Upon the leaſt Ouſe, where Thet a ſmall brooke breaking out of Suffolke, meeteth and runneth with him, in a low ground, was ſeated that ancient City SITOMAGUS which Antonine the Emperour maketh mention of, corruptly in the Fragments of an old Choragraphicall table called SIMOMAGUS and SINOMAGUS now Thetford, in the Saxon language Ðeoꝺꝛoꝺ in which remaineth part of the former name with the addition of the Engliſh word Ford. For, like as Sitomagus in the Brittiſh tongue implieth a Citie by the river Sit, which now is Thet for Magus as Plinie ſheweth, ſignified a City) ſo Thetford in Engliſh betokeneth the Ford of Thet; neither are theſe two names Sit and Thet much unlike in ſound. There are in it at this day but few Inhabitants, although it be of a good bigneſſe; but in times paſt it was very populous; and beſide other tokens of antiquity it hath ſtill to bee ſeene a great Mount raiſed to a good height by mens hands; fenſed with a double rampier, and as the report goeth, fortified in ancient time with walles: which was a Romane worke as ſome thinke, or rather of the Engliſh Saxon Kings, as others would have it, under whom it flouriſhed a long time. But after it was ſacked, firſt by Suenus the Dane, who in a rage ſet it on fire in the yeere 1004; and ſixe yeers after being ſpoyled againe by the furious Danes, it loſt all the beauty and dignity that it had. For the recovery whereof, Biſhop Arfaſt removed his Epiſcopall See from Elmham hither, and Biſhop William his ſucceſſor did all he could to adorne and ſet it out: ſo that, under King Edward the Confeſſour, there were counted in it 947. Burgeſſes, and in William the Conquerours time 720. Manſions: whereof 224. ſtood void, and the chiefe Magiſtrate was termed a Conſul, which name may intimate that it was a Roman towne. But when Biſhop

Biſhop Herbert (ſurnamed Loſenga, for that he was compoſed of Leaſing and Flattery) the third Prelate that by evill meanes and Simony climbed up to this Dignity, had removed his ſeat from hence to Norwich, it fell againe to decay, and as it were languiſhed. Neither could it ſufficiently bee comforted for the abſence of the Biſhop, by the Abbay of Cluniac Monkes, which by his meanes was built. This Abbay, Hugh Bigod built out of the ground: For ſo writeth he in the Inſtrument of the foundation. I Hugh Bigod Steward to King Henry, by his graunt and by the adviſe of Herbert Biſhop of Norwich, have ordained Monkes of the Order of Cluny, in the Church of S. Mary which was the Epiſcopall ſeat of Thetford, which I gave unto them, and afterwards founded another more meete for their uſe, without the Towne. Howbeit even then, the greateſt part of that Citty that ſtood on the hithermore Banke by little and little fell to the ground: the other part although it was much decayed, yet one or two Ages agoe flouriſhed with ſeaven Churches, beſides three ſmall religious Houſes, whereof the one was, by report erected in the memoriall of the Engliſhmen and Danes ſlaine here. For hard by as our Hiſtorians doe record, Edmund that moſt holy King a litle before his death fought Seaven houres and more with the Danes not without an horrible ſlaughter, and afterwards gave over the battaile on even hand; ſuch was the alternative fortune of the Field, that it drave both ſides paſt their ſenſes.

By Waveney the other River of thoſe twaine, that bound this Shire and runneth Eaſtward, not farre from the Spring head thereof, are ſeene Buckenham and Kenninghall. This which may ſeeme to have the name left unto it of the Iceni, is the Seat of that moſt honourable Family of the Howards, whoſe glory is ſo great, that the envy of Bucchanan cannot empaire it. As for the other, ſo named, as I take it of Beech trees which the Saxons called Bucken; it is a faire and ſtrong Caſtle, built by William de Aubigny the Norman, (unto whom the Conqueror had given the place) and by his heires that were ſucceſſively Earles of Arundell, it deſcended to the Tatſalls, and from them by Caly and the Cliftons unto the family of the Knevets. Theſe are of an ancient houſe and renowned ever ſince Sir Iohn Knevet was Lord Chancellour of England under King Edward the Third, and alſo honourably allied by great marriages. For over and beſide theſe of Buckenham, from hence ſprang thoſe right worſhipfull knights, Sir Thomas Knevet Lord Knevet, Sir Henry Knevet of Wiltſhire, and Sir Thomas Knevet of Aſhellwell Thorpe and others. This Aſhellwell Thorpe is a little Towne nere adjoyning, which from the Thorpes in times paſt of Knights degree, by the Tilneis and the L. L. Bourchiers of Berners, is devolved at length hereditarily unto that Sir Thomas Knevet before named. As for that Buckenham, aforeſaid, it is holden by this tenure and condition, that the Lords thereof ſhould at the Coronation of the Kings of England be the Kings Butlers that day. Like as, (a thing that may beſeeme the noting) in Charleton a little neighbour village, Raulph de Carleton and ſome one other, held lands by this ſervice, namely, To preſent an hundred Herring-Pies or Paſties, when Herrings firſt come in, unto their Soveraigne Lord the King, whereſoever he be in England.

But this river neare to his ſpring runneth by and by under Diſce, now Dis, a prety towne well knowne; which King Henry the Firſt gave frankely to Sir Richard Lucy, and hee ſtraightwayes paſſed it over to Walter Fitz-Robert with his Daughter: of whoſe Poſterity Robert Fitz-Walter obtained for this place the liberty of keeping Mercat, at the hands of King Edward the Firſt. From thence, although Waveney bee on each ſide beſet with Townes, yet there is not one amongſt them that may boaſt of any Antiquity: unleſſe it bee Harleſton a good Mercate, and Shelton that ſtandeth farther of, both which have given ſurnames to the ancient Families of the Sheltons and Harleſtons: but before it commeth to the Sea, it coupleth it ſelfe with the river Yare, which the Britans called Guerne, the Engliſhmen Gerne, and Iere, of Alder trees, no doubt, ſo termed in Britiſh wherewith it is overſhadowed. It ariſeth out of the mids of this Countrie, not farre from Gernſton a little Towne that tooke name thereof, and hath hard by it Hengham, which had Lords, deſcended from Iohn Mareſcall (Nephew by the brother to William Mareſcall Earle of Penbroch) upon whom King John beſtowed it with the Lands of Hugh de Gornay, a Traitour, and alſo with the daughert

A daughter and coheire of Hubert de Rhia. From this Mareſcals it paſſed in revolution of time, unto the Lord Morleis, and from them by Lovell unto the Parkers, now Lords Morley. A little from hence is Sculton, otherwiſe called Burdos or Burdelois, which was held by this Tenure, That the Lord thereof on the Coronation day of the Kings of England, ſhould be chiefe Lardiner. Joint-neighbour to Sculton is Wood-Riſing the faire ſeate of the Family of Southwels, which received the greateſt reputation and encreaſe from Sir Richard Southwell Privie Councellour to King Edward the Sixth; and his Brother Sir Robert Maſter of the Rowles.

More Eaſtward is to be ſeene Wimundham, now ſhort, Windham, famous for the Albineys Earles of Arundell, there enterred: whoſe Anceſtor and Progenitor William D' Albiney, Butler to King Henry the Firſt founded the Priory, and gave it to the Abbay of Saint Albans for a Cell, which afterward was advanced to an Abbay. Upon the Steeple whereof, which is of a great height, William Ket one of the Captaines of the Norfolke Rebels, in the yeare of our Lord 1549. was hanged on high. Neither would it bee paſſed over in ſilence, that five miles from hence ſtandeth Attilborrough, the ſeate of the Mortimers, an ancient Family, who being different from thoſe of Wigmor, bare for their Armes, A Shield, Or, Semè de floures de Lyz Sables, and founded heere a Collegiat Church, where there is little now to bee ſeene. The Inheritance of theſe Mortimers hath by marriage long ſince accrued to the Ratcliffs, now Earles of Suſſex, to the Family of Fitz-Ralph, and to Sir Ralph Bigot. But returne we now to the River.

The ſaid Yare hol deth not his courſe farre into the Eaſt, before he taketh Wentſum a Riveret (others call it Wentfar) from the South, into his ſtreame: upon which, neere unto the head thereof, there is a foure ſquare Rampier at Taiesborrough, containing foure and twenty Acres. It may ſeeme to have beene a Campe place of the Romans, if it be not that which in an old Chorographicall Table or Map publiſhed by Marcus Welſerus, is called AD TAUM. Somewhat higher, upon the ſame River, ſtood VENTA ICENORUM, the moſt flouriſhing City, (for a little one) in times paſt of all this people; but now having loſt the old name, it is called Caſter. And no marvaile, that of the three VENTÆ, Cities of Britain, this onely loſt the name, ſeeing it hath quite loſt it ſelfe. For, beſide the ruines of the Walles, which containe within a ſquare plot or quadrant, about thirty acres, and tokens appearing upon the ground where ſometimes houſes ſtood, and ſome few peeces of Romane money which are now and then there digged up, there is nothing at all remaining. But out of this ancient VENTA, in the ſucceeding ages, Norwich had her beginning, about three miles from hence, neere unto the confluents of Yare and another nameleſſe River (ſome call it Bariden) where they meet in one: which River with a long courſe running in and out by Fakenham, which King Henry the firſt gave to Hugh Capell, and King John afterward to the Earle of Arundell; and making many crooked reaches, ſpeedeth it ſelfe this way by Attilbridge to Yare, and leaveth Horsford North from it: where a Caſtle of William * Cheneys, who in the Raigne of Henry the Second, was one of the great Lords and chiefe Peeres of England, lieth overgrowne with buſhes and brambles. This NORVVICH is a famous City, called in the Engliſh Saxon tongue Noꝛ̃ꝺpyc, that is, a Northerly Creeke, if Wic among the Saxons ſignifieth the creeke or Cove of a River, as Rhenanus ſheweth unto us: for, in this very place the River runneth downe amaine with a crooked and winding compaſſe: or, a Northerne Station, if Wic, as Hadrianus Iunius would have it, betokeneth a ſure and ſecure ſtation or place of aboad; where dwelling houſes ſtand joyntly and cloſe together: or a Northerly Caſtle, if Wic ſound as much as Caſtle, as our * Archbiſhop Alfrick the Saxon hath interpreted it. But if I ſhould with ſome others be of opinion that Norwich by a little turning is derived from Venta, what ſhould I doe but turne awry from the very truth? For by no better right may it challenge unto it ſelfe the name of Venta, than either Baſil in Germany, the name of AUGUSTA, or Baldach of BABYLON. For, like as Baldach had the beginning of Babylons fall; and Baſil ſprang from the ruine of Auguſta: even ſo our Norwich appeared and ſhewed it ſelfe, though it were late, out of that ancient

VENTA, which, the Britiſh name thereof Caer Guntum in Authours, doth prove: wherein, like as in the River Wentſum or Wentſar the name of Venta doth moſt plainely diſcover it ſelfe. For, this name Norwich wee cannot reade of any where in our Chronicles before the Daniſh warres. A

So farre is it off, that either Cæſar or Guiteline the Britain built it, as they write who are more haſty to beleeve all than to weigh matters with ſound judgement. But now, verily, by reaſon of the wealth, the number of Inhabitants, and reſort of people, the faire buildings, and faire Churches, and thoſe ſo many, (for it containeth about thirty Pariſhes) the painefull induſtry of the Citizens, their loyalty towards their Prince, and their courteſie unto ſtrangers, it is worthily to bee ranged with the moſt celebrate Cities of Britaine. It is right pleaſantly ſituate on the ſide of an Hill two and fifty Degrees and forty Scrupuls from the Æquator, and foure and twenty Degrees and five and fifty Scrupuls in Longitude. The forme is ſomewhat long: lying out in length from South to North a mile and an halfe: but carrying in breadth, about halfe ſo much, drawing it ſelfe in by little and little at the South end in manner, as it were, of a cone or ſharpe point. Compaſſed it is about with ſtrong walles (in which are orderly placed many Turrets, and twelve gates) unleſſe it bee on the Eaſt-ſide; where the River (after it hath with many windings in and out watered the North part of the City, having foure Bridges for men to paſſe to and fro over it) is a Fence thereto, with his deepe Chanell there, and high ſteepe bankes. In the very infancy, as I may ſo ſay, of this City, when Etheldred a witleſſe and unadviſed Prince raigned, Sueno or Swan the Dane who ranged at his pleaſure through England with a great rable of ſpoiling Ravenours, firſt put it to the ſacke, and afterwards ſet it on fire. Yet it revived againe, and as wee reade in that Domeſday booke wherein William the Conquerour tooke the review of all England, there were by account in King Edward the Confeſſours time, no fewer than one thouſand three hundred and twenty Burgeſſes in it. At which time (that I may ſpeake out of the ſame Booke) *It paid unto the King twenty pounds and to the Earle ten pounds: and beſide all this twenty ſhillings, and foure Prebendaries, and ſixe Sextars of Honey; alſo a Beare and ſixe Dogges for to bait the Beare: but now it paieth ſeventy pounds by weight to the King, and an hundred ſhillings for a * Gerſume to the Queene, and an ambling Palfrey: alſo twenty pounds Blanc to the Earle, and twenty ſhillings for a Gerſume by tale.* But while the ſaid King William raigned, that flaming fire of fatall ſedition, which Ralph Earle of Eaſt England had kindled againſt the King, ſettled it ſelfe heere. For, when hee had ſaved himſelfe by flight, his wife together with the French Britons endured in this place a moſt grievous Siege even to extreme famine: yet at length driven ſhe was to this hard pinch that ſhe fled the land, and this City was ſo empaired, that ſcarce 560. Burgeſſes were left in it, as we reade in that Domeſday booke. Of this yeelding up of the City Lanfrank Archbiſhop of Canterbury maketh mention in his Epiſtle to King William, in theſe words. Your Kingdome is purged of theſe villanous and filthy Britons, The Caſtle of Norwich is rendred up into your hands. And the Britons who were therein and had lands in England, having life and limme granted unto them, are ſworne within forty dayes to depart out of your Realme, and not enter any more into it without your leave and licence. From that time beganne it againe to recover it ſelfe by little and little out of this diluge of calamities, and Biſhop Herbert, whoſe good name was cracked for his foule Simony, tranſlated the Epiſcopall See from Thetford hither, and built up a very faire Cathedral Church on the Eaſt ſide and lower part of the City, in a certaine place then called Cow-holme, neere unto the Caſtle. The firſt ſtone whereof in the Raigne of King William Rufus, and in the yeare after Chriſts Nativity 1096. himſelfe laid, with this inſcription. B C D E F

DOMINUS HERBERTUS POSUIT PRIMUM LAPIDEM IN NOMINE PATRIS, FILII, ET SPIRITUS SANCTI. AMEN.

That is.

A LORD [BISHOP] HERBERT LAID THE FIRST STONE IN THE NAME OF THE FATHER, THE SONNE, AND HOLY GHOST, AMEN.

Afterwards, he procured of Pope Paschal that it should be established, and confirmed for the Mother Church of Norfolke and Suffolke: he endowed it bountifully with as much lands, as might sufficiently maintaine threescore Monkes, who had there faire and spacious Cloysters. But after that they were thrust out by King Henry the Eight, there were substituted for them a Deane, sixe Prebendaries and others. The Church being thus built and an Episcopall See there placed, the Towne now (as B saith William of Malmesbury) became of great name for frequent trade of Merchants and resort of people. And in the 17. yeare of King Stephen, as we reade in old Annals, Norwich was founded a new, became a well peopled City, and was made a Corporation. And most certaine it is out of the kings Records, that king Stephen granted it unto his sonne William for his Appennage, as they terme it, or inheritance. Out of whose hands King Henry the Second shortly after wrested it by composition and kept it for himselfe: And albeit his Sonne Henry, called the younger King, when he aspired ambitiously to the kingdome, had made a large promise thereof unto Hugh Bigod Earle of Norfolke whom hee had drawne to side with him. At which time Bigod taking part with the young King, who could not containe his hope of the Kingdome within C the bounds of duty and equity, most grievously afflicted and oppressed this City: and then as it is thought reedified that Castle standing within the very City upon an high hill neere unto the Cathedrall Church, which being compassed with a ditch of a wonderfull depth seemed in those daies impregnable. Which notwithstanding, Lewis the French-man, with whom the seditious Barons of England combined against King John, won it easily by Siege. Now, that Bigod reedified this Castle I verily beleeve, because I have seen Lions Saliens engraven there in a Stone after the same forme that the Bigods used in times past in their Seales: of whom also there was one that in his Seale used a Crosse. These things fell out in the first age (we may say) of Norwich.

But in the age next ensuing, it encreased mightily and flourished, by reason that the D Citizens grew to be passing wealthy, who exhibited a supplication in the Parliament house unto King Edward the First, that they might be permitted to wall their City about, which they afterwards performed to the exceeding great strengthning and honor thereof. They obtained moreover of King Richard the Second, that the Worsted made there might be transported: and in the yeare 1403. king Henry the fourth granted that they might choose every yeare a Major in stead of their Bailiffes, which before were the principall Magistrates. They built likewise a passing faire Towne-house in the very middest of the City neere unto the Mercat-place, which on certaine set dayes is furnished exceeding well with all things necessary for mans life. And verily much beholden it is unto the * Netherlanders, that being weary of Duke de * Or Dutch-and first brought in the making and trade of saies, baies, and other stuffes now much in use. But why should I stand long upon these things, when as Alexander Nevill a Gentleman well borne and very learned hath notably described all these matters, together with the story of their Bishops, the orderly succession of their Magistrates, and the furious outrage of that most villanous Rebell Ket against this City? This only will I adde, that in the yeare 1583. the Citizens conveighed water out of the River through pipes by an artificiall Instrument or water-forcer up into the highest places of the City. Heere I may justly commence an action both against Polydor Virgill an Italian, and also against Angelus Capellus a Frenchman, and put them to their answer F before the Tribunal of venerable Antiquity, why they have avouched that the ancient ORDOVICES, who be seated, as it were in another world, inhabited this Norwich, I would have the same mery action also against our Country man D. Caius, but that I know for certaine that the good old man, right learned though he were, was blinded in this point with the naturall love of this his own native Country. Neither have I more to say of Norwich unlesse it may please you to runne over these Verses of Master Iohn Ionston a Scottish-Britan written of the same.
E Alba his cruelty, and hating the bloudy Inquisition, repaired hither in great numbers men of the Low countries.

Vrbs speciosa situ, nitidis pulcherrima tectis, Grata peregrinis, delitiosa suis.
Bellorum sedes, trepido turbante tumultu,
Tristia Neustriaco sub duce damna tulit.
Victis dissidijs, postquam caput ardua cœlo
Extulit, immensis crevit opima opibus.
Cultus vincit opes, & cultum gratia rerum,
Quam benè? si luxus non comitetur opes.
Omnia sic adeò sola hæc sibi sufficit, ut si
Fors regno desit, hæc caput esse queat.

A City seated daintily, most faire built she is knowne, Pleasing and kinde to Strangers all, delightfull to her owne.
The seat of warre whiles civill sturs and tumults yet remain'd,
In William the Normans dayes, she grievous losse sustain'd,
These broiles and jarres once past, when as her head aloft againe
She bare, in richnesse infinite and wealth she grew amaine.
Her Port exceeds that wealth, and things all superfine, this Port
How happy were it, if excesse with such wealth did not sort.
So all sufficient in her selfe, and so complete is shee,
That if neede were, of all the Realme the Mistresse shee might bee.

A Ruffe. De Rariorum animalium, Historia.

From Norwich, the River Yare having entertained other beackes and brookes as guests, yet all under his owne name, passeth on still with many winding crookes very full of the fishes called Ruffes, which name because in English it soundeth like to Rough, D. Caius named it aptly in Latine Aspredo, that is, Rough. For, it is all the body over, rough and hath very sharpe and pricky finnes: it delighteth in sandy places; for shape and bignesse like unto a Perch; in colour browne and duskish above, but palish yellow beneath: marked by the chawes with a double course of half-circles: the eye for the upper halfe of it of a darke browne, for the nether somewhat yellowish like delayed gold, the ball and sight thereof blacke. This speciall marke by it selfe it hath, that there is a line goeth along the backe, and fastened to the body (as it were) with an overthwart thred, all to bespotted ouer the taile and fins with blacke speckes: which finnes when the fish is angry stand up and bristle stiffe and strong: but when the anger is allayed they fall flat againe. The meat of this Ruffe resembleth that of the Perch, much commended for holsomnesse; and for eating tender and short.

Halles-hall.

When Yare is gone past Claxton, where there stands a Castlet built round, which Sir Thomas Gawdy knight Justice of the Common Pleas of late repaired, it receiveth a brooke which passeth by nothing memorable but Halles-hall, and that only memorable for his ancient Owner Sir Iames Hobart Atturney Generall and of the Privie Counsell to King Henry the Seventh (by him dubbed Knight at such time as he created Henry his sonne Prince of Wales) who by building from the ground the faire Church at Loddon being his Parish Church, Saint Olaves bridge over Waveney that divideth Norfolke and Suffolke, the cawsey thereby, and other works of piety, deserved well of the Church, his Country, and the Common-weale, and planted three houses of his owne Issue, out of the second whereof Sir Henry Hobart his great Grandchilde now likewise Atturney Generall to King Iames is lineally descended. Now Yare approching neerer to the Sea, runneth downe Southward, that so it may shed it selfe more gently into the salt sea waves, and thereby maketh a little languet of land like a tongue thrust out, which it selfe of one side watereth, and the Sea on the other beateth upon. On this languet I saw standing in a most open plaine shore, Yarmouth, in the English-Saxon Gar-muð, and lier-muð, that is, Yares-mouth, a very convenient Haven, and as faire a Towne, beautifully built and passing well fensed both by the naturall strength of the place and also by the skilfull industry of mans Art. For although it bee environed almost round with Water, on the West side with the River which hath a Draw Bridge over it, and from other Partes with the Ocean, unlesse it bee North-Garienis Ostium. Yarmouth.

A Northward where there is firme land: yet is it in moſt ſightly manner encloſed with a good ſtrong wall, which together with the River make a ſquare forme of foure ſides, but ſomewhat long: upon which wall, beſide Towres, there is caſt a mount toward the Eaſt, from whence the great Peeces of Ordnance uſe to thunder and flaſh all about into the Sea under it, which is ſcarce 60. paces off. It hath indeed but one Church, yet the ſame is very large, having a paſſing high ſpire ſteeple to adorne it, built by Herbert Biſhop of Norwich hard by the North gate: under which are to be ſeene the foundations brought above ground of a goodly peece of worke to enlarge the ſame. That this was that old Towne GARIANONUM, where, in times paſt, the Stableſian Horſemen kept their ſtanding watch and ward againſt the barbarous ene- Garianonum.
B mies, I dare not affirme; neither doe I thinke that Garianonum was where Caſter is now (in times paſt the faire ſeat of Sir John Faſtolfe, a moſt martiall knight, and now appertaining to the Paſtons) albeit it is much celebrated among the Inhabitants for the antiquity thereof, and the fame goeth that the River Yare had another mouth or paſſage into the Sea under it.

But, as I am perſwaded that GARIANONUM ſtood at Burgh-caſtle in Suffolke, which is on the other banke about two miles off, ſo I am eaſily induced to thinke, that both Yarmouth aroſe out of the ruines thereof, and alſo that the ſaid Caſter was one of the Roman Forts, placed alſo upon the mouth of Yare, that now is ſtopped up. For, like as the * North Weſterne Winde doth play the Tyrant upon Holland * Caurus.
C over againſt it, and by drift of Shelves and Sand-heapes hath choked the mid- deſt of the Rhene-mouthes: even ſo the * North-Eaſt Winde afflicteth and annoi- * Aquilo.
eth this Coaſt, and driveth the ſand on heapes, ſo as it may ſeeme to have dammed up this mouth alſo.

Neither will it be prejudiciall to the Truth, if I ſhould name our Yarmouth, GARIANONUM, being ſo neere adjoyning as it is, unto the old Garianonum: conſidering that Gerienũ the River, whence it tooke the name, having now changed his chanell, entreth into the maine Sea a little beneath this Towne, which it hath alſo given name unto: For, I muſt needs confeſſe, that this our Yarmouth is of later memory. For, when that ancient Garianonum aforeſaid was decayed, and there was no Garriſon to D defend the Shore, Cerdick a warlike Saxon landed here (whereupon the Inhabitants Cerdicus the Saxon.
at this day call the place Cerdick-ſand, and the Writers of Hiſtories, Cerdick-ſhore) and Cerdick ſand.
after hee had made ſore war upon the Iceni, tooke Sea and ſailed from hence into the Weſt parts, where he erected the Kingdome of the Weſt Saxons. And not long after, the Saxons in ſtead of Garianonum, founded a new Towne in that moiſt and wateriſh ground, neer the Weſt ſide of the River and named it Yarmouth: But finding the Situation thereof not to be healthfull, they betooke themſelves to the other ſide of the River called then of the ſame Cerdicke, Cerdick-ſand, and built this new Towne, in which there flouriſhed in King Edward the Confeſſour his daies 70. Burgeſſes, as William Worceſter.
wee finde recorded in the * Notitia of England. After this, about the yeare of our * Domeſday booke.
E Redemption 1340. the Townesmen ſtrengthned it with a wall, and in ſhort ſpace it grew ſo rich and puiſſant, that oftentimes in ſeafights they ſet upon their neighbors of Leſtoffe, yea and the * Portmen, for ſo termed they the Inhabitants of the Cinque * Portuenſes.
Ports, not without much bloud ſhed on both ſides. For they were moſt ſpitefully bent againſt them, haply for being excluded out of the number of the Cinque Ports, and deprived of theſe priviledges which old Garianonum or Yarmouth, and their Anceſtours, enjoyed under the * Comes of the Saxon Shore in elder times. * Lieutenant.
But this their ſtoutneſſe was repreſſed at length and taken downe by the Kings Authority: or as ſome thinke, their luſty courage became abated by that moſt grievous and lamentable plague, which in one yeare, within this one little Towne brought F 7000. to their graves. The which is witneſſed by an ancient Latine Chronographicall Table hanging up in the Church, wherein are ſet downe alſo their warres with the Portmen and Leſtoffians aforeſaid.

Since that time, their hearts have not beene ſo haughty, nor their wealth ſo great, to make them bold: howbeit painfully they follow the trade of Merchandiſe, Herrings.

Halecum. and taking of Herrings (which the learned thinke to bee Chalcides and Leucomenides) a kinde of fish more plentifull heere than in any other Coast of the world againe. For, it may seeme incredible how great a Faire, and with what resort of people, is holden heere at the Feast of Saint Michael, and what store of Herrings and other fish is then bought and sold. At which time, they of the Cinque Ports Portuenses. aboue-said by an old order and custome, appoint their Bailiffs, Commissioners, and send them hither, who, that I may speake out of their owne Patent or Commission, together with the Magistrates of this Towne, during the time of the free Faire, hold a Court, for matters concerning the Faire, doe execute the Kings Iustice, and keepe the Kings peace. As for the Haven below the Towne, it is very commodious both for the inhabitants and for Norwich-men also: but for feare that it should be barred and stopped up, they wrestle as it were, to their great cost and charges, with the maine Sea: which to make them amends and to restore what it hath eaten and swallowed up elsewhere in this Shore, hath by heaping of earth and sand together, cast up here of late a prety Island.

The river Thyrn. At this mouth also, another River, which some call Thyrn sheddeth it selfe together with Yare into the sea: This River springing up neere unto Holt a towne so called of an Holt or tuft of trees, and for the Mercat well knowne, running about five miles distant from Yare, holdeth on a joynt course a great way and keepeth pace with him, Blickling. by Blickling, now the seat of the ancient Family of Clere who in former times dwelt Ailesham. at Ormesby; and by Ailesham a Mercat Towne of good resort, where the Earle of * Athole in Scotland had lands not farre from Worsted, whereas I reade, the Stuffe Worsted. Worsted Stuffe. Worsted, in so great request amongst our Ancestours, was first made; and hence so named, as Dornicks, Cameric, Calecut, &c. had in like manner their denomination from the places where they were first invented, and made. Then passeth Thyrn neere Saint Benets in the Holme. the decayed great Abbay called Saint Benet in the Holme: which Knut the Dane built, and the Monkes afterward so strengthned with most strong wals and bulwark, that it seemed rather a Castle than a Cloister. In so much, that William the Conquerour could not winne it by assault, untill a Monke betraied it into his hands upon this condition, that himselfe might bee made Abbot thereof. Which was done accordingly: but forthwith, this new Abbot for being a Traitour, (as the Inhabitants make report) was hanged up by the Kings commandement, and so justly punished for this treason. But the ground in this Island or Holme is so fenny and rotten, that if a man cut up the strings and rootes of trees, and shrubs there growing, it floteth aloft on the water, and is ready to follow one whither he will have it. And some there be who thinke, by the Perwinkles and Cocles that other while are digged up there; that the Sea had broken in thither. From thence runneth this River downe by Ludham, Ludham. Clipsby. an house of the Bishops of Norwich, and by Clipsby, which gave name to a Family of ancient note in his Tract, and straightway uniteth his owne streame with the Yare. From the mouth of Yare the shore goeth directly (as it were) North, to Winterton a point or cape very well knowne to Sailers, which tooke that name, I suppose, of the cold and winterly Situation. For, it lieth full upon the Ocean, the father of windes and cold, who with exceeding violence rusheth against the bankes and piles that are A most fat and battle ground. opposed against him. Howbeit, the Country adjoyning round about, in many mens opinion hath the fattest Soile and softest mould of any country in all England, as which asketh least labour, and yeeldeth most fruit. For, with a silly jade, (as Plinie writeth of Bizacium in Africke) and a poore old woman at one side of the yoake drawing the plough, it is easily broken up, and eared. From Winterton immediately the shore turning Westward, the sea retireth, without any bearing out in manner at all, along a flat and low coast, as farre as to Eccles, which is almost overflowed and drowned with Bronholme. the Ocean. From thence it carrieth an higher shore, by Bronholme sometime a Priory founded and enriched by G. Glanvill, and seated upon the sharpe top of an hill, the Crosse whereof our ancestours had in holy reverence, I know not for what miracles. * Next it is Paston a small townlet which yet hath given surname to a Family growne Paston. Not far hence is Gimmingham, which with other Manors, John Earle of Warren and Surrie gave in times paſt to Thomas Earle of Lancaſter, and by Cromer where the neighbour Inhabitants with great expenſe went about to make an Havenet, but to ſmall purpoſe, the Ocean ſo furiouſly played the Tyrant and made reſiſtance. Thence the Shore runneth forth to Wauburne-hope; a Creeke fortified in our time, ſo called of Wauburne a little Towne, unto which by the interceſſion of Oliver de Burdeaux, King Edward the Second granted the Liberty of keeping a Mercat: Next unto it is Clay, and over againſt it with a little River running betweene, Blackney, our Country man Bale calleth it Nigeria, a famous Houſe of Carmelite Friers in this late age afore going, built by Sir Robert de Roos, Sir Ro-B bert Bacon, and John Bret: out of which came John Baconthorp, ſo named of the place of his nativity, (which now is the habitation of the Heidons, an ancient Race of Knights degree) A man in that age of ſuch variety and depth withall of excellent learning, that hee was had in exceeding great admiration among the Italians, and commonly called The Reſolute Doctor. Whence it is, that Paulus Panſa thus writeth of him. If thy minde ſtand to enter into the ſecret power of the Almighty and moſt mercifull God, no man hath written of his Eſſence more exactly. If any man deſireth to learne the cauſes of things, or the effects of Nature; if hee wiſh to know the ſundry motions of Heaven, and the contrary qualities of the Elements, this man offereth himſelfe as a ſtore-

More within the Country is Walſingham ſcarce foure miles from hence: whereupon it is that of the vicinity unto the Sea Eraſmus calleth it Parathalaſſia. Very famous now is this Village by reaſon of the beſt Saffron growing there: but of late time as much renowned through all England for a Pilgrimage to our Ladie the Virgin Mary: whom hee who had not in that former Age viſited and preſented with D offerings, was reputed irreligious. But this ſhall Eraſmus an eye-witneſſe deſcribe in his owne very words. Not farre from the Sea, (ſaith hee) about foure miles, there ſtandeth a Towne living almoſt of nothing elſe but upon the reſort of Pilgrimes. There is a Colledge of Chanons, yet ſuch, as unto whom the Latiniſts have given the addition of Regulares, a middle kinde betwixt Monkes and thoſe Chanons whom they terme Secular: This Colledge hath ſcarce any other Revenewes than from the liberality of the ſaid Virgin. For certaine of the greater Preſents and Oblations are layed up and preſerved. But if there be any money offered or ought elſe, of ſmall value, that goeth unto the maintenance of the Covent, and their Head or Preſident, whom they call Prior. The Church is faire and neat; yet in it the Virgin dwelleth not: that honour forſooth, ſhee hath done unto her Sonne: ſhee hath her Church
E by her ſelfe, but ſo, as that ſhee may bee on the right hand of her Sonne. Neither doth ſhee dwell heere for all this, for why, the Building is not yet finiſhed, and the place hath a through light and ayre on all ſides, with open doores and wide open windowes; the Ocean Sea withall, the father and foſter of windes is hard by. In that Church, which I ſaid was unfiniſhed, there is a ſmall Chappell, but all of wood, whereinto on either ſide at a narrow and little Doore are ſuch admitted as come with their Devotions and Offerings. Small light there is in it, and none other in manner but by tapers or wax-candles, yeelding a moſt dainty and pleaſant ſmell. Nay if you looke into it, you would ſay it were the Habitation of heavenly Saints indeed, ſo bright ſhining it is all over with pretious Stones, with Gold and Silver. But with-
F in the memory of our fathers, when King Henry the Eighth had ſet his minde and eye both, upon the Riches and Poſſeſſions of Churches, all this vaniſhed quite away. Touching Walſingham, I have nothing elſe to ſay more, but that the Family of the Walſinghams, Knights (as they will have it that curiouſly ſearch after Genealogies) fetched firſt their name and Originall from hence: Out of which houſe flouriſhed that Sir Francis Walſingham, Secretary unto Queene Elizabeth, a man as of deepe insight, so also of as rare and painfull industry in the weightiest affaires of the Realme. But hard by it at Houghton, flourished sometime the noble Family of the Neirfords, who by matching in marriage with * Parnel de Vallibus (who had about Holt, Cley, and elsewhere a goodly Inheritance) was greatly enriched. But now let us looke backe againe to the Shore.

Houghton. The Neirfords. * Petronilla Vaulx.

Neere unto Walsingham Westward, upon the Sea side, was that ancient Towne BRANNODUNUM, where when the Saxons first molested Britaine with their Invasions, The Dalmatian Horsemen lay in Garrison under the Lieutenant of the Saxon Shore. But now it is a country Village, reteining nought but the remaines of that name, and shewing a Trench and Rampire (the neighbour Inhabitants call it the Castle) that containeth within it a plot of ground much about eight Acres, and is named Brancaster, where peeces of Romane money are many times gotten out of the earth. Very commodiously was there a Garrison planted in this place: for at S. Edmunds Chappell neere adjoyning, and Hunstanton, built by that holy King Saint Edmund, the coast draweth backe into the South, and so admitteth a larger creeke for the Sea to enter into, lying open for Pirats, into which many Rivers also doe void themselves. As for Hunstanton, it is to be remembred in this regard, if there were nothing else, for that it hath beene the Habitation of the Family of Le Strange, Knights by degree, ever since that in the Raigne of Edward the Second, Iohn Baron Le Strange of Knockin, gave the same unto Hamon his younger Brother.

The catching of Hawkes, and the plentifull fishing, the Ieat and Amber also found oftentimes in this Shore I wittingly omit, seeing that there is great store of these things else where along this Tract. Yet Sharnborn in this Coast is not to be omitted both for that Fœlix the Burgundian who brought these East Englishmen to the Christian Faith and state of perpetuall Felicity, built in this place the second Church of Christians in this Country (for the first, he founded at Babingley where he landed) as also becaufe it is verily thought and that by the faithfull testimony of old deeds and evidences, that an old Englishman Lord of this place before the comming of the Normans, by vertue of sentence given judicially in open Court by William Conquerour himselfe, recovered this Lordship against Warren, unto whom the Conquerour had given it. Which argument they enforce hard, who would prove that the said William entred upon the Possession of England by Covenant and agreement, and not by right of warre and Conquest.

Sharnborn. Fœlix a Bishop.

The foresaid Creeke or Bay, our Country men call the Washes, Ptolomee termed it AESTUARIUM METARIS, haply for Malthraith, by which name the Britains called the like Frithes and Armes of the Sea in other places: neither doth it signifie among them any other thing than an Arme of the Sea uncertainly changing the chanell such as this is: Upon this, where the River Ouse striveth forcibly against the Ocean, standeth Linne, peradventure so named of the waters broad spreading; For that doth Lhyn import in the * British tongue. A large Towne this is, encompassed with a deepe trench and wals for the most part thereof, divided by two small Rivers that have fifteene bridges or thereabout over them: and although it be of no great antiquity and not long since called Linnum Episcopi, that is, Bishops Linne, becaufe it appertained to the Bishops of Norwich, untill King Henry the Eighth his daies, for it had beginning out of the ruines of an elder Towne which stood over against it in Marshland, and is at this day called Old Linne and Linnum Regis, that is, Kings Linne; yet by reason of the safe Haven which yeeldeth most easie accesse, for the number also of Merchants there dwelling, and thither resorting, for the faire and the goodly houses, the wealth also of the townesmen, it is doubtlesse the principall towne of this Shire except Norwich onely. It hath likewise most large franchises and immunities, which the Inhabitants bought with their owne bloud of King John, whiles they tooke part with him and defended his quarrell, who ordained there a Major, and delivered unto them his owne sword to be carried before him, yea and gave unto them a silver cup all gilt, which they still doe keep. These their liberties being afterwards lost, they redeemed not without bloud also, of King Henry the Third, when siding with him and

A and ſerving under his Banner, they fought an unfortunate battaile againſt the outlawed Lords in the Iſle of Ely, as the booke of Ely and Mathew Paris doe both joyntly witneſſe.

Over againſt Linne, on the farther ſide of the River lieth Merſhland, a little moiſt merſh country, as the name implieth, divided and parted every where with ditches, trenches and furrowes to draine and draw the waters away: a ſoile ſtanding upon a very rich and fertile mould, and breeding abundance of cattell: in ſo much as that in a place commonly called Tilneyſmeth there feed much about 30000. ſheepe: but ſo ſubject to the beating, and overflowing of the roaring maine Sea, which very often breaketh, teareth, and troubleth it ſo grievouſly, that hardly it can be holden B off with chargeable wals and workes. The places of greater note in this Merſhland, are theſe: Walpole, which the Lord of the place gave in times paſt unto the Church of Ely together with his ſonne, whom he had made a Monke there: Wigenhall, the poſſeſſion of I. Howard in the Raigne of Edward the Firſt, whoſe Poſterity ſpred, and became a moſt honorable and noble Family, whereof I have already ſpoken: Tilney, whence in old time the ſtocke of the Tilneys, Knights, tooke name; and Saint Maries the ſeat of the ancient race of the Carvils. Tilney. S. Maries.

Now have we paſſed along all the Sea-coaſt. As for the inner part of the Country, there are alſo very many Townes toward the Weſt ſide, but becauſe they bee of later memory, I will briefly runne them over. Neere to Linne upon an high hill ſtandeth C Riſing-caſtle, almoſt matchable to the Caſtle of Norwich; the ſeat in times paſt of the Albineys; afterwards of Robert de Monthault, by one of the ſiſters and coheires of Hugh Albiney Earle of Arundell; and at laſt the manſion place of the Mowbrays: who, as I have learned, came out of the ſame houſe that the Albineys did. But now, after long languiſhing, as it were, by reaſon of old age, the ſaid Caſtle hath given up the ghoſt. Below it is Caſtle-acre, where was ſometimes the habitation of the Earles of Warren, in a Caſtle now halfe downe, on a little Rivers ſide: which carrying no name, ariſeth not farre from Godwicke a lucky good name, where there ſtands a ſmall houſe, but greatly graced by the Lord thereof, Sir Edward Coke Knight, a man of rare endowments of nature, and as in the Common lawes much practiſed, ſo of deepe in- D ſight therein, which all England both tooke knowledge of whiles hee diſcharged the function of Atturney Generall many yeares moſt learnedly, and now acknowledgeth whiles being Lord Chiefe Juſtice of the Common Pleas, he adminiſtreth juſtice as uprightly and judicioully. Neither is he leſſe to be remembred, ſot that he loveth learning, and hath well deſerved of the preſent and ſucceeding ages by his learned labours. Reports.

This Riveret or brooke with a ſmall ſtreame and ſhallow water runneth Weſtward to Linne, by Neirford, that gave name to the Family of the Neirfords famous in times Neirford. paſt, and by Neirborrough: where neere unto the houſe of the Spilmans, knights, upon a very high hill is to be ſeene a warlike Fort of paſſing great ſtrength and of ancient E worke, ſo ſituated, as it hath a very faire proſpect into the Country about it. After, upon the ſaid Brooke is ſeated Penteney, a prety Abbay; the ordinary buriall place in ancient time of the Noblemen and Gentlemen in this Tract.

Neere unto it lieth Wormegay, commonly Wrongey, which Reginald de Warren bro- Wormegay. ther of William de Warren the ſecond Earle of Surry had with his wife, of whom as I have read, the ſaid Earle had the donation or Maritagium (as they uſe to ſpeake in the law phraſe) and by his ſonnes daughter ſtreightwayes it was transferred to the Bar- Bardolphs dolphs, who being Barons of great nobility, flouriſhed a long time in honorable ſtate, Barons. and bare for their Armes Three Cinque-foiles or in a Shield Azur. The greateſt part of whoſe Inheritance together with the Title came to Sir William Phelips, and by his F daughter paſſed away to the Vicount Beaumont. More Eaſtward are ſeated, Swaffham a Mercat Towne of good note, ſometime the Poſſeſſion of the Earle of Richmond: Aſhele Manour, by Tenure whereof the Haſtings and Greies Lords of Ruthin had the charge of table clothes and linnen uſed at the ſolemne Coronation of the Kings of England: North Elmham, the Biſhops See for a good time, when as this Province was divided into two Dioceſes: Dereham, wherein Withburga King Annas daughter was buried: whom becauſe ſhee was piouſly affected, farre from all riotous exceſſe, and wanton lightneſſe, our Anceſtours accounted for a Saint. Next unto which is Greſhenhall, and adjoyning thereto Elſing, the poſſeſſions in ancient time of the Folliots, men of great worth and Dignity, which in right of dowry came by a daughter of Richard Folliot to Sir Hugh de Haſtings, deſcended out of the Family of Abergevenny: and at length by the daughters and heires of Haſtings the laſt, Greſhenhall aforeſaid fell unto Sir Hamon le Strange of Hunſtanton, and Elſing unto William Browne the brother of Sir Antonie Browne the firſt Viconnt Mount-acute. In this quarter alſo is Ick-borrough, which Talbot ſuppoſeth to have beene that ICIANI, whereof Antonine ſpeaketh. Neither have I cauſe to write any more of theſe places. And now I thinke it is good time to ſet downe the Earles and Dukes of Northfolke, that I may proceed to Cambridgeſhire.

Earles and Dukes of Norfolke.

William the Conquerour made one Raulph Governour of Eaſt-England, that is to ſay, of Norfolke, Suffolke, and Cambridgeſhire, who forthwith gaping as I ſaid, after an alteration and change in the State, was diſpoſſeſſed of that place. After certaine yeares, in the Raigne of Stephen, Hugh Bigod was Earle of Norfolke: For, when peace was concluded betweene Stephen and Henry Duke of Anjou, who became afterwards King Henry the ſecond, by expreſſe words it was provided, that William King Stephens ſonne ſhould have the whole Earledome of Norfolke, excepting among other things, The third peny of that County, whereof Hugh Bigod was Earle. Whom notwithſtanding King Henry the Second created Earle againe, of the third peny of Norfolke and Norwich. Who dying about the 27. yeare of Henry the Second, Roger his ſonne ſucceeded, who, for what cauſe I know not, obtained at the hands of King Richard the firſt a new Charter of his creation: Him ſucceeded his ſonne Hugh, who tooke to his wife Mawde the eldeſt daughter and one of the heires of William Mareſcall Earle of Pembroch. By whom he had iſſue one ſonne named Roger, Earle of Norfolke and Mareſcall of England, who at Tournament having his bones put out of joint, died without iſſue: and another, called Hugh Bigod Lord chiefe Juſtice of England ſlaine in the battaile of Lewis: whoſe ſonne Roger ſucceeded his Uncle in the Earldome of Norfolke and dignity of Mareſcall: but having incurred through his inſolent contumacy the high diſpleaſure of King Edward the Firſt, was compelled to paſſe away his honors and well neere his whole inheritance into the Kings hands to the uſe of Thomas of Brotherton the Kings ſon, whom he had begotten of his ſecond wife Margaret ſiſter to Philip the Faire, King of France. For thus reporteth the Hiſtory, out of the Library of Saint Auſtens in Canterbury. In the yeare 1301. Roger Bigod Earle of Norfolke ordained King Edward to bee his heire: and hee delivered into his hands the rod of the Marſhals Office with this condition, that if his wife brought him any children, he ſhould without all contradiction receive againe all from the King and hold it peaceably as before: and the King gave unto him a 1000. pounds in money, and a thouſand pound land during his life, together with the Marſhalſhip, and the Earldome. But when he was departed this life without iſſue, King Edward the Second, honoured the ſaid Thomas of Brotherton his brother, according to the conveiance aforeſaid, with the Titles of Marſhall and Earle of Norfolke. Whoſe daughter Margaret called Marſhalleſſe and Counteſſe of Norfolke wife to Iohn Lord Segrave, king Richard the Second created in her abſence Dutcheſſe of Norfolke for terme of life: and the ſame day created Thomas Mowbray the daughters ſonne of the ſaid Margaret, then Earle of Nottingham, the firſt Duke of Norfolke, To him and his heires males; unto whom he had likewiſe granted before the State and ſtile of Earle Marſhall of England.

Parliament 21. Richard. 2.

This is hee, that before the king was challenged and accuſed by Henry of Lancaſter Duke of Hereford, for uttering inconſiderately certaine reprochfull, and derogatory words againſt the king. And when they were to fight a combat, at the very barre and entry of the Liſts, by the voice of an Herauld it was proclaimed in the kings name, That both of them ſhould be baniſhed, Lancaſter for ten yeares, and Mowbray for ever: who afterwards ended his life at Venice, leaving two ſonnes behind him in England.

A England. Of which, Thomas Earle Marſhall and of Nottingham, for no other Title uſed hee, was beheaded for ſeditious plotting againſt Henry of Lancaſter, who now had poſſeſſed himſelfe of the Crowne by the name of King Henry the Fourth. But his brother and heire John, who through the favour of King Henry the Fifth was raiſed up, and for certaine yeares after called onely Earle Marſhall and of Nottingham, at laſt in the very beginning of Henry the Sixth his Raigne, By authority of Parliament and by vertue of the Patent granted by King Richard the Second, was declared, Duke of Norfolke, as being the ſonne of Thomas Duke of Norfolke his father, and heire to Thomas his brother. After him ſucceeded John his ſonne, who died in the firſt yeare of Edward the Fourth: and after him likewiſe John his ſonne, who whiles
B his father lived was created by King Henry the Sixth Earle of Surry and of Warren. Whoſe onely daughter Anne, Richard Duke of Yorke, the young ſonne of King Edward the Fourth tooke to wife, and together with her received of his father the Titles of Duke of Norfolke, Earle Marſhall, Earle of Warren and Nottingham. But after that he and his wife both were made away in their tender yeares, Richard the Third, King of England conferred this Title of the Duke of Norfolke, and the dignity of Earle Marſhall upon John Lord Howard, who was found next cozen in bloud and one of the heires to the ſaid Anne Dutcheſſe of Yorke and Norfolke; as whoſe mother was one of the daughters of that firſt Thomas Mowbray Duke of Norfolke, and who in the time of King Edward the Fourth was ſummoned a Baron to C the Parliament. This John loſt his life at Boſworth field, fighting valiantly in the quarrell of King Richard, againſt King Henry the Seventh. His ſonne Thomas, who being by King Richard the Third created Earle of Surry, and by King Henry the Seventh made Lord Treaſurer, was by King Henry the Eighth reſtored to the Title of Duke of Norfolke, and his ſonne the ſame day created Earle of Surry: after that by his conduct, James the fourth, King of the Scots was ſlaine, and the Scottiſh power vanquiſhed at Branxton. In memoriall of which Victory the ſaid King granted to him and his heires males for ever, that they ſhould beare in the midſt of the Bend in the Howards Armes, the whole halfe of the upper part of a Lion Geules, pierced through the mouth with an arrow, in the due colours of the Armes of the King of Scots. I tranſlate it
D verbatim out of the Patent. After him ſucceeded his ſonne Thomas as well in his honours, as in the Office of Lord Treaſurer of England, and lived to the time of Queene Mary, toſſed to and fro betweene the reciprocall ebbes and flowes of fortune, whoſe grand ſonne Thomas (by his ſonne Henry, the firſt of the Engliſh Nobility that did illuſtrate his high birth with the beauty of learning) being attainted for purpoſing a marriage with Mary the Queene of Scots, loſt his life in the yeare of our Lord 1572. and was the laſt Duke of Norfolke. Since which time his offſpring lay for a good while halfe dead: but now watered and revived with the vitall dew of King James, reflouriſheth very freſhly.

CAMBRIDGE-SHIRE.

CAMBRIDGE-SHIRE, called in the English-Saxon Grentbrig-ſcyne lyeth more inward, and ſtretched out in length Northward. On the East it butteth upon Northfolke and Suffolke, on the South upon the East-Saxons or Eſſexe, and Hertfordſhire, on the Weſt upon Bedford and Huntingdon ſhires, and Northward upon Lincoln-ſhire: being divided into two parts by the river Ouſe which croſſeth it over-thwart from Weſt to East.

The lower and South-part is better manured, and therefore more plentifull, being ſome-what a plaine, yet not altogether levell, for the moſt part or all of it rather (ſave onely where it bringeth forth ſaffron) is laid out into corne fields, and yeeldeth plentifully the beſt barly; of which ſteeped in water and lying wet therein untill it ſpurt againe, then after the ſaid ſprout is full come, dried and parched over a Kill, they make * ſtore of mault: By venting and ſending out whereof into the neighbor-countries, the Inhabitants raiſe very great gaine. The farther and Northerne part, becauſe it is Fenniſh ground, by reaſon of the many flouds that the rivers cauſe, and ſo diſperſed into Iſlands, is called The Iſle of Ely, a tract paſſing greene, freſh and gay by reaſon of moſt plenteous paſtures: howbeit after a ſort hollow, by occaſion of the water that in ſome places ſecretly entreth in; yea and otherwhile when it overfloweth, ſurroundeth moſt part of it.

* Byne Mault.

Along the Weſt ſide of the lower part runneth one of the two highwayes made by the Romans, (Ely booke calleth it Ermingſtreet) which paſſeth forth right to Huntingdon through Roiſton, that ſtandeth in the very edge and entry of the Shire, a towne well knowne, yet but of late built, whereof I have already ſpoken: alſo by Caxton, in times paſt the ſeate of the Barony of Stephen de Eſchaliers, and from whoſe Poſterity in the reigne of King Henry the Third it deſcended to the Frevills, and from them by the Burgoins to the Iermins. Neither is Gamlingbay far diſtant from hence, where dwelt the Avenells, whoſe Inheritance came by marriage to the ancient Family of Saint George, (out of which there flouriſhed many Knights ſince the time of King Henry the Firſt) at Hatley, which of them is called Hatley Saint George. Above Caxton before mentioned is Eltesley, where was in elder Ages a Religious houſe of Holy Virgines, among whom was celebrated the incertaine memory of Saint Pandionia the daughter of a Scottiſh King, as the tradition is. But long ſince they were tranſlated to Hinchinbroke. And againe above Eltesley, was the Priory of Swaſey founded for blacke Monkes by Alan la Zouch brother to the Vicount of Rohan in the Leſſer Britaine, and was the common Sepulture a long time for the Family of Zouch.

More Weſtward a little river runneth through the middle of this part, which iſſuing downe out of Aſhwel, haſtneth from South to North with many turnings, to joyn it ſelfe with the Ouſe, running by Shengay (where be the goodlieſt medows of this Shire) a Commandery in old time of the Knights Templars; which Shengay, Sibyl the daughter of Roger Mont-gomery Earle of Shrewsbury, and wife of I. de Raines gave unto them in the yeere 1130. nor farre from Burne Caſtle, in ancient times the Barony of Picot Sheriffe of this Shire, and of the Peverels, from whom by one of the daughters, this and other Poſſeſſions came unto Sir Gilbert Pech: the laſt of whoſe houſe, after he had otherwiſe advanced his children by his ſecond wife, ordained King Edward the Firſt, to be his Heire. For, in thoſe dayes the Noble men of England brought into uſe againe the cuſtome of the Romanes under their Emperours, which was to nominate them their heires, if they were in any diſfavour with their Soveraignes.

But in the Barons warre in King Henrie the Third his dayes, this Caſtle was burnt downe, being ſet on fire by Ribald L' Iſle: At which time Walter de Cottenham a reſpective perſon, was hanged for Rebellion.

By what name writers termed this River, it is a queſtion: ſome call it Granta, others Camus. And unto theſe I rather incline: both for that the courſe thereof is ſomewhat crooked; for, ſo much doth Cam in the Britiſh tongue ſignifie, whence a certaine crooked river in Cornwall is named Camel; and alſo becauſe that ancient towne CAMBORITUM, which Antonine the Emperour mentioneth in his third journey of Britaine, ſtood upon this river as I am well neere induced to beleeve, by the diſtance, by the name, and alſo by the peeces of Romane mony found here nigh unto the bridge in great ſtore. For, CAMBORITUM, ſignifieth A Fourd at Camus, or a Fourd with crooked windings. For Rith in our Britiſh or Welſh tongue betokeneth A Fourd, which I note to this end, that the Frenchmen may more eaſily perceive and ſee what is the meaning of Auguſtoritum, Darioritum, Rithomagus, and other ſuch like in France. Howbeit the Saxons chuſe rather to call our Camboritum, Grantceaſtep and Grontceaſtep, which name it keepeth ſtill: but whence it was derived, I cannot yet ſee. If I ſhould fetch it from Gron a Saxon word that ſignifieth Fenny place, I might perhaps goe wide: And yet Aſſerius termed once or twice, certaine fenniſh and mariſh grounds in Somerſetſhire, by a mungrell name halfe Saxon and halfe Latine, Gronnas paludoſiſſimas: and very well knowne it is, that a City in Weſt Friſland, which is ſituate in ſuch a ground is named Groningen. But let other hunt after the derivation of this name. About the yeere of Chriſt 700. this was a little deſolate Citty, as ſaith Bede, whiles hee reporteth that neere unto the walles, there was found a little trough or coffin, very cunningly and finely wrought of Marble, and covered moſt fitly with a lidde of the like ſtone. But now a ſmall Village it is: one part whereof Henry Lacie Earle of Lincolne gave unto his baſe ſonne Henry, with this condition, that his ſonnes and their poſterity (which a good while ſince be cleane worne out) ſhould have no other Chriſtian name but Henry: the other part, Henry the Sixth King of England comming out of the houſe of Lancaſter, into whoſe hands the Patrimony of Earle Lacie fell, graunted unto the Kings Colledge in Cambridge: which was either a part or elſe a plant of that ancient Camboritum, ſo neere it commeth unto it both in ſituation and name. Neither can I eaſily beleeve, that Grant was turned into Cam; for this might ſeeme a deflexion ſome what too hardly ſtreined, wherein all the letters but one are quite ſwallowed up. I would rather thinke that the common people reteined the terme of the ancient name of Camboritum or of the river Cam, although writers uſed more often the Saxon name Grantbridge. This Citty which being the other Univerſity of England, the other eye, the other ſtrong-ſtay, as it were, thereof, and a moſt famous Mart and ſtore-houſe of good Literature and Godlines, ſtandeth upon the river Cam, which after it hath in ſporting wiſe beſprinkled the Weſt ſide thereof with many Iſlets, turning into the Eaſt, divideth it into two parts, and hath a Bridge over it, whence aroſe this latter name Cambridge. Beyond the bridge is ſeene a large and ancient Caſtle, which ſeemeth now to have lived out his full time, nigh Maudlen Colledge. On this ſide the Bridge, where ſtandeth the greateſt part by farre of the City, you have a pleaſant ſight every where to the eye, what of fair ſtreets orderly raunged, what of a number of Churches, and of ſixteene Colledges, ſacred manſions of the Muſes, wherein a number of great learned men are maintained, and wherein the knowledge of the beſt Arts, and the skill in tongues ſo flouriſh, that they may be rightly counted the fountaines of Literature, Religion, and all Knowledge whatſoever, who right ſweetly bedew and ſprinkle, with moſt holeſom waters the gardens of the Church and Common-wealth through England. Neither is there wanting any thing here, that a man may require in a moſt flouriſhing Vniverſity, were it not that the ayre is ſomewhat unhealthfull ariſing as it doth out of a fenny ground hard by. And yet peradventure they that firſt founded an Univerſity in that place, allowed of Platoes judgement. For, he being of a very excellent and ſtrong conſtitution of body choſe out the Academia, an unwholſome place of Attica, for to ſtudy in, that ſo the ſuperfluous

A superfluous rankneſſe of body which might overlay the minde, might be kept under by the diſtemperature of the place. Nevertheleſſe, for all this, our forefathers, men of ſingular wiſedome dedicated this place, and not without divine direction unto learned Studies, and beautified it with notable workes and buildings.

And leaſt we ſhould ſeeme in the worſt kinde unthankefull to thoſe ſingular Patrons of learning, or rather that I may uſe the words of Eumenius, toward the Parents of our Children: let us ſummarily rehearſe both themſelves, and the Colledges alſo which they founded and conſecrated to good Literature, to their honourable memory, and that out of the Cambridge Story. The report goeth, that Cantaber a Spaniard, 375. yeeres before the Nativity of Chriſt, firſt began and founded this Univerſity: Alſo that Sebert King of the Eaſt-Angles reſtored it againe in the yeere after Chriſts birth, 630. Afterwards being other whiles overthrowne and deſtroyed with the Daniſh ſtormes, it lay a long time forlorne and of no account, untill all began to revive under the Normans governement. Colledges. B John Caius.

And not long after, Innes, Hoſtels and Halles were built for Scholers, howbeit endowed with no poſſeſſions. But Hugh Balſham Biſhop of Ely, in the yeere 1284. built the firſt Colledge called Peter-houſe, and endowed it with Lands: whoſe example theſe enſuing did imitate and follow: Richard Badew with the good helpe and furtherance of Lady Elizabeth Clare Counteſſe of Vlſter, in the yeere 1340. founded Clare Hall: Lady Mary S. Paul Counteſſe of Pembroch in the yeere 1347. C Pembroch Hall: The Guild or Society of Corpus Chriſti Brethren, Corpus Chriſti Colledge, which is called alſo S. Bennet Colledge: William Bateman Biſhop of Norwich, about the yeere 1353. Trinity Hall: Edmund Gonevil in the yeere 1348. and Iohn Caius Doctor of Phyſicke in our time, Gonevil and Caius Colledge: Henry the Sixth King of England erected Kings Colledge in the yeere 1441. whereunto he joyned a Chappell, which may rightly be counted one of the faireſt buildings of the whole world. His wife Margaret of Anjou, in the yeere 1443. built Queenes Colledge: Robert Woodlarke Profeſſor of Divinity in the yeere 1459. S. Katharines Hall: Iohn Alcocke Biſhop of Ely in the yeere 1497. was the founder of Ieſus Colledge: Lady Margaret Counteſſe of Richmond mother to King Henry the Seaventh, about the yeere 1506. erected D Chriſts Colledge, and S. Iohns, enlarged now in goodly manner with new buildings: Sir Thomas Audley Lord Chancellour of England, in the yeere 1542. built Maudlen Colledge; which Sir Chriſtopher Wray Lord chiefe Juſtice of England hath lately bewtified with new buildings and endowed with great poſſeſſions: And that moſt puiſſant King, Henry the Eight, in the yeere of our ſalvation 1546. made Trinity Colledge of three others, to wit, of S. Michaels Houſe or Colledge, which Herveie Stanton in the reigne of Edward the Second built, of Kings Hall founded by King Edward the Third, and of Fiſhwicks Hoſtell. Which Colledge, that the Students might inhabite more pleaſantly, is now repaired, nay rather new built, with that magnificence, by the carefull direction of Thomas Nevill Doctor of Divinity, Maſter of the ſaid Col- E ledge, and Deane of Canterbury, that it is become a Colledge for ſtately greatneſſe, for uniforme building and beauty of the roomes, ſcarce inferiour to any other in Chriſtendome: and he himſelfe may bee accounted in the judgement even of the greateſt Philoſopher Truly * μεγαλοπρεπης for beſtowing ſo great coſt in publike and not in his owne private uſes. Alſo wherein I congratulate our Age, and our ſelves in the behalfe of good learning, that honourable and prudent man Sir Walter Mildmay knight, one of the Privy Counſell to Queene Elizabeth, who founded a new Colledge in the honour of Emanuel: and Lady Francis Sidneie Counteſſe of Suſſex, in her laſt will gave a Legacy of 5000. pounds to the building of a Colledge that ſhould be called Sidney-Suſſex, which is now fully finiſhed. * Decently magnificent.

F I let paſſe here litle Monaſteries and Religious houſes becauſe they were of ſmall note, unleſſe it were Barnewell Abbey, which Sir Paine Peverell a worthy and valiant warriour, Standard-bearer to Robert Duke of Normandy in the holy War againſt Infidels, tranſlated, in the reigne of Henry the firſt, from S. Giles Church, where Picot the Sheriffe had ordained ſecular Prieſts, unto this place, and brought into it thirty Barnewell. Hiſtoria Barnewallenſis.

Historia Barnwellensis. * Paganut.

Monkes, for that himselfe at that time was thirty yeeres of Age. The reason of that name Barnewell, you may read if it please you, out of the private History of that place, in these words: * Sir Payne Peverell obtained of King Henry the First, a certaine plot of ground without the Burgh of Cambridge: Out of the very midst of that place there sprung up certaine Fountaines very pure and lively, which in English they called Barnewell in those daies, as one would say the wels of Barnes, that is, Children; For that Boyes and Youthes meeting once a yeare there on the Even of Saint Iohn Baptists Nativity, after the English manner exercised themselves in wrestling and other sports and pastimes befitting their age, yea and merrily applauded one another with songs and minstralsie. Whence it came, that for the number of Boyes and Girles running thither and there playing, grew to be a custome, that on the suddaine a multitude of buyers and sellers repaired thither.

A B

Neither was Cambridge, (albeit it was consecrated to the Muses) altogether free from the furies of Mars. For, when the Danes robbed and spoyled up and downe, many times they wintered here: and in the yeere of Redemption 1010. when Sueno the Dane, by most cruell and terrible tyranny, bare downe all before him, they spared not the honour of the place, nor the Muses, (which we read that Sylla yet did at Athens) but pittifully burnt and defaced it all. Nevertheless at the first comming in of the Normans, it was sufficiently peopled. For, thus we read in the Domesday booke of King William the Conquerour. The Burrough of Grentbridge is divided into tenne Wards, and hath 387. Mansion houses. But eighteene houses were destroyed for building of the Castle, what time, as the said King William the First determined to overawe the English every where (whom lately hee had conquered) with Castles, as it were with bridles of servitude. Afterwards in the Barons warre, it sustained great losse by the out-lawed Barons out of the Isle of Ely: therefore Henry the Third to represse their outrages caused a deepe ditch to be cast on the East side, which is still called Kings ditch.

C

Here happily there is a secret expectation of some, that I should give mine opinion as touching the antiquity of this University. But I will bee no dealer in this case: For, I meane not to make comparison betweene these two most flourishing Universities of ours, to whom I know none equall. Howbeit I feare me, they have builded Castles in the Ayre, and thrust upon us devices of their owne braines; who extolling the antiquity thereof farre above any probability of truth, have written that this Cantaber of Spaine streight after Rome was built, and many yeeres before the Nativity of Christ erected this University. True and certaine it is, that whensoever it was first ordained, it was a seat of learning about the time of King Henry the First. For, thus wee read in an old Additament of Peter Blessensis unto Ingulph.

Ioffred made Abbot of Crowland. Anno 1109.

Abbot Ioffred sent ouer to his Manour of Cotenham neere Cambridge, Gislebert his fellow Monke, and professour of Divinity, with three other Monkes: who following him into England, being throughly furnished with Philosophicall Theoremes, and other primitive sciences, repaired dayly to Cambridge: and having hired a certaine publike Barne, made open profession of their sciences, and in short space of time drew together a great number of Scholars. E But in the second yeere after their comming, the number of their Scholars grew so great, as well from out of the whole Country as the Towne; that the biggest house and barne that was, or any Church whatsoever sufficed not to receive them all. Whereupon sorting themselves apart in severall places, and taking the Vniversity of Orleance for their paterne, earely in the morning, Monke Odo a singular Grammarian and Satyricall Poet read Grammer unto Boyes and those of the younger sort assigned unto him, according to the Doctrine of Prisian and of Remigius upon him. At one of the clocke, Terricus a most witty and subtile Sophister taught the elder sort of young men, Aristotles Logicke, after the Introductions of Porphyrie and the Comments of Averroes. At three of the clocke Monke William read a Lecture in Tullies Rhetoricke and Quintilians Flores: But the great Master Gislebert, upon every Sunday, and Holy-dayes, preached GODS Word unto the People. And thus out of this little Fountaine, which grew to bee a great River, wee see how the City of GOD now is become enriched, and all England made fruitfull, by meanes of very many Masters and Teachers proceeding out of Cambridge, in manner of the Holy Paradise, &c.

But

A * But at what time it became an Vniverſity by authority, Robert de Remington ſhall tell you. Vnder the Reigne (ſaith hee) of Edward the Firſt, Grantbridge of a Schoole was made an Vniverſity (ſuch as Oxenford is) by the Court of Rome. But what meane I thus unadviſedly to ſtep into theſe liſts? Wherein long ſince two moſt learned old men have encountred one with another: Unto whom verely, as to right learned men I am willing to yeeld up my weapons, and vaile bonnet with all reverence. The Meridian line cutting the Zenith juſt over Cambridge, is diſtant from the furtheſt Weſt poynt twenty three degrees, and twenty five ſcruples. And the Arch of the ſame Meridian lying betweene the Aequator and Verticall poynt, is fiftie two degrees and 11. ſcruples.

B Cam from Cambridge continuing his courſe by Waterbeach an ancient ſeat of Nuns, which Lady Mary S. Paul tranſlated from thence to Denny ſomewhat higher but nothing healthfuller, when in a low ground he hath ſpread a Mere, aſſociateth himſelfe with the River Ouſe. *

But to returne hard under Cambridge Eaſtward neere unto Sture a little brooke is kept every yeere in the moneth of September, the greateſt Faire of all England, whether you reſpect the multitude of buyers and ſellers reſorting thither, or the ſtore of commodities there to be vented. Hard by whereas the way was moſt comberous and troubleſome to paſſengers to and fro, that right good and praiſe-worthy man G. Hervy Doctor of the Civill Law and M. of Trinity Hall in Cambridge, made C not long ſince with great charges but of a Godly and laudable intent a very faire raiſed Cauſey, for three miles or thereabout in length toward Neumercat. Stourbridge Faire.

Neere unto Cambridge on the South-Eaſt ſide, there appeare aloft certaine high Hills; the Students call them Gogmagog-Hills: Henry of Huntingdon tearmed them Amæniſſima montana de Balſham, that is, The moſt pleaſant Mountaines of Balſham, by reaſon of a little Village ſtanding beneath them, wherein as hee writeth, the Danes left no kinde of moſt ſavage cruelty unattempted. On the top of theſe hills I ſaw a Fort intrenched, and the ſame very large, ſtrengthened with a threefold Rampire: an hold ſurely in thoſe dayes inexpugnable, as ſome skilfull men in feats of Warre bee of opinion, were it not that water is ſo farre off. Gervaſe of Tilbury ſeemeth to D call it Vandelbiria. Beneath Cambridge (ſaith he) there was a place named Vandelbiria, for that the Vandals waſting the parts of Brittaine, with cruell ſlaughter of Chriſtians, there encamped themſelves: where upon the very top of the hill they pitched their Tents; there is a Plaine incloſed round with a Trench and Rampire, which hath entrance into it but in one place as it were at a Gate. Gogmagog Hills. A Military Fort. Wandlesbury.

Touching the Martiall ſpectre, or ſprite that walked here, which he addeth to the reſt, becauſe it is but a meere toyiſh and fantaſticall deviſe of the doting vulgar ſort; I willing over-paſſe it. For it is not my purpoſe to tell pleaſant tales, and tickle eares. In the Vale under theſe hills is Salſton to be ſeene, which from the Burges of Burgh-Green, by Walter De-la-pole and Ingalthorp, came unto Sir Iohn Nevill Marqueſſe E Mont-acute, and by his daughter and one of his heires to the Hudleſtons, who have lived here in worſhip and reputation. Salſton.

More Eaſtward, firſt we meete with Hilderſham, belonging ſometimes to the Buſlers and now by marriage to the Pariſes: Further hard by the Woods, is Horſheath ſituate; the Poſſeſſion whereof is knowne by a long deſcent to have pertained unto the ancient Families of the Argentons and Alingtons, of whom elſewhere I have written, and is now the habitation of the Alingtons. Adjoyning hereunto is Caſtle Camps, the ancient ſeat alſo of the Veres Earles of Oxford, which Hugh Vere held (as the old booke of Inquiſition Records) That he might be the Kings Chamberleine: whereas F notwithſtanding moſt true it is, that Henry the Firſt King of England granted unto Aubry de Vere that Office in theſe words: The principall Chamberlaineſhip of all England in Fee and Inheritance, with all the Dignities, Liberties, and Honours thereto belonging, as freely and honourably, as Robert Malles held the ſame, &c. The Kings notwithſtanding ordained ſometimes one, and ſometimes another at their pleaſure to execute this Office. Horſheath. See in Hertfordſhire. Caſtle Camps Magiſtra Cameraria Anglia. Lord Great Chamberleine.

* Inq. 6. E. 2. The Earles of Oxford alſo, that I may note it incidently, by the heire of R. Sandford held the Manours of Fingrey and Wulfelmelſton by Serjeanty of Chamberlainſhip to the Queenes at the Coronation of the Kings.

Ditches. Not far from hence are ſeene here and there thoſe great and long Ditches which certainly the East Angles did caſt, to reſtraine the Mercians, who with ſudden inrodes were wont moſt outragiouſly to make havocke of all before them. The firſt of theſe beginneth at Hinkeſton, runneth Eaſtward by Hilderſham toward Horſ-heath, about five miles in length. The ſecond neere unto this, called Brentditch goeth from Melborne by Fulmer.

Where D. Hervies cawſey which I mentioned, endeth, there appeareth alſo a third forefence or ditch caſt up in old time: which beginning at the Eaſt banke of the river Cam, reacheth directly by Fenn-Ditton, or more truly Ditch-ton (ſo called of the very Ditch) betweene great Wilberham and Fulburn, as farre as to Balſham. At this day this is called commonly Seauen mile Dyke, becauſe it is ſeaven miles from Newmercate: Fleam dyke. in times paſt, Fleam-Dyke in old Engliſh, that is, Flight-Dyke, of ſome memorable flight there, as it ſeemeth. At the ſaid Wilberham ſometimes called Wilburgham, dwelt in times paſt the Barons Liſle of Rong-mount*, men of ancient nobility: of whom John, for his Martiall proweſſe was by King Edward the Third ranged among the firſt founders of the order of the Garter: and of that Family there yet remaineth an heire Male, a reverend old Man and full of Children, named Edmund Liſle, who is ſtill Lord of this place.

De Inſula. * De Rubeo monte.

More Eaſt from hence five miles within the Country, is to bee ſeene the fourth forefence or ditch, the greateſt of all the reſt, with a rampier thereto; which the common people wondring greatly at, as a worke made by Devils and not by men, uſe to Divels Dyke. call Devils-Dyke: others, Rech-Dyke, of Rech a little mercate towne, where it beginneth. This is doubtleſſe that, whereof Abbo Floriacenſis when he deſcribeth the ſight of Eaſt England, writeth thus. From that part whereas the Sun inclineth Weſtward, the Province it ſelfe adjoyneth to the reſt of the Iſland, and is therefore paſſable: but for feare of being overrun with many invaſions and inrodes of enemies, it is fortified in the front with a banke or rampier like unto an huge wall, and with a Trench or Ditch below in the ground. This for many miles together cutteth overthwart that Plaine which is called Newmarket-heath, where it lay open to incurſions, beginning at Rech: above which the Country is fenny, and therefore impaſſable: and it endeth neere to Cowlidge, where the paſſage by reaſon of woods was more cumberſome. And it was the limit as well of the Kingdome, as of the Biſhopricke of the Eaſt Angles. Who was the author of ſo great a peece of worke, it is uncertaine. Some later writers ſay it was King Canutus the Dane: whereas notwithſtanding the ſaid Abbo made mention of it, who died before that Canutus obtained the Kingdome of England: and the Saxon Chronicle, where it relateth the rebellion of Athelwolph againſt King Edward the Elder, calleth it ſimply Dyke; and ſheweth, That King Edward laid waſte whatſoever lieth betweene the Dyke and the river Ouſe, as farre as to the North Fennes: alſo that Aethelwold the rebell, and Eohric the Dane, were at that time ſlaine there in battell. But they who wrote ſince Canutus times, termed it, Saint Edmunds limit, and Saint Edmunds Dyke; and verily thinke, that King Canutus caſt it up, who being moſt devoted to Saint Edmund the Martyr granted unto the religious Monkes of Saint Edmunds Bury (for to make ſatisfaction for the wicked cruelty of Swan his father wrought upon them) very great immunities, even as farre as to this Dyke: whence it is, that William of Malmesbury in his booke Of Biſhops writeth thus, The Cuſtomers and Toll gatherers, which in other places make foule worke and outrage, without reſpect or difference of right and wrong, there in humble manner on this ſide Saint Edmunds Dike, ſurceaſe their quarrels and braules. And certaine it is that theſe two fore-fences laſt named were called Saint Edmunds Dykes. For Mathew Florilegus hath recorded that the ſaid battell againſt Aethelwolph, was fought betweene the two Dykes of Saint Edmund.

Abbo died anno. 1003. Canutus began his reigne Anno. 1018. Anno. 905.

Burwell. Nere unto Rech, ſtandeth Burwel, a Caſtle in later times of the Lord Tiptoſt, which in thoſe moſt troubleſome times of King Stephen Geffrey Mandevill Earle of Eſſex, who who by violent invaſion of other mens poſſeſſions loſt much honour, valiantly aſſaulted: untill that being ſhot through the head with an arrow, he delivered thoſe countries from the feare they had ſtood in a long time.

Scarce two miles off, ſtands Lanheath, where for theſe many yeeres the Cottons, right worſhipfull Gentlemen of Knights degree have dwelt: From which Wicken is not farre diſtant, which came to the Family of the Peytons by a daughter and coheire of the Gernons about Edward the Thirds time, as afterward Iſleham deſcended to them by a coheire of Bernard in Henry the Sixth's time, which Knightly Family of Peytons flowred out of the ſame Male-ſtocke, whence the Vffords Earles of Suffolke deſcended, as appeareth by their Coate-armour, albeit they aſſumed the ſurname of Peyton according to the uſe of that age, from their Manour of Peyton-hall in Boxford in the County of Suffolke. Lanheath. Wicken. Iſleham. Peyton.

Upon the ſame Dyke alſo, is ſeated Kirtling, called likewiſe Catlidge, famous in theſe dayes by reaſon of the principall houſe of the Barons North; ſince Queene Mary honoured Sir Edward North, with that title for his wiſedome: but in times paſt it was famous for a Synode held there, what time as the Clergy men were at hot ſtrife among themſelves about the celebration of the feaſt of Eaſter. 977. Kirtling. Barons North.

The higher and Northerly part of this Shire is wholly divided into river Iſles: and being diſtinguiſhed by many Ditches, Chanels and Draines, with a pleaſant greene hew all Summer time contenteth the eyes of the beholders: but in Winter wholly in manner over-covered with water, farther every way than a man is able to ken, reſembleth in ſome ſort a very Sea. The Fennes and Iſle of Ely.

They that inhabited this fenniſh Country and all the reſt beſide, (which from the edge and borders of Suffolke, as farre as to Wainflet in Lincolne-ſhire conteineth threeſcore and eight miles, and millions of acres lying in theſe foure Shires, Cambridge, Huntingdon, North-hampton and Lincolne) were in the Saxons time called Girvii, that is, as ſome interpret it, Fen-men or Fen-dwellers. A kind of people according to the nature of the place where they dwell rude, uncivill, and envious to all others whom they call Vpland-men: who ſtalking on high upon ſtilts, apply their mindes, to graſing, fiſhing and fowling. The whole Region it ſelfe, which in winter ſeaſon and ſometimes moſt part of the yeere is overflowed by the ſpreading waters of the rivers Ouſe, Grant, Nen, Welland, Glene, and Witham, having not loades and ſewers large enough to voide away: But againe when their Streames are retired within their owne Channels, it is ſo plenteous and ranke of a certaine fatte groſſe and full hey, (which they call Lid) that when they have mowen downe as much with the better as will ſerve their turnes, they ſet fire on the reſt and burne it in November, that it may come up againe in great abundance. At which time a man may ſee this Fenniſh and moyſt Tract on a light flaming fire all over every way, and wonder thereat. Great plenty it hath beſides of Turfe and Sedge for the maintenance of fire: of reed alſo for to thatch their Houſes, yea and of Alders, beſide other watery Shrubbes. But chiefly it bringeth forth exceeding ſtore of willowes both naturally, and alſo for that being planted by mans hand they have ſerv'd in good ſteed, and often cut downe with their manifold increaſe, and infinit number of heires (to uſe Plinies word) againſt the violent force of the waters ruſhing againſt the bankes. Whereof alſo as well here, as in other places there be baskets made, which ſeeing the Britains call Baſcades, I for my part, that I may note ſo much by the way, do not underſtand the Poet Martiall in that Diſtichon, unleſſe hee meaneth theſe, among the Preſents and Gifts ſent to and fro. Girvii.

Barbara de pictis veni Baſcauda Britannis, Sed me jam mavult dicere Roma ſuam.

By barbarous name, a Baskaud I from painted Britans came,
But now Rome faine would call me hers, although I be the ſame.

Beſides al this the herb, Scordii, which alſo is called Water Germãder, groweth plentifully Scordium.

fully here hard by the ditches ſides: but as for theſe Fenny Ilands, Fælix a writer of good antiquity hath depainted them forth in theſe words. There is a Fen of exceeding great largeneſſe which beginning at the bankes of the river Gront, ariſing ſomewhere with ſedge plots, in other places with blacke waters yeelding a duskiſh vapour, with woods alſo among the Iſles, and having many winding turnes of the banke, reacheth out in a very long tract, from South to North-Eaſt as farre as to the Sea. And the very ſame Fenne William a Monke of Crowland in the life of Guthlake hath thus deſcribed in verſe.

Eſt apud Angligenas à Grontæ flumine, longo
Orbe per anfractus ſtagnoſos, & fluviales, Circumfuſa palus, Orientaliſque propinqua
Littoribus Pelagi, ſeſe diſtendit ab Auſtro
In longum verſus Aquilonem, gurgite tetro, Morboſos piſces vegetans, & arundine denſa
Ventorum ſtrepitus, quaſi quædam verba ſuſurrans.

A ſpatious Fenne in England lies from Gront that rivers ſide,
Among the winding crankes of Lakes and Rivers far and wide,
Y' ſpred, and neere unto the bankes of Eaſterne Sea doth ſtretch,
It ſelfe; and ſo from Southerne ſide a long North Eaſtward reach.
In muddy gulfe unwholſome fiſh it breeds: as reeds doe ſhake
There growing thicke, of winds as words a whiſpering noiſe they make.

Joyne hereunto if you pleaſe thus much out of Henry of Huntingdon: This Fenny country (ſaith he) is paſſing rich and plenteous, yea and beautifull to behold, watered with many Rivers running downe to it, garniſhed with a number of Meres both great and ſmall, trimly adorned likewiſe with many Woods and Ilands. And for a finall concluſion of this matter, take with you alſo theſe few words of William of Malmesbury ſpeaking of his time. So great ſtore there is here of Fiſhes that ſtrangers comming hither make a wonder at it, and the Inhabitants laugh thereat, to ſee them wonder. Neither is Water-Foule leſſe cheape; ſo that for one halfe penny and under, five men at the leaſt may not onely eat to ſlake hunger and content nature, but alſo feed their fill of Fiſh and Foule.

As touching the drying up of this Fenny country, what diſcourſe and arguing oftentimes there hath beene either by way of ſound and wholſome counſell, or of a goodly pretence and ſhew of a common good, even in the High Court of Parliament, I liſt not to relate. But it is to be feared leaſt (that which often hath happened to the Pontine Mariſhes of Italy) it would come againe to the former ſtate. So that many thinke it the wiſeſt and beſt courſe according to the ſage admonition in like caſe of Apollo his Oracle, Not to intermeddle at all with that which God hath ordained. Upon the naturall ſtrength of this place and plenty of all things there, ſeditious Rebels have often preſumed; and not onely the Engliſh when they banded themſelves againſt William Conquerour, but the Barons alſo whenſoever they were Out-lawed, from hence troubled and moleſted their Kings. But evermore they had ill ſucceſſe, albeit otherwhiles they built fortreſſes both at Eryth and alſo at Athered, at this day Audre, where the eaſieſt entrance is into this Iſle. And even yet neere unto Audre, is to be ſeene a Military rampire of a meane height, but of a very large compaſſe, which they call Belſars-hils, of one Beliſar, I wot not who.

Pauſanias in Corinth.

Audre.

Part of this Fenny country that lyeth more South and is the greateſt by farre, which alſo is counted of this ſhire, was named in the Engliſh Saxon tongue Elig now The Iſle of Ely, of the chiefe Iland, which name Bede hath derived from Eeles, and thereupon ſometime tearmed it Inſulam anguillariam, that is, The Iſle of Eeles. Polydore Virgil fetcheth the originall therof from the Greek word ἕλος, that ſignifieth Mariſh, others from Helig a Brittiſh word betokening Willowes or Sallowes, wherewith it doth moſt of all abound. Part of this Region, we read that one Tombert a Prince of the Southern Girvii gave as a dowry to his wife Audry, who after ſhe had left her ſecond husband husband Egfrid, King of the Nordan humberland, being fully reſolved to ſerve Chriſt, built a Monaſtery for Nunnes Votaries in the principall Iland of theſe, properly called Elig which was then reckoned at 600 Hides or Families; and of this Monaſtery, ſhe alſo her ſelfe the firſt Abbeſſe. Yet was not this the firſt Church in the fenny country. For the booke of Ely recordeth, that S. Auſten of Canterbury founded a Church at Cradiden; which Penda the Mercian afterwards raſed: and William of Malmesbury reporteth, that Fælix Biſhop of the Eaſt Engliſh had his firſt See at Soham, which yet is within the Dioceſſe of Norwich. Soham, ſaith he, is a village ſituate neere unto a Fen, which was in times paſt dangerous for thoſe that would paſſe into Ely by water: now by reaſon of a way or cauſey made through the Fenny ground overgrowne with Reeds, men may goe over thither by land. There be remaining ſtill the tokens of a Church deſtroyed by the Danes, which with the ruines thereof overwhelmed the inhabitants, who were burnt together with it. At which time alſo that Monaſtry of S. Audry was overthrowne by the furious Danes: but Ethelwold Biſhop of Wincheſter reedified it: For he, by a compoſition betweene the King and him, bought the whole Iland a new, and having caſt out the Prieſts thence, ſtored it with Monks, unto whom King Edgar, as we read in his letters patents, granted within the Fens, juriſdiction over the ſecular cauſes of two Hundreds, and without the Fens, of two Hundreds and an halfe in Wichlaw, within the province of the Eaſt-Angles, which are called at this day, The liberties of S. Audry. Afterwards Kings and great Noble men enriched it with large revenewes: and Earle Brithnoth eſpecially, Being now ready to joyne battaile with the Danes in the yeare 999. gave unto the Church of Ely, Somerſham, Spaldwic, Trumpinton, Ratindum, Heisbury, Fulburn, Tineſton, Tripleſtow, and Impetum, (for that the Monkes had in magnificent manner entertained him) in caſe he ſhould looſe his life in that battaile. But his fortune was to die at Maldun, after hee had fought with the Danes 14. dayes together. And ſo rich was the Monaſtery, that the Abbot thereof, as witneſſeth Malmsbury, laid up every yeere in his owne purſe a thouſand and foure hundred pounds. And Richard the laſt Abbot ſonne, to Earle Giſlebert, being over-tipled, as it were with wealth, diſdaining to bee under the Biſhop of Lincolne, dealt with the King, what by golden words, as the Monkes write, and what by great ſuite and politicke meanes, that a Biſhops See might be erected here: which, hee prevented by death obtained not. Yet ſoone after, King Henry the firſt having gotten allowance from the Pope, made Herveie, who had beene Biſhop of Bangor and by the Welſhmen caſt out of his owne ſeat, the firſt Biſhop of Ely: unto whom and to his ſucceſſors he laied for his Dioceſſe Cambridge-ſhire, which had belonged before unto the Biſhop of Lincolne, and confirmed certaine Royalties in theſe Ilands. To the Biſhops of Lincolne, from whoſe juriſdiction he had taken away this Iland and Cambridge-ſhire, he granted for to make amends, The Manour of Spaldwic: or as the booke of Ely hath, The Manour of Spaldwic was given unto the Church of Lincolne for ever, in exchange for the Biſhops ſuperintendency over the County of Cambridge. Herveie being now made Biſhop, fought by all meanes poſſible to augment the dignity of his Church.

Saint Audries Libertie.

Ely booke.

He obtained that it might bee every where Toll-free (theſe are the very words of the booke of Ely:) He ſet it free from the yoke of ſervice of watch and ward, that it owed to the Caſtle of Norwich: hee made a way from Exning to Ely, through the Fennes, ſixe miles in length; he beganne the faire Palace at Ely for his Succeſſours, and purchaſed to it faire Lands and not a few Lordſhips. And his Succeſſours by abridging the number of Monkes (for, from threeſcore and tenne they brought them downe to forty) flowed with riches and wealth in great abundance even unto our time, and their feſtivall and ſolemne Holydayes they celebrated with ſo ſumptuous proviſion and ſtately pompe, that they wonne the prayſe and prize from all the Abbaies in England: whereupon a Poet alſo in that age wrote theſe verſes not unproperly.

Præviſis aliis, Elienſia feſta videre,
Eſt, quaſi præviſa nocte, videre diem.

See, after others, Ely feaſts, and ſurely thou wilt ſay,
That having ſeene the night before, thou ſeeſt now the day.

The

The Church likewiſe, which now began for age and long continuance to decay, they built up by litle and litle, and brought it to that ample ſtatelineſſe which now it hath: For, large it is, high and faire, but ſomewhat defaced, by reaſon of Noblemens and Biſhops tombes (not without moſt ſhamefull indignity) are broken downe. And now in ſtead of that great Covent of Monks, there are eſtabliſhed a Deane, Prebendaries, a Grammar ſchoole, wherein 24. children are maintained and taught. Foure ſpeciall things there are about this Church, that the Common people talke much of: The Lanterne. The Lanterne on the very toppe thereof, juſt over the Quire, ſupported with eight pillars, and raiſed upon them right artificially, by Iohn Hotham the Biſhop. Vnder the Church towards the North, ſtandeth Saint Maries Chappell a ſingular fine peece of worke, built by Simon Montacute, Biſhop. On the South ſide, there is an huge heape of earth caſt up round of a great heigth, which they call the Mount, having had a wind mill upon it. And laſtly, a Vine bearing fruit in great plenty, which now is withered and gone. Theſe 4. a Monk of this place in times paſt knit up within this Rhyme.

Hæc ſunt Eliæ, Lanterna, Capella Mariæ, Atque molendinum,
Nec non dans vinea vinum.

Theſe things you may at Ely ſee,
The Lanterne, Chapell of Saint Marie,
A Winde-mill mounted up on hie,
A Vine-yard yeelding Wine, yeerely.

As for Ely it ſelfe, it is a ſmall Cittie, nor greatly to bee counted of, either for beauty, or frequency and reſort, as having an unwholſome Aire by reaſon of the Fens round about, although it be ſeated ſomewhat higher. Neere to it is Downham where the Biſhop hath his retyring Houſe with a Parke: neere to Downham is Conney the ancienteſt ſeat of the Family ſurnamed for their habitation heere, L'iſle and De Inſula, and firſt planted here by Nigellus the ſecond Biſhop of Ely their Allies in the time of King Henry the First, as is ſet downe in a Lieger Booke of Ely. Chateries or Cheaterich is not farre hence Weſtward, were Alwena a devout woman founded a Nunnery upon a coppid ground encompaſſed with Fens, while her husband founded Ramſey. But higher Northward amidſt the Fennes, there ſtood another Abbay of very great name, called Thorney, of thornes and buſhes that grow thicke about it, but in times paſt Ankerige of Ankers or Eremites living there ſolitarily; where as we finde in Peterborough booke Sexvulph a devout and religious man built a Monaſtery with little Cels for Eremits: Which being afterwards by the Danes throwne downe, Aethelwold Biſhop of Wincheſter (that he might promote the Monaſticall profeſſion) reedified, ſtored it with Monkes, and compaſſed it round about with trees. The place, as writeth William of Malmesbury, Repreſenteth a very Paradiſe; for that in pleaſure and delight it reſembleth Heaven it ſelfe: in the very Mariſhes bearing Trees, that for their ſtreight talneſſe, and the ſame without knots, ſtrive to touch the Stars; a Plaine is there as even as the Sea, which with greene graſſe allureth the eye, ſo ſmooth and level that if any walke along the fields they ſhall finde nothing to ſtumble at. There is not the leaſt parcell of ground that lies waſte and void there. Here ſhall you finde the earth riſing ſomewhere for Apple trees, there ſhall you have a field ſet with Vines, which either creepe upon the ground, or mount on high upon poles to ſupport them. A mutuall ſtriſe there is betweene nature and husbandry, that what the one forgetteth, the other might ſupply and produce. What will be ſaid of the faire and beautifull buildings, which it is a wonder to ſee how the ground amid theſe Fens and Mariſhes, ſo firme and ſound, doth beare with ſure and ſtedfaſt foundations? A wonderfull ſolitary place is there afforded to Monkes for quiet life, that ſo much the more conſtantly ſettle their mindes upon Heavenly things for that they ſee men very ſeldome, and ſo are they ſeene in their ſtate more mortified and lower brought. A wonder it is to have a Woman

ſeene

A ſeene there: if come men thither; there is rejoycing as at ſo many Angels. In a word, I may truly ſay, that this Iſland is an Hoſtell of Chaſtity, an harbour of Honeſty, and a Schoole or Colledge of Divine Philoſophie.

Touching Wisbich, the Biſhop of Elies Caſtle, about 13. miles off, ſituate among the fennes and rivers, and made of late a priſon to keepe the Papiſts in hold, I have nothing elſe to ſay, but that this towne together with Walepole, was in old time given by the owner thereof unto the monaſtery of Ely; what time as he conſecrated Alwin his little ſon there to live a monkes life: that King William the First built a Caſtle there, when the outlawed Lords made rodes out of this fenny country: and that in the yeere of our ſalvation 1236. when the Ocean being diſquieted with violent
B windes, for two dayes continually together had beaten upon the ſhore, made an exceeding wide breach and overwhelmed both land and people. But the Caſtle of bricke that now is ſeene there, Iohn Morton Biſhop of Ely built within the remembrance of our great grandfathers: who alſo drew as ſtreight as a line in this fenny country a ditch, which they call the Newleame for better conveyance and carriage by water, that by this meanes the towne being well frequented might gaine the more and grow to wealth. Which fell out quite contrary: For it ſtandeth now in no great ſteed, and the neighbour inhabitants complaine that the courſe of Nen into the Sea by Clowcroſſe, is by this meanes altogether hindred and ſtopped.

Wisbich. Walepoole. Newleame. Clowcroſſe.

The firſt Earle of Cambridge that I can finde, was William the brother of Ranulph
C Earle of Cheſter, as wee read in a patent or inſtrument of Alexander Biſhop of Lincolne, bearing date in the yeere 1139. Afterwards, thoſe of the royall blood in Scotland that were Earles of Huntingdon, wee may thinke to have beene Earles of Cambridge alſo: For that it appeareth certainly out of the Records of the realme, that David Earle of Huntingdon, received the third penny of the County or Earledome of Cambridge. Long time after, King Edward the Third advanced Sir Iohn of Henault brother to William the third Earle of Holland and of Henault to this honour, for the love of Queene Philip his wife, who was coſin to the ſaid Iohn. For whoſe ſake alſo when Iohn was revolted from him and tooke part with the French, hee honoured with the ſame title William Marqueſſe of Iuliers, the ſaid Queene Philips ſiſters ſon.
D After the death of theſe two Forainers, King Edward the Third tranſlated this dignity to his fifth ſonne Edmund of Langley, which after he had held foure yeeres (my warrant I have out of an old manuſcript, being in the hands of that skilfull Antiquary Francis Thinn) the Earle of Henault coſin to Queene Philip, came into Parliament houſe, put in a claime for his right, and returned backe well contented. The ſaid Edmund of Langly afterwards Duke of Yorke had two ſonnes, Edward Duke of Yorke, who for a certaine time held the Earldome of Cambridge, and was ſlaine in the battell of Agincourt: and Richard by the grace and favour of King Henry the Fifth, and conſent of his brother Edward, was created Earle of Cambridge. But when he (ungratefull and ambitious man that hee was) contrived the deſtruction of that good and noble
E Prince, and ſo loſt his head; the title of Cambridge died the ſame day that he did, or lurked at leaſt wiſe among other titles of his ſonne Richard, who was afterwards Duke of Yorke and reſtored to his blood and eſtate, as being coſin and heire to his Unkle Edward Duke of Yorke.

Earle of Cambridge.

HUNTINGDON-SHIRE.

NExt unto Cambridge-ſhire, lyeth HUNTINGDON-SHIRE, in the Saxon tongue hunteduneꝛcyne; ſo ſituate, that Southward it confineth upon Bedford-ſhire; Weſtward upon Northampton-ſhire: like as Northwards, where by the River * Avon it is parted; and Eaſtward upon Cambridge-ſhire, a Country good for corne and tillage: and toward the Eaſt, where it is fenny, very rich and plentifull for the feeding of Cattaile: elſewhere right pleaſant, by reaſon of riſing hils and ſhady groves: For, the Inhabitants report, that in ancient times, it was throughout beſet with woods: and certaine it is, that it was a Foreſt, untill that king Henry the Second, in the beginning of his raign diſforeſted it, (as we find in an old perambulation) all ſave Waybridge Sapple and Herthei, which were Woods of the Lords demaine, and remaine ſtill foreſts.

* Or Auſon, I, Nen.

The South part thereof; the River Ouſe (that I have ſo often ſpoken of) runneth by, and bedecketh with flowers. On which River among other of leſſe note, there ſtand ſome Townes of good note. Firſt, after it hath left Bedford-ſhire, and is entred into this County, it viſiteth Saint Neots, commonly called Saint Needs, ſo named of one Neotus, a man both learned and holy; who travailed all his life time in propagating of Chriſtian Religion, whoſe body was tranſlated from Neotſtok in Cornwall hither, and in honour of him, Alfrick converted the Palace of Earle Elfride unto a Monaſtery. The which Dame Roiſia Wife to Richard Lord of Clare, ſhortly after the comming in of the Normas enriched with many faire Poſſeſſions; But before it was named Ainulphsbury of one Ainulph likewiſe an holy and devout man, which name continueth ſtill alſo in one part of it. A little beneath this, at Alleweſton a very ſmall Village, there are two little Springs, the one freſh, the other ſomewhat brackiſh: of which the neighbours give out, that this is good againſt ſcabs and leproſie, the other againſt the dimneſſe of the eye-ſight. From thence not farre, Ouſe paſſeth to Bugden a proper faire houſe of the Biſhops of Lincolne, and ſo by Hinchingbrok, a religious houſe ſometimes of Nuns whom King William the Conquerour tranſlated hither from Eliteſley in Cambridge-ſhire, and now the dwelling houſe of the Cromwels, knights; commeth to Huntingdon, in the Engliſh-Saxon tongue, as Marianus reporteth Huntandun, in the publique ſeale Hunterſdune, that is, the hill or downe of hunters, as Henry Archdeacon of this place, who flouriſhed 400. yeares ſince, interpreteth it: whence it uſed in their ſeale, an hunter; and Leland our Countriman alluding thereunto, hath coined a new Latine word for it, namely Venantodunum. This is the chiefe Towne of all this Shire, (to which it hath given alſo the name) farre excelling all the Townes about it, the ſame Archdeacon ſaith, as well for light ſome and pleaſant ſituation, as for the beauty and faire ſhew that it hath it ſelfe: as well alſo for the vicinity of the Fennes as for great ſtore of Deere and Fiſh. In King Edward the Confeſſors time, (that I may note ſo much out of Domeſday booke) There were in this Borrough foure Ferlings, that is, Quarters or Wards: In two of them were 116. Burgeſſes, paying cuſtome and gelt, and under them 100. Bordarij; in the other two 111. Burgeſſes for all cuſtomes and the Kings gelt. It is ſeated upon the North-banke of Ouſe, ſomewhat high, ſtretching out in length Northward, adorned with foure Churches: and it had a little Abbay founded by Maude the Empreſſe and Euſtace Lovetoft: the ruines whereof Eaſtward I have ſeene hard under the Towne. By the River neere unto the Bridge which is faire built of ſtone, the Mount and Plot of a Caſtle, is to bee ſeene, which in the yeare of our Redemption 917. King Edward the Elder built anew: and David the Scotiſhman, unto whom, as an ancient Hiſtoriographer writeth King Stephen had given the Burrough of Huntingdon for an augmentation of his eſtate, enlarged with many new buildings and Bulwarkes: but in the end King Henry the Second both becauſe it was a place of refuge for ſeditious Rebels, and for that the Scots and the Huntingdon.

It is very likely, and ancient-like, that ſome Romans were ſpoiling the [illegible] fractures with red bricks when I found it in Sept. 1842.

Saint Lizes had oftentimes raiſed quarrels and contention about it, to cut off all occaſions of ſtrife, laid it even with the ground; when as hee, provoked with their unreaſonable variance ſwore an oath, that neither they of Saint Lizes nor the Scottiſhmen ſhould quarrell any more for it. From theſe Caſtle hils, where there is a goodly proſpect a great way off, a man may behold below a medow which they call Portſholme, environed round about with the River Ouſe, the ſame very exceeding large, and of all others that the Sunne ever ſhone upon, moſt freſh and beautifull: whereof in the Spring time this may be truly ſaid:

Ver pingit vario gemmantia prata colore:
The pleaſant Spring faire flowers doe yeeld,
Of divers colours, in this field.

With ſuch a delectable variety of gaye colours it pleaſeth and contenteth the eye. On the hither banke over againſt Huntingdon, ſtandeth the mother as it were thereof, from whence it had his Originall, called in Domeſday booke Godmundceſter, and at this day Good-man-cheſter, for Gormoncheſter: A very great country Towne, and of as great name for tillage, ſituate in an open ground, of a light mould, and bending to the Sun. Neither is there a Towne againe in all England that hath more ſtout and luſty husbandmen, or more ploughs agoing: For, they make their boaſt that they have in former time received the Kings of England as they paſſed in their progreſſe this way, with nine ſcore ploughs, brought forth in a ruſticall kind of pompe for a gallant ſhew. Verily, of our Nation, there be none that apply their mindes ſo ſeriouſly as they doe to husbandry (which Columella termeth the neere cozin of Wiſedome) whether you reſpect their skill therein, or their ability to beare the expences, and their willing mind withall to take the paines. Henry of Huntingdon before named, calleth it a Village, in his daies, not unlovely: and truly writeth, that in times paſt it had been a noble City. For, to ſay nothing of Roman peeces of coine oftentimes there ploughed up, nor of the diſtance in the old Itinerary, the very ſignification of the name may probably prove, that this was the very ſame City, which Antonine the Emperor termed DUROLIPONTE, amiſſe, in ſtead of DUROSIPONTE. For Duroſi-ponte (pardon me I pray you for changing one letter) ſoundeth in the Britiſh tongue, A bridge over the water Oſe. And that this River is named indifferently and without diſtinction, Vſe, Iſe, Oſe, and Ouſe, all men confeſſe. But when this name was under the Danes quite aboliſhed, it began to be called Gormonceſter, of Gormon the Dane, unto whom after agreement of peace King Ælfred granted theſe Provinces. Hereto, this old Verſe giveth teſtimony.

Godmanchester.

Durosiponte.

Gormonis à caſtri nomine, nomen habet.
Gormoncheſter, at this howre,
Takes the name of Gormons Towre.

This is that Gormon of whom John Picus an old Author, writeth in this wiſe: King Ælfred conquered and ſubdued the Danes, ſo that they gave what hoſtages hee would for aſſurance, either to be packing out of the Land, or elſe to become Chriſtians. Which thing alſo was effected. For, their King Guthrum, whom they call Gormond, with thirty of his Nobles and well neere all his people was baptized; and adopted by Ælfred as his Sonne, and by him named Athelſtan. Whereupon he remained heere; and the Provinces of the Eaſt-Engliſh and of the Northumbrians were given to him: that continuing in his allegiance, under the Kings protection, he might cheriſh and alſo maintain them as his inheritance, which he had formerly overrun with ſpoile and robbery. Neither would this be omitted, that ſome alſo of thoſe ancient Writers have termed this place Gumiceſter, and Gumicaſtrum, avoucheth withall, that Machutus a Biſhop had heere his Epiſcopall See. And by the name of Gumiceſter King Henry the Third granted it to his ſonne Edmund Earle of Lancaſter.

Ouſe making haſte ſpeedily from hence, when he was about to enter into Cambridgeſhire, paſſeth through moſt delightſome medowes hard by a proper and faire towne, which ſometime in the Engliſh-Saxon tongue was called Slepe, and now S. Ives, of Saint Ives.

Ive

A Ivo a Perſian Biſhop, who, as they write, about the yeare of Chriſt 600. travailed through England, preached diligently the Word of God, and to this Towne, wherein he left this life, left alſo his name. From whence notwithſtanding ſhortly after the religious perſons tranſlated his body to Ramſey Abbay.

Turning aſide from hence ſcarce three miles, wee ſaw Somerſham a faire dwelling houſe, of late dayes belonging to the Biſhops of Ely, which Earle Brithnot in the yeare 991. gave to Ely Church, and James Stanley, the laviſh, and expencefull Biſhop, enlarged with new buildings. A little above that moſt wealthy Abbay Ramſey was ſituate amiddeſt the Fennes, where the Rivers become ſtanding waters, when they have once found a ſoft kinde of Soile. Somerſham.

B The deſcription of this place have here if it pleaſe you, out of the private Hiſtory of this Abbay. Ramſey, that is, The Rams Iſle, on the Weſt ſide (for on other ſides enniſh grounds through which one cannot paſſe, ſtretch out farre and wide) is ſevered from the firme ground almoſt two bow-ſhots off by certaine uneven and quaggy miry plots. Which place being wont in times paſt to receive gently within the boſome and brinkes thereof, Veſſels arriving there with milde gales of winde in a ſhallow River onely: now through great labour and coſt after the foule and dirty quagmires aforeſaid were ſtopped up with heapes of wood, gravell and ſtones together, men may paſſe into on foote on the ſame ſide upon a dry cauſey: and it lieth out in length almoſt two miles, but ſpreadeth not all out ſo much in bredth: which notwithſtanding is beſet round about with beautifull rowes of Alder-trees, and reed plots, that with C freſh greene canes and ſtreight bulruſhes among, make a faire and pleaſant ſhew; and before it was inhabited, garniſhed and bedecked all over with many ſorts of trees, but of wilde Aſhes eſpecially, in great aboundance. But now after longer tract of time, part of theſe groves and woods being cut downe, it is become arable ground of a very fat and plentifull mould, for fruit rich, pleaſant for corne, planted with gardens, wealthy in paſtures, and in the Spring time, the medowes arraied with pleaſant flowers ſmile upon the beholders: and the whole Iſland ſeemeth embroidered, as it were, with variety of gay colours. Beſides that, it is compaſſed all about with Meres full of Eeles, and pooles repleniſhed with fiſh of many ſorts, and with fowle there bred and nouriſhed. Of which Meres, one is called after the name of the Iſland Ramſey Mere, farre excelling all the other waters adjoyning, in beauty and fertility, on that ſide D where the Iſle is counted bigger and the wood thicker, ſlowing daintily by the ſandy banke thereof, yeeldeth a very delectable ſight to behold: in the very gulfes whereof by caſting as well of great wide maſhed nets, as of other ſorts, by laying alſo of hookes baited, and other inſtruments deviſed by fiſhers craft, are caught oftentimes and drawne certaine Pikes of an huge and wonderfull bigneſſe, which the Inhabitants call Hakeds: and albeit the fowlers doe continually haunt the place and catch great ſtore of young water-fowle, yet there is abundance alwaies that remaineth untaken. Furthermore that Hiſtory ſheweth at large, how Ailwin a man of the bloud royall, and for the ſpeciall great authority and favour that hee had with the King, ſirnamed Healf-Koning, that is, Halfe King, being admoniſhed and mooved thereunto by a Fiſhers dreame built it; how Oſwald the Biſhop furthered and enlarged it; how Kings and others endowed it with ſo faire revenewes, that for the maintenance of threeſcore Monkes it might diſpend by the yeare ſeven thouſand pounds of our Engliſh money. But ſeeing it is now pulled downe and deſtroyed, ſome may thinke I have already ſpoken overmuch thereof. Yet hereto I will annexe out of the ſame Authour the Epitaph of Ailwins Tombe, for that it exhibiteth unto us an unuſuall and ſtrange title of a Dignity. Ramſey. Ramſey Mere. Hakeds.

F HIC REQUIESCIT AILWINUS INCLITI REGIS EADGARI COGNATUS, TOTIUS ANGLIÆ ALDERMANNUS, ET HUJUS SACRI COENOBII MIRACULOSUS FUNDATOR.

HERE RESTETH AILWIN COZIN TO THE NOBLE KING EADGAR, ALDERMAN OF ALL ENGLAND, AND OF THIS HOLY ABBAY THE MIRACULOUS FOUNDER.

From hence to Peterborough, which is about ten miles off, King Canutus, becauſe travailing that way and finding it very comberſome by reaſon of ſwelling Brookes and ſloughs, with great coſt and labour made a paved Cauſey, which our Hiſtorians call Kings-delfe, not farre from that great Lake Wittleſmere. And as this Abbay did adorne the Eaſt ſide of the Shire, ſo, the middle thereof was beautified by Saltrie, which the ſecond Simon de Sancto Lizio Earle of Huntingdon built. From which not farre, is Cunnington, holden anciently of the Honour of Huntingdon: where, within a foure ſquare Trench, are to be ſeene expreſſe remaines of an ancient Caſtle, which as alſo Saltrie, was by the gift of Canutus, the ſeat of Turkill that Dane, who abode heere among the Eaſt Engliſh, and ſent for Sueno King of Denmarke to make ſpoile of England. After whoſe departure, Waldeof the ſonne of Siward Earle of Northumberland enjoyed it, who married Judith Niece to William the Conquerour by his ſiſter on the mothers ſide: by whoſe eldeſt daughter it came to the royall family of Scotland. For ſhe, by a ſecond marriage, matched with David Earle of Huntingdon (who afterwards obtained the Kingdome of Scotland) being the younger ſonne of Malcolm Can-mor, King of Scots, and of Margaret his wife deſcended of the royall line of the Engliſh-Saxons: For, ſhee was Niece to King Edmund Iron-ſide by his ſonne Edward ſirnamed, The Baniſhed. David had a ſonne named Henry, and Henry had another named David Earle of Huntingdon, by one of whoſe daughters, Iſabel, Cunnington and other lands by right of marriage deſcended to Sir Robert Bruſe: from whoſe eldeſt ſonne Robert ſirnamed the Noble, James King of Great Britaine lineally deriveth his Deſcent: and from Bernard his younger ſonne, unto whom this Cunnington with Exton fell, Sir Robert Cotton Knight is lineally deſcended; whoover and beſide other vertues, being a ſingular lover and ſearcher of Antiquities, having gathered with great charges from all places the Monuments of venerable Antiquity, hath heere begunne a famous Cabinet, whence of his ſingular courteſie, hee hath oftentimes given me great light in theſe darkſome obſcurities.

But theſe Quarters, conſidering the ground lying ſo low, and for many moneths in the yeare ſurrounded and drowned, in ſome places alſo floting (as it were) and boven up with the waters, are not free from the offenſive noiſomneſſe of Meres and the unwholeſome aire of the Fennes. Here for ſixe miles in length and three in breadth that cleare deepe and fiſhfull Mere named Wittleſmere ſpreadeth it ſelfe, which as other Meres in this Tract, doth ſometimes in Calmes and faire weather ſodainly riſe tempeſtuouſly, as it were, into violent water-quakes to the danger of the poore fiſhermen, by reaſon, as ſome thinke, of evaporations breaking violently out of the bowels of the earth. As for the unhealthineſſe of the place, whereunto onely ſtrangers, and not the natives there are ſubject, who live long and healthfully, there is amends made, as they account it, by the commodity of fiſhing, the plentifull feeding, and the abundance of turfe gotten for fewell. For, King Cnut gave commandement by Turkill the Dane, of whom ere while I ſpake, That to every Village ſtanding about the Fennes, there ſhould bee ſet out a ſeverall Marſh: who ſo divided the ground, that each Village by it ſelfe ſhould have in proper uſe and occupation ſo much of the very maine Marſh, as the firme ground of every ſuch Village touched the Marſh lying juſt againſt it. And he ordained that no Village might either digge or mow in the Marſh of another without licence, but that the paſture therein ſhould lye all in common, that is, Horne under horne, for the preſervation of peace and concord among them. But thus much of this matter.

Wittleſmere Lake.

When

A When the ſonnes and ſervants of the ſaid King Cnut, ſent for from Peterborough to Ramſey, were in paſſing over that Lake, There fell upon them, as they were cheerefull under ſaile and lifting up their voices with joyfull ſhoutings, moſt untoward and unhappy windes, wherewith a turbulent and tempeſtuous ſtorme aroſe, that encloſed them on every ſide, ſo that laying aſide all hope, they were in utter deſpaire of their life, ſecurity, or any helpe at all. But ſuch was the mercifull clemency of Almighty God, that it forſooke them not wholy, nor ſuffered the moſt cruell Gulfe of the waters to ſwallow them up all quite, but by his providence ſome of them he delivered mercifully out of thoſe furious and raging waves: but others againe according to his juſt and ſecret judgement he permitted amiddeſt thoſe billowes to paſſe out of this fraile and mortall life. And when the fame of ſo fearefull a danger was noiſed abroad and come to the Kings eares, there fell a mighty trembling and quaking upon him: but being comforted and releeved by the counſaile of his Nobles and freinds, for to prevent in time to come all future miſhaps by occaſion of that outragious monſter, hee ordained that his ſouldiers and ſervants with their ſwords and skeins ſhould ſet out and marke a certaine Ditch in the Mariſhes lying thereby, betweene Ramſey and Whittleſey, and afterwards that workemen and labourers ſhould skoure and cleanſe them: whereupon, as I have learned of ancient predeceſſours of good credite, the ſaid Ditch by ſome of the neighbour Inhabitants tooke the name Swerdeſdelfe, upon that marking out by ſwords: and ſome would have it to bee termed Cnouſ-delfe according to the name of the ſame King. Yet commonly at this day they call it Steeds dike: and it is counted the limit and bound between this County and Cambridge-ſhire. The little Hiſtory of Ely. The foundation of Saltry. Swerdeſdelfe differing from Kings Delfe.

C In the Eaſt ſide of this Shire, Kinnibantum Caſtle, now called Kimbolton, the habitation in times paſt of the Mandevilles, afterwards of the Bohuns and Staffords, and at this day of the Wingfields, doth make a faire ſhew. Under which was Stoneley a prety Abbay founded by the Bigrames. A little from hence is Awkenbury, which King John gave to David Earle of Huntingdon: and John ſirnamed the Scot, his ſonne, unto Sir Stephen Segrave: of whom I am the more willing to make mention, for that he was one of thoſe Courtiers who hath taught us, That there is no power alwaies powerfull. Hardly and with much adoe hee climbed to an eminent and high eſtate, with great thought and care hee kept it, and as ſodainely hee was dejected from it: For, in his youth, of a Clerke he became a Knight, and albeit hee was but of meane D parentage, yet through his induſtry toward his later dayes ſo enriched and advanced, that being ranged with the great Peeres of the Realme, hee was reputed chiefe Juſtice of England, and managed at his pleaſure after a ſort all the affaires of State. But in the end he loſt the Kings favour quite, and to his dying day lay cloſe in a Cloyſter: and who before time from a Clerkſhip betooke himſelfe through arrogancy to ſecular ſervice, returning againe to the office of a Clerke, reſumed the ſhaven crowne which hee had forſaken without the counſell and adviſe of the Biſhop. Not farre from hence is Leighton, where Sir Gervaſe Cliſton knight, lately made Baron Cliſton, beganne to build a goodly houſe, and cloſe to it lyeth Spaldwicke, which King Henry the Firſt gave unto the Church of Lincolne for amends of a loſſe, when hee erected the Biſhopricke of Ely, taken out of the Dio- E ceſſe of Lincolne, as I have before ſhewed. Kimbolton. Stephen Segrave. Mat. Paris. Leighton.

But where the River Nen entreth into this Shire, it runneth faſt by Elton the ſeat of the ancient Family of the Sapcots, where is a private Chappell of ſingular workemanſhip and moſt artificiall glaſſe windowes, erected by Lady Elizabeth Dinham the widow of Baron Fitz-warin, married into the ſaid Family. But a little higher, there ſtood a little City more ancient than all theſe, neere unto Walmsford: which Henry of Huntingdon calleth Caer Dorm and Dormeceaſter upon the River Nen, and reporteth to have beene utterly raſed before his time. This was doubtleſſe that DUROBRIVÆ, that is, The River paſſage, that Antonine the Emperour ſpeaketh of, and now in the very ſame ſenſe is called Dornford neere unto Cheſterton, which beſide peeces of F ancient Coine daily found in it, ſheweth apparant tokens of a City overthrowne. For, to it there leadeth directly from Huntingdon a Roman Port way: and a little above Stilton, which in times paſt was called Stichilton, it is ſeene with an high banke, and in an ancient Saxon Charter termed Ermingſtreat. This Street now runneth here through the middeſt of a foure ſquare Fort, the North ſide whereof was fenſed Elton. Walmsford. Durobrivæ. Stilton. Ermingſtreet.

were digged up not long ſince Cofins or Sepulchres of ſtone in the ground of R. Bevill, of an ancient houſe in this Shire. Some verily thinke that this City tooke up Caſter in Northamptonſhire. both bankes of the River; and there bee of opinion that the little Village Caſter ſtanding upon the other banke was parcell thereof. Surely to this opinion of theirs maketh much the teſtimony of an ancient ſtory, which ſheweth that there was a place by Nen called Dormund-caſter, in which when Kinneburga had built a little Monaſtery, it began to be called firſt Kinneburge-caſter, and afterwards ſhort Caſter. This Kinneburga the moſt Chriſtian daughter of the Pagan King Penda, and wife to Alfred King of the Northumbrians (changed her Princely State into the ſervice of Chriſt, if I may uſe the words of an ancient Writer) and governed this Monaſtery of her own, as Prioreſſe or mother of the Nunnes there. Which afterwards, about the yeare of Salvation 1010. by the furious Danes was made levell with the ground. But where this River is ready to leave this County, it paſſeth hard by an ancient houſe called Bottlebridge (ſo is it now termed ſhort for Botolph-bridge) which the Draitons and Leons brought from R. Gimels by hereditary ſucceſſion into the Family of the Shirleies. And to this houſe adjoyneth Overton, now corruptly called Orton, which being by felo-

Earles of Huntingdon. This County of Huntingdon when the Engliſh-Saxons Empire began now to C decline, had Siward an Earle by Office, and not inheritance: For as yet there were no Earles in England by inheritance, but the Rulers of Provinces, after the cuſtome of that age were termed Earles, with addition of the Earledome of this or that Province whereof they had the rule for the time: as this Siward whiles he governed this County was called Earle of Huntingdon; whereas afterwards being Ruler of Northumberland, they named him Earle of Northumberland. He had a ſonne named Waldeof, who under the Title of Earle had likewiſe the government of this Province, ſtanding in favour as he did with William the Conquerour whoſe Niece Judith by his

But after that the ſaid Simon was dead, David brother to* Maud the Holy, Queene of England (who afterwards became King of Scots) married his wife by whom hee had a ſonne named Henry. But in proceſſe of time, as fortune and Princes favour varied, one while the Scots, another while the Sim Lizes enjoyed this dignity: Firſt Henry the ſonne of David aforeſaid: then Simon S. Liz ſonne of Simon the firſt: after him Makolm King of Scots, ſonne to Earle Henry: and after his death Simon Sent Liz the third who dying without iſſue, William King of Scots and brother to Malcolm ſucceeded: for, ſo wrote he that then lived, Raphe de Diceto in the yeare 1185. When Simon (ſaith hee) the ſonne of Earle Simon was E departed without children, the King reſtored the Earldome of Huntingdon with the Pertinences unto William King of the Scots. Then his brother David, and Davids ſonne John ſirnamed Scot, Earle of Cheſter, who dying without iſſue, and Alexander the

A good while after King Edward the Third created Sir William Clinton Earle of Huntingdon who dyed iſſueleſſe: And in his roome there was placed by King Richard the Second, Guiſeard of Engoliſme, a Gaſcoine, who was his Governour in his minority: and after his death ſucceeded Iohn Holland, Iohn his ſonne (who was ſtiled Duke of Exceſter, Earle of Huntingdon and Ivory, Lord of Sparre, Admirall of England and Ireland, Lieutenant of Aquitane, and Conſtable of the Towre of London) and his ſonne likewiſe Henry, ſucceſſively, F

A Countries, whiles he ſtood firme and faſt unto the houſe of Lancaſter, albeit he had married King Edward the Fourth his owne ſiſter. Then Thomas Grey, who became afterward Marqueſſe Dorſet, a little while enjoyed that honour. Alſo it is evident out of the Records, that William Herbert Earle of Pembroch brought in againe the Charter of creation, whereby his father was made Earle of Pembroch, into the Chancery for to be cancelled: and that King Edward the Fourth in the ſeventeenth of his Raigne created him Earle of Huntingdon, at ſuch time as he granted the Title of Pembroch to the Prince his ſonne. Afterward King Henry the Eighth conferred that honour upon George Lord Haſtings: after whom ſucceeded his ſonne Francis, and after him likewiſe his ſonne Henry, a right honourable Perſonage, commended B both for true Nobility and Piety. But whereas hee dyed without iſſue, his brother Sir George Haſtings ſucceeded: and after him his Grandchilde Henry by his ſonne, who at this day enjoyeth the ſaid honour.

In this little Shire are numbered Pariſhes. 78.

CORI-

CORITANI.

NOw must wee passe on to the CORITANI, who beyond the ICENI dwelling further within the Land, and spreading themselves very farre through the Mediterranean part of the Island, inhabited as farre as to the German Ocean, to wit in these Countries which now are commonly called NORTHAMPTON-SHIRE, LEICESTER-SHIRE, RUTLAND-SHIRE, LINCOLN-SHIRE, NOTTINGHAM-SHIRE, and DERBY-SHIRE. With the Etymology of this their name I will not once meddle, for feare leaſt putting downe incertainties for certaine and undoubted trueths, I may seeme to slip into an errour. For, although this People were spread farre and wide, which GUR-TATI signifieth in the British tongue, yet if I would boldly avouch, that these were thence called CORITANI, should I not play hazard at all aventure? Let them, for mee, guesse more safely, who can more happily. As for mee, I will in the meane time according to my purpose survey as diligently as I may these shires which I have now named, each one by it selfe orderly in their severall places.

NORTHAMPTON-SHIRE.

THis County of NORTHAMPTON, in the Engliſh-Saxon tongue Noꝛþ-aꝑenꝺon-ꝛcipe, and Northanton-ſhire, commonly called Northampton-ſhire, ſituate in the very middle and heart, as it were, of England, from the South-Weſt ſide, where it is broadeſt, drawing it ſelfe narrower by little and little, reacheth out in length to the North-Eaſt. On the Eaſt lie Bedford and Huntingdon-ſhires: on the South Buckingham and Oxford-ſhires: Weſtward Warwickſhire: and Northward Rutland-ſhire, and Lincoln-ſhire, ſeparated from it by Avon the leſſe, and Welland, two Rivers. The Eaſt ſide thereof, from Ouſe to Dowbridge, one of the Romane high waies which they call Watling-ſtreat runneth through: The middle and Eaſt part the River Neu, which by Writers is named alſo Aufona, with his gentle ſtreame parteth in twaine. A champian countrey it is, exceeding populous, and paſſing well furniſhed with Noblemens and Gentlemens houſes, repleniſhed alſo with Townes and Churches, in ſo much as in ſome places there are twenty, and in others thirty Steeples with Spires or ſquare Towres within view at once. The Soile very fertile both for tillage and for paſture, yet nothing ſo well ſtored with Woods, unleſſe it bee in the further and hither ſides. But in every place, as elſewhere alſo in England, it is over-ſpred and as it were beſet with Sheepe: which according as that Hythodæus merrily ſaid, Were wont to bee ſo gentle and fed with ſo little; but now in our daies, as the report goes, beginne to bee ſo ravenous and wilde, that they devour men, they waſte and depopulate fields, houſes, and Townes-ſhips. Utopia of Sir Thomas More.

On the South border, where the River Ouſe ſo often mentioned firſt ſpringeth, in a place riſing with an eaſie aſcent, and out of which there walme Springs in great plenty, ſtandeth Brakley, as one would ſay a place full of Brake or Ferne, in old time a famous Mercat Towne and ſtaple as it were for wool: which how large and wealthy it was, it maketh now demonſtration to travailers, only by the ruines thereof; and by a Major, whom it hath for the chiefe Magiſtrate. The Zouches Lords of the place, founded a College there: from whom it came ſucceſſively as a poſſeſſion in marriage right unto the Hollands and the Lovels. But when Lord Lovell in King Henry the Seventh his time was attainted, the Stanleies became Lords of it by the Kings gift. But the College there, at this day ruinous, belongeth to the Students of Mawdlen College in Oxford, who uſe it for a retyring place. Neither came this place to the leaſt name and reputation that it had, by occaſion of the memory of Saint Rumbald a young Infant, who as wee finde written in his life, being a Kings ſonne, ſo ſoone as ever he was borne, after he had ſpoken I know not what holy words, and profeſſed himſelfe to be a Chriſtian, was forthwith baptiſed, and ſo preſently dyed, and being canonized by the people amongſt the Saints, had his commemoration kept both here and at Buckingham.

From hence Northward, when we had gone ſix miles forward, and all the way well wooded, firſt we ſaw Aſtwell, where Sir T. Billing ſometime Lord chiefe Juſtice in the Kings Bench with great ſtate dwelt: from whom it deſcended hereditarily to the Shirleis by the ancient Family of the Lovels: then Wedon and Wapiham, which the Family of the Pinkeneys held by Barony, untill that H. de Pinkney ordained King Edward the Firſt his heire. Whom being a right good and excellent Prince many evill men made their heire; whereas (according to Tacitus) a good father maketh no Prince, but a bad one his heire. Then came we ſtraight waies to TRIPONTIUM, which Antonine the Emperour mentioneth, though not in due place: For, I am of opinion, that this was the very ſame, which now we call Torceſter: and to prove it, there be ſome arguments of moment as yet remaining. If Trimontium in Thracia had that name of three hils, Triturrita in Tuskane of three Towres, and Tripolis likewiſe Barony of the Pinkeneys.

wiſe of three Cities conjoyned in one; I have no reaſon to doubt, that this TRIPONTIUM of ours, might be ſo called of three Bridges. And heere at this Torceſter the Roman Port way which in many places moſt evidently ſheweth it ſelfe betweene it and Stony ſtratford, is cut through by three ſpeciall Chanels or ſtreames that the little River there d ivideth it ſelfe into; which in times paſt, like as at this day had of neceſſity there ſeverall Bridges over them. Now, if you ask a Britain, how he ſaith in Britiſh [Three Bridges] you ſhall heare him by and by anſwer [Taer ponte]: and there be certaine honeſt men, from whom I have received heere peeces of Romane Coine, that conſtantly avouch, the true name of this place to be Torceſter, and think it was ſo called of Towres. Howbeit Marianus nameth it Toueceſter, if the booke be not faulty, in whom we read, that this towne was ſo fortified in the yeer of our Redemption 917. that the Danes by no meanes could winne it by aſſault: and that King Edward the elder afterwards compaſſed it about with a ſtone Wall; yet wee with all our ſeeking could ſee no tokens of any ſuch Wall. Only there is a Mount remaining caſt up with mens hands, they call it Berihill, now turned into private mens Gardens, and planted on every ſide with Chery trees. And very time it ſelfe hath ſo conquered and ſubdued the towne, that beholden it is to the ſituation, to the name, and old Coines other whiles heere found, for that eſteeme which it hath of antiquity. For, no memorable thing there is in it but one onely Church that it hath; and the ſame is a large and faire building, wherein D. Sponde ſometime the Parſon thereof, by report, a good benefactor to Church and towne both, lieth entombed within a tombe of fine and curious workemanſhip. But hard by, at Eaſton-Neſſon, there is to bee ſeene, a faire and beautifull dwelling houſe belonging to the Knightly Family of the Farmors.

The River that watereth Torceſter, as it goeth from hence toward Ouſe, runneth beſide Grafton, which now is reputed an Honor of the Kings, but in times paſt was the ſeat of the Family de Widdevil: out of which came Richard, a man highly renowned for his vertue and valour: who for that he tooke to wife Iaquet the widow of John Duke of Bedford, and daughter to Peter of Luxenburgh, Earle of Saint Paul, without the Kings licence, was by King Henry the Sixth fined at a thouſand pounds of our money. Yet afterwards he advanced the ſame Richard to the honorable Title of Baron Widdevil de Rivers. With whoſe daughter Dame Elizabeth, King Edward the Fourth ſecretly contracted marriage: and verily hee was the firſt of all our Kings ſince the Conqueſt that married his ſubject. But thereby, he drew upon himſelfe and his wives kinsfolke a world of troubles, as yee may ſee in our Hiſtories. The ſaid Richard Widdevil Lord of Rivers, Grafton, and de la Mote, by king Edward the Fourth now his ſon in Law, was erected (theſe be the very words out of the Charter of his creation) to be Earle Rivers, by cincture of the ſword, To have unto him and his heires, with the Fee of 20. pounds, by the hands of the Sheriffe of Northampton. And ſoone after he was with exceeding great honour ordained High Conſtable of England, (I ſpeake out of the kings Patent it ſelfe) To occupy, manage, and execute that Office, either by himſelfe, or by ſufficient Deputies for terme of life, receiving yearely two hundred pounds out of the Exchequer, with full power and authority to take examinations, and to proceede in Cauſes of and concerning the crime of high Treaſon, or the occaſion thereof: alſo to heare, examine, and in due time to determine the cauſes and buſineſſes aforeſaid, with all and ſingular matters ariſing from them, incident to them, or conjoyned therewith, even ſummarily, and in any place whatſoever below, without noiſe or formall order of Iudgement, onely upon ſight of the Truth of the fact, and with the Kings hand and power, if it ſhall be thought meete in our behalfe, without all appeale. Moreover about that time he was made Lord Treaſurer of England. But he having enjoyed theſe honours a ſmall while, was ſoone after in the quarrell of the king his ſonne in Law, aforeſaid, taken in the battaile at Edgcote, and beheaded. And albeit, in his ſonnes this offspring, as it were halfe dead, tooke an end, what time as Anthony Earle Rivers was by Richard the third made ſhorter by the head, Richard alſo and his other brethren dead without iſſue: yet from the daughters there did ſpred forth moſt faire and fruitfull branches. For, out of them flowred the royall Race and line of England, the Marqueſſes of Dorſet, the Earles of Eſſex, Juſt behinde Grafton lieth Sacy Forreſt ſtored with Deere and fit for game. More Eaſtward, the Country all over is beſprinkled with Villages and little Townes, among which, theſe are of greateſt name, Bliſworth, the habitation of the Wakes deſcended from that honorable race of the Barons of Wake and Eſtotevile: Pateſhull, which gave name to the moſt worſhipfull family in times paſt of the Pateſhuls: Greenes-Norton, ſo named of the Greenes men in the fore-going age right famous for their wealth. But it was called in foretime (if I be not deceived) Norton Dany, which thoſe Greenes held by knights ſervice, as alſo a moity of Aſheby Mares in this County, by B ſervice, To liſt up their right hand toward the King upon Chriſtmaſ-day every yeare, whereſoever the King ſhall bee in England. Alſo Wardon, an Hundred, which had Lords deſcended from Sir Guy of Reinbudcourt a Norman, whoſe inheritance came by the Follios to Guiſcard Leddet, whoſe Daughter Chriſtian bare unto her husband Henry de Braibrooke many children: yet Guiſcard the eldeſt of them tooke to him the ſirname of Leddet from his mother. But ſhortly after, thoſe faire lands and poſſeſſions were by the females parted betweene William and Iohn, both Latimers of Corby. From Iohn, the Griphins in this Shire, and from William thoſe Latimers, Barons of good antiquity, in York-ſhire, deduced their Deſcent.

Fines 18. Rich. 2.

Higher into the Country Northward is the head of the River Auſona (for Avon in C the Britiſh tongue is a generall name of all Rivers) which the people dwelling thereby call Nen: and from the Weſt ſide of the Shire, holdeth on his courſe with many reaches of his bankes, after a ſort through the middle part of this Shire; and all the way along it doth comfortable ſervice. A notable River, I aſſure you, and if I have any ſight into theſe matters, fortified in times paſt with gariſons by the Romans. For, when as that part of Britain on this ſide the River, was now in Claudius the Emperors time brought ſubject to the Romane government, ſo as the Inhabitants thereof were called Socij Romanorum, that is, the Romans conſorts or aſſociates, and the Britans dwelling beyond the river oftentimes invaded this their country, and with great violence made incurſions, and ſpoiled much: when as alſo that the Aſſociates themſelves who could D better endure the Romans commands, than brooke their vices, other whiles conſpired with thoſe on the further ſide of the River: P. Oſtorius (as ſaith Tacitus) cinctos caſtris Antonam (Auſonas I would reade if I might be ſo bold) & Sabrinam cohibere parat, that is, if I underſtand the place a right, Hee by placing Forts and Gariſons, hard by the Rivers Antona, or Auſona rather, and Severn, determined to reſtraine and keepe in thoſe Britans on the further ſide; and theſe that were Provincials and aſſociates, from conjoyning their forces together, and helping one another againſt the Romans. Now what River this ANTONA ſhould be no man is able to tell. Lipſius the very Phœbus of our age hath either driven away this miſt, or elſe verily a cloud hath dimmed mine eye-ſight. He pointeth with his finger to Northampton, and I am E of opinion that this word Antona is cloſely crept into Tacitus, in ſtead of Auſona, on which Northampton ſtandeth. For the very navill, heart and middle of England is counted to be nere unto it, where out of one hill ſpring three great Rivers running divers wayes: Cherwell into the South; Leame, Weſtward, which as it maketh ſpeed to Severn, is ſtraight wayes received by a ſecond Auſon; and this Auſona or Nen Eaſtward. Of which, theſe two Auſons ſo croſſe England overthwart, that whoſoever comes out of the North parts of the Iſland muſt of neceſſity paſſe over one of theſe twaine. When Oſtorius therefore had fortified Severne, and theſe two Auſons, he had no cauſe to feare any danger out of Wales, or the North parts, to befall unto his people, either Romans or aſſociates; who at that time had reduced the nereſt F and next part of the Iſland onely into the forme of a Province: as elſe where Tacitus himſelfe witneſſeth. Some of theſe Forts of Oſtorius his making, may thoſe great fortifications and military Fenſes ſeeme to bee, which are heere ſeene at Gildsborough and Dantrey, betweene the Springheads of the two Auſons which run divers waies, and where onely there is paſſage into the hither part of Britaine without any rivers

to hinder it. That fort at Gildsborough, is great and large, but this at Dantrey is greater and larger: For, being foure ſquare, upon an high hill from whence all the country beneath may bee ſeene farre every way about, and having on the Eaſt ſide a Mount, which they call Spelwell, it encloſeth within a banke caſt up by mans hand, more than one hundred acres of ground or thereabout. Within which the country people other whiles finde coined peeces of money of the Roman Emperors, as proofes of the antiquity thereof. Much deceived are they therefore, who will needs have it to bee a worke of the Danes, and that of them, the towne under it, was named Dantrey: which being a through-fare well knowne at this day by reaſon of the Innes there, had a religious houſe of the Auſten Friers, that Sir H. de Faweſley founded, as I have read. A

At the head of Auſona or Nen, ſtandeth Catesby that gave name to an ancient Family, but now of foule tainted memory, for a moſt horrible and damnable complot, never in any age exampled, which that Robert Catesby of Aſhby S. Leger, the ſhame and indelible ſtaine of his houſe and name, deteſtably breathing forth ſavage cruelty in barbarous wiſe, and compaſſing impiouſly the deſtruction of Prince and Country, deviſed lately under a ſpecious pretext of Religion. B

Of whom, let all times be ſilent, leaſt by making mention of him, the foule ſtaine and blot of our age appeare unto Poſterity; at the naming whereof we cannot chuſe but with horror grieve and groane againe, ſeeing the very dumbe and liveleſſe creatures ſeeme to be moved and troubled at ſo helliſh Villany imagined by him and his complices. Hard by it, is Faweſley, where have dwelt a long time the Knightleies worſhipfull Knights deſcended from thoſe more ancient Knightleies of Gnowſhall in the County of Stafford: and more Eaſtward hard by Nen, as yet very ſmall, there is Wedon in the ſtreet, ſometimes the royall ſeat of Wolpher K. of the Mercians, and converted into a Monaſtery by his daughter Werburg a moſt holy Virgine: of whoſe miracles in driving away Geeſe from hence, ſome credulous writers have made many a tale. Verily I ſhould wrong the Truth, if I ſhould not thinke, (albeit I have thought otherwiſe) that this Wedon is the very ſtation that Antonine the Emperour nameth BANNAVENNA, BENNAVENNA, BENNAVENTA, and once corruptly ISANNAVENTA: notwithſtanding there now remaine no expreſſe tokens of that name, conſidering how Time changeth all, both names and things. For the diſtance from the next ſtations and baiting Townes which were in ancient times, anſwereth juſt: and in the very name of BANNAVENNA, the name of the River Auſon, the head whereof is neere unto it in ſome ſort doth plainly diſcover it ſelfe. Likewiſe, the high Port-way or Romane ſtreet goeth directly from hence Northward with a bridge or cauſey oft broken and worne out; but moſt of all over againſt a Village named Creek, where it was of neceſſity that there ſhould be a bridge; but in other places the bridge ſheweth it ſelfe alſo as farre as to Dowbridge, neere Lilborne moſt apparantly. C D

Bannavenna, which untruly is called, Iſannaventa and Iſanavatia.

Somewhat more Northward wee ſaw Althorp, the habitation of the Spenſers knights, allied to very many and thoſe moſt honorable and worſhipfull families: out of which houſe Sir Robert Spenſer the fifth Knight in a ſucceſſive continued Deſcent, a reſpective lover of vertue and learning, was by our moſt gracious Soveraigne King James advanced to the honour of Baron Spenſer of Wormeleighton. Hard by Althorp, Holdenby houſe, a faire patterne of ſtately and magnificent building maketh a faire glorious ſhew, which Sir Chriſtopher Hatton one of Queene Elizabeths Privie Councell, Lord Chancellor of England, and knight of the Order of the Garter, built upon the lands and inheritance of his great grandmother, heire unto the Family of the Holdenbeis, for the greateſt and laſt monument, (as himſelfe afterwards was wont to ſay) of his youth: A man, to ſay nothing of him but that which in truth is due, for Religion and godlineſſe right devout, of approved faithfulneſſe to the State, of incorrupt equity: for almeſdeeds of all others moſt bountifull; and one (which is not the leaſt part of his praiſe) that was moſt willing and ready to ſupport and maintaine learning. Who, as he lived a godly life, ſo as godly he ſlept in Chriſt: yet his commendation made knowne by the lightſome teſtimony of letters, ſhall ſhine forth more cleerely than by that gorgeous Monument right well beſeeming ſo great a Perſonage, which E F

Althorp, or Oldthorp. Baron Spenſer. Sir Chriſtopher Hatton. He died anno 1591.

Sir

A Sir William Hatton, his adopted ſonne, conſecrated to his memory, in the Church of Saint Paul in London.

Beneath theſe places Nen paſſeth on forward with a ſtill and ſmall ſtreame, and anone taketh in a ſmall Brooke from the North, and is thereby augmented: where, at the very meeting and confluence of both, a City called after the River Northafandon, and ſhort, Northampton, is ſo ſeated, that on the Weſt ſide it is watered with the Brooke, and on the South ſide with the foreſaid Nen. Which City I was of late eaſily induced to gueſſe, to have beene that ancient BENNAVENTA; but if my conjecture miſſed the trueth, the confeſſion of my errour may ſalve it. As for the name, it may ſeeme to haue beene impoſed of the ſituation thereof upon the North B banke of the River Auſon. The City it ſelfe which ſeemeth to have beene built all of ſtone, is, I aſſure you, for houſes very faire, for circuit of good largeneſſe, and walled about: and from the Wall yee have a goodly proſpect every way to a wide and ſpacious plaine Country. Northampton.

On the Weſt ſide, it hath an old Caſtle, and the very antiquity thereof giveth a grace unto it, built by Simon de Sancto Lizio, commonly called Senlyz, the firſt of that name Earle of Northampton: who alſo joyned unto it a beautifull Church called Saint Andrews, for a place of his owne buriall: and, as men ſay, reedified the Towne: Simon alſo the younger, his ſonne, founded without the Towne a Monaſtery commonly called * De la prey, for Nunnes. During the Saxons Heptarchie, it ſeem- C eth to have lien forlorne and of none account, neither have Writers made any where mention of it, in all thoſe depredations of the Danes, unleſſe it were when Sweno the Dane in a furious and outragious moode made moſt cruelly havocke throughout all England: for then, as Henry of Huntingdon recordeth, it was ſet on fire and burnt to the ground. In the Raigne of Saint Edward the Confeſſour, there were in it, as we finde in the Survey Booke of England, LX. Burgeſſes in the Kings Domaine, having as many Manſions: Of theſe, in King William the Conquerours time, Foureteene lay waſte and voide, and forty ſeaven remained. Over and above theſe, there were in the new Burrough forty Burgeſſes in the Domaine of King William. After the Normans time, it valiantly withſtood the Siege layed unto it by the Barons, when they D diſquieted and troubled the whole Realme with injurious wrongs and ſlaughters, being maliciouſly bent againſt King John for private cauſes; which notwithſtanding they ſo cloked with pretenſes of Religion and the common good, that they tearmed themſelves, The Army of God and the holy Church; at which time, they ſay, that Trench and Rampire was made, which they call Hunſhil: but it ſtood not out with like ſucceſſe againſt Henry the third their lawfull King, as it did againſt theſe rebels: for, when thoſe Barons being nuzzelled up in ſedition, and rebellion, from hence diſplaied their banners and ſounded the battaile againſt him, he made a breach through the Wall, and ſoone wonne it by aſſault. After this, diverſe times, like as before the kings held their Parliaments here, becauſe it ſtandeth very nere in the midſt of Eng- E land: and in the yeere after Chriſt was borne 1460. here was a wofull and bloody field fought; wherein (ſuch was the civill diviſion of England in it ſelfe) Richard Nevil Earle of Warwick, after many a noble man ſlaine, led away captive that moſt unhappy king Henry the Sixth in a piteous ſpectacle, who was now the ſecond time taken priſoner by his ſubjects. To conclude, the Longitude of Northampton our Mathematicians have deſcribed by 22. degrees and 29. ſcruples: and the Latitude by 52. degrees and 13. ſcruples. From hence Nen maketh haſte away by Caſtle Aſhby, where Henry L. Compton began to build a faire ſightly houſe: cloſe unto which lieth Yardley Haſtings, ſo named of the Haſtings, ſometimes Earles of Pembroch, unto whom it belonged. And to turne a little aſide, I may not omit Horton, when as king Henry the Eighth created Sir W. Par F Lord thereof, unckle and Chamberlaine to Queene Catharin Par, Baron Par of Horton, which honor ſhortly vaniſhed with him when he left only daughters, who were married into the families of Treſham, and Lane. But to returne: Nen goeth forward to Mercat Wellingborow, in old time Wedlingborough, and Wodlingborough, made a mercat by K. John at the ſuit of the Monks of Crowland; where there runneth into it a Riveret comming downe by Ruſhton and Newton, belonging to the Treſhams, by Geddington alſo where the King had a Caſtle, and where there remaineth yet a Croſſe erected in the honour of Queene Æleonor wife to King Edward the Firſt: by Boughton the ſeat of the Montacutes Knights: by Kettering a Mercat Towne well frequented, neere unto which ſtandeth Rouwell much talked of for the horſe Faire there kept: by Burton likewiſe the Barony (if I miſtake not the name) of Alane de Dinant: For, king Henry the Firſt gave unto him a Barony of that name in this Shire, for that in ſingle fight he had ſlaine the French Kings Champion at Gizors: and by Harrouden, the Lord whereof named Sir Nicolas Vaulx Captaine of Guines in Picardy, king Henry the Eighth created Baron Vaulx of Harrouden.

From hence goeth the Auſon or Nen to Higham, a Towne in times paſt of the Peverels, and after by them of the Ferrers, from whom it is named Higham Ferrers: who had heere alſo their Caſtle: the ruines and rubbiſh whereof are yet ſeene nere unto the Church. But, the excellent ornament of this place was Henry Chicheley Archbiſhop of Canterbury, who built All-ſoules College in Oxford, and another here, wherein he placed Secular Clerkes, and Prebendaries, and withall an Hoſpitall for the poore. Then runneth it by Addington the poſſeſſion in old time of the Veres, and by Thorpſton commonly called Thrapſton, belonging likewiſe to them: and over againſt it Draiton, the houſe in the foregoing age of Sir H. Greene: but afterwards by his daughter, of John and Edward Staffords, Earles of Wiltſhire; but now the habitation of the Lord Mordaunt unto whom it deſcended hereditarily from thoſe Greenes noble Gentlemen and of right great name in this Country in their time.

Then runneth it, in manner round about a proper little Towne which it giveth name unto, Oundale they now call it corruptly in ſtead of Avondale: where there is nothing worth ſight, but a faire Church, and a free Schoole for the inſtruction of children, and an Almeſhouſe for poore people, founded by Sir William Laxton, ſometime Major of London. Neere adjoyning to this, ſtands Barnewell, a little Caſtle, which now of late Sir Edward Mont-acute of the ancient family of the Mont-acutes, as may be collected by his Armes, hath repaired and beautified with new buildings. In times paſt it was the poſſeſſion of Berengary le Moigne, that is, Monke, and not, as ſome thinke, of Berengary of Touraine, the great Clerke, whoſe opinion of the Sacrament of the Lords Supper, was condemned in a Synode of an hundred and thirteene Biſhops aſſembled by the Biſhop of Rome.

After this, it paſſeth on by Fotheringhay Caſtle, environed on every ſide with moſt pleaſant medowes, which in the Raigne of Henry the Third, when the ſtrong holds encouraged the Lords and Nobles to revolt, William Earle of Aumarl ſurpriſed upon the ſodaine, and laied all the Country about waſte, as Mathew of Paris recordeth. At which time it belonged unto the Earles of Huntingdon who were of the royall Race of Scotland. A good while after, King Edward the Third aſſigned it, as it were, for an inheritance or appennage as the French tearme it, unto his ſonne Edmund of Langley, Duke of Yorke, who reedified the Caſtle, and made the higheſt fortification or Keepe thereof in forme of an horſe-fetter, which both of it ſelfe, and with a Faulcon in it, was his Deviſe, or Empreſe; as implying that hee was locked up from all great hope, as a younger brother. His ſonne Edward Duke of Yorke in the ſecond yeere of Henry the Fift his Raigne, and in the yeere of Chriſt 1415. (as appeareth by an inſcription there in rude and barbarous Verſes) founded a paſſing faire Collegiat Church, wherein himſelfe, when he was ſlaine in the battaile at Agincourt, as alſo Richard Duke of Yorke, his brothers ſonne, who loſt his life at Wakefield, and his wife Cecily Nevil, had ſtately and ſumptuous Tombes, which were profanely ſubverted together with the upper part of the Church, in King Edward the Sixth his time. Yet in memoriall of them, Queene Elizabeth comming thither commanded two Monuments to be erected in the nether part of the Church, that now ſtandeth: which notwithſtanding, (ſuch was their pinching and ſparing that had the charge of this worke) are thought ſcarce beſeeming ſo great Princes deſcending from Kings, and from whom Kings of England are deſcended.

Fotheringhay.

Cecily Ducheſſe of Yorke.

The

A The forme of the Keepe beforesaid built like a fetter-locke occasioneth mee to digresse a little, and I hope with your pardon, when the graveſt Authours in as ſmall matters have done the like: Edmund of Langley Duke of Yorke who built that Keepe, and garniſhed the glaſſe-windowes there with Fetter-lockes, when hee ſaw his ſons being young ſcholers gazing upon the painted windowes, asked them what was Latin for a Fetter-locke? They ſtudying and looking ſilently one upon another, not able to anſwer: If you cannot tell me, ſaith he, I will tell you, Hic, hæc, hoc Taceatis, that is, Hic, hæc, hoc, be ſilent and quiet: and therewithall added, God knoweth what may happen hereafter. This King Edward the Fourth his great Grand-childe reported publiquely, when he having attained the Crowne created Richard his younger ſonne Duke B of Yorke, and then commanding that hee ſhould uſe for his Badge the Fetter-locke open to verifie the preſage of his great Grand-father. But this by the way. * Fetter-locke.

The ſaid Cecily mother to King Edward the Fourth ſaw plainly within the compaſſe of a few yeeres what diſports unruly and powerfull Fortune (pardon the word, for I acknowledge that God ruleth all) maketh herſelfe out of the miſeries of the mighty. For ſhe ſaw Richard Duke of Yorke her husband, even then when he thought himſelfe ſure of the Kingdome, and her ſonne the Earle of Rutland, ſlaine together in a bloudy fought field, and ſome few yeeres after her eldeſt ſonne Edward the Fourth enjoying the regall Crowne, deprived of the ſame, recovering it againe, and taken away by untimely death, when hee had before made away her ſecond ſonne and his C owne brother George Duke of Clarence. After that, ſhe ſaw her other ſonne Richard Duke of Glocester aſpiring to the Crowne and making way to it by that lamentable murdering of his Nephewes, and ſlandering of her his owne Mother, (for he charged her openly with the greateſt diſhonor incident to a Lady:) and afterward ſhe ſaw him when he was poſſeſſed of the Kingdome, within a while ſlaine in battaile: And theſe her miſeries were ſo linked together, that the longer ſhe lived the greater ſorrow ſhe felt, and every day was more dolefull than other. As for that diſaſtre which even heere befell unto another moſt mighty Prince Mary Queene of Scots, I had leiſer it ſhould be enwrapped up in ſilence, than once ſpoken of: Let it be forgotten quite, if it be poſſible: if not, yet be it hidden, as it may in ſilence. Under the beſt Princes ſome D there are who being once armed with authority, know how by ſecret ſlights to ſet a goodly ſhew and faire pretenſe of conſcience and Religion, thereby to cloke their owne private deſignes: And there be againe, that ſincerely and from the heart tender true Religion, their Princes ſecurity, yea and (which is the higheſt rule and law of all) the publique ſafety. Neither can it bee denied, but that even the beſt Princes themſelves are otherwhiles violently carried away, as good Pilotes with tempeſts, againſt their wils whither they would not. But what they doe as Princes and Kings, let us leave to God who onely hath power over Kings.

Nen being now come unto the skirts of Huntingdon-ſhire, running under a faire ſtone Bridge at Walmesford, paſſeth by DUROBRIVÆ, a right ancient City, Durobrivæ. E which being called in the Engliſh Saxon Tongue Dormancester, as I ſaid before, tooke up a great ſpace of ground on both bankes of the River in both Counties. For, the little Village Caſter which ſtands a mile off from the River, may ſeeme to Caſter. have beene a part of it, by the pavements there found, wrought checker wiſe with ſmall ſquare quarels; although on the Church wall we reade this inſcription bearing date of a later time.

XV. KL. MAII DEDICATIO HUJUS ECCLESIÆ MCXXIIII.

THE FIFTEENTH DAY BEFORE THE KALENDS OF MAY, IN THE YEERE ONE THOUSAND ONE F HUNDRED TWENTY FOURE, [WAS] THE DEDICATION OF THIS CHURCH.

And doubtleſſe, of greater name and note it was: for in the corne fields adjoyning, which in ſteade of Dormanton, they call Normanton Fields, ſo many peeces of Romane Coine are turned out of the ground, that a man would verily thinke they had beene ſowed there: and two Rode-wayes, whereof the Cauſeys A are yet evident to bee ſeene, went from hence, the one called Forty-foot-way, becauſe it was forty foot broade, unto Stanford: the other named Long-ditch and Lollham-Bridges. High-ſtreat by Lollham-bridges, (bridges I aſſure you of great antiquity, whereof eleven arches are in ſight, now chinking and chawning for age) through Weſt Deeping, into Lincoln-ſhire. At the very diviſion and parting of theſe two Port-waies ſtan-Upton. deth Upton highly ſituate, whereupon it tooke alſo that name: where Sir Robert Wingfield Knight, deſcended from that ancient Family of the Wingfields, which hath brought forth ſo many worſhipfull and worthy Knights, hath a faire houſe with moſt lovely walkes.

Peterborough. From DUROBRIVÆ the River Auſon or Nen paſſeth on to Peterburgh ſeated in B the very angle or nouke of this Shire, where Writers report there hath beene a gulfe or whirlpole in the River, of exceeding great depth, called Medeſwell, and a Towne hard by it named thereupon Medeſwelhamſted and Medeſhamſted; which Towne, as wee reade in Robert de Swapham, was built in an excellent fine place, having of the eaſt ſide fennes, and paſſing good waters, and of the other many goodly woods, medowes, and paſtures: faire and beautifull to the eye every way, and not acceſſable by land ſave only on the Weſt ſide. The River Nen runneth by at the South ſide of the Burrough; in the middle of which River, there is a place as it were a gulfe ſo deepe and cold withall, that even in Summer no ſwimmer is able to ducke or dive unto the bothom. Yet is it never for all that frozen over in Winter: for there is a ſpring there, whence the water welleth out. This place they C called in old time Meddeſwell; untill that Wolpher King of the Mercians built there a Mo- naſtery in honour of Saint Peter. And ſeeing the place was all a mariſh ground, be laid the foundation, as that Robert writeth, with mighty huge ſtones, ſuch as eight yoke of Oxen would hardly draw one of them, which I ſaw with mine owne eyes, ſaith he, when this Monaſtery was deſtroyed. Afterward, of this Monaſtery dedicated to Saint Peter, it began to bee called PETRIBURGUS, or PETROPOLIS, that is, Peterborow or Burgh, and the ſaid Monaſtery was very famous and renowned. The originall occaſion, and the building whereof, I have thought it worth my labour briefly to put downe, out of the ſaid Robert de Swapham, a Writer of good antiquity. Peada, the ſonne of Penda, who was the firſt Chriſtian King of the Mercians, in the yeere of D grace 546. for the propagation of Chriſtian Religion, laid the foundation of a Monaſtery at Medeſhamſted in the Girvians or Fen-country, which hee could not finiſh, for that by the wicked practiſe of his mother, he was made away.

After Peada ſucceeded his brother Wolpher, who being moſt averſe from Chriſti- an Religion, murdered Wolphald and Rufin his owne ſonnes with cruell and barbarous immanitie, becauſe they had devoted themſelves unto Chriſt, and embraced his Religion. But himſelfe ſome few yeeres after, embracing Chriſtian Religion, for to expiate and waſh away the ſtaine of that his impiety with ſome good and godly worke, ſet in hand to build up this Monaſtery which his brother had begunne: which through the helpe of his brother Æthelbred, of Kineburga alſo E and Kineſwith his ſiſters, being fully finiſhed in the yeere of our Lord 633. hee conſecrated unto Saint Peter, endowed it with ample Revenewes, and ordained Sexwulfi a right godly and devout man (who principally adviſed him to this worke) the firſt Abbat thereof.

This Monaſtery flouriſhed afterward, and had the name and opinion in the world of great holineſſe, for the ſpace of two hundered and foureteene yeeres or thereabout, untill thoſe moſt heavie and wofull times came of the Danes, who made ſpoile and waſte of all: For, then were the Monkes maſſacred, and the Monaſtery quite overthrowne lay buryed, as one would ſay, many yeeres together in the owne rubbiſh and ruines. At the laſt, about the yeere of our Lord 960. Ethel- F wold Biſhop of Winchester, who wholy gave himſelfe to the furtherance of monaſticall profeſſion began to reedifie it, having the helping hand eſpecially of King Ead- gar, and Adulph the Kings Chancellour, who upon a pricke of conſcience and deepe repentance, for that hee and his wife together lying in bed aſleepe had overlaid and ſmothred

A smothred the little infant their onely sonne, laid upon the reedifying of this monastery all the wealth he had: and when it was thus rebuilt, he became Abbat thereof.

From which time, it was of high estimation and name, partly for the great riches it had and in part for the large priviledges which it enjoyed: although in the reigne of William the Conquerour, Herward an Englishman being proclaimed traitour and outlawed, made a rode out of the Isle of Ely and rifled it of all the riches that it had gathered together: against whom Turold the Abbot, erected the fort Mont-Turold: Yet was it esteemed exceeding wealthy even unto our fathers daies, when, King Henry the Eighth thrust out the Monkes in all places, alleaging that they declining from the ordinances, which those holy and ancient Monkes held, wasted in B riot and excesse the goods of the Church, which was the Patrimony and inheritance of the poore; and in their places erected here a Bishopricke assigning thereunto this county and Rutland-shire for his Diocese: and placed withall a Deane and certaine Prebendaries. So that of a Monastery it became a Cathedrall Church; which if you well consider the building, is for the very antiquity thereof, goodly to behold. The forefront carieth a majesty with it, and the Cloisters are very large, in the glasse-windowes whereof is represented the history of Wolpher the founder, with the succession of the Abbots. Saint Maries Chappell is a goodly large building, full of curious worke, and the quire faire: wherein two as infortunate Queenes as any other, Katherine of Spaine repudiated by King Henry the Eighth, and Mary Queene of C Scodand being enterred, found rest and repose there, from all their miseries.

Mont. Turold.

Beneath Peterburgh, the river Auson or Nen, which by this time is gone from his spring-head much about forty five miles, and carrieth along with him all rils, brookes, and land flouds occasioned by raine, that he hath taken into his chanels, is divided sundry waies. And finding no way to cary his streame, by spreading his waters all abroad in winter time, yea and other whiles most part of the yeere, overfloweth all the plaine country, so as it seemeth to be nothing but a vast sea lying even and levell, with some few Iflands that beare up their heads and appeare aboue the water. The cause of such inundation the people inhabiting thereby, alleage to be this, for that of the three chanels or draines, by which so great store of water was D wont to be issued into the sea, the first that went directly into the sea by Thorney Abbey, and then a part by Clow Crosse and Crowland: the second also by the trench cut out by Morton Bishop of Ely, called the New leam, and then by Wisbich, have a long time been forlet and neglected: and so the third which goeth downe by Horseybridge, Witlesmer, Ramsey-mere and Salters-lode, is not able to receive so much water: whereby it breaketh forth with more violence upon the flats adjoyning. And the country complaineth for trespasse done unto them, as well by those that have not scoured the said draines, as by them that have turned the same aside to their private uses: and as the Reatines said some time, so doe they, That Nature herselfe hath well provided for mans use; in that she hath given all rivers their courses, and issues, and as well E their inlets into the Sea, as their heads and springs. But thus much of this matter may seeme to some over-much.

Morton 1478–1486 (Nic.

In this place is the County least in breadth: for betweene Nen and the River Welland the one limit on the North side, there are scarce five miles. Upon Welland, which Æthelward an old writer called Wevlad, neere unto the spring head, is Braibrock Castle, built by Robert May, alias, De Braybroke, a most inward minion of King John: whose sonne Henry having married Ghristian Ledet an inheritrice of a great estate, his eldest sonne adopted himselfe into the surname of the Ledet: from one of whose Nieces by his sonne, as I said before, it came unto the Latimers, and by them unto the Griphins, whose inheritance now it is. Neere unto it among the woods I saw some F few reliques of a Monastery, called in times past De Divisis, and afterward Pipwell; which William Buttevillain founded in the reigne of Henry the Second for Cistertian Monkes. From thence might Rockingham bee seene, were it not for the woods, a Castle sometime of the Earles of Aumarle, built by King William the Conqueror, at what time it was a wast, (as we finde in his Domesday booke) fortified with Rampier and Bulwarkes, and a duple range of Battlements, ſituate upon the ſide of an hill within a woody Foreſt, which thereupon is named Rockingham Foreſt. A Haringworth. See Aſhby De la Zouch, in Leiceſter-ſhire.

After this it runneth beſide Haringworth the ſeat in old time of the Cantlows and now of the Lord Zouch: who deſcended from Eude a younger ſonne of Alan de la Zouch, of Aſhby De la Zouch, have growne up to a right honourable Family of Barons; whoſe honour and ſtate was much augmented by marriage with one of the heires of * Cantlow, as alſo with an other of Baron Saint Maur, who likewiſe drew his Pedegree from the heire of the Lord Zouch de Aſhby, and the Lovels Lords of Caſtel-Cary in Somerſetſhire.

* De Cantelupo.

Deane.

Here alſo I ſaw Deane, belonging in ancient times to the Deanes, afterwards to the Tindals, which place is worth the remembrance, if it were but for this, that it is now a proper and faire dwelling houſe of the Brudenells: out of which Family Sir Edmund Brudenell, late deceaſed, was a paſſing great lover and admirer of venerable Antiquity. B

Barons de Engain.

The Family likewiſe of Engain, which was both ancient and honourable had their ſeat hereby at Blatherwic (where now the Staffords of knights degree inhabite, who deſcended from Ralph the firſt Earle of Stafford) and thoſe Engaines changed their Caſtle named Humel before time, into a Monaſtery called Finiſheved. Their iſſue male failed about two hundred yeares ſince: but of their heires the eldeſt was wedded unto Sir Iohn Goldington, the ſecond to Sir Laurence Pabenham, and the third to Sir William Bernak, all right worthy Knights.

Or Hymell.

Apthorpe.

Heere alſo is to bee ſeene Apthorp, the ſeat of a moſt worthy knight, Sir Anthony Mildmay, whoſe father Sir Walter Mildmay, late one of Queene Elizabeths Privie Counſell, for his vertue, wiſdome, piety, and bounty to learning and learned men, by founding Emanuel College in Cambridge, hath worthily deſerved to bee regiſtred among the beſt men in this our age. C

Thornhaugh.

Hard by ſtandeth Thornhaugh ſometimes belonging to the Family De Sancto Medardo, contracted into Semare, and now to the right honorable Sir William Ruſſell, ſonne to Francis Earle of Bedford deſcended from Semare, whom King James for his vertues and faithfull ſervice in Ireland whiles hee was Lord Deputy there, advanced to the Dignity of Baron Ruſſell of Thornhaugh.

Welledon.

Baſſet of Welledon.

Neither is the Towne Welledon to bee paſſed over in ſilence, conſidering that it went in old time for a Barony, which by Mawde the Daughter and heire of Geffrey de Ridell (who together with King Henry the Firſt his ſonne was drowned) did deſcend to Richard Baſſet ſonne of Ralph Baſſet, Lord Juſtice of England, in whoſe race it continued unto King Henry the Fourth his dayes: For then, by the females it accrued to the Knevets and Alesburies. D

Welland being paſt Haringworth goeth to viſit Colliweſton, where Lady Margaret Counteſſe of Richmond, King Henry the Seaventh his mother built a goodly faire and ſtately houſe: Under which, the neighbour inhabitants uſe to digge great plenty of ſclate ſtones for their buildings. From whence Wittering Heath, a plaine, runneth out farre into the Eaſt, wherein the people there dwelling, report, that the Danes long ſince were diſcomfited in a memorable battaile and put to flight. Now by this time is Welland come to Burghley whereof the moſt prudent and right honorable Councellour Sir William Cecil, Lord high Treaſurer of England, yea a ſingular treaſure and ſupporter of the ſame, received the Title of Baron Burghley, for his great good deſerts, at the hands of Queene Elizabeth. Which Title hee adorned with the luſtre of his vertues, and beautified this place with magnificent ſumptuous buildings, adjoyning thereto a large Parke encompaſſed about with a ſtone wall of a great circuite. Beneath it, there are ancient Quarries of ſtone at Bernak, out of which the Abbayes of Peterburgh and of Ramſey were built. For heere (to write the very words out of the Hiſtory of Ramſey) The toyling ſtrength of the Quarriers is often tried and held to worke: yet ever ſtill there remaineth worke for them behinde, wherein they being refreſhed betweene whiles with reſt, may bee exerciſed and kept in ure. And thus wee reade in the Charter of king Edward the Confeſſour: In conſideration of foure thouſand Eeles in Lent, the Monkes of Ramſey ſhall have out of the Terri-

F

A Territory of Saint Peter ſo much ſquare ſtiler ſtone, as they vſed, at Berneck, and of rough building ſtone for wals, at Burch. Vnder Berneck that high-way made by the Romanes, which the neighbour Inhabitants, of the breadth that it carrieth, call The forty foot-way, from Caſter to Stanford cutteth and divideth this Shire, and is to bee ſeene with an high Cauſey, eſpecially by the little Wood of Bernach, where it hath a Beacon ſet upon the very ridge, and ſo runneth forth along by Burgbley Parke wall toward Stanford. Forti foot-way.

Some five miles hence, Welland running downe by Maxey Caſtle, belonging ſometime to the noble houſe of Wake, and by Peag-Kirk, (where, in the Primitive Church of the Engliſh Nation, Pega an holy woman who gave name to that place, and ſiſter B of Saint Guthlak, with other Nuns and devout virgins by their life and example gave good documents of piety and chaſtity;) commeth to the Fennes ſo often mentioned. And for as much as the banke on the South ſide thereof is in many places neglected, the River lieth ſore upon the lands thereabout with great detriment: and thus being put out of his owne Chanell that before time went by Spalding, he entreth cloſely into Nen or Auſon, and over-chargeth it exceedingly. Maxey. Peag-Kyrk, Ingulfus.

Now the leſſe Avon, which is the other of the limits, as I ſaid, of this ſhire Northward, but ſerveth for a limit onely about five or ſix miles in length, breaking out of the ground at Avon-well by Naſeby, neere by the Spring-head of Welland, runneth Weſtward by Suleby ſometime an Abbay of Black-Monkes, and by Stanford upon C Avon, the habitation of the Caves Family, out of which there is ſpread a notable offſpring with many branches in all that Tract adjoyning: alſo by Lilborne, the ſeate in times paſt of the Canvilles. Which, that it hath beene in old time a Manſion place or Station of the Romans, I am induced to thinke, by the ſite thereof hard by one of their Port-waies, by the ancient Trenches there, and a little piked hill caſt up: into which when of late dayes ſome digged in hope of old hid treaſure, in ſtead of gold they found coles. And when this river being as yet but ſmall is once gone vnder Dunbridge, it leaveth Northampton-ſhire and entreth Warwick-ſhire. By thoſe coles digged forth from vnder the ſaid hill, what if I ſhould conjecture that this hill was raiſed up for a limit or bound-marke, ſeeing Siculus Flaccus writeth, that either aſhes, or coles, D or pot-ſherds, or broken glaſſes, or bones halfe burnt, or lime, or plaſter, were wont to be put vnder land-markes and limits: and S. Auguſtine writeth thus of coles: Is it not a wonderfull thing (ſaith hee) whereas conſidering Coles be ſo brickle, that with the leaſt blow they breake, with the leaſt cruſhing they are cruſhed; yet no time, bee it never ſo long conquereth them: in ſo much as they that pitch Land-markes and limits, were wont to couch them underneath, to convince any litigious fellow whatſoever, that ſhould come never ſo long time after, and avouch that a limit was not there pitched. And ſo much the rather incline I to this my conjecture, becauſe they that have written of limits, doe write that certaine hillockes or piles of earth which they termed Botontines, were ſet in limits: ſo that I ſuppoſe moſt of theſe mounts and round hils which we every where ſee and E call Burrowes, were for this purpoſe raiſed, and that aſhes, coles, pot-ſherds, &c. may be found vnder them, if they were digged downe a good depth into the earth. Stanford. The Caves. Bounds or Meere markes in old time. Lib. de Civit. Dei 21. cap. 4. Botontines. Hence peradventure come our Buttings.

The firſt Earle that this County had to my knowledge, was Waldeof (ſonne of that warlike Siward) who being alſo Earle of Huntingdon, for his diſloyall treachery vnto William the Conquerour, loſt his head: leaving two daughters onely behinde him, by Iudith the Conquerours Niece by a ſiſter of his mothers ſide. Simon de Saint Liz, being ſcornfully rejected by Iudith the mother for that hee was lame-legged, married Mawd the eldeſt Daughter, and hee built Saint Andrewes Church and the Caſtle at Northampton. After him ſucceeded his ſonne, Simon the ſecond, who a long time was in ſuite about his mothers poſſeſſions with David King of Scots his mothers ſecond F husband: and having ſided with King Stephen, in the yeere of our Lord 1152. departed this life with this teſtimoniall that went of him: A Youth full fraught with all unlawfull wickedneſſe, and as full of all unſeemely lewdneſſe. His ſonne Simon the third, having gone to law with the Scots for his right to the Earldome of Huntingdon, waſted all his eſtate, and through the gracious goodneſſe of King Henry the Second, married Earles of Northampton. The life of Waldeof.

married the Daughter and Heire of Gilbert de Gaunt Earle of Lincolne: and in the end having recovered the Earledome of Huntingdon, and diſſeized the Scots, dyed childeleſſe in the yeare 1185. Whereas ſome have lately ſet downe Sir Richard Gobion to have beene Earle of Northampton afterward; I finde no warrant thereof either in Record, or Hiſtory: Onely I finde, that Sir Hugh Gobion was a Ringleader in that rebellious rable which held Northampton againſt king Henry the Third, and that the inheritance of his houſe came ſhortly after by marriage to Butler of Woodhall, and Turpin, &c. But this is moſt certaine that King Edward the Third created William de Bohun a man of approved valour, Earle of Northampton: and when his elder brother Humfrey de Bohun, Earle of Hereford and of Eſſex, High Conſtable alſo of England, was not ſufficient in that warlike age, to beare that charge of the Conſtable, he made him alſo High Conſtable of England. After him his ſonne Humfrey ſucceeding in the Earledome of Northampton, as alſo in the Earledomes of Hereford and of Eſſex, for that his Unckle dyed with iſſue, begat two Daughters; the one beſtowed in marriage upon Thomas of Woodſtocke, the youngeſt ſonne of King Edward the Third; the other upon Henry of Lancaſter, Duke of Hereford, who afterwards attained to the Crowne by the name of King Henry the Fourth. The Daughter of the ſaid Thomas of Woodſtocke brought by her marriage this Title of Northampton with others, into the Family of the Staffords. But when they afterwards had loſt their honours and dignities, King Edward the Sixth honoured Sir William Parr Earle of Eſſex, a moſt accompliſhed Courtier, with the Title of Marqueſſe of Northampton: who within our remembrance ended this life iſſueleſſe. And while I was writing and peruſing this Worke, our moſt ſacred Soveraigne King James in the yeere of our Salvation 1603. upon one and the ſame day advanced Lord Henry Howard brother to the laſt Duke of Norfolke, a man of rare and excellent wit, and ſweet fluent eloquence, ſingularly adorned alſo with the beſt ſciences, prudent in counſell, and provident withall, to the ſtate of Baron Howard of Marnehill, and the right honourable name, title, ſtile, and Dignity of Earle of Northampton.

LEICESTER-SHIRE.

ON the North ſide of Northampton-ſhire boundeth LEICESTER-SHIRE, called in that Booke wherein William the Conquerour ſet downe his Survey of England, Ledeceſter-ſhire: a champian Country likewiſe throughout, bearing corne in great plenty, but for the moſt part without Woods. It hath bordering upon it on the Eaſt ſide, both Rutland-ſhire and Lincoln-ſhire, on the North Nottingham and Derby-ſhires; and Warwick ſhire on the Weſt. (For, the high Rode way made by the Romanes called Watling-ſtreat, directly running along the Weſt skirt, ſeparateth it from Warwick-ſhire:) and on the South ſide, as I noted even now, lyeth Northampton-ſhire. Through the middle part thereof paſſeth the River Soar taking his way toward the Trent: but over the Eaſt part a little River called Wreke gently wandereth, which at length findeth his way into the foreſaid Soar.

On the South ſide, where it is divided on the one hand with the River Avon the leſſe, and on the other with the River Welland, we meet with nothing worth relation, unleſſe it be, on Wellands banke, (whiles he is yet but ſmall and newly come from his head) with Haverburgh commonly called Harborrow, a Towne moſt celebrate heereabout for a Faire of Cattaile there kept: and as for Carleton, as one would ſay, the husband-mens Towne, (that is not farre from it) wherein (I wote not whether it be worth the relating) all in manner that are borne, whether it bee by a peculiar property of the Soile, or the water, or elſe by ſome other ſecret operation of nature, have an ill favoured, untunable, and harſh manner of ſpeech, fetching their words with very much adoe deepe from out of the throat, with a certaine kinde of wharling.

That Romane ſtreete way aforeſaid, (the cauſey whereof being in ſome other places quite worne and eaten away, heere moſt evidently ſheweth it ſelfe) paſſeth on directly as it were by a ſtreight line Northward, through the Weſt ſide of this Province. The very tract of which ſtreet I my ſelfe diligently traced and followed even from the Tamis to Wales, purpoſely to ſeeke out Townes of ancient memory: (laugh you will perhaps, at this my painfull and expenceſull diligence, as vainly curious:) neither could I repoſe my truſt upon a more faithfull guide for the finding out of thoſe ſaid townes which Antonine the Emperour ſpecifieth in his Itinerary. This Street-way, being paſt Dowbridge, where it leaveth Northampton-ſhire behinde it, is interrupted, firſt with the River Swift, that is indeed but ſlow, although the name import ſwiftneſſe, which it maketh good onely in the Winter moneths. The Bridge over it now called Bransford and Bensford Bridge, which heere conjoyned in times paſt this way, having been of long time broken downe, hath beene the cauſe that ſo famous a way for a great while was the leſſe frequented: but now, at the common charge of the country, it is repaired. Upon this way lyeth of the one ſide, Weſtward, Ceſter-Over, (but it is in Warwick-ſhire) a place worth the naming, were it but in regard of the Lord thereof Sir Foulke Grevill, a right worſhipfull and worthy knight: although the very name it ſelfe may witneſſe the antiquity, for, our anceſtours added this word Ceſter to no other places but only cities. On the other ſide of the way Eaſtward, hard by water Swift which ſpringeth neere Knaptoft the ſeat of the Turpins a knightly houſe deſcended from an heire of the Gobions, lieth Miſterton belonging to the ancient family of the Poulteneis, who tooke that name of Poulteney a place now decaied within the ſaid Lordſhip. Neere to it is Lutterworth a Mercate Towne the poſſeſſion in times paſt of the Verdons, which onely ſheweth a faire Church which hath beene encreaſed by the Feldings of knights degree and ancient gentry in this Shire. That famous John Wiskliffe was ſometime Parſon of this Church, a man of a ſingular, polite, and well wrought wit, moſt converſant alſo in the holy Scripture: who for that he had ſharpened the neb of his pen againſt the Popes authority, the Church of Rome, and and religious men, was not onely in his life time moſt grievouſly troubled, but alſo one and forty yeeres after his death, his dead Corps was cruelly handled, being by warrant from the Councell of Siena turned out of his grave and openly burned. Neither is it to be forgotten that neere to this Towne is a ſpring ſo cold that within a ſhort time it turneth ſtrawes and ſtickes into ſtones.

A ſpring turning ſtrawes and ſtickes into ſtones.

From that Bensford bridge, the foreſaid old High way goeth on to High-croſſe, ſo called, for that thereabout ſtood ſometime a Croſſe, inſtead of which, is erected now a very high poſt with props and ſupporters thereto. The neighbours there dwelling reported unto me, that the two principall High-waies of England did here cut one another overthwart, and that there ſtood a moſt flouriſhing City there, named Cleyceſter, which had a Senate of Aldermen in it, and that Cleybrooke, almoſt a mile off, was part of it: alſo, that on both ſides of the way, there lay under the furrowes of the corne fields great foundations and ground workes of foure ſquare ſtone: alſo that peeces of Roman money were very often turned up with the Plough: although above the ground, as the Poet ſaith, Etiam ipſa periere ruinæ, that is, Even the very ruines are periſhed and gone. Theſe preſumptions together with the diſtance of this place from BANNAVENTA or Weedon, which agreeth juſt, and withall the ſaid Bridge, leading hitherward, called Bensford, are inducements unto me to thinke verily, that the ſtation BENNONES, or VENONES, was heere, which Antonine the Emperour placeth next beyond BANNAVENTA, eſpecially ſeeing that Antonine ſheweth how the way divided it ſelfe heere into two parts, which alſo goeth commonly currant. For, Northeaſtward, where the way lieth to Lincolne, the Foſſe way leadeth directly to RATÆ and to VERNOMETUM, of which I will ſpeake anon: and toward the Northweſt, Watling ſtreet goeth as ſtreight into Wales by MANVESSEDUM, whereof I ſhall write in his due place in Warwick-ſhire.

Cley Ceſter. Cleybrooke.

Bennones.

Higher, yet neere the ſame ſtreetſide ſtandeth Hinkley, which had for Lord of it, Hugh Grantmaiſmill, a Norman, high Steward or Seneſchall of England, during the Raignes of king William Rufus, and Henry the Firſt. The ſaid Hugh had two daughters, Parnell, given in marriage to Robert Blanch-mains (ſo called of his faire white hands) Earle of Leiceſter, together with the High-Stewardſhip of England; and Alice, wedded to Roger Bigot. Verily, at the Eaſt end of the Church, there are to be ſeene Trenches and Rampires, yea and a Mount caſt up to an eminent height, which the inhabitants ſay was Hughes Caſtle. Three miles hence ſtandeth Boſworth, an ancient Mercat Towne, which liberty together with the Faire S. Richard Harecourt obtained for it at the hands of king Edward the Firſt. Under this towne in our great grandfathers daies the kingdome of England lay hazarded upon the chance of one battaile: For, Henry Earle of Richmond, with a ſmall power encountred there in pitched field king Richard the Third, who had by moſt wicked meanes uſurped the kingdome: and whiles he reſolved to die the more valiantly, fighting for the liberty of his country, with his followers and friends, the more happy ſucceſſe he had, and ſo overcame and ſlew the Uſurper: and then being with joyfull acclamations proclaimed King in the very mids of ſlaughtered bodies round about, he freed England by his happy valour from the rule of a Tyrant, and by his wiſdome refreſhed and ſetled it being ſore diſquieted with long civill diſſentions. Whereupon Bernard Andreas of Tholous, a Poet living in thoſe daies, in an Ode dedicated unto King Henry the Seventh, as touching the Roſe his Deviſe, writ theſe Verſes, ſuch as they are:

1487. Richard the Third ſlaine.

Ecce nunc omnes poſuere venti
Murmuris, præter Zephyrum tepentem:
Hic Roſas nutrit, nitidóſque flores Veris amœni.

Behold now all the windes are laid,
But Zephyrus that blowes full warme:
The Roſe, and faire ſpring-floures in mead
He keepeth freſh, and doth no harme.

Other

A Other memorable things there are none by this Street, unleſſe it bee Aſhby de la Zouch, that lyeth a good way off: a moſt pleaſant Lordſhip now of the Earles of Huntingdon, but belonging in times paſt to the noble Family De la Zouch, who deſcended from Alan Vicount of Roban, in Little Britaine, and Conſtantia his wife daughter to Conan le Groſſe Earle of Britaine and Maude his wife the naturall daughter of Henry the Firſt. Of this houſe Alane De la Zouch married one of the heires of Roger Quincy Earle of Winchester, and in her right came to a faire inheritance in this Country. But when hee had judicially ſued John Earle of Warren, who choſe rather to try the Title by the ſword point than by point of Law, he was ſlaine by him even in Weſtminſter Hall, in the yeere of our Lord 1269. and ſome yeeres after, the B daughters and heires of his grand ſonne transferred this inheritance by their marriages into the Families of the Saint Maures, of Caſtle Cary, and the Hollands. Yet their father firſt beſtowed this Aſhby upon Sir Richard Mortimer of Richards Caſtle his cozin, whoſe younger iſſue thereupon tooke the firname of Zouch, and were Lords of Aſhby. But from Eudo a younger ſonne of Alane who was ſlaine in Weſtminſter Hall, the Lords Zouch of Harringworth branched out, and have beene for many Deſcents, Barons of the Realme. Afterward in proceſſe of time Aſhby came to the Haſtings, who built a faire large and ſtately houſe there, and Sir William Haſtings procured unto the Towne the liberty of a Faire in the time of King Henry the Sixth. Here I may not paſſe over the next neighbour Cole-Overton, now a ſeat of the Beaumontes deſcen- C ded from Sir Thomas Beaumont Lord of Bachevill in Normandy, brother to the firſt Vicount. This place hath a Cole prefixed for the forename which Sir Thomas, as ſome write, was hee, who was ſlaine manfully fighting at ſuch time as the French recovered Paris from the Engliſh in the time of King Henry the Sixth. This place of the pit-coles (being of the nature of hardned Bitumen, which are digged up to the profit of the Lord, in ſo great a number that they ſerve ſufficiently for fewell to the neighbour Dwellers round about farre and neere.

Pit-cole or ſtone cole.

I ſaid before that the River Soar did cut this Shire in the middle, which ſpringing not farre from this Street, and encreaſed with many ſmall rils and Brookes of running water, going a long Northward with a gentle ſtreame, paſſeth under the Weſt and D North ſide of the cheife Towne or City of this County, which in Writers is called Lege-Ceſtria, Leogora, Legeo ceſter, and Leiceſter. This Towne maketh an evident faire ſhew both of great antiquity and good building. In the yeere 680. when Sexwulph at the commandement of King Etheldred divided the kingdome of the Mercians into Biſhoprickes, hee placed in this an Epiſcopall See, and was himſelfe the firſt Biſhop that ſat there: but a few yeeres after, when the See was tranſlated to another place, this Dignity had an end, and therewith the ſtately part of the Towne by little and little was empaired, untill that Edelfleda a moſt vertuous and noble Lady in the yeere after our Saviours Nativity 914. repaired and ſtrongly walled it new about; in ſo much as Matthew of Paris in his leſſer Story wrote thus, Legeceſter is a right wealthy City and E notably well fenced with an indiſſoluble Wall, which if it had a ſtrong foundation were inferiour to no City whatſoever. About the Normans entring into this Land, it was well peopled and frequented, yea and had very many Burgeſſes in it; out of whom they were bound by an ancient cuſtome (as we reade in William the Conquerours booke) To ſend twelve with the King ſo often as he went in perſon to the warres: But if hee made a voyage by ſea againſt his enemies, they ſent foure horſes to carry armour as farre as to London. This City paid yeerely to the King 30. pounds by tale, and twenty in ora, that is, * by weight, alſo 25. meaſures called Sextaries of hony. But in the time of King Henry the Seconds Raigne, it was ſore overpreſſed with a world of great and grievous calamities, and the wals throwne downe, what time as Robert firnamed Boſſu, (that is, Crouch F backe) Earle of Leiceſter conſpired and rebelled againſt the King. Which Matthew of Paris ſheweth in theſe words: For the obſtinate ſtubborneſſe of Earle Robert ſpurning againſt the King, the noble City of Leiceſter was beſieged and overthrowne by King Henry, and the Wall which ſeemed indiſſoluble, was utterly caſt downe all round about. For, that I may adde thus much out of the leſſer Hiſtory aboveſaid, when the Wall of the City wanting a good foundation was undermined, and the props that ſuſtained it at length burnt, the peeces and fragments of the Wall fell downe, which even to this day (ſuch is the indiſſoluble tenacity and ſtifneſſe of the morter) remaine faſt, and retaine the bigneſſe of ſound rockes. Miſerable alſo was the impoſition of a fine upon the Citizens at that time, and their baniſhment as lamentable; who having obtained by paying ſummes of money licence to depart, tooke Sanctuary for extreame feare in Saint Albans and Saint Edmundsbury. The Caſtle likewiſe was diſmantled of all Fortifications, which verily was a large and ſtrong peece. Beneath which, there is a very faire Hoſpitall or houſe for receit of poore people, and a Collegiat Church wherein Henry Earle of Lancaſter, and Henry of Lancaſter his ſonne, who was the firſt Duke of Lancaſter, lie buried. For, the ſaid Duke when he was now ſtepped farre in yeeres, of a pious minde built this Hoſpitall for the maintenance of poore folke, and to that end dedicated it. Concerning which, Henry Knighton of Leiceſter who lived in that age, writeth thus in his ſtory. Henry the firſt Duke of Lancaſter built a Collegiat Church and an Hoſpitall without the South Gate of Leiceſter; wherein hee ordained a Deane with 12. Canons Prebendaries, as many Vicars, and other Officers, an hundred poore and feeble people, and ten poore able women to give attendance upon the ſaid feeble folke; and this Hoſpitall hee endowed with ſufficient revenewes. As for this Hoſpitall it continueth in ſome good ſtate, as an other Bede-houſe in the Towne built by W. Wigeſton. But the Collegiat Church which was a magnificent worke, and the greateſt ornament of Leiceſter was demoliſhed when religious houſes were granted to the King.

City

At the other ſide of the City among moſt goodly and pleaſant medowes which the River Soar watereth, there was an Abbay, called of that place, De Pree: of which, the ſaid Knighton hath written thus, Robert de Boſſu Earle of Leiceſter (when he begun Gerondon Abbay for Ciſtertians) founded the Monaſtery of S. Mary De Pratis, at Leiceſter, endowed it richly with Lands, Poſſeſſions and Revenewes, and himſelfe with the conſent of * Amice his Wife became a * Chanon Regular in the ſame, and, for the ſpace of fifteene yeeres, in habite of a Chanon ſerved God there, and ſo ſlept in the Lord; That thus forſooth, he might make amends by repentance in a Chanons weed of that offence; which beforetime hee had committed by rebelling with a traiterous minde againſt his Liege Prince. What name Leiceſter had in the Romans time, it is not knowne; In the Catalogue of Ninnius, I thinke it to bee that, which is called Caer Lerion: But, that Leir a King, of whom there goe many tales, built it, they that will, may beleeve it for mee. But the ſituation thereof upon the Foſſ-way, and the diſtance both from BENNONES and VEROMETUM, agreeth ſo juſt with the deſcription of Antonine, that I cannot but thinke it to be that RATÆ which Ptolomee nameth RAGÆ, although there is neither tippe nor toe remaining in it of the name RATÆ: unleſſe peradventure it be in that old long Ditch and Rampire which they call Rawdikes, ſcarce halfe a mile without the South Gate.

* Amicie.
* Or Prieſt.

Or Road dikes.

Heere am I at a ſtand, and looke about me what way to follow for the ſeeking out of ancient Townes. Ranulph a Monke of Cheſter recordeth, that the ancient ſtreet way went through the waſts from hence to Lincolne, but hee telleth us not, through what Waſts. The common voice goeth that it went on ſtill full North through Nottingham-ſhire: Antonine the Emperour (if I have any inſight at all) ſeemeth to inſinuate, that it paſſed North-Eaſtward through this County into Lincoln-ſhire. And verily, this way there are places of antique memory that by ſome of their remaines and tokens ſhew themſelves: but the other way, I could not my ſelfe ever yet meete with any; what others have done I know not, and would willingly learne.

North-Weſt from Leiceſter, and not farre off is Grooby a large Lordſhip and Manor which from Hugh Grantmaiſmill whom King William the Conquerour had enriched with great poſſeſſions and revenewes, came by the Earles of Leiceſter, and the Quincies, unto the houſe of the Ferrers: out of which the Lord Ferrers of Grooby flouriſhed a long time in the honorable ſtate of Barons: and in the end, Iſabel the only daughter remaining of the right line, brought it by her marriage into the name of the Greies, from whence it fell againe at the laſt by Attainder into the Kings hands. But

A whiles I was reviſing of this Worke, our Soveraigne Lord King James reſtored Sir Henry Grey a worthy Knight to the ancient honour of his noble Progenitors, creating him Baron Grey of Grooby in the firſt yeare of his Raigne.

Now let us returne to the River Soar, which being paſt Leiceſter, firſt giveth name to Montſorell, or rather Mont-Soar-hill, a name compounded of Norman and Engliſh both: which now is famous onely for a Mercate there kept: but in old time moſt renowned for the Caſtle, ſeated upon a ſteepe and craggy Hill, hanging over the River, which before time belonged to the Earles of Leiceſter, but afterwards to Saer de Quincy Earle of Wincheſter in the Barons warre; at this day nothing but a rude heape of rubbiſh: For, in the yeere 1217. the Inhabitants of the Towne, when after a long Siege they had wonne it, raſed it downe to the very ground, as being the Devils neſt, and a Den of theeves, robbers, and rebels. Somwhat higher on the other ſide of the River ſtandeth Barrow: where is digged lime, commended above all other for the ſtrong binding thereof. After, ſome few miles from thence, Soar while hee ſeeketh Trent, leaveth Leiceſter-ſhire, a little above Cotes now the habitation of the Family of Skipwith originally deſcended out of York-ſhire, and enriched many yeeres ſince with faire Poſſeſſions in Lincoln-ſhire, by an heire of Ormesbie. On the oppoſite banke of Soar ſtandeth Lough-borrough a Mercate Towne, which adorned one onely man with the name of Baron, to witte, Sir Edward Haſtings; and that in the Raigne of Queene Mary. But when ſhee, of whom he was moſt dearely loved, departed this life, hee taking a loathing to the World was not willing to live any longer to the World; but wholy deſirous to apply himſelfe to Gods Service, retired into that Hoſpitall which hee had erected at Stoke Pogeis in Buckingham-ſhire; where with poore people hee lived to God, and among them finiſhed the courſe of his life devoutly in Chriſt. That this Lough-borrow is that Towne of the Kings named in the Saxon Tongue Liegranburge, which as Marianus ſaith Cuthwulph tooke from the Britans in the yeere of Chriſt 572. the neere affinity of the name may yeeld ſome proofe. But now among all the Townes of this Shire it rightfully chalengeth the ſecond place next unto Leiceſter, whether a man either regard the bigneſſe or building thereof, or the pleaſant Woods about it. For, within very little of it, the Foreſt of Charnwood or Charley ſtretcheth it ſelfe out a great way, wherein is ſeene Beaumanour Parke, which the Lords of Beaumont (as I have heard) fenſed round about with a ſtone Wall. Theſe Beaumonts deſcended from a younger ſonne of John County of Brene in France, who for his high honour, and true valour was preferred to marry the heire of the Kingdome of Jeruſalem, and with great pompe crowned King of Jeruſalem in the yeere of our Lord 1248. Hence it is that wee ſee the Armes of Jeruſalem ſo often quartered with thoſe of Beaumont in ſundry places of England. Sir Henry Beaumont was the firſt that planted himſelfe in England about the yeere 1308. who advanced to the marriage of an heire of Alexander Comine Earle of Boghan in Scotland (whoſe mother was one of the heires of Roger Quincy Earle of Winchester) entred upon a very goodly and faire inheritance, and ſo a great Family was propagated from him. Hee in the Raigne of Edward the Third, for certaine yeeres was ſummoned to the Parliament, by the name of Earle of Boghan, and John Lord Beamont in the Raigne of Henry the Sixth was for a time Conſtable of England, and the firſt to my knowledge, that in England received at the Kings hands the ſtate and Title of a Vicount. But when William the laſt Vicount was dead without iſſue, his ſiſter was wedded to the Lord Lovell, and the whole inheritance afterwards, which was rich and great, by attainder of Lovell fell into the hands of King Henry the Seventh.

In this North part we meete with nothing at all worth the naming, unleſſe it be a little religious houſe, which Roiſe Verdon founded for Nunnes and called it Grace-Dieu, now belonging to a younger houſe of the Beaumonts: and where the Trent runneth, hard by, is Dunnington, an ancient Caſtle built by the firſt Earles of Leiceſter: which afterwards came to John Lacy Earle of Lincolne, who procured unto it from King Edward the Firſt the priviledge of keeping a Mercate and Faire. But when as in that great great proſcription of the Barons under King Edward the Second the hereditaments of Thomas Earle of Lancaſter, and Alice Lacy his Wife were ſeiſed into the Kings hands, and alienated in divers ſorts, the King enforced her to releaſe this Manour unto Hugh Le Deſpenſer the younger.

Vernometum or Veromctum.

The Eaſt part of this Shire which is hilly and feedeth great numbers of Sheepe, was adorned with two places of eſpeciall note; VERNOMETUM or VEROMETUM, whereof Antonine the Emperour hath made mention, and Burton-Lazers, both in the ages fore-going of very great name and reputation. VERNOMETUM, which now hath loſt the name, ſeemeth to have ſtood (for I dare not affirme it) in that place, which at this day men call Burrowhill and Erd-burrow: For, betweene VEROMETUM and RATÆ, according to Antonine his reckoning are twelve Italian miles; and ſo many well neere there be, from Leiceſter to this place.

The name Burrow alſo that it hath at this day came from Burgh, which in the Saxon Tongue ſignifieth, a place fortified, and under it a Towne called Burrough belonging to an old Family of Gentlemen ſo ſirnamed. But, (that which maketh moſt for proofe) in that very place there riſeth up an hill with a ſteepe and upright aſcent on every ſide, but South Eaſtward: in the top whereof appeare the expreſſe tokens of a Towne deſtroyed, a duple Trench, and the very Tract where the Wals were, which encloſed about eighteene Acres of ground within. At this day it is arable ground, and is nothing ſo famous, as in this, that the youth dwelling round about were wont yeerely to exerciſe themſelves in wreſtling and other games in this place. And out of the very name a man may conjecture, that there ſtood there ſome great Temple of the Heathen Gods. For, VERNOMETUM in the ancient Gauls language, which was the ſame that the old Britans tongue, ſoundeth as much as A great Temple; as Venantius Fortunatus in the firſt booke of his Songs plainly ſheweth, writing of Vernometum a Towne of Gaule in theſe Verſes.

Burton Lazers.

As for Burton, ſirnamed Lazers, of Lazers (for ſo they uſed to terme folke infected with the Elephantiaſie or Leproſie) was a rich Spittle-houſe, or Hoſpitall, under the Maſter whereof, were in ſome ſort all other ſmall Spittles or Lazer-houſes in England, like as himſelfe alſo was under the Maſter of the Lazers in Hieruſalem. It was founded in the firſt age of the Normans, by a common contribution over all England, and the Mowbraies eſpecially did ſet to their helping hands. At which time the Leproſie which the learned terme Elephantiaſis, becauſe the skins of Lepres are like to that of Elephants) in grievous manner by way of contagion ranne over all England. For, it is verily thought that this diſeaſe did then firſt creepe out of Ægypt into this Iſland: which eft-once had ſpread it ſelfe into Europe: firſt of all in Pompeius Magnus his dayes: afterwards, under Heraclius, and at other times as we may ſee in the Hiſtories, whether by celeſtiall influence, or other hidden cauſes I leave to the learned. But ſo farre as I could hitherto reade, it did never ſet foote in England before that time. Beſides theſe places before named of great name and marke, wee muſt not overpaſſe neither Melton Mowbray neere unto this Burton, a Mercate Towne bearing name of the Mowbraies ſometime Lords thereof, wherein is nothing more worth the ſeeing, than a faire Church; nor Skeffington, ſtanding farther off, which as it hath given name to a worſhipfull Family, ſo againe it hath received worſhip and credit from the ſame.

Skeffington.

The River that watereth this part of the Shire, is by the Inhabitants about it called the Wreken, along which upon reſemblance of the name I have ſought VERNOMETUM, but in vaine. This Wreken gathereth a ſtrong ſtreame by many lively Brookes reſorting unto it, whereof one paſſeth by Wimondham an ancient habitation of Wimondham.

A of a younger branch of the houſe of the Lords Barkleis, well encreaſed by an heire of Dela-Laund, and ſo on by Melton Mowbray before mentioned, by Kirkby Bellers, (where there was a Priory) having that addition of the Bellers, a reſpective, rich, and noble Family in their time, by Brokesby a ſeat now of the Villiers of an old Norman race, and deſcended from an heire of Bellers: which Brokesby imparted formerly the ſirname to the Brokesbies of eſpeciall antiquity in theſe parts. Then the Wreken ſpeedeth by Ratcliffe high mounted upon a cliffe and within few miles conjoyneth it ſelfe to Soar, neere unto Mont-Soar-hill, before mentioned. Brookesby.

Whatſoever of this Shire lieth beyond the Wreken Northward, is not ſo frequently inhabited, and part of it is called the Wold, as being hilly without wood; wherein B Dalby a ſeat of the old Family of the Noels, of whom I ſhall ſpeake elſewhere, and Waltham on the Wold, a meane Mercat, are moſt notable. Through this part as I have beene enformed paſſeth the Foſſe-way, made by the Romans from Lewing Bridge, by Segrave which gave ſirname to the honourable Family often mentioned, and the Lodge on the Wold toward the Vale of Bever, but the Tract thereof as yet I know not.

This Shire hath beene more famous from time to time by reaſon of the Earles thereof have beene very renowned. And ſeeing it had under the Saxons government Earles by inheritance, I will firſt reckon them up in order, as Thomas Talbot a skilfull Antiquary hath delivered me a note of them out of the kings Records. In the time of Æthelbald King of the Mercians, and in the yeere of our Redemption 716. Leofrick C was Earle of Leiceſter, whom there ſucceeded in direct line Algar the firſt, Algar the ſecond, Leofrick the ſecond, Leofſtane, Leofrick the third buried in Coventry, Algar the third, who had iſſue two ſonnes, Æadwin Earle of March, Morkar Earle of Northumberland, and a daughter named Lucy, firſt married to Ivon Talboys of Anjou, afterwards to Roger of Romara, who begat of her William of Romara Earle of Lincolne. Now when as the iſſue male of this Saxon Family failed, and the name of the Saxons was troden (as it were) under foot, Robert Beaumont a Norman Lord of Pont Audomar and Earle of Mellent, (after that Simon an officiary Earle of Leiceſter was dead) obtained his Earledome in the yeere of our Lord 1102. at the bountifull hand of King Henry the Firſt: which Robert, A man for skill and knowledge excellent, The words of to ſonne three Roberts, the firſt ſirnamed Boſſu becauſe hee was crook-backed, who after he had rebelled againſt King Henry the Firſt, weary of his looſe irregular life, became a Chanon Regular; the ſecond ſirnamed Blanch-maines of his lily-white-hands, who ſided with the young King againſt King Henry the Second, and dyed in the expedition of King Richard the Firſt to the Holy Land; the third ſirnamed Fitz-Parnell, becauſe his mother was* Parnels daughter and one of the heires to Petronilla.

E Hugh Grant-maiſmill the laſt, in whoſe right hee was Seneſchall or Steward of England, and died iſſueleſſe in the time of King John.

A few yeeres after, Simon Montfort deſcended from a baſe ſonne of Robert King of France, who had married the ſiſter of Robert Fitz-Parnell, enjoyed this honour. But after that hee and his were expelled in the yeere 1200. as wholy devoted to the French, Ranulph Earle of Cheſter attained unto this Dignity, not in right of inheritance, but by his Princes favour. Howbeit, afterwards Simon Montfort ſonne of Matthew Paris.
the foreſaid Simon obtained this honour, when Almarik his eldeſt brother ſurrendred up his right before King Henry the Third. This Simon, ſtood in ſo gracious favour with King Henry the Third, that hee called him home againe out of France when he was baniſhed, heaped upon him great wealth, admitted him unto the Earle-F dome of Leiceſter, granted to him the Stewardſhip of England, and to honour him the more gave him his owne ſiſter in marriage. But hee, thus over-heaped with honourable benefits, when he had no meanes to requite them (ſuch is the perverſe wilfulneſſe of men) beganne hatefully to maligne him, yea and did moſt wickedly See Eoveſham in Worceſterſhire.
moleſt the good King having ſo well deſerved, making himſelfe Ringleader to the rebellious Barons, and with them raiſing horrible tempeſts of civill warre, in which himſelfe alſo at length was overthrowne and ſlaine. A

As for his Honours and Poſſeſſions, King Henry the Third gave and graunted them to Edmund his owne younger ſonne Earle of Lancaſter. So afterward this honour lay as it were obſcured among the Titles of the houſe of Lancaſter: and Mawde the daughter of Henry Duke of Lancaſter being married to Henry Duke of Bavaria, Earle of Henault, Holland, Zeland, &c. added unto his other Titles, this of Earle of Leiceſter alſo: For, in the Charter dated the five and thirty yeere of King Edward the Third, hee is in plaine termes ſtiled William Earle of Henhault and of Leiceſter: yea and, as we finde in the Inquiſition made Anno 36. of the ſaid King Edward the Third, ſhee by the name of Dutcheſſe of Bavaria, held the Caſtle, Manour, and Honour of Leiceſter. After whoſe deceaſe without iſſue, that honour reverted to John of Gaunt Duke of Lancaſter who had wedded Blanch the other ſiſter of Mawde. From which time it became united to the Houſe of Lancaſter, untill in our remembrance it reflouriſhed in L. Robert Dudley, who was by Queene Elizabeth girt with the ſword of the Earledome of Leiceſter, and extraordinarily favoured: whereupon the States Generall of the united Provinces in their great troubles choſe him triumphantly for their abſolute Governour, and ſoone after as contemptuouſly rejected him, reſerving all Soveraignty to themſelves. But after a ſhort time he paſſed out of this tranſitory life in the yeere 1588. leaving the fame onely of his greatneſſe behinde him. C

RUTLAND-SHIRE.

RUTLAND, in the old Engliſh Saxon tongue Roteland, is environed within Leiceſter-ſhire, unleſſe it be on the South-ſide, where it lieth upon the river Welland, and on the Eaſt-ſide, where it butteth upon Lincoln-ſhire. A Country nothing inferiour to Leiceſter-ſhire either in fruitfull qualitie of ſoile, or pleaſantneſſe, but in quantitie onely, as being the leaſt County of all England. For, lying in forme almoſt round like a circle, it is in compaſſe ſo farre about, as a light horſeman will ride in one day. Whence it is, that the Inhabitants tell a tale of I wote not what king, who ſhould give to one Rut ſo much land as he could ride about in one day: and that he, forſooth, rode about this ſhire within the time appointed, and ſo had it given him, and named it by his owne name Rutland. But let ſuch fables bee packing: I would not have the trueth prejudiced with an extravagant tale.

And where as the earth in this ſhire is every where red, and ſo red that even the ſheepes fleeces are thereby coloured red: whereas alſo the Engliſh-Saxons called Red in their tongue Roet and Rud; may we not ſuppoſe that this Countrey was named Rutland, as one would ſay a Redland? For, as ſaith the Poet. The name of Rutland.

Conveniunt rebus nomina ſæpè ſuis.
The names, as often times we ſee,
With things themſelves full well agree.

Now, that places in all Nations have had their names of redneſſe, Rutlan Caſtle in Wales, built on a ſhore of red earth, Redbay, Redhill, Redland, The Red Promontory, The Red-Sea alſo betwixt Ægypt and Arabia, Erytheia in Ionia, and a number beſides may proove moſt evidently: So that there is no cauſe why we ſhould give credit to fables in this behalfe. As for this little County, it may ſeeme to have beene ordained a Shire or County but of late daies. For, in King Edward the Confeſſors time, it was counted a part of Northampton-ſhire, and our Hiſtoriographers who wrote three hundred yeeres agoe and upward, reckoned it not in the number of Shires.

Waſh or Guaſh, a little river, which runneth from the Weſt Eaſtward through the middle of it, divideth it in twaine. In the hithermore or South part riſeth Uppingham upon an high aſcent, whence that name was impoſed, not memorable for any thing elſe, but becauſe it is counted a well frequented Mercat towne, and hath for to ſhew a proper Schoole, which together with another at Okeham R. Ihonſon a Miniſter of Gods word, in a good and laudable intent, for the training up of children in good literature lately erected, with the money he had gotten together by way of collection. Under this ſtandeth Dryſtoke, which in no wiſe is to be paſſed over with ſilence, conſidering it hath been the habitation from old time of a right ancient race of the Digbyes: which (I grieve to utter it, but all men know it) hath now caught a deepe ſteine by Sir Everard Digby drawne into that curſed crew, who moſt horribly complotted with one diveliſh flaſh of helliſh Gunpouder to blow up both Prince, and Country. More Eaſtward upon the river Welland, I ſaw nothing remarkeable, unleſſe it be Berobdon, now Barodon, which Thomas Beauchamp Earle of Warwicke held, with South Leffingham, now South Luffenham, and other Hamelets, by ſervice to be the Kings Chamberlaine in the Exchequer. Uppingham. Fines 14. Edw. 3.

On the further part beyond the river, among the hils, there ſpreadeth below a very pleaſant and fruitfull vale, named at this day The vale of Catmoſe, happily of Coet maes, which ſignifieth in the Brittiſh tongue a field full of woods. In the middeſt whereof Okeham ſheweth it ſelfe, which by the like reaſon may ſeeme to have taken the name from Okes: where, hard by the Church which is large and faire, remaine the crackt and decaying walls of an old Caſtle: which, Walkelin de Ferrarijs built in the firſt times of the Norman Kings. And that it hath been the dwelling place of the Ferrars, beſides the credit of writers, and generall report, the great horſe ſhoes, which in times paſt that family gave in their armes, faſtned upon the gate and in the hall, may ſufficiently proove. Afterwards it belonged to the Lords of Tatteſhall: But when King Richard the ſecond had promoted Edward, the Duke of Yorkes ſonne, to the Earledome of Rutland, he gave unto him this Caſtle alſo. A Barons Cromwell. See Earles of Eſſex.

But within our Fathers remembrance it befell unto Thomas Cromwel, and was reputed the ſeat of his Baronie: whom King Henry the Eighth advanced to the higheſt pitch of dignity: and ſtreightwaies when by his plotting and attempting of many matters he had caſt himſelfe into the tempeſtuous ſtormes of envy and diſpleaſure, bereft him on a ſudden both of life and dignity. B

Burly.

Over againſt it Eaſtward, there ſtandeth Burley moſt daintily ſeated, and overlooking the vale: A ſtately and ſumptuous houſe now of the Haringtons, who by marrying the daughter and heire of Colepeper, became Lords of ſo faire an inheritance; that ever ſince they have flouriſhed in theſe parts, like as before time the Colepepers had done, unto whom by N. Green the wealthy and goodly Livelod of the Bruſes in part had deſcended. As for thoſe Bruſes, being men of the chiefe Nobility in England, they were engraffed into the Roiall ſtocke and family of Scotland: out of whom by Robert the eldeſt brother, the race Roiall of Scotland are ſprung: like as by Bernard the younger brother, the Cottons of Connington in Huntingdon-ſhire (of whom I have written already) and theſe Haringtons. In which regard and gracious reſpect King James advanced Sir Iohn Harington branched from that ſtem that the ancient Lords Harington, to the title of Baron Harington of Exton, a towne adjacent, where he hath alſo an other faire houſe. C

Baron Harington.

Moreover, on the Eaſt ſide, by the river Guaſh, ſtands Brigcaſterton, whereof I will ſay more afterward, and Rihall: where, when ſuperſtition had ſo bewitched our anceſtours, that the multitude of their pety Saints, had well neere taken quite away the true God, one Tibba a pety Saint or Goddeſſe, reputed to bee the tutelar patroneſſe of Hauking, was of Foulers and Faulkoners worſhipped as a ſecond Diana: Eſſendon alſo is neere adjoyning; the Lord whereof Sir Robert Cecil, a good ſonne of a right good father (the ſtrength and ſtay of our Common-wealth in his time) was by King James created Baron Cecil of Eſſendon in the firſt yeere of his reigne. D

The Faulkoners Saint. Baron Cecill de Eſſendon.

This little County King Edward the Confeſſor, by his laſt Will and Teſtament bequeathed unto his wife Eadith, yet with this condition, that after her death it ſhould come to S. Peter of Weſtminſter. For, theſe be the very words of the ſaid Teſtament. I will, that after the death of Queene Eadith my wife, ROTELAND with all the appertenances thereto, be given to my Monaſtery of the moſt bleſſed Saint Peter, and be yeelded up without delay for ever unto the Abbot and to the Monkes there ſerving God: yet King William the Conquerour cancelled and made voide this Teſtament, who reſerving a great part of it to himſelfe, divided the reſt betweene Counteſſe Iudith, whoſe daughter was married to David King of Scots, Robert Mallet, Oger, Giſlebert of Gaunt, Earle Hugh, Aubrey the Clerk, and others: And unto Weſtminſter, firſt he left the Tithes, afterwards the Church onely of Okeham and parcels thereunto appertaining. E

Earles of Rutland.

This County hath not had many Earles. The firſt Earle of Rutland, was Edward, the firſt begotten Sonne of Edmund of Langley Duke of Yorke, created by King Richard the Second upon a ſingular favour that he caſt unto him during his Fathers life, and afterwards by the ſame King advanced to the honour of Duke of Aumarle. This young man, wickedly projected with others a practiſe to make away King Henry the Fourth, and ſtreight waies with like levity diſcovered the ſame: But after his Fathers death, being Duke of Yorke loſt his life fighting couragiouſly F

A couragiouſly amid the thickeſt troupes of his enemies in the battaile of Agincourt. Long time after, there ſucceeded in this Honour Edward the little young Sonne of Richard Duke of Yorke, and he together with his Father, during thoſe deadly broiles of civill warre, was ſlaine in the battaile fought at Wakefield.

Many yeeres after, King Henry the Eighth, raiſed up Sir Thomas Mannours, to be Earle of Rutland, who in right of his Grand-mother Æleonor was poſſeſſed of a goodly and faire inheritance of the Barons Roos, lying in the countries round about, and elſewhere. In his roome ſucceeded his Sonne Henry, and after him likewiſe Edward his Sonne, unto whom if I ſhould ſay nothing elſe, that commendation of the Poet was moſt aptly and truly appliable.

B ——Nomen virtutibus æquat,
Nec ſinit ingenium nobilitate premi.

His name ſo great with vertues good, he matcheth equally,
Nor ſuffreth wit ſmuthring to lie under Nobility.

But he, by over haſty and untimely death, being received into Heaven, left this dignity unto John his Brother: who alſo departing this life within a while, hath for his ſucceſſor, Roger his Sonne, anſwerable in all points to his ancient and right noble parentage.

LINCOLNE-SHIRE.

VPon Rutland on the East side, confineth the County of LINCOLNE, called by the English-Saxons Lincollcyne, and by the Normans Nicol-shire after their comming into the Land, with some transposition of letters, but usually LINGOLNE-SHIRE. A very large Country, as reaching almost threescore miles in length, and carrying in some places above thirty miles in bredth: passing kinde for yeeld of Corne, and feeding of Cattaile, well furnished and set out with a great number of Townes, and watered with many Rivers. Upon the East side, where it bendeth outward with a brow fetching a great compasse, the German Ocean beateth on the shore: Northward it recheth to Humber an arme of the sea: on the West side it butteth upon Nottingham-shire: and on the South it is severed from Northampton-shire by the River Welland. This whole Shire is divided into three parts, whereof one is called Holland: a second Kesteven, and the third Lindsey. Holland, which Ingulph termeth Hoiland lyeth to the sea, and like unto that Holland in Germanie, it is so throughly wet in most places with waters, that a mans foote is ready to sinke into it, and as one standeth upon it, the ground will shake and quake under his feet: and thence it may seeme to have taken the name: unlesse a man would with Ingulph say that Hoiland is the right name, and the same imposed upon it, of Hay which our Progenitours broadly called Hoy.

This part throughout beareth upon that ebbing and flowing arme of the Sea, which Ptolomee calleth METARIS, in stead of Maltraith, and wee at this day, The Washes. A very large arme this is and passing well knowne, at every tide and high sea covered all over with water, but when the sea ebbeth, and the tide is past, a man may passe over it as on dry land, but yet not without danger. Which, King John learned with his losse. For, whilest he journied this way, when he warred upon the rebellious Barons, the waters suddenly brake in upon him, so that at Fosse-dyke, and Welstream he lost all his carriage and princely furniture, as Matthew of Westminster writeth. Metaris æstuarium. The Washes.

This Country which the Ocean hath laied to the land, as the Inhabitants beleeve, by sands heaped and cast together, they it terme Silt, is assailed on the one side with the said Ocean sea, and in the other with a mighty confluence of waters from out of the higher countries, in such sort that all the Winter quarter the people of the country are faine to keepe watch and ward continually, and hardly with all the bankes and dammes that they make against the waters, are able to defend themselves from the great violence and outrage thereof. The ground bringeth forth but small store of corne, but plenty of grasse, and is repleniished abundantly with fish and water-fowle. The Soile throughout is so soft, that they use their Horses unshod: neither shall you meet so much as with a little stone there, that hath not beene brought thither from other places: nevertheless, there bee most beautifull Churches standing there built of foure square stone.

Certaine it is, that the sea aforetime had entred farther up into the Country, and that appeareth by those bankes formerly raised against the waterwaves then in-rushing, which are now two miles off from the shore, as also by the hils neere Sutterton, which they call Salt-Hils. But, of fresh water there is exceeding great want in all places: neither have they any at all but raine water and that in pits, which if they be of any great depth, presently become brackish, if shallow, they dry up as soone. Neither are there Quicksands wanting, which have a wonderfull force to draw to them and to hold fast, as both Shepheards and their poore Sheepe also finde other whiles not without danger. Salt-hils. Quicksands.

This Holland or Hoiland (whether you will) is divided into two parts. The Lower and the Higher: The Lower hath in it foule and slabby quavemires, yea and most troublesome troubleſome Fennes, which the very Inhabitants themſelves for all their ſtilts cannot ſtalke through. And conſidering that it lieth very low and flat, fenced it is of the one ſide againſt the Ocean, on the other from thoſe waters which overwhelme the upper part of the Iſle of Ely, with mighty piles and huge bankes oppoſed againſt the ſame. Of which, Southybanke is of greateſt name; which leaſt it ſhould have a breach made through it with that infinite maſſe of water that falleth from the South part, when the Rivers ſwell, and all is overflowne by inundation, the people watch with great care and much feare, as againſt a dangerous enemy. And yet for the draining away of this water, the neighbour Inhabitants at the common charges of the country beganne to make a new chanell at Clowcroſſe in the yeere 1599. Neere unto this banke aforeſaid, we ſaw Crowland, which alſo is called Croyland, a Towne of good note among the Fenne-people, the name whereof ſoundeth, as Ingulph the Abbat of this place interpreteth it, as much as A raw and muddy Land: A place, as they write, much haunted in times paſt with I wot not what ſprites and fearefull apparitions, before that Guthlake a right holy and devout man led there an Eremits life. In whoſe memoriall Æthelbald King of the Mercians founded to the honour of God at his great charges, in the yeere of our Salvation 716. an Abbay very famous both for opinion of the religious life of the Monkes, and alſo for their wealth. Concerning which, take heere, if you pleaſe, theſe Verſes of Fœlix a Monke of good antiquity, out of the life of Guthlake.

Crowland.

Nunc exercet ibi ſe munificentia Regis,
Et magnum templum magno molimine condit.
At cum tam mollis, tam lubrica, tam malè conſtans
Fundamenta palus non ferret ſaxea, palos
Præcipit infigi quercino robore cæſos,
Leucarúmque novem ſpacio rate fertur arena;
Inque ſolum mutatur humus, ſuffultáque tali
Cella baſi, multo ſtat conſummata labore.

His bounty now the King doth there beſtow,
An Abbay faire with much expenſe to reare.
But ſeeing that the wateriſh Fenne below,
Thoſe ground-workes laid with ſtone uneath could beare,
(So quaving ſoft and moiſt the Baſes were)
He cauſed piles made of good heart of oke, Pitch't downe to be with maine commanders ſtroke.
Then nine leagues off, men ſand in Barges brought,
Which once faſt ramm'd by painfull workmans hand,
Of rotten earth good ſolid ground was wrought;
On which for aye ſuch workes might firmely ſtand;
And thus by this deviſe of new plantation,
The Church ſtands firme and hath a ſure foundation.

The Divels of Crowland.

If I ſhould exemplifie unto you out of that Monke, the Devils of Crowland, with their blabber lips, fire-ſpitting mouthes, rough and skaly viſages, beetle heads, terrible teeth, ſharpe chins, hoarſe throats, blacke skinnes, crump-ſhoulders, ſide and gor-bellies, burning loines, crooked and hawm'd legges, long tailed buttockes, and ugly miſhapes, which heeretofore walked and wandered up and downe in theſe places, and very much troubled holy Guthlake and the Monkes, you would laugh full merily: and I might bee thought a ſimple ſily-one full worthily. Howbeit, in regard of the admirable ſituation of this place, ſo farre different from all others in England, and conſidering the Abbay was ſo famous, I am well content to dwell a while in the deſcription of theſe particulars. Amid moſt deepe Fennes and ſtanding waters in a muddy and miry ground this Crowland lyeth ſo ſhut up and divided round about

A about from all entrance, that there is no acceſſe to it, unleſſe it bee on the North and East ſide, and that by narrow Cawſies. Seated it is for all the world, if I may re-ſemble great and ſmall things together, like unto Venice. Three ſtreets it hath and thoſe ſevered one from another by water courſes betweene, planted thicke with willowes, and raiſed upon piles or poſtes pitched and driven downe deepe into the ſtanding waters, having over them a triangle Bridge of admirable workmanſhip, under which for to receive the fall of the waters meeting in one confluence, the Inhabitants report there was a pit ſunke of a mighty depth. Now, whereas beyond the Bridge in ſolum mutatur humus (as that Monke ſaid) that is, The mould is chaunged, and is become firme and ſolid ground, there ſtood in times paſt that famous Abbay, and B the ſame verily taking up but a ſmall plot of ground: about which, all (ſave where the Towne ſtandeth) is ſo rotten and mooriſh, that a man may thruſt a pole downe right thirty foote deepe: and round about it every way is nothing but a plot of reeds; and next unto the Church a place planted with Alders. Howbeit, the Towne is well enough peopled with Inhabitants, who have their Cattaile a great way from the Towne, and when they are to milke them, they goe in little punts or boats that will carry but two a peece, (which they call Skerries:) yet the moſt gain-full trade they have is by taking fiſh, and catching of water-foule; and that is ſo great, that in the moneth of Auguſt, they will ſpread a net and at once draw three thouſand Mallards and wilde Duckes and ſuch like together: and theſe pooles or watery plots C of theirs, they uſe to terme their Corne fields: for, they ſee no Corne growing in five miles any way. In regard of this their taking of fiſh and fowle they paid yeerely in times paſt to the Abbat, as now they doe to the King, three hundred pounds of our money.

The private Hiſtory of this Abbay I liſt not to relate (ſeeing it is commonly extant and to be ſeene) out of Ingulph now printed and publiſhed: yet my minde ſerves me well, briefely to record, that which Peter of Bloys Vice-chancellour to King Henry the Second reported at large, as touching the new building of this Abbay in the yeere of our Redemption 1112. to the end, that by this one preſident wee may learne, by what meanes and helpes, ſo mighty, ſo huge, and ſo faire religious houſes D were raiſed and built up in thoſe times. Ioffrid the Abbat obtained of the Archbiſhops and Biſhops in England, An Indulgence for the third part of penance enjoyned for ſinnes committed, unto every one that helped forward ſo holy a worke. With this Indulgence he ſent out Monkes every way and all about to gather money: wherewith when hee was now ſufficiently furniſhed, to the end that hee might have an happy beginning of this worke from ſome happy names of lucky preſage, hee ſolemnely appointed the day of Saint Perpetua, and of Saint Felicity, on which he would lay the firſt foundation. At which day there came flocking in great numbers, the Nobles, the Prelates, and Commons of all the Country thereabout. After the celebration of Divine Service, and Anthems ſung in parts, Abbat Ioffrid himſelfe layed the firſt Corner
E ſtone Eaſtward; then the Noble men and great perſons every one in their degree couched their ſtones, and upon the ſaid ſtones ſome laid money, others their ſealed Deeds of lands, Advouſons of Churches, of Tenths of their Sheepe, and of the Tithes of their Churches, of certaine meaſures of wheat, and of a certaine number of Workemen, as Maſons and Quarriers, whom they would pay. The common ſort again and townеſhips for their parts, offered with chearefull devotion, ſome money, others one daies labour every moneth untill the worke were finiſhed, ſome the building of whole Pillars, others of the baſes to the ſaid Pillars, and others again to make certaine parts of the wals, ſtriving a vie who ſhould doe moſt. This done, the Ab-bat after hee had in a ſolemne ſpeech commended their devout bounty to ſo holy a F worke, granted unto every one of them the fraternity of his Abbay, and the participation beſides of all ſpirituall benefits in that Church: as praiers, bleſſings, &c. and ſo when he had entertained them with a very ſumptuous feaſt, hee gave them his bleſſing and diſmiſſed them chearefully every man to his owne home. But I will dwell no longer in this matter. But hereby you may ſee how by ſmall contributions great workes

workes aroſe. From Crowland there goeth a Cauſey planted on both ſides with Willowes, betweene the River Welland and the deepe Mariſhes, Northward: upon which, two miles from Crowland, I ſaw the fragment of a Piramis with this Inſcription.

Spalding.

Higher yet upon the ſame River is ſeated Spalding, encloſed round about with Riverets and draines, a fairer Towne I aſſure you than a man would looke to finde in this Tract among ſuch ſlabbes and water-plaſhes: where Ivo Talbois, whom Ingulph elſewhere calleth Earle of Anjou, gave an ancient Cell to the Monkes of Angiers in France. From hence as farre as to Deeping, which is ten miles off, Egelrick Abbat of Crowland, afterwards Biſhop of Durham, made for the eaſe of travailers, as ſaith Ingulphus, through the middeſt of a vaſt Foreſt, and of moſt deepe Fennes, a ſound cauſey of wood and ſand, after his owne name called Elrich-road; which notwithſtanding at this day is not to be ſeene.

In higher Hoiland that bendeth more into the North, firſt we have in ſight Kirkton, ſo named of the Church, which is paſſing faire; and then, where the River Witham hemnd in ſtrongly with bankes on both ſides runneth in a maine and full ſtreame toward the ſea, flouriſheth Boſton, more truely named Botolphs-towne. For, it carried that name from one Botolph a moſt holy and devout Saxon, who at Icanhoe, had a Monaſtery. A famous Towne this is, ſtanding on both ſides of the River Witham, which hath over it a wooden bridge of a great height, and well frequented by the meanes of a commodious haven unto it: the Mercat place is faire and large, and the Church maketh a goodly ſhew, as well for the beautifull building as the greatneſſe thereof: the towre-ſteeple of it, which riſeth up to a mighty height, doth, as one would ſay, ſalute paſſengers and travailers a great way off, and giveth direction alſo to the ſailers. A lamentable overthrow it ſuſtained in the Raigne of Edward the firſt. For, when bad and Ruffian-like behaviour rufled at that time over all England, certaine military luſty fellowes having proclaimed heere a Juſts or running at Tilt, at a Faire time, when there was much reſort of people thither, came apparelled in the habit of Monkes and Chanons, ſet fire on the Towne in moſt places thereof, brake in upon Merchants with ſodaine violence, tooke away many things by force, burnt a great deale more; in ſo much as our Hiſtorians write, that (as the ancient Writers record of Corinth when it was deſtroied) molten gold and ſilver ran downe in a ſtreame together. The Ring-leader Robert Chamberlan, after hee had confeſſed the act, and what a ſhamefull deed had been committed, was hanged: yet could he not be wrought by any meanes to diſcloſe his complices in this foule fault. But happier times raiſed Boſton againe out of the aſhes, and a ſtaple for wooll here ſetled, did very much enrich it, and drew thither merchants of the Hanſe Society, who had here their Guild. At this day it is for building faire, and by good trade rich. For, the Inhabitants give themſelves both to merchandiſe and alſo to graſing. Nere unto this was the Barony de Croeun or de Credonio, out of which family, Alan de Croeun founded the Priory of Freſton, and at length Parnel heire of the family being twice married transferred no ſmall inheritance, firſt to the Longchamps, which came to the Pedwardins; and ſecondly to John

Vaulx,

A Vaulx, from whom the Barons Roos are deſcended. Beyond it ſcarce ſix miles, reacheth Holland: all which Ivo Talboys of Anjou received at the bountifull hands of king William the Conqueror, but Herward an Engliſh man, of good hope and full of dout courage, being ſonne to Leofrick Lord of Brine or Burne not brooking his inſolency, when he ſaw his owne and his Country mens ſafety now endangered; after he had received the cincture with a military Belt by Brann Abbat of Peterborough, whoſe ſtomacke roſe alſo againſt the Normans, raiſed warre againſt him, oftentimes put him to flight, and at length carried him away captive, and ſuffered him not to bee ranſomed but with ſuch conditions that he might be received into the Kings favour, wherein he dyed his liege man. For ſo deſerved his valour, which is alwayes commended even in a very enemy. His Daughter being wedded to Hugh Enermeve Lord
B of Deping enjoyed his lands, which afterwards, as I underſtand, was devolved upon the Family of Wake, which being mightily enriched with the Poſſeſſions of the Eſtotevills, was of right great honour in theſe parts, untill the Raigne of Edward the Second: for then, by an heire Generall, their inheritance came by right of marriage unto Edmund of Woodſtocke youngeſt ſonne to King Edward the Firſt, and Earle of Kent. But of a younger ſonne, the ancient Family of the Wakes of Bliſworth in Northampton-ſhire yet remaining is deſcended.

Barons de Wake.

The ſecond part of this Country commonly called Keſteven, and by Æthelward an ancient Authour, Ceoſtefnewood, adjoyning to Hoiland on the Weſt ſide; is for aire
C farre more wholeſome, and for Soile no leſſe fruitfull. Greater this is and larger than the other, yea and garniſhed every where with more faire Townes. At the entry thereinto upon the river Welland ſtandeth Stanford, in the Saxon tongue Stean-forð, built of rough ſtone, whence it hath the name. A Towne well peopled and of great reſort, endowed alſo with ſundry immunities, and walled about; It gave Geld or Tribute, as wee reade in Domeſday Booke, for twelve hundreds and an halfe, in the army, ſhipping, and Danegeld, and in it were ſixe Wards. What time as King Edward the elder fortified the South bankes of Rivers againſt the Danes breaking by force into the Land out of the North parts, Marianus recordeth, that hee built a very ſtrong Caſtle juſt over againſt this Towne alſo on the South banke (which now is D called Stanford Baron) yet there appeareth not any one token thereof at this day: for, that Caſtle which in time of the civill Warre Stephen ſtrengthened againſt Henry of Anjou, was within the Towne, as both the generall report holdeth, and the very plot alſo whereon it ſtood as yet remaining, ſheweth. But ſoone after, the ſaid Henry, being now King of England, gave the whole Towne of Keſteven Keſteven.

Stanford.

See Burghley in the County of Northampton.

Stanford, which was in his Demaine, excepting the fees or Feifs of the Barons and Knights of the ſame Towne, unto Richard de Humez or Homets, who was Conſtable to the King, his Soveraigne Lord, for his homage and ſervice. And the ſame afterwards, held William Earle of Warren by the will and pleaſure of King John.

Under the Raigne of Edward the Third, an Univerſity, and publique profeſſion E of good learning beganne heere, which the Inhabitants count no ſmall credit unto them. For, when there was ſuch hote debate and contention betweene the Northren and Southren Students at Oxford, a great number of Scholers withdrew themſelves hither: but after a ſmall while they returned upon the Kings Proclamation, to Oxford, and as they ſodainely beganne, ſo they ended as ſoone this new Univerſity: And thenceforward provided it was by oth, That no Student in Oxford ſhould publiquely profeſſe or reade at Stanford to the prejudice of Oxford. Nevertheleſſe it flouriſhed with freſh trading and merchandiſe, untill the civill warre, betweene the two houſes of Lancaſter and Yorke, grew ſo hote, that the Northren Souldiers breaking into the Towne deſtroyed all with fire and ſword. Neither could it ever ſince that F time fully recover the ancient Dignity. And yet now it is in good eſtate: and the civill government thereof conſiſteth of an Alderman and foure and twenty Burgeſſes his brethren. Beautified it is with ſeven Pariſh Churches or thereabout, and ſheweth an old Hoſpitall and that a very faire houſe founded by William Browne a Burgeſſe there, beſides another new one on this ſide the Bridge lately built by that Neſtor of

An Academy or Univerſity begun at Stanford.

Britaine, Sir William Cecill Baron Burghley, what time as hee raiſed that ſtately and ſumptuous houſe at Burghley, whereof I have ſpoken already in Northampton-ſhire, who lieth enterred here in a goodly and gorgeous Tombe within the Pariſh Church of Saint George; a man (to ſay nothing elſe of him) who by courſe of nature, and for his owne glory lived long enough, but in regard of his Country died overſoone.

* Commonly called High-Dike.

Although ſome tokens remaining of antiquity, and the * High-ſtreet, made by the Romans, which ſo ſoone as you are without the Towne leadeth you the direct way into the North, may ſufficiently ſhew, that ſometimes there was a Ferry or Water-fare heere.

Gauſennæ.

Yet that this Towne ſhould be that GAUSENNÆ, which Antonine the Emperour placeth not farre from hence, the ſaid tokens of Antiquity doe not affoord ſufficient proofe.

Bridge-Caſterton.

But ſeeing that a mile from hence there is a little Village called Bridge-caſterton (which very name carryeth with it the marke of Antiquity) where the River Guaſh or Waſh croſſeth the ſaid High-ſtreet; the affinity of this name Guaſh with Gauſennæ, and the diſtance alſo making not againſt it, hath made mee to thinke that Gauſennæ was it which now is called Bridge-caſterton, untill time bring truth to light. If I ſhould thinke, that Stanford grew out of the ruines of this Towne, and that this part of the Shire was named Keſteven of GAUSENNÆ, like as another part, Lindſey, of the City Lindum, let this I pray you, bee but mine opinion, and judge yee thereof accordingly. It is ſuppoſed that this Gauſennæ was overthrowne, when (as Henry Archdeacon of Huntingdon writeth) the Picts and Scots had ſpoiled all the Country, as farre as to Stanford: where Hengiſt and his Engliſh-Saxons with their unwearied force and ſingular proweſſe hindered the paſſage of thoſe furious Nations, ſo that after many of them were ſlaine, and more taken priſoners, the reſt betooke themſelves to flight. But let us proceed to the reſt.

Deping.

On the Eaſt ſide of Keſteven which bendeth toward Holland, as wee goe Northward, theſe places ſtand in order: Firſt, Deping, that is to ſay, (as Ingulph interpreteth it), Deepe Medow: Where, Richard de Rulos, Chamberlaine to William Conquerour, excluding the River Welland with raiſing up an high banke (for that it often overflowed) and building upon the ſaid Banke many Tenements, made a great Village.

Deping fen.

This Deping, or Deepe Medow, was very fitly ſo called, for, the plaine lying under it, and which taketh up in compaſſe many miles, is of all this fenny Country the deepeſt, and the very receptacle of moſt waters.

Burne.

And that which a man would mervaile at, it lyeth farre under the Chanell of the River Clen, which being held in with forced bankes, paſſeth by from out of the Weſt. Then have you Burne, well knowne by occaſion that King Edmund was crowned and the Wakes had a Caſtle there, who obtained unto this Towne, from King Edward the Firſt, the liberty of a Mercate.

Lutterell. Sempringham.

More Eaſtward is Irnham, a ſeat of the Barony in times paſt of Sir Andrew Lutterell. Beyond it is Sempringham, famous in theſe daies by reaſon of that paſſing faire houſe, which Edward Lord Clinton, afterwards Earle of Lincolne built; but renowned in old time for the religious Order of the Gilbertines, inſtituted by Gilbert Lord of the place: for he, a wonderfull man, & in cuſtodia mulierum gratiæ ſingularis, that is, of ſingular grace in taking charge of women, in the yeere after Chriſts Nativity 1148. contrary to Juſtinians Conſtitutions, which forbad Double Monaſteries, that is to ſay, of men and women together; howbeit, well backed with the authority of Eugenius the third, Biſhop of Rome, ordained a Sect conſiſting of men and women; which ſo grew and encreaſed, that himſelfe laied the foundations of thirteene religious houſes of this Order, and whiles hee lived had in them 700. Gilbertine Brethren, and eleven hundred Siſters; but no honeſter than they ſhould be, if wee may beleeve Niele, a ſcoffing Poet in thoſe daies, who wrote thus of them:

Gilbertine Freers and Siſters.

Harum ſunt quædam ſteriles, quædam parientes,
Virgineóque tamen nomine cuncta tegunt.
Quæ paſtoralis baculi dotatur honore,
Illa quidem meliùs, fertiliúſque parit.

Vix

A Vix etiam quævis ſterilis reperitur in illis, Donec eis ætas talia poſſe negat.
Some barren are of theſe, ſome fruitfull be,
Yet they by name of Virgins cover all:
More fertile ſure and better beareth ſhe,
Who bleſt is once with croyſier paſtorall:
Now, ſcarce of them is found one barren Doe,
Till age debarre, whether they will or no.

Then ſee you Folkingham, which alſo is now a Lordſhip of the Cliuſons, the Baro- Lords of Fol-B ny in times paſt of the Gaunts, who were deſcended from Gilbert de Gaunt, nephew kingham.
to Baldwin Earle of Flaunders, unto whom by the liberality of King William the Conquerour there fell great revenewes. For, thus we reade in an old manuſcript: Memorandum, that with William Conquerour there came in one Gilbert de Gaunt, unto whom the ſaid William gave the Manour of Folkingham, with all the Appertenances and the Honour thereunto belonging: and they expelled a certaine woman named Dunmoch. Of the ſaid Gilbert came one Walter de Gaunt his ſonne and heire, and of the ſaid Walter came Gilbert de Gaunt his ſonne and heire, alſo Robert de Gaunt a younger ſonne. And from the ſaid Gilbert the ſonne and heire, came Alice his daughter and heire, who was eſpouſed to Earle Simon, and ſhee gave many Tenements to religious men, and dyed without C heire of her owne body. Then deſcended the inheritance to Robert de Gaunt aforeſaid her unckle: and of the foreſaid Robert came Gilbert his ſonne and heire, and of the aforeſaid, came another Gilbert his ſonne and heire, and of the aforeſaid, came another Gilbert his ſonne and heire, who gave the Manour of Folkingham with the Appertenances to Edward the ſonne of Henry King of England. This Gilbert as wee finde in the Plees, out of Pl. 27. H. 3.
which this Pedegree is prooved, claimed ſervice againſt Wil. de Scremby. And at Rot. 13. Linc.
length it came by gift of the Prince to Sir Henry Beaumont: For, moſt certaine it is, that he held it in the Raigne of Edward the Second. Inqui. 4. E. 2.

Neere unto this, is Screkingham, remarkable for the death of Alfrick the ſecond, Screkingham.
Earle of Leiceſter, whom Hubba a Dane ſlew. Of which place, it ſeemeth that In- D gulph ſpake, writing thus: In Keſteven were ſlaine three great Lords or petty Kings of the Danes, whom they buryed in a Village which was called before, Laundon, but now for the Sepulture of three Kings, Tre-King-ham. And more into the Eaſt, is Hather, in this regard onely to be mentioned, that the Buſſeis or Buſleis heere dwell, who deduce their Buſſy.
Race from Roger de Buſly in the Conquerours time. Then Sleford, a Caſtle of the Bi- Sleford.
ſhops of Lincolne, built by Alexander the Biſhop: where Sir John Huſſy the firſt and Baron Huſſy.
laſt Baron of that name created by King Henry the Eighth, built himſelfe an houſe: who having unwittingly and unadviſedly in the yeere 1537. engaged himſelfe with the common people in a tumultuous commotion, what time as the firſt diſſention brake out in England about Religion, loſt his head. Not many miles from hence ſtan-E deth Kime, which gave name to a noble family called De Kime: but the poſſeſſion of Kime.
the place came at length to the Umfranvils: of whom three were called to the Parliament by the name of the Earles of Anguſe in Scotland. But the firſt of them, the learned in our common lawes would not acknowledge to be Earle, (for that Anguſe was not within the limits of the Realme of England) untill hee produced openly in Court the Kings Writ, by vertue whereof he had been ſummoned by the King to the Parliament, under the Title of Earle of Anguſe. From the Umfravils this came unto the Earles of family of Talbois, of whom Gilbert was created by King Henry the Eighth Baron Anguſe.
Talbois, whoſe two ſonnes dying without iſſue, the inheritance was by the females transferred to the Dimocks, Inglebeies, and others. More Weſtward wee ſaw Temple Temple Bruer.
F Bruer, that is, as I interprete it, Temple in the Heath. For it ſeemeth to have beene a Commaundery of the Templers: conſidering that the decayed broken Walles of the Church there are ſeene in forme of the New Temple at London. Hard to it lyeth Blankeney, the Barony in times paſt of the D'incourts, who flouriſhed ſucceſſively a Barons long time one after another from the Normans comming in unto King Henry the D'Eincourt.

Sixth his time: For then, their male line determined in one William, who had two ſiſters for his heires, the one married to Sir William Lovell, the other to Sir Ralph Cromwell. The more willingly have I made mention of this Family, to give ſatisfaction in ſome meaſure unto the longing deſire of Edmond Baron D'eincourt, who long ſince being carefull and earneſt about the preſervation of the memory of his name, as having no male Iſſue, put up an humble Petition to King Edward the Second, Whereas hee foreſaw that his ſirname and Armes after his death would bee quite forgotten, and yet heartily deſired that after his deceaſe they might bee ſtill remembred, that hee might bee permitted to enfeoffe whomſoever it pleaſed him, both in his Manours and Armes alſo. Which requeſt hee obtained, and it was graunted under the Kings Letters Patents: yet for all that is this ſirname now quite gone (to my knowledge) and had it not beene continued by the light of learning, might have beene cleane forgotten for ever.

Patent. 10. Edw. 2.

In the Weſt part of Keſteven and the very confines of this Shire and Leiceſterſhire, ſtandeth Belvoir, or Beauvoir Caſtle, ſo called of the faire proſpect (what name ſoever it had in old time) mounted upon the top of a good ſteepe hill, buile by Robert De Todeneie a Norman Nobleman, who alſo beganne the little Monaſtery adjoyning, from whom by the Albeneies out of little Britaine, and the Barons Roos, it came by inheritance to the Mannors Earles of Rutland: of whom the firſt, that is to ſay, Thomas, as I have beene enformed, raiſed it up againe with newbuildings from the ground, when as it had for many yeeres lien buryed as it were in his owne ruines. For, in deſpite of Thomas Lord Roos, who tooke part with King Henry the Sixth, it was much defaced by William Lord Haſtings, unto whom (after that the ſaid Baron Roos was attainted) King Edward the Fourth had graunted it with very faire Lands. But Edmond Baron Roos ſonne of the ſaid Thomas, by the gracious favour of king Henry the ſeventh recovered this ancient Inheritance againe. About this Caſtle are found the Stones called Aſtroites, which reſemble little Starres joyned one with another, wherein are to bee ſeene at every corner five Beames or Rayes, and in every Ray in the middeſt is ſmall hollowneſſe. This Stone among the Germanes got his name of Victorie, for that, as George Agricola writeth in his Sixth Booke of Mineralls, they are of opinion, that whoſoever carryeth it about him ſhall winne his ſuite and get victory of his enemies. But whether this Stone of ours, as that in Germany, being put in vineger, will ſtirre out of his place, and turne it ſelfe ſome-what round, I could never yet make tryall. Under this Caſtle lyeth a Vale and preſenteth a moſt pleaſant proſpect thereunto, whereupon it is commonly called, the Vale of Belver, which is very large and paſſing pleaſantly beautified with Corne fields, and no leſſe rich in paſtures; lying ſtretched out in three Shires, of Leiceſter, Nottingham and Lincolne.

The vale of Beaver.

If not in this very place, yet hard by it, in all probability, ſtood that MARGIDUNUM, which Antonine the Emperour placeth next after VERNOMETUM, as both the name and the diſtance alſo from VERNOMETUM and the Towne PONT or Paunton, betweene which Antonine placeth it, may moſt plainly ſhew. It ſhould ſeeme that ancient name Margidunum was borowed from Marga and the ſituation of it: For, Marga among the Britans is a kinde of earth named Marle wherewith they nouriſhed and kept their grounds in heart: and DUNUM, which ſignifieth an Hill, agreeth onely to places higher mounted than others. And yet in this Etymology of the name I am in a doubt, ſeeing that Marle in this place is very geaſon or skant (happily becauſe no man ſeeketh for it) unleſſe the Britans by the name of Marga tearmed Plaiſter-ſtone, which is digged uppe hard by, as I have learned: the uſe whereof in white pargetting and in making of Images, was of eſpeciall requeſt among the Romans, as Plinie witneſſeth in his Naturall Hiſtory.

Margidunum.

Marga. i. Marle Dunum.

Witham a River plentifull in Pikes but carrying a ſmall ſtreame, watereth this part of the Shire and on the North-ſide encloſeth it. It hath his beginning by a little River Witham.

A little towne of the ſame name, not farre from the ruines of Bitham Caſtle, which, as we find in an old Pedigree King William the firſt gave to Stephen Earle of Albemarle and Holderneſſe, that he might from thence have wherewith to feed his ſonne, as yet a little infant, with fine wheat bread (conſidering that in Holderneſſe they did eate in thoſe daies oten bread onely, although they uſe now ſuch kind of bread little or nothing at all.) But in the reigne of King Henry the Third, when William de Fortibus Earle of Aumarle rebelliouſly kept this Caſtle, and thence forraged and waſted the country about it, it was laid well neere even with the ground. Afterward, this was the capitall ſeat, as it were, of the Barony of the Colvils, who along time flouriſhed in very great honour: but the right line had an end under King Edward the Third: B and then the Gernons and thoſe notable Baſſets of Sapcot, in right of their wives entred upon the inheritance. Bitham. Matthew Paris. Colvill.

This river Witham preſently beneath his head hath a towne ſeated hard by it named Paunton, which ſtandeth much upon the antiquity thereof, where are digged up oftentimes pavements of the Romanes wrought with checker worke: and heere had the river a bridge over it in old time: For, that this is the towne AD PONTEM, which Antonine the Emperor placed ſeven miles diſtant from MARGIDUNUM, the name Paunton, together with the diſtance not onely from Margidunum but alſo from Crococalana doth eaſily convince: for in Antonine, that towne was called CROCO- CALANA, which at this day is named Ancaſter, and is no more but a long ſtreete, C through which the High-way paſſeth: whereof the one part not long ſince belonged to the Veſcies, the other to the Cromwells. At the entry into it on the South part, we ſaw a rampier with a ditch, and certaine it is, that aforetime it had been a Caſtle: like as on the other ſide Weſtward, is to be ſeene a certaine ſummer ſtanding campe of the Romanes. And it may ſeeme that it tooke a Britiſh name from the ſituation thereof. For it lieth under an hill: and Cruc-maur in Britiſh ſignifieth a Great hill, like as Cruc-occhidient, a mount in the Weſt, as we read in Giraldus Cambrenſis, and Ninnius: But what ſhould be the meaning of that Calana, let others looke. The memory of antiquity in this towne is continued and maintained by the Romane Coines, by the vaults under ground oftentimes diſcovered, by the ſite upon the High-ſtreet, and by D thoſe fourteene miles that are betweene it and Lincolne through a greene plaine, which we call Ancaſter-Heath; for, juſt ſo many doth Antonine reckon betweene Croco-calana and Lindum. But now returne we to the river. Paunton. Ad Pontes. Crococalana. Ancaſter.

After Paunton, wee come to Grantham, a towne of good reſort, adorned and ſet out with a Schoole built by Richard Fox Biſhop of Wincheſter, and with a faire Church, having a ſpire-ſteeple of a mighty heigth, whereof there goe many fabulous tales. Grantham.

Beneath it, neere unto Herlaxton a little village, a braſen veſſell in our fathers time was turned up with a plough, wherein a golden Helmet of a moſt antique faſhion was found, ſet with precious ſtones: which was given as a preſent to Catherine of E Spaine, wife and Dowager to King Henry the Eighth. From hence Witham paſſeth with a long courſe North-ward not farre from Somerton Caſtle: which Antonine Becc, Biſhop of Durham built, and gave to King Edward the Firſt: but a little after it was beſtowed upon Sir Henry de Beaumont, who about that time came into England and began the family of the Lords Beaumont: which in the foregoing age in ſome ſort failed, when as the ſiſter and heire of the laſt Vicount was married to John Lord Lovel de Tichmerſh. But of this houſe I have ſpoken before in Leiceſter-ſhire. From thence, the river bending by little and little to the South-Eaſt, and paſſing through a Fenny Country, diſchargeth it ſelfe into the German Sea beneath Boſton, after it hath cloſed in Keſteven on the North. A golden Helmet. Somerton. Durham booke. Lords of Beaumont.

F On the other ſide of Witham, lieth the third part of this ſhire, named Lindſey, which, of the chiefe Citie of the Shire Bede called Lindiſi: and being greater than Hoiland and Keſteven, butteth with a huge bowing front upon the Ocean, beating upon the Eaſt and North ſides thereof. On the Weſt part it hath the river Trent, and is ſevered from Keſteven; on the South by that Witham aforeſaid, and the Foſſe Dike ancient- Lindſey.

ly cast and scoured by King Henry the First for seven miles in length from Witham into Trent, that it might serve the Citizens of Lincolne for carriage of necessaries by water.

Torksey.

Where this Dike entreth into Trent, standeth Torksey, in the Saxon language Turcesig, a little towne, and in these daies of small account, but in ancient times very famous. For, before the Normans comming in, as we finde in that booke wherein King William the first set downe his survey of England, there were numbered in it two hundred Burgesses, who enjoyed many priviledges, on this condition, that they should transport the Kings Embassadours whensoever they came this way in their owne Barges along the Trent, and conduct them as farre as YORKE. But where this Dike joyneth to Witham, there is the principall City of this Shire placed: which Ptolomee and Antonine the Emperour called LINDUM, the Britans LINDCOIT, of the woods (for which we finde it elsewhere written amisse Luit-coit) Bede, LINDE-COLLINUM, and LINDE COLLINA CIVITAS, whether it were of the situation upon an hill, or because it hath been a Colonie, I am not able to avouch. The Saxons termed it Lindo-collyne, and Lind-cyllan-ceaster, the Normans most corruptly Nichol, we Lincolne, and the Latine writers Lincolnia: whereupon Alexander Necham in his booke intituled, Divine wisdome, writeth thus,

Domesday booke.

Lindum. Lincolne. Collis an hill.

Lindisiæ columen Lincolnia, sive columna, Munificâ fœlix gente, repleta bonis.
Lincolne the stay or piller sure of Lindsey thou maist bee, Blest for thy people bounteous, and goods that are in thee.

Others will have it to take that name of the river Witham, which they say was called by a more ancient name Lindis, but they have no authority to warrant them. Neither am I of their judgement: For, Necham is against it, who foure hundred yeeres agoe called the said river, Witham in this verse.

Trenta tibi pisces mittit Lincolnia, sed te,
Nec dedigneris, Withama parvus adit.
The Trent unto thee sendeth fish, O Lincoln, well we see;
Yet little Witham, scorne it not, a riveret comes to thee.

I for my part would rather derive it from the British word Lhin, which with the Britans signifieth a Lake. For, I have been enformed of the Citizens, that Witham below the Citie, by Swanpole was broader than now it is, and yet is it at this day of a good breadth: and to say nothing of Lindaw in Germanie, by the Lake Acronius, and of Linternum in Italie standing by a Lake; I see that in our Britaine, Tallhin, Glan-lhin, and Lhinlithquo, are townes by lakes sides. This Citie it selfe being large, well inhabited and frequented, standeth upon the side of an hill, where Witham bendeth his course Eastward, and being divided with three small chanels, watereth the lower part of the Citie. That the ancient LINDUM of the Britans stood on the very top of the hill, which had a very hard ascent up to it, and reached out beyond the gate called Newport, the expresse tokens of a rampier and deepe ditches which are yet very evident, doe plainely shew.

In this City, Vortimer that warlike Britan, who many a time discomfited the Saxons and put them to flight, ended his daies, and was heere contrary to his owne commandement, buried. For, he was in a full and assured hope perswaded, that if he were enterred in the sea shore, his very ghost was able to protect the Britans from the Saxons, as writeth Ninius, the disciple of Elvodugus. But the English Saxons after they had rased this old Lindum, first possessed themselves of the South side of the hill, at the foot whereof they built, as it seemeth, the gate yet standing compiled of vast stones; and with the ruines of that more ancient Towne fortified it. Afterwards they went downe lower to the river side, built in a place that was called Wickanford, and walled it

A it about on that ſide which is not fenſed by the River: At which time, as ſaith Bede, Paulinus preached the Word of God unto the Province of Lindſey, and firſt of all converted unto the Lord, the Governour or Provoſt of Lincolne City, whoſe name was Blecca, with his family. In which very City, hee built alſo a Church of goodly ſtone worke, the roofe whereof being either fallen for want of repaire, or caſt downe by the violent hand of enemies, the walles are ſeene ſtanding to this day. After this the Danes wonne it by aſſault once or twice: Firſt, thoſe troupes of ſpoiling mates, out of whoſe hands King Edmund Ironſide wreſted it by force: then Canutus from whom Æthelдred regained it, when upon his returne out of Normandy, he valiantly forced Canutus to abandon the towne, and beyond all hope recovered England which before was loſt. In the Raigne of B Edward the Confeſſour, there were in it, as Domeſday booke recordeth, a thouſand and ſeventy Manſions, with lodgings to give entertainment, and twelve Lage men having Sac, and Soc. But in the Normans time, as ſaith William of Malmesbury, It was one of the beſt peopled Cities of England, and a place of traffique and merchandiſe, for all commers by ſea and land: and as the ſame Domeſday booke ſaith, there were at that time counted and taxed in this City 900. Burgeſſes: and many Manſions were laied waſte, 166. for the Caſtle, and other 74. without the precinct of the Caſtle, not through the oppreſſion of the Sheriffe and his Miniſters, but by reaſon of miſhap, poverty, and caſualty by fire. The ſaid King William the Conqueror for the ſtrengthning of it and terrour of the Citizens, raiſed a paſſing large and ſtrong Caſtle upon the brow of the hill: and almoſt at the very ſame
C time, Remigius Biſhop of Dorcheſter for to give credit and ornament thereto tranſlated hither his Epiſcopall ſeat from Dorcheſter, which was in the moſt remote corner of his Diœceſſe and a ſmall Towne. And when by this time that Church which Paulinus had built was quite gone to decay, the ſame Remigius having purchaſed certaine houſes with grounds lying unto them, in the very higheſt place of the City, neere unto the Caſtle (as Henry of Huntingdon ſaith) mounting up aloft with high and ſtately towres, built in a ſtrong place a ſtrong Church, in a faire plot a faire Church, and dedicated it to the Virgin of Virgins; notwithſtanding the Archbiſhop of Yorke was enraged thereat, who chalenged to himſelfe the propriety of the ſoile: and in it ordained 44. Prebendaries. Which Church afterwards being ſorely defaced with fire, as he ſaith, Alexander that moſt bountiful Biſhop of Lin-D colne repaired, with skilfull artificiall workemanſhip. Of whom William of Malmesbury reporteth, becauſe for his little low ſtature hee was a dwarfe among men, his minde laboured to riſe aloft and ſhew it ſelfe to the world, with outward workes. And as concerning his bounty a Poet of that time among other things wrote thus:

Qui dare feſtinans gratis, ne danda rogentur,
Quod nondum dederat, nondum ſe credit habere.

Who haſtening frankly for to give, for feare that folke ſhould crave:
He never thought that he had that which yet he never gave.

E Beſides theſe two Biſhops already mentioned Robert Bloet who ſat there before Alexander, R. de Beaumeis, Hugh a Burgundian and their Succeſſours, by little and little brought this Church, which could not bee one Biſhops worke, to the ſtately magnificence that now it carryeth. Certes, as it is built, it is all throughout not onely moſt ſumptuous, but alſo paſſing beautifull, and that with rare and ſingular workmanſhip: but eſpecially that fore-front at the Weſt end, which in a ſort raviſheth and allureth the eyes of all that come toward it. In this Church, although there bee divers Monuments of Biſhops and others, yet theſe onely ſeeme memorable: That of Copper wherein the bowels of that right noble and vertuous Queene Æleonor wife to King Edward the Firſt are beſtowed, who died at Hardby in this Shire: as alſo theſe
F following, wherein lye interred Sir Nicolas Cantlow, one or two of the Family of Burgherſh: Lady Catherine Swinford the third wife of John of Gaunt Duke of Lancaſter and mother of the houſe of Somerſet, with whom lyeth buryed Joan her daughter, ſecond wife to Raulph Nevill the firſt Earle of Weſtmerland, who enriched her husband with many happy children.

The

Sidnacester. The Biſhops Dioceſſe of Lincolne not content with thoſe ſtreit limits, wherewith the Biſhops of Sidnacester, who had Epiſcopall juriſdiction over this ſhire contented themſelves in the Primitive Church of the Engliſh Nation, conteined under it ſo many countries, as that the greatneſſe thereof was burdenous unto it: And although King Henry the Second tooke out of it the Province of Ely, and King Henry the Eighth the Biſhopricks of Peterbourgh, and of Oxford, yet ſtill at this day it is counted the greateſt Dioceſſe by farre of all England, both for juriſdiction and number of ſhires: and the Biſhop hath in his Dioceſſe one thouſand two hundred forty ſeven Pariſh Churches.

Many and great Biſhops ſince Remigius his time have governed this See, whom to reckon up is no part of my purpoſe. For, I will not inſiſt either upon Robert Bloet, from whom King William Rufus wrung 50000. pounds, for ſecuring his title in the very City of Lincolne it ſelfe, which was found defective: nor upon that prodigall and profuſe Alexander, who in exceeding ſtately buildings was ſo exceſſively delighted: ne yet upon Hugh the Burgundian Canonized a Saint, whoſe corps King John, with his Nobles and friends about him, to performe (as mine author ſaith) a dutifull ſervice to God and that holy Saint, late Biſhop, carried upon their ſhoulders to his buriall. Howbeit, the memory of two Prelates I muſt needs renew afreſh: the one is Robert Groſthead, a man ſo well ſeene both in literature and in the learned tongues, in that age, as it is incredible: and to uſe the words of one then living, A terrible reprouer of the Pope, an adviſer of his Prince and Soveraigne, a lover of verity, a corrector of Prelates, a director of Prieſts, an inſtructor of the Clergy, a maintainer of Schollers, a Preacher to the people, a diligent ſearcher into the Scriptures, a mallet of the Romaniſts, &c. The other is mine owne Præceptor, whom in all duty I muſt ever love and honour, that right reverend Father Thomas Cooper, who hath notably well deſerved both of all the learned and alſo of the Church, in whoſe Schoole I both confeſſe and rejoice that I received education. The City it ſelfe alſo flouriſhed a long time: being ordained by King Edward the Third for the Staple, as they tearme it, that is, the Mart, of Wooll, Leather, Lead, &c. Which although it hath not been over-laied with any grievous calamities, as being once onely ſet on fire, once alſo beſieged in vaine by King Stephen, who was there vanquiſhed and taken priſoner, forced alſo and won by King Henry the Third, when the rebellious Barons, who had procured Lewis of France to chalenge the Crowne of England, defended it againſt him, without any great dammage; yet incredible it is how much it hath been empaired by little and little, conquered as it were with very age and time: ſo that of fifty Churches which it had ſtanding in our Great-grandfathers daies, there are now remaining ſcarce eighteene. It is remooved, that I may note this alſo, from the Æquator, 53. degrees and 12. ſcruples: and from the Weſt point, 22. degrees and 52. ſcruples.

Highdike. As that Street-way called Highdike goeth on directly from Stanford to Lincolne, ſo from hence Northward it runneth with an high and ſtreight cauſey, (though heere and there it be interrupted) forward for ten miles ſpace to a little Village called the Spittle in the Street, and beyond: By the which as I paſſed, I obſerved moreover, about three miles from Lincolne, another High-port-way alſo, called Ould-ſtreet, to turne out of this High dike Weſtward, carrying a bancke likewiſe evident to be ſeene, which, as I take it, went to AGELOCUM, the next baiting towne, or place of lodging, from LINDUM, in the time of the Romanes. But I will leave theſe, and proceed in the courſe that I have begun.

Witham being now paſt Lincolne, runneth downe not far from Wragbye, a member of the Barony called Truſbut, the title whereof is come by the Barons Roos unto the Mannours now Earles of Rutland. Then approcheth it to the ruines of a famous Abbay in times paſt called Beapdena, commonly Bardney; where Bede writeth, that King Oſwald was Entombed, with a Banner of gold and purple hanged over his Tombe. The writers in the foregoing age, thought it not ſufficient to celebrate the memory of this moſt Chriſtian worthy King Oſwald, unleſſe unto his glorious exploits they ſtitched alſo ridiculous miracles. But that his hand remained heere uncorrupted

A uncorrupted many hundred yeeres after, our Anceſtours have beleeved, and a Poet of good antiquity hath written in this wiſe,

Nullo verme perit, nulla putredine tabet
Dextra viri, nullo conſtringi frigore, nullo
Diſſolvi fervore poteſt; ſed ſemper eodem
Immutata ſtatu perſiſtit, mortua vivit.

The mans right hand by no worme periſht is,
No rottenneſſe doth cauſe it putrifie;
No binding cold can make it ſtarke, ywis,
B Nor melting heat, diſſolve and mollifie;
But alwayes in one ſtate perſiſt it will
Such as it was: though dead, it liveth ſtill.

This Abbay, as writeth Peter of Bloys, being ſometime burnt downe to the ground by the Danes furious outrage, and for many revolutions of yeeres altogether forlorne, that noble and devout Earle of Lincolne Gilbert de Gaunt reedified, and in moſt thankfull affectionate minde aſſigned unto it with many other poſſeſſions, the tithes of all his Manours whereſoever throughout England. Then, is Witham encreaſed with Ban a little River, which out of the midſt of Lindſey runneth downe, firſt by Horne Caſtle, which belonged in C times paſt to * Adeliza of Condie, and was laid even with the ground in the Raigne of Stephen, afterwards became a capitall ſeat of the Barony of Gerard de Rodes, and pertaineth now, as I have heard, to the Biſhop of Carlile: From thence, by Scrivelby, a Manour of the Dimockes who hold it hereditarily devolved upon them from the Marmions, by Sir J. Ludlow, and that by ſervice, (to uſe now the Lawyers words) Of Grand Serjeanty, viz. That whenſoever any King of England is to bee crowned, then the Lord of this Manour, for the time being, or ſome one in his name (if himſelfe bee unable) ſhall come well armed for the warre, mounted upon a good horſe of ſervice, in preſence of the Soveraigne Lord the King upon his Coronation day; and cauſe Proclamation to bee made, that if any man will avouch that the ſaid Soveraigne Lord the King, hath not right to his D Kingdome and Crowne, he will be preſt and ready to defend the right of the King, of his Kingdome, of his Crowne and dignity, with his body, againſt him, and all others whatſoever. Somewhat lower, The Ban at Tatteſhall a little Towne ſtanding in a Mariſh Country, but very commodiouſly, well knowne by reaſon of the Caſtle, built for the moſt part of bricke, and the Barons thereof, runneth into Witham. They write that Eudo and Pinſo two Noblemen of Normandy, loving one another entirely as ſworne brethren, by the liberall gift of King William the Conquerour received many Lordſhips and faire lands in this tract, which they parted ſo, as that Tatteſhall fell to Eudo, which he held by Barony, from whoſe poſterity it came by Dryby and the Bernacks unto Sir Raulph Cromwell, whoſe ſonne bearing the ſame name, and being under King Henry E the Sixth Lord Treaſurer of England, departed out of this world without iſſue: but unto Pinſo fell Eresby, which is not farre off: From whoſe progeny, the inheritance deſcended by the Becks unto the Willoughbeies: unto whom there came alſo an encreaſe both of honour, and alſo of faire Livelods by their wives, not onely from the Uffords Earles of Suffolke; but alſo from the Lords of Welles, who brought with them very faire poſſeſſions and lands of the family de Engain Lords of ancient Nobility, and from the firſt comming in of the Normans of great power in theſe parts. Among theſe Willoughbeis one excelled all the reſt in the Raigne of Henry the Fifth, named Sir Robert Willoughby, who for his martiall proweſſe was created Earle of Vandoſme in France, and from theſe by the mothers ſide deſcended Peregrine Berty, Baron F Willoughby of Eresby, a man for his generous minde and military valour renowned both in France, and the Low-countries. Witham now approching neere unto the Sea, entertaineth out of the North another ſmall nameleſſe River; at the ſpring head whereof ſtandeth Bollingbroke Caſtle, ſituate upon a low ground, and built of a ſoft and crumbling ſtone by William de Romara Earle of Lincolne, taken from Alice Lacey by King

King Edward the Second, becauſe ſhe married againſt his will; and ennobled in that it was the Birth-place of King Henry the Fourth, who thereof was named Henry of Bollingbroke. At which time it beganne to be reckoned among thoſe Honorable Manours, which are termed Honours. And Witham, after it hath received this Riveret, having paſſed through Boſton, as I have ſaid, diſchargeth it ſelfe at length into the German Sea.

Bollingbroke.

From the mouth of Witham the ſhore ſhutteth forth with a mighty ſwelling bent into the German Sea, as farre as to Humber a great Arme of the Sea, being every where ſlaſhed and indented with many ſmall Waſhes and places which the ſalt water breaketh into: and hath but few Townes upon it, becauſe there be few Havens there: and the ſhelves or barres of ſand lie every where anenſt the land. Yet of theſe few Townes which take up this Coaſt, ſome be memorable: and Wainefleet eſpecially, if it were but for this cauſe onely, that it bred William Wainfleet Biſhop of Wincheſter, a worthy Prelat, founder of Mawdlen College in Oxford, a man that ſingularly well deſerved of learning. Then Alford, which for the Mercate is beholden to Lion Lord Welles, who obtained for it this priviledge from King Henry the Sixth. This Family of Welles, was very ancient and honourable: and the laſt of that name had to wife a daughter of King Edward the Fourth, and being by King Henry the Seventh created Vicount Welles, died having no iſſue. But the inheritance, by the Females came to the Willoughbeys, Dimockes, De la Launds, Hoes, and others. More inward are Driby and Ormesby neighbour Townes, which gave ſirnames to two great families in their times; from the Dribyes deſcended the elder Lords Cromwell, now determined, and from Ormesbyes the houſe of Skipwith, ſtill continuing. After this, ye have Louth a little Mercate Towne well frequented, which had the name of Lud a ſmall River, that runneth under Cokerington the capitall place in times paſt of the Barony of Scoteney. And then Grimsby, which our Sabins or conceited perſons dreaming what they liſt, and following their owne fanſies, will have to be ſo called of one Grime a Merchant, who for that hee had brought up a little foundling of the Danes royall blood named Haveloke, when it had beene caſt forth to periſh, or to take his lucke or fortune, is much talked of, together with Haveloke that lucky foſter-childe of his: who having beene firſt a skullen in the Kings kitchin, and afterwards promoted to the marriage of the Kings daughter for his heroicall valour in feates of Armes, and I wot not what, worthy exploits. A narration right well beſeeming and meeteſt for them that take pleaſure to paſſe out the long nights with telling of old wives tales. But the honour and ornament of this place was the right reverend Doctour Whitgift late Archbiſhop of Canterbury, a peereleſſe Prelate for piety and learning in our daies.

Scarce ſix miles from hence, more within the country there ſheweth it ſelfe an ancient Caſtle, which at this day is called Caſtor, in the old Engliſh Saxons Tongue Ðuangcaſtep, and Thong-caſter, in Britiſh Caer Egarry: in both languages it is aptly named ſo of the thing, to wit, of an hide cut into peeces, like as Byrſa, that Caſtle or Citadell of the Carthaginians ſo well knowne. For, our Annales record, that Hengiſt the Saxon, after he had vanquiſhed the Picts and Scots, and received very large poſſeſſions in other places, obtained alſo in this tract of Vortigern, ſo much ground as hee could compaſſe round about with an Oxe hide cut out into very ſmall laners, that we call Thongs, wherein he founded and built this Caſtle. Whence it is that one, who hath written in verſe a Breviary of the Britiſh Hiſtory, turned Virgils verſes in this maner.

But after this, Ankam hath a bridge over it, at Glanford, a ſmall Mercate Towne, which the common people, of the ſaid bridge, ſo commonly call Brigg, that the true name is almoſt quite forgotten. Next unto it, within a Parke I ſaw Kettleby the ſeat of the worſhipfull ancient family of the Tirwhits, Knights, deſcended from Grevil Oxenbridge, and Echingham. Bye what it is.

All this Tract-over at certaine ſeaſons, good God, what ſtore of fowles (to ſay nothing of fiſhes) is heere to be found! I meane not thoſe vulgar birds which in other places are highly eſteemed and beare a great price, as Teales, Quailes, Woodcockes, Pheſants, Partridges, &c. but ſuch as we have no Latine names for, the very delicate Delicate fowles.

C dainties, indeed, of ſervice, meates for the Demigods, and greatly ſought for by theſe that love the tooth ſo well, I meane, Puitts, Godwitts, Knotts, that is to ſay Canutus or Knouts birds, (for, out of Denmarke they are thought to fly thither), Dotterels, ſo named of their dotiſh fooliſhneſſe, which being a kinde of birds as it were of an apiſh kinde, ready to imitate what they ſee done, are caught by candle light according to fowlers geſture: if he put forth an arme, they alſo ſtretch out a wing: ſets he forward his legge, or holdeth up his head, they likewiſe doe theirs: in briefe, what ever the fowler doth, the ſame alſo doth this fooliſh bird untill it bee hidden within the net. But theſe things I leave to their obſervation, who either take pleaſure earneſtly to hunt after Natures workes, or being borne to pamper the belly de-

Knotts. Dotterells.

D light to ſend their eſtates downe the throat.

More Weſtward, the River Trent alſo after he hath ended his long courſe, is received into the Humber, after it hath with his ſandy banke bounded this ſhire from Foſſedike hither; having runne downe firſt not farre from Stow, where Godive the wife of Earle Leofricke built a Monaſtery; which for the low ſite that it hath under the hills, Henry of Huntingdon ſaith to have beene founded Vnder the Promontory of Lincolne: Then, neere unto Knath, now the habitation of Baron Willoughby of Parrham, in times paſt of the family of the Barons Darcy, who had very much encreaſe both in honor and alſo of poſſeſſions by the daughter and heire of the Meinills. This Family of the Darcyes proceeded from another more ancient, to wit, from one whoſe name was Stow.

Knath.

E Norman de Adrecy or Darcy de Nocton, who flouriſhed in high reputation under King Henry the Third; and whoſe ſucceſſours endowed with lands the little Nunnery at Alvingham in this County. But this dignity is as it were extinct, for that the laſt Norman in the right line which is more ancient, left behinde him onely two ſiſters: of which the one was married to Roger Pedwardine, the other to Peter of Limbergh.

Fines 29. E. 3.

Then runneth the Trent downe to Gainesborrow, a towne ennobled by reaſon of the Danes ſhips that lay there at rode, and alſo for the death of Sueve Tiugg-Kege, a Daniſh Tyrant, who after he had robbed and ſpoiled the country, as Matthew of Weſtminſter writeth, being heere ſtabbed to death by an unknowne man, ſuffered due puniſhment at length for his wickedneſſe and villany. Many a yeere after this, it became the Gainesborrow.

F poſſeſſion of Sir William de Valence Earle of Pembroch, who obtained for it of king Edward the Firſt the liberty to keepe a Faire: From which Earle by the Scottiſh Earles of Athol, and the Piercies, deſcended the Barons of Bourough who heere dwelt: concerning whom I have written already in Surry. In this part of the Shire ſtood long ſince the City Sidnaceſter, which affoorded a See to the Biſhops of this Tract, who were

Sidnaceſter.

were called the Biſhops of Lindiſars: But this City is now ſo farre out of all ſight A and knowledge, that together with the name the very ruines alſo ſeeme to have periſhed, for by all my curious enquiry, I could learne nothing of it.

Neither muſt I overpaſſe, that in this Quarter, at Melwood there flouriſhed the family of Saint Paul, corruptly called Sampoll, Knights; which I alwaies thought to have beene of that ancient Caſtilion race of the Earles of Saint Paul in France. But, the Coat-Armour of Luxemburgh, which they beare, implieth that they are come Saint Paul. out of France ſince that the ſaid Caſtilion ſtocke of Saint Paul, was by marriage implanted into that of Luxemburgh, which happened two hundred yeeres ſince or thereabout.

Above this place the Rivers of Trent, Idell and Dane doe ſo diſport themſelves with B
the diviſion of their ſtreames, and Mariſhes cauſed by them and other Springs, as Axelholme. they encloſe within them the River-Iſland of Axelholme, in the Saxon Tongue Eaxalholme, which is a parcell of Lincolne-ſhire. It carryeth in length from South to North ten miles, and in breadth not paſt halfe ſo much. The flat and lower part of it Gals, a ſhrub. toward the Rivers is mariſh ground, and bringeth forth an odoriferous kinde of ſhrub which they tearme Gall. It yeeldeth alſo Pets in the Mores, and dead rootes of firwood which in burning give a ranke ſweet ſavour. There alſo have beene found great and long firre-trees while they digged for Pet, both within the Iſle, and alſo
* without, at Laughton upon Trent banke, the old habitation of the family of D'alauſon, now contractly called Daliſon. The middle parts of this Iſle, where it riſeth gently C with ſome aſcent is fruitefull and fertile, and yeeldeth flax in great aboundance:
Alabaſtrites. alſo the Alabaſter ſtone, and yet the ſame being not very ſolide but brittle, is more meet for pargetting and plaiſter-worke, than for other uſes. The chiefe Towne called in old time Axel, is now named Axey, whence, by putting to the Saxon word Holme, which they uſed for a River-Iſland, the name no doubt was compounded. But ſcarce deſerveth it to bee called a Towne, it is ſo ſcatteringly inhabited: and yet it is able to ſhew the plot of ground where a Caſtle ſtood, that was raſed in the Barons warre, and which belonged to the Mowbraies, who at that time poſſeſſed a great part of the Iſle.

In the yeere 1173. as writeth an old Chronographer, Roger de Mowbray forſaking D
* Henry the Second, in regard of his ſonne whom he had made King with him. his Allegeance to the Elder * King, repaired the Caſtle at Kinard Ferry in the Iſle of Axholme, which had beene of old time deſtroyed. Againſt whom a number of Lincoln-ſhire men making head, when they had paſſed over the water in barges, laid ſiege to the Caſtle, forced the Conſtable thereof and all the ſouldiers to yeeld, and overthrew the ſaid Caſtle. Somewhat higher is Botterwic, the Lord whereof Sir Edmund Sheffeld, King Edward the Sixth created the firſt Baron Sheffeld of Botherwic: who for his country ſpent his life againſt the Rebels in Norfolke, having begotten of Anne Vere the Earle of Oxfords daughter, a ſonne named John, the ſecond Baron, and father to Edmund now Lord Sheffeld, a right honourable Knight of the Garter, Preſident of the Councell eſtabliſhed in the North. But more into the North I ſaw Burton Stather ſtanding upon E the other ſide of Trent, whereof I have hetherto read nothing memorable.

Earles of Lincolne. This Shire glorieth in the Earles which have borne Title thereof. After Egga who flouriſhed in the yeere 710. and Morcar both Saxons, and who were Earles by office, onely, William de Romara a Norman, was the firſt Earle after the Conqueſt, in whoſe roome being dead (for neither his ſonne, whereas he died before his father, nor his
H. 2. grand-child enjoied this title) King Stephen placed Gilbert de Gaunt. After whoſe deceaſe Simon de Saint Lyz, the younger, the ſonne of Earle Simon, (you reade the very words of Robert Monteniis, who lived about that time) Wanting lands, by the gracious gift of King Henry the Second tooke his onely daughter to wife, with her his honour alſo. F
After this Lewis of France, who was by the ſeditious Barons brought into England girt a ſecond Gilbert out of the Family de Gaunt, with the ſword of the Earldome of Lincolne: but when the ſaid Lewis was ſoone after expelled the land, no man acknowledged him for Earle, and himſelfe of his owne accord relinquiſhed that title. Then Raulph the ſixth Earle of Cheſter obtained this honour of King Henry the Third, who

A a little before his death gave unto Hawiſe or Avis his ſiſter (the wife of Robert De Quincy) by Charter, the Earledome of Lincolne, ſo farre forth as appertained unto him, that ſhee might bee Counteſſe thereof: For in this tenour runne the very words of the Charter. She likewiſe beſtowed it upon John de Lacy Conſtable of Cheſter, and the heires whom hee ſhould beget of the body of Margaret her daughter. This John had iſſue Edmund, who dying before his mother left this honour for Henry his ſonne to enjoy, who was the laſt Earle of that line: For when his ſonnes were taken away by untimely death, and he had but one little daughter onely remaining alive named Alice, hee affianced her, being but nine yeeres old, to Thomas the ſonne of Edmund Earle of Lancaſter, with this condition, That if he ſhould fortune to dye without heires of Lib. Monaſter. de Stanlow.
B her body, or if they happened to dye without heires of their bodies, his Caſtles, Lordſhips, &c. ſhould in Remainder come to the heires of Edmund Earle of Lancaſter for ever. But the ſaid Alice had no childe at all by her husband Thomas: But when Thomas her husband was beheaded, ſhee that by her light behaviour had not a little ſteined her good name, tooke Sir Eubul le Strange, with whom ſhe had lived before time too familiarly, for her husband, without the aſſent and privity of her Soveraigne, who being here- 2. Edw. 2.
at highly offended, ſeiſed her poſſeſſions into his owne hands. Yet both Sir Eubul Strange, and Sir Hugh Frene her third husband, are in ſome Records named Earles of Lincolne. After Alice, now very aged, was departed this life without iſſue, Henry Earle of Lancaſter Nephew to Edmund aforeſaid by his ſecond ſonne, entred upon C her large and faire patrimony by vertue of that conveiance (which I ſpake of be- Eſcaet. 1. E. 3. N. 134.
fore) and from that time it accrued to the Houſe of Lancaſter. Howbeit the Kings of England at their pleaſure have beſtowed the name and honour of Earles of Lincolne, as, King Edward the Fourth gave it to Sir John De la Pole: and King Henry the Eighth, to Henry Brandon, both the Sonnes of the Dukes of Suffolke, who both ended this life without Iſſue; the firſt ſlaine in the battaile at Stoke, and the other taken away by the ſweating ſickneſſe. Afterward Queene Elizabeth promoted Edward Baron Clinton Lord high Admirall of England, to the ſaid honour, which his ſonne Henry enjoyeth at this day. See Dukes of Suffolke. Anno 14. Elizabetha.

There are in this Shire Pariſhes much about 630.

NOTTINGHAM-SHIRE.

UPon the West side of Lincolne-shire confineth the County of NOTTINGHAM, in the English Saxon tongue Snottengaham-rcyne, and in English Nottingham-shire, being farre lesse in quantity; limited Northward with York-shire, Westward with Darby-shire, and in some parts with York-shire, and on the South side with Leicester-shire. The South and East part thereof are made more fruitfull by the noble and famous River Trent, with other Riverets resorting unto it. The West part is taken up with the Forest of Shirewood, which stretcheth out a great way. This part because it is sandy, the Inhabitants tearme The Sand, the other, for that it is Clayish, they call the Clay: and so have divided their Country into these two parts.

The River Trent, in the old English Saxon tongue Treonta (which some Antiquaries of small note and account have called Triginta in Latine, for the affinity of the French word Trent that signifieth that number Triginta, that is, thirty) having gone a long journey, so soone as hee is entred into this Shire, and hath (recepto Soure flumine ex agro Leicestrensi, taking in the River Soure from the field of Leicester) runne by Steanford, where I have learned there be many tokens remaining of old antiquity, and peeces of Roman money oftentimes found; and then by Clifton, which hath given both habitation and firname also to the ancient family of the Cliftons, much enriched by one of the heires of Cressy, taketh in from the West the little River Lin, which rising neere unto Newsted, that is, New place, where sometime King Henry the Second founded a small Abbay, and which is now the dwelling house of the ancient Family of the Burons, descended from Ralph de Buron, who at the first comming in of the Normans flourished in great state, both in this Countrey and also in Lancashire; runneth hard by Wallaton rich in veines of cole, where Sir Francis Willoughby a Knight nobly descended from the Greis Marquesse Dorset, in our daies built out of the ground with great charges (upon a vaine ostentation of his wealth) a stately house with artificiall workemanship, standing bleakely, but offering a very goodly prospect to the beholders farre and neere.

The river Trent. Lin a riveret. Byron. Wollaton.

Then runneth it by Linton or Leuton, much frequented and famous in old time for the Abbay there of the Holy Trinity, founded by William Peverell, the base sonne of King William the Conquerour; but now all the fame is onely for a Faire there kept. Where, on the other banke at the very meeting well neere of Lin and Trent, the principall Towne that hath given name unto the Shire is seated upon the side of an hill now called Nottingham, (by softning the old name a little) for Snottengaham; for, so the English Saxons named it of certaine caves and passages under the ground, which in old time they hewed and wrought hollow under those huge and steepe cliffes, which are on the South side hanging over the little River Lin, for places of receit and refuge, yea and for habitations. And thereupon Asserius interpreteth this Saxon word Snottengaham in Latine Speluncarum domum, that is, An house of Dennes or Caves, and in the British Tui ogo hanc, which signifieth the very selfe same. The Towne for the naturall site thereof is right pleasant: as where, on the one hand lye faire and large Medowes by the Rivers side, on the other, rise hils with a gentle and easie ascent: and is plentifully provided of all things beside, necessary for mans life. On the one side Shirewood yeeldeth store of wood to maintaine fire, although many use for that purpose stinking pit cole digged forth of the ground: on the other, Trent serveth it aboundantly with fish. And hence hath beene taken up this od barbarous Verse, Lenton. Nottingham.

*Limpida sylva focum, * Triginta dat mihi piscem.* *Trent.

Shire-wood yeelds me fuell for fire,
As Trent yeelds fish, what I require.

At a word, for largeneſſe, for building, for three faire Churches, a paſſing ſpacious and beautifull Mercat place, and a moſt ſtrong Caſtle, it maketh a goodly ſhew. The ſaid Caſtle is mounted upon an huge and ſteepe worke on the Weſt ſide of the City, in which place it is thought that Caſtle ſtood in times paſt upon whoſe ſtrength the Danes preſuming held out againſt the Siege of Æthered and Ælfrid ſo long, untill they fruſtrate of their purpoſe brake up their Siege, truſſed up bagge and baggage and diſlodged. For when the Danes had taken this Caſtle, Burthred King of the Mercians (as mine Authour Aſſerius writeth) and the Mercians, addreſſe their meſſengers to Æthered King of the Weſt Saxons, and to Ælfred his brother, humbly beſeeching them to come and aide them, that ſo they might give battaile to the fore-named Army, which requeſt they alſo eaſily obtained. For, thoſe two brethren ſlacking no whit their promiſe, having levied from all parts a mighty Army, aſſembled their forces, entred Mercia, and ſeeking with one accord jointly to encounter the enemy, come as farre as to Snottenga-ham. And when the Painims keeping themſelves within the defenſe of the Caſtle refuſed to give battaile, and the Chriſtians with all their force could not batter the Wall, after peace concluded betweene the Paganes and Mercians, thoſe two brethren with their bands returned home. But after this, King Edward the elder, built the Village Bridgeford juſt over againſt it, and compaſſed the Towne about with a wall, which now is fallen downe; and yet the remaines thereof I have ſeene on the South ſide. And within very few yeeres after, in King Edward the Confeſſours time, as wee reade in Domeſday booke, there were numbered in it one hundred and ſeventy three Burgeſſes, and from the two Minters, there were paid forty ſhillings to the King. Alſo the water of Trent, the Foſſe dike, and the way toward Yorke were warded and kept, that if any man hindered the paſſage of veſſels, he was to make amends with the payment of foure pounds.

As for the Caſtle which now wee ſee, it may bee well of great name in regard both of the Founder, and the worthineſſe alſo of the worke: for William of Normandy built it to bridle the Engliſh; and ſo ſtrong it was, as William of Newborough writeth, as well by naturall ſituation as hand-labour, that it is held impregnable (if it may have ſufficient men to defend it) unleſſe it bee by famine. Afterward alſo King Edward the Fourth beſtowed great coſt in the repairing of it, and beautified it with faire buildings: whereto King Richard alſo the Third ſet to his helping hand. Neither for all the changes and alterations of times, hath it undergone the common condition or deſtiny incident to ſuch great Caſtles, being never forced and wonne by aſſault. Once was it in vaine beſieged by Henry of Anjou, at which time the ſouldiers lying in Gariſon ſet fire upon the buildings joyning unto it. Once alſo it was ſuddenly ſurpriſed by Earle Robert de Ferrarijs in the Barons warre, who ſpoiled the Inhabitants of all their goods. The Caſtellanes report many ſtories of David King of the Scots priſoner in it, and of Roger Mortimer Earle of March, taken heere in a hollow ſecret paſſage under the ground, who becauſe he priſed his faith and loyalty to his country lighter than Scotiſh gold, and with a vaſte minde deſigned other miſchiefes, was afterwards hanged. Certes, in the firſt baſe Court of the Caſtle wee went downe by many ſteps or ſtaires with candle light into a Vault under the ground and certaine cloſe roomes wrought out of the very rocke, in the walles whereof are engraven the ſtories of Chriſts Paſſion and other things, by the hand (as they ſay) of David the Second, king of Scots, who was there impriſoned. But in the upper part of the Caſtle which riſeth up aloft upon a rocke, we came alſo by many ſtaires into another Cave likewiſe under the ground, which they call Mortimers Hole, for that in it the foreſaid Roger Mortimer lay hidden, when as being guilty to himſelfe of wickedneſſe he ſtood in feare of his life.

1175. Rog. Hoveden. Pag. 307.

Mortimers hole.

As for the poſition of Nottingham, it ſeeth the North Pole elevated fifty three Degrees, and hath the Meridian two and twenty Degrees and foureteene minutes diſtant from the utmoſt point of the Weſt, whence Geographers beginne to meaſure the Longitude.

Pier pount. * De Petræ ponte.

From hence the Trent runneth with a milde ſtreame and paſſeth forward by Holme, called of the Lords thereof Holme * Pierpount, whoſe Family is both ancient and noble,

A noble, and out of which Robert Pierpount was ſummoned by King Edward the Third unto the high Court of Parliament, among the Barons of the Kingdome; unto Shelford where Ralph Hanſelin founded a Priory, and the Lords Bardolph had a manſion, but now the ſeat of the worſhipfull ſtocke of the Stanhopes, knights; whoſe ſtate in this Tract hath growne great and their name renowned ſince they matched with an heire of Mallovell. From whence he runneth downe with a rolling ſtreame to Stoke, a little Village, but well knowne for no ſmall overthrow and ſlaughter that there happened: when Sir John de la pole Earle of Lincolne, who being by King Richard the Third declared heire apparent to the Crowne, ſeeing by the comming of king Henry the Seventh himſelfe debarred of the hope of the Kingdome, heere in B behalfe of a counterfeit Prince rebelliouſly oppoſed himſelfe againſt a lawfull king, and ſo reſolutely with his friends and followers loſt his life. Not farre from hence is Thurgarton where Sir Ralph D'eincourt founded a Priory, and ſomewhat higher Southwell ſheweth it ſelfe aloft, with a Collegiat Church of Prebendaries conſecrated to the bleſſed Virgin Mary, a place not very faire in outward ſhew, I muſt needs ſay, but ſtrong, ancient, and of great fame. Which, as they write, Paulinus the Firſt Archbiſhop of Yorke founded, after he had baptiſed the Inhabitants of this Shire in the River Trent, and ſo regenerated them to Chriſt. Since which time, the Archbiſhops of Yorke have had here a very faire and ſtately Palace and three Parkes ſtored with Deere adjoyning thereto. That this is the City which Bede calleth Tio-vul-
C Finga-ceſter, I doe the more ſtedfaſtly beleeve, becauſe thoſe things which he hath reported of Paulinus baptizing in the Trent neere unto Tio-vul-Finga-ceſter, the private Hiſtory of this Church conſtantly avoucheth to have beene done in this very place. From thence out of the Eaſt, Snite a little Brooke runneth into Trent, which being but ſmall and ſhallow watereth Langer, a place of name in regard of the Tibetots or Tiptofts Lords thereof, who afterwards became Earles of Worceſter: alſo Wiverton, which from Heriz a worſhipfull man long ſince in theſe parts, came by the Brets and Caltoſtes unto the Chaworthes, who fetch their name out of the * Cadurci in France, and derive their pedegree from the Lord of Walchervill.

Now doth Trent divide it ſelfe, neere Averham or Aram an ancient habitation of D the Suttons Gentlemen of reſpective worth, and runneth hard under a good great Towne called Newark, as one would ſay, The new worke, of the new Caſtle, which Caſtle ſo freſh and of ſo beautifull building, as Henry of Huntingdon termeth it, Alexander that bountifull minded Biſhop of Lincolne built: which Prelate, that I may uſe the words of an ancient Hiſtorian, carrying a moſt brave and gallant minde, builded both this Caſtle and another alſo with moſt profuſe and laviſh expenſe. And becauſe ſuch manner of ſumptuous buildings little became the gravity and dignity of a Biſhop, he to take away the envie and hard conceit of the world for ſuch building, and to expiate, as it were, the offence that grew thereby, founded as many Monaſteries and filled them with religious Brethren. Nevertheleſſe, this vaine prodigality and laviſh ſpending that was in a military Biſhop, E was purſued afterwards with condigne puniſhment. For, King Stephen, who laboured nothing more than to eſtabliſh his tottering eſtate in his Kingdome by ſeizing into his hands all the ſtrongeſt holds thereof, brought this Prelate, what with hard impriſoning, and, in a ſort, with famiſhing him, to that paſſe, that will'd hee nill'd he, at length hee yeelded up unto him both this Caſtle, and that other at Sleford in Lincolne-ſhire. Neither is there any other memorable matter heere to be related, but that King John finiſhed in this place the moſt wearieſome courſe of his troubleſome life; and King Edward the Sixth incorporated it of one Alderman, and twelve Aſſiſtants. From hence the River gathering himſelfe againe into one Chanell, run-
F neth directly Northward, beſet on both ſides with Villages; neither affoordeth it any matter worth remembrance before it come to Littleborrough, a little Towne in deed and truely anſwering to the name, where, as there is at this day a Ferry much uſed, ſo there was in times paſt that Station, whereof Antonine the Emperour once or twice made mention, and which according to ſundry Copies is called AGELOCUM or SEGELOCUM.

but now I am verily perſwaded and aſſured that I have found it out, both for that it ſtandeth upon the old Port High-way, and alſo becauſe the field lying to it ſheweth tiquity hath beene very notable, being deſcended from one of the heires of Creſſy, and formerly from an heire of Lexinton, as I lately ſhewed. The greateſt ornament of this Family was Sir John Markham, who ſitting Lord chiefe Juſtice of England, F guided the helme of Juſtice with ſo even an hand and ſo great equity (a thing that I would have you to reade in the Engliſh Hiſtories) that his honour and glory ſhall never periſh. Six miles from it Weſtward, is Workenſop, a Towne well knowne for

Earle

A Earle of Shrewsburies Houſe which within our remembrance George Talbot Earle of Shrewsbury built with that magnificence, as beſeemeth ſo great an Earle, and yet ſuch as was not to be envied. This Workenſop from the Lovetoſts firſt Lords thereof, under the Normans Raigne, deſcended by the Furnivalles and Nevil, unto the L. Talbots with a very goodly inheritance. Of which Lovetoſts, G. Lovetoſt in the time of King Henry the Firſt, founded here an Abbay, the ruines whereof I have ſeen toward the Eaſt ſide of the Towne, amidſt moſt pleaſant and plentifull paſtures: and the Weſt part of the Church ſtandeth ſtill paſſing faire to be ſeene with two towre ſteeples. A little higher upon the ſame River I ſaw Blithe a famous Mercate Towne, which Bulley or Buſly, a Noble man of the Normans blood, fortified with a Caſtle: but now the very rubbiſh thereof is hardly to bee ſeene, time ſo conſumeth all things. But the Abbay there, was founded by Roger Buſly and Foulke De Liſieurs: and this is the fartheſt Towne almoſt in Nottingham-ſhire, Northward, unleſſe it bee Scroby a little Towne of the Archbiſhops of Yorke, ſituate in the very confines and frontiers of York-ſhire.

William ſirnamed the Conquerour appointed over this Shire William Peverell his baſe ſonne, not with the Title of Earle, but of Lord of Nottingham: who had a ſonne that dyed before his father, and hee likewiſe had a ſonne of the ſame name, whom king Henry the Second diſinherited, for that he went about to poiſon Ranulph Earle of Cheſter. Much about this time Robert de Ferrarijs, who rifled and ranſacked Nottingham, in a Donation which he made unto the Church of Tuttesbury, ſtiled himſelfe thus, Robertus Comes junior de Nottingham, that is, Robert the younger Earle of Nottingham. But afterwards King Richard the Firſt gave and confirmed unto his brother John the Earledome and Caſtle of Nottingham with all the Honour of Peverell. Many yeeres after, King Richard the Second honoured John Lord Mowbray with this Title of Earle of Nottingham; who dying a young man without iſſue, his brother Thomas ſucceeded after him: He being by king Richard the Second created Earle Mareſhall and Duke of Norfolke, and ſoone after baniſhed, begat Thomas Earle Mareſhall, whom king Henry the Fourth beheaded; and John Mowbray, who, as alſo his ſonne and Nephew, were likewiſe Dukes of Norfolke and Earles of Nottingham. But when as their male iſſue failed, and that Richard the young ſonne of King Edward the Fourth, being Duke of Yorke had borne this Title with others by his Wife the heire of the Mowbraies, but a ſmall while, King Richard the Third honoured William Vicount Barkley deſcended from the Mowbraies with this Title of Earle of Nottingham: and whereas hee dyed without iſſue, king Henry the Eighth beſtowed the ſame honour upon his illegitimate ſonne H. Fitz Roy, when hee created him Duke of Richmond; but hee departed this life in the flower of his age, leaving no childe. Afterward this Title lay extinct, untill in the yeere of our Lord 1597. Queene Elizabeth by ſolemne inveſtiture adorned therewith Charles Lord Howard of Effingham, and High Admirall of England, deſcended from the Mowbraies, in regard of his ſervice (as appeareth in the Charter of his Creation) right valiantly and faithfully performed againſt the Spaniſh Armado in the yeere 1588. as alſo at the winning of Caliz in Spaine, where he was Lord Generall of the forces by ſea, like as the Earle of Eſſex, of thoſe by land.

DARBY-SHIRE.

DARBY-SHIRE, called in old Engliſh-Saxon Deorbỹ-ſcire, lieth cloſe to Nottingham-ſhire Weſtward, confining with Leiceſter-ſhire upon the Southſide, like as with Stafford-ſhire on the Weſt, and York-ſhire in the North, reſembling, as it were, the forme of a Triangle, but not with equall ſides. For, whereas about the point of it lying Southward it is ſcarce ſixe miles broad, it ſo enlargeth and ſpreadeth it ſelfe on both ſides, that where it looketh into the North it carrieth much about thirty miles in breadth. The River Derwent, that runneth along the middeſt of it, divideth it after a ſort in two parts, which River breaking out of the North limit thereof and taking his courſe Southward, ſometimes with his blacke waters ſtained with the Soile and earth that it paſſeth by, rumbleth downe apace into the Trent: For, Trent overthwarteth the ſaid narrow point, that I ſpake of, lying Southward. The Eaſt ſide and the South parts are well manured, not unfruitfull, and beſides, well ſtored with Parkes; The Weſt part beyond Derwent which they call the Peake being all of it hilly, or a ſtony and craggy ground, is more barraine: howbeit rich in lead, iron, and coles, which it yeeldeth plentifully, and alſo feedeth Sheepe very commodiouſly.

In the South corner the firſt place worth the naming that offereth it ſelfe to ſight, is Greiſely Caſtle, more than broken downe, which together with a little Monaſtery was founded in times paſt in honour of Saint George, by the Greiſeleies Lords thereof, who fetching their deſcent from William the ſonne of Sir Niele of Grieſeley, about the very Conqueſt of England by the Normans, have flouriſhed unto theſe dayes in great worſhip, the which they have not a little augmented long ſince by marrying with the daughter and heire of the ancient family of Gaſteneys. Upon the River Dove, which untill it entreth into Trent divideth this Country from Stafford-ſhire, we meet with nothing in this Shire but ſmall country Villages, and Aſhburne a Mercate towne, where the houſe of the Cokains flouriſhed a long time; and Norbury, where the right ancient family of the Fitz-Herberts have long inhabited: out of which, Sir Anthony Fitz-Herbert hath deſerved paſſing well of the knowledge and profeſſion of our Commons law: Not farre from which is Shirley an ancient Lordſhip of the well renowned Family of the Shirleys, who derive their pedegree from one Fulcher: unto whom, beſide the antiquity of their houſe, much honor and faire lands have accrued by marriage with the heires of the Breoſes, the Baſſets of Brailesford, the Stantons, Lovets, &c. And heere ſtand round about many places which have given name and Habitation to worſhipfull Families: as Longford, Bradburne, Kniveton, from whence came thoſe Knivetons of Mercaſton and Bradley: of which houſe Saint Lo Kniveton is one, to whoſe judicious and ſtudious diligence I am deeply endebted: alſo Ketdelſton, where the Curſons dwelt, as alſo at Crokhall. But whether Sir Robert Curſon knighted by King Henry the Seventh, made a Baron of the Empire by Maximilian the Emperour in the yeere 1500. for his ſingular valour, and thereupon by King Henry the Eigth made a Baron of England with a liberall penſion aſſigned, was deſcended from theſe Curſons, I dare not affirme. Heereby is Radborn, where Sir John Chandos knight, Lord of the place, laid a goodly foundation of a great and ſtately houſe: from whom by a daughter it came by hereditary ſucceſſion unto the Poles, who dwell heere at this day. But theſe particularities I leave for him who hath undertaken the full deſcription of this Shire.

Greiſly Caſtle. The family of the Greiſleys.

The family of the Shirleys.

Baron Curſon.

But upon Trent, ſo ſoon as ever he hath taken to him the river Dove, is Repandunum to bee ſeene, for ſo doe our Hiſtory-writers call it, the Saxons named it Hpeþanðun, and we at this day Repton, which from a great and faire Towne is become a poore ſmall Village. For, in old time very famous it was, by reaſon both of the buriall of Repton.

Æthelbald

Æthelbald that good King of the Mercians, who through the treachery of his owne people loſt his life, and of the other Kings of Mercia: as alſo for the unfortunate calamity of Burthred the laſt King of the Mercians, who when hee had enjoyed his kingdome partly by way of entreaty and partly by meanes of bribery, full twenty yeeres, was heere deprived of his kingdome by the Danes, or rather freed and exempted from the glittering miſery of princely State, and ſo became an example to teach men in how tickliſh and ſlippery a place they ſtand which are underpropped onely with money. Then not farre from Trent is Melborn a Caſtle of the Kings now decaying, wherein John Duke of Burbon taken priſoner in the battaile of Agincourt was detained nineteene yeeres under the cuſtody of Sir Nicholas Montgomery the younger. Scarce five miles hence Northward, the River Derwent hath his walke, who in the utmoſt limit, as I ſaid before, of this Shire Northward deriving his head out of the Peak hils, being one while ſtreitned betweene crags, and ſometimes another while watering and cheriſhing the freſh greene medowes, by moſſie and moriſh grounds holdeth on his courſe for thirty miles or thereabout directly, as it were, into the South. Howbeit in ſo long a courſe hee paſſeth by nothing worth looking on, except Chatteſworth, a very large, faire and ſtately houſe, which Sir William Candiſh, or Cavendiſh deſcended out of that ancient houſe of Gernon in Suffolke, beganne, and which his Wife Elizabeth, and after Counteſſe of Shrewesbury, hath of late with great charges fully finiſhed.

King Burthred.

But where Derwent turneth ſomewhat Eaſtward, when it is once paſt Little Cheſter, that is, Little City, where old peeces of Roman money are often times gotten out of the ground, Darby ſheweth it ſelfe, in the Engliſh-Saxon Tongue named Nopꝺwopꝺhig, and by the Danes (as Athelward that ancient Writer witneſſeth) Deoraby, the chiefe Towne of all this Shire: which name, being taken from the River Derwent and contracted from Derwentby, it hath beſtowed upon the whole County. A proper Towne it is, none of the leaſt, not without good trade and reſort unto it. On the Eaſt ſide of it, the River Derwent making a very faire ſhew, runneth downe carrying a full and lofty ſtreame under a beautifull ſtone Bridge, upon which our devout forefathers erected a faire Chappell, which now is neglected and goeth to decay: Through the South part thereof runneth a prety cleere Riveret which they call Mertenbrooke. Five Churches there be in it: Of which the greateſt named All Hallowes, dedicated to the memory of All-Saints, hath a Towre Steeple that for height and ſingular fine Workemanſhip excelleth. In which Church, the Counteſſe of Shrewesbury, of whom erewhile I ſpake, truſting her ſelfe better than her heires, providently erected a Sepulture for her ſelfe, and as religiouſly founded an Hoſpitall hard by, for the maintenance of twelve poore folke, eight men and foure women.

Memorable in old time was this place, becauſe it had beene a lurking hole and a Rendevous for the Danes, untill Ethelfleda that victorious Lady of the Mercians, by a ſuddaine forceable ſurpriſe, made a ſlaughter of the Danes and became Miſtreſſe of it. In the time of King Edward the Confeſſour, as wee finde in Domeſday booke, it had 143. Burgeſſes, whoſe number notwithſtanding decreaſed ſo, that in William the Conquerours Raigne there remained onely an hundred: And theſe paid unto the King at the feaſt of Saint Martin 12.* Trabes of Corne. But now all the name and credit that it hath, ariſeth of the Aſſiſſes there kept for the whole ſhire, and by the beſt nappy ale, that is brewed there: a drinke ſo called, of the Daniſh word Oela ſomewhat wreſted, and not of Alica, as Ruellius deriveth it: the Britans termed it by an old word Kwrw, in ſteade whereof Curmi is read amiſſe in Dioſcorides; where hee ſaith, that the Hiberi (perchance he would have ſaid Hiberni, that is, The Iriſhmen) in lieu of wine uſe Curmi, a kinde of drinke made of Barly. For, this is that Barly-wine of ours, which Julian the Emperour, that Apoſtata, calleth merrily in an Epigramme, Πυγγαῖον, ἀβρότου βρῶμα. This is the ancient and peculiar drinke of the Engliſhmen and Britans, yea and the ſame very wholſome, howſoever Henry of Aurenches the Norman, Arch-poet to King Henry the Third, did in his pleaſant wit merrily jeſt upon it in theſe Verſes,

* Thraves of corne, as it ſhould ſeeme.

Ale.

Cerviſia in latine, Curmi in Dioſcorides: Ale in Engliſh, of Oel, a Daniſh word.

Neſcio

A Nescio quod Stygia monstrum conforme paludi, Cervisiam plerique vocant: nil spissius illa
Dum bibitur, nil clarius est dum mingitur, unde
Constat, quòd multas faces in ventre relinquit.
Of this strange drinke, so like to Stygian lake, (Most tearme it Ale) I wote not what to make:
Folke drinke it thicke, and pisse it passing thin,
Much dregges therefore must needs remaine within.

B Howbeit, Turnebus that most learned Frenchman maketh no doubt, but that men using to drinke heereof, if they could avoid surfetting, would live longer than those that drinke wine: and that from hence it is, that many of us drinking Ale live an hundred yeeres. And yet Asclepiades in Plutarch ascribeth this long life to the coldnesse of the aire, which keepeth in and preserveth the naturall heat in bodies, when he made report, that the Britans lived untill they were an hundred and twenty yeeres old. Turnebus de Vino.

But the wealth of this Towne consisteth much in buying of corne and selling it againe to the mountaines: for all the Inhabitants be as it were a kinde of huckslers, or badgers. Not farre from hence doth Derwent carry his streame, where by Elvaston Sir Raulph Montjoye had lands, in the time of Edward the First: from whence came Barons Montjoye.

C Sir Walter Blunt, whom King Edward the Fourth advanced to the honour of Baron Montjoye with a pension: whose posterity have equalled the nobility of their birth with the ornaments of learning: and principally among them, Charles, late Earle of Devonshire, Baron Montjoy, Lord Lieutenant Generall of Ireland, and Knight of the Order of the Garter. Beneath this Elvaston, Derwent disburdeneth himselfe into the chanell of Trent, which within a while admitteth into it the River Erewash, that in this part serveth as a limit to divide this country from Nottingham-shire. Neere unto this River standeth Riseley, a possession of the Willoughbeies: of which family was that Sir Hugh Willoughby, as I have heard say, who whiles hee endevoured to discover the Frozen Sea neere unto Wardhous in Scandia, was frozen to death together with his company,

D in the same ship. Hard by it also is Sandiacre, or as others will have it, Sainct Diacre, the seat of the Family of the Greies of Sandiacre: whose inheritance Sir Edward Hilary in right of his wife was first possessed of; and whose sonne became adopted into the name of the Greies: and a few yeeres after, the one of his daughters and heires wedded to Sir John Leake, and the other to John Welsh. Greies of Sandiacre.

On the East side of this Shire there follow in order Northward these places, Codenor in old time Coutenoure Castle, which belonged to the Barons Grey, called thereupon Lords Grey of Codenor; whose inheritance in the foregoing age came to the Zouches by the marriage that Sir John de la Zouch the second sonne of William Lord de la Zouch of Haringworth, contracted with Elizabeth the heire of Henry Grey the Codenor Castle. Barons Grey of Codenor.

E last Lord of Codenor. Then, Winfeld, a very great and goodly Manour, where Raulph Lord Cromwell in the Raigne of Henry the Sixth built a sumptuous and stately house, for those daies. After it, you see Alffreton, which men thinke to have beene built by Alfreton. King Alfred, and of him to have taken that name: which Towne had also Lords, entituled therupon, de Alfreton: of whom the second named Robert, the sonne of Raulph, built in the most remote angle and nouke of this shire the little Abbay De Bello capite, commonly called Beau-chiefe; but a few yeeres after for default of heires males the Family of Chaworth and the Lathams in Lancashire possessed their inheritance, by two daughters. These bare for their Armes, Two Cheverons, as they tearme them, Or, in a Shield Azur: which very same Coat the Musards, that is, The doubters The Barons of Alfreton coat of Armes.

F and delaiers who were called Barons of Staveley in this County, changing the colours onely gave, who during the Raigne of King Edward the First had an end in Sir Nicholas Musard: and his eldest sister was married to Ancher Freschevill, whose posterity flourisheth heere still at this day. Higher yet in the very East frontier of this County, upon a rough and a craggy Soile standeth Hardwic, which gave name to a Family in Staveley. Freshwell commonly.

which poſſeſſed the ſame: out of which deſcended Lady Elizabeth Counteſſe of Shrewesbury, who beganne to build there two goodly houſes joyning in manner one to the other, which by reaſon of their lofty ſituation ſhew themſelves, a farre off to be ſeene, and yeeld a very goodly proſpect. This now giveth the Title of Baron to Sir William Cavendiſh her ſecond ſonne, whom King James of late hath honoured with the honour of Baron Cavendiſh of Hardwic.

Baron Cavendiſh.

Cheſter-field in Scardale.

More inward in the Country, is ſeated Cheſter-field in Scardale, that is, in a Dale compaſſed in with cragges and rockes: For, ſuch rockes the Engliſhmen were wont to tearme Scarres. Both the new name it ſelfe, and the ruines of the old Walles doe proove, that this Cheſter-field was of good antiquity: but the ancient name thereof is by continuance of time worne out and quite loſt. King John made it a free Burrough when he gave it to William Briewer his eſpeciall favourite. In Writers it is famous only by occaſion of the warre betwixt King Henry the Third and his Barons, wherein Robert Ferrars the laſt Earle of Darby of that name, being taken priſoner and deprived of his honour by authority of the Parliament, lived afterwards as a private man; and his poſterity flouriſhed with the Title onely of Barons. Hard to this Cheſter-field Weſtward lyeth Walton, which from the Bretons came hereditarily by Loudham to the Folliambs men of great name in this Tract: and Eaſtward Sutton, where the Leaks held a long time a worſhipfull port, in Knights degree.

Walton. Sutton.

A little from hence is Bolſover an ancient Caſtle, ſituate ſomewhat with the higheſt: which belonged to the Haſtings Lords of Abergavenney, in right of exchange with King Henry the Third: who being altogether unwilling that the Earledome of Cheſter, unto whom this Caſtle had appertained, ſhould bee divided and beſtowed among diſtaves, aſſigned here and there other poſſeſſions unto the ſiſters of John Scot the laſt Earle.

The Weſt part beyond Derwent, which throughout riſeth high and peaketh up with hils and mountaines, whence in old time it was called in the old Engliſh tongue Peac-lond, and is at this day, haply for that cauſe, named the Peake (for, that word among us ſignifieth to appeare aloft) is ſevered from Stafford-ſhire by the Dove a moſt ſwift and cleere River, of which I ſhall ſpeake hereafter. This part although in ſome place it hath craggy, rough and bare ſcarres, and cragges; yet by reaſon that under the upper cruſt of the earth there is limeſtone which ſupplyeth a barling fruitfull ſlugh, or humour, there be in it greene graſſie hils and vales, which bring forth full oates, and feed ſafely both droves of greater beaſts, and alſo many flockes of ſheepe: For, there is no more danger now from Wolves which in times paſt were hurtfull and noiſome to this Country; and for the chaſing away and taking of which ſome there were that held lands heere at Wormehill, who thereupon were ſirnamed Wolvehunt, as appeareth plainely in the Records of the Kingdome: But ſo plentifull it is of lead, that the Alchymiſts, who condemne the Planets as convict of ſome crime unto the metall mines, have upon a ridiculous errour written, that Saturne, whom they make the Lord and Dominatour of lead, is liberally affected to England, in granting lead; but diſpleaſed with France, to which he hath denied the ſame. And verily, I thinke that Pliny ſpake of this Country when hee ſaid this, In Britaine in the very cruſt of the ground, without any deepe mining, is gotten ſo great ſtore of lead, that there is a law expreſſely made of purpoſe, forbidding men to make more than to a certaine ſtint. For, in theſe mountaines, fertile lead ſtones are daily digged up in great aboundance, which upon the hill tops lying open to the Weſt winde, neere unto Creach and Workeſ-Worth (which heereupon tooke name of the lead-workes) when the Weſterne winde beginnes to blow (which winde of all others they have by experience found to hold longeſt) they melt with mighty great fires of wood into lead, in troughes or trenches wich they digge of purpoſe for it to runne into, and ſo make it up into Sowes. Neither onely lead, but Stibium alſo called in the Apothecaries ſhops Antimonium, is heere found by it ſelfe in veines: which minerall the women of Greece uſed in old time to colour their eye-browes with, whereupon the Poet Ion, in Greeke tearmeth it ἀμιλτογενον. Milſtones likewiſe are heere hewed out, as alſo grindle-

Beſides Workes-worth, lately mentioned, we meet with never another place worth the remembrance, unleſſe it be Haddon by the River Wie, the ſeat for many yeeres together of the Vernons, who as they were very ancient ſo they became no leſſe renowned in theſe parts, in ſo much as Sir George Vernon knight, who lived in our time, for his magnificent port that hee carried, the open houſe that hee kept, and his commendable hoſpitality, gat the name among the multitude of a Pety King in the Peake. By Vernon.

B his Daughters and heires a goodly and great Inheritance was transferred unto Sir John Mannours ſonne of Thomas Earle of Rutland, and to Sir Thomas Stanley ſonne of Edward Earle of Darby. There adjoyneth unto this, Bakewell upon the ſame Riveret, which among theſe hils maketh it ſelfe way into Derwent. This was by the Saxons called Baddecanwell: And Marianus writeth, that King Edward the Elder erected there a Burrough. Now whether it borrowed this name or no of the hote waters, which the ancient Engliſhmen, as alſo the Germans in their language tearmed Bade and Baden, whence came Baden in Germany and Buda in Hungary, I know not. Certes, at the ſpring-head of Wie not farre from hence, there riſe and walme up nine fountaines of hote waters, the place at this day is called Buxton well: which Buxton.

C being found by experience holſome for the ſtomach, ſinewes, and the whole body, George Earle of Shrewesbury lately beautified with buildings, and ſo they are begunne againe to bee reſorted unto, by concourſe of the greateſt Gentlemen and of the Nobility. At which time that moſt unfortunate Lady, Mary Queene of Scots bad farewell unto Buxton with this Diſtichon, by a little change of Cæſars Verſes concerning Feltria, in this wiſe:

Buxtona quæ calidæ celebrabere nomine lymphæ,
Fortè mihi poſthac non adeunda, vale.
Buxton, that of great name ſhalt be, for hote and holſome baine,
D Farewell, for I perhaps ſhall not thee ever ſee againe.

But that theſe hote waters were knowne in old time, The Port-way or High paved Street named Bath-gate, reaching for ſeven miles together from hence unto Burgh a little Village doth manifeſtly ſhew. Neere unto this Burgh there ſtandeth upon the top of an hill an old Caſtle ſometimes belonging to the Peverels, called The Caſtle in the Peake, and in Latin De Alto Pecco, which King Edward the Third together with 46. Notwithſtanding, by reaſon of theſe and ſuch like fables, this Hole is reckoned for one of the wonders of England: neither are there wanting the like tales of another Cave, but eſpecially of Devils Arſe in Peake.

But all the memorable matters in this high and rough ſtony little Country, one hath compriſed in theſe foure Verſes.

To theſe Wonders may be added a wonderfull Well in the Peake Foreſt not farre from Buxtons which ordinarily ebbeth and floweth foure times in the ſpace of one houre or thereabout, keeping his juſt Tides: and I know not whether Tideſwell a Mercate Towne heereby hath his name thereof.

Lords and Earles of Darby. Simon Dunelm. Hovenden. Matthew Paris. 204.

The Peverels who I have ſaid before were Lords of Nottingham are alſo reported to have beene Lords of Darby. Afterward King Richard the Firſt, gave and confirmed unto his brother John the Counties and Caſtles of Nottingham, Lancaſter, Darby, &c. with the honours thereto belonging, with the honour alſo of Peverell. After him theſe were Earles of Derby out of the family of Ferrars (ſo far as I am able to gather out of the Regiſters of Tutbury, Merivall, and Burton Monaſteries) William Ferrars, ſonne to the Daughter and heire of Peverell, whom King John with his owne hand, (as we finde in an ancient Charter) inveſted Earle of Darby: William his ſonne who bruiſed with a fall out of his Coach died in the yeere 1254. And this Williams ſonne, Robert; who in the Civill Warre loſt this Title and a great eſtate by forfeiture, in ſuch ſort as that none of his poſterity, although they lived in great port and reputation, were ever reſtored to that honor againe: But moſt of this Roberts poſſeſſions K. Henry the Third paſſed over unto Edmund his owne younger ſon: and King Edward the Third (I write out of the very originall Record) by authority and adviſe of the Parliament, ordained Henry of Lancaſter, the ſonne of Henry Earle of Lancaſter, Earle of Darby, to him and his heires, and withall aſſigned unto him a thouſand markes yeerely during the life of his father Henry Earle of Lancaſter. From that time this Title was united to the line of Lancaſter, untill King Henry the Seventh, beſtowed the ſame upon Thomas Lord Stanley, who before had wedded Margaret the Kings mother, to him and the heires males of his body. He had for his ſucceſſour his Grandſonne Thomas begotten by George his ſonne of Ioan the heire of the Lord Strange of Knocking: this Thomas had by the ſiſter of George Earle of Huntingdon, Edward, the third Earle of this Family, highly commended for hoſpitality and affability, who by the Lady Dorothy Daughter to the firſt Thomas Howard Duke of Norfolke, begat Henry the fourth Earle, eſts-once honourably employed, who left by Lady Margaret Daughter of Henry Earle of Cumberland, Ferdinand, and William ſucceſſively

CORNAVII.

Having now travailed in order through the Countries of the ancient CORITANI, I am to ſurvey the Regions confining, which in ancient time the people called CORNABII or CORNAVII, inhabited: The derivation or Etymologie of whoſe name let others ſift out. As for my ſelfe, I could draw the force and ſignification of that word to this and that diverſly; but ſeeing none of them doth aptly anſwere to the nature of the place, or diſpoſition of the people, I chuſe rather to reject them, than heere to propound them. According therefore to my purpoſe, I will ſeverally runne over thoſe Provinces which after Ptolomees deſcription the CORNAVII ſeeme to have poſſeſſed, that is to ſay, Warwick-ſhire, Worceſter-ſhire, Stafford-ſhire, Shrop-ſhire and Cheſhire. In which, there remaineth no footing at this day, of the name Cornavij, although this name continued even untill the declining State of the Romane Empire. For, certaine Companies and Regiments of the CORNAVII ſerved in pay under the later Emperours, as wee may ſee in the Booke of Notitia Provinciarum.

WARWICK-SHIRE.

THE County of WARVVICK, which the old Engliſh Saxons as well as wee called WARVVICK-SHIRE, being bounded on the Eaſt ſide with Northampton-ſhire, Leiceſter-ſhire, and the Watling-ſtreet Way, which I ſpake of: on the South with Oxford-ſhire and Glocesterſhire, on the Weſt, for the greateſt part with Worceſter-ſhire, and on the North ſide with Stafford-ſhire, is divided into two parts, the Feldon and Woodland, that is, into a plaine Champian, and a woody Country: which parts, the River Avon running crookedly from North-East to South-Weſt, doth after a ſort ſever one from the other.

The Feldon, lyeth on this ſide Avon Southward, a plaine Champian Countrey, and being rich in Corne and greene graſſe, yeeldeth a right goodly and pleaſant proſpect to them that looke downe upon it from an Hill which they call Edge-hill. Where this hill endeth nere unto Wormington, we ſaw a round Fort or military tenſe caſt up of a good bigneſſe, which, as others of that kinde, wee may well thinke to have beene made for the preſent, and not long to continue, by occaſion of ſome enemies that in times paſt were ready to invade thoſe parts. Of the rudy Soile heere, come the names of Rodway and Rodley: yea and a great part of the very Vale is thereupon termed The Vale of Red-horſe, of the ſhape of an Horſe cut out in a red hill by the Country people hard by Pillerton.

Feldon.

The Vale of Redhorſe.

In this part the places worth naming are Shipſton and Kinton, the one in times paſt a Mercate of Sheepe, the other of Kine, whereupon they gat thoſe names: alſo Compton in the Hole, ſo called for that it lyeth hidden in a Valley under the Hilles; yet hath it delights and pleaſures about it, and from thence a noble Family hath taken the name: out of which the moſt excellent Prince Queene Elizabeth advanced Sir Henry Compton to the honour of a Baron in the yeere of our Redemption 1572. Likewiſe Wormeleighton, ſo highly commended, and notorious for good Sheepe-paſture, but now much more notable ſince that King James created that right worſhipfull Sir Robert Spenſer, of whom I have alteady ſpoken, Baron Spenſer of Wormeleighton. Moreover, Shugbury, where the ſtones called Aſtroites, reſembling little Starres, are found, which the Lords of the place firnamed thereupon Shugbury, have long ſhewed in their Coat Armour: Southam a Mercate Towne well knowne: as alſo Leamington (ſo called of Leame a ſmall Brooke that wandereth through this part of the Shire) where there boyleth out a ſpring of ſalt water: and Utrhindon, now Long Ichingdon, and Harbury. Neither verily are theſe two places memorable for any other cauſe, but for that Fremund ſonne to King Offa was betwixt them villanouſly in times paſt ſlaine by thoſe that forelayed him, a man of great renowne and ſingular Piety to God ward, unto whom nothing elſe procured envie and evill will, but becauſe in an unhappy time hee had by happy Conduct quelled the audacious Courage of his enemies. Which Death of his notwithſtanding turned to his greater Glorie. For, beeing buryed at his Fathers Palace, now called Off-Church, hee liveth yet unto Poſterity, as who beeing raunged in the Catalogue of our Saints hath among the multitude received Divine Honours: and whoſe life is by an ancient Writer ſet out in a good Poeme, out of which let it bee no offence to put downe theſe few Verſes following touching the Murderer, who upon an ambitious deſire of a Kingdome, ſlew him.

Paſt hope, whiles Fremund liv'd, to ſpeed of wiſhed regalty,
All ſecret and unworthy meanes he plots to make him dye.
With naked ſword, prophane ſlave he, aſſaileth cowardly
His Lord unwares, and as he lay beheads him cruelly.
At Wydford thus Prince Fremund did this glorious crowne attaine, Whiles ſlaying guilty folke, at once, himſelfe is guiltleſſe ſlaine.

Foſſe-way.

Thus much of the Feldon, or Champion part, which, that ancient Foſſe-way (a thing that would not bee overpaſſed) cutteth overthwart: the ridge whereof is ſeene in paſtures lying now out of the way, neere unto Chesterton the habitation of that ancient Family of the Peitoes, out of which was that William Peito, a Franciſcane Frier, whom Paul the Fourth, Pope of Rome, of ſtomach to worke Cardinall Pole diſpleaſure (would you thinke theſe heavenly Wights were ſo wrathfull) created, though in vaine, Cardinall and Legate of England having recalled Cardinall Pole to Rome before, to bee accuſed and charged as ſuſpected corrupt in Religion: But Queene Mary, albeit ſhee were moſt affectionately devoted to the Church of Rome, interpoſed or rather oppoſed her ſelfe ſo, that Peito was forbidden to enter into England, and the power Legantine left entire and whole to Cardinall Pole. Heere I wote not whether it would bee materiall to relate, how in the Raigne of Edward the Fourth certaine Writers in Bookes of purpoſe penned made complaint of Covetouſneſſe, how that ſhe having aſſembled heere about flockes of Sheepe as a puiſſant power of armed forces, beſieged many Villages well peopled, drave out the Husbandmen, wonne the ſaid Villages, deſtroyed, raſed, and depopulated them in ſuch miſerable ſort heereabout, that one of the ſaid Writers a learned man in thoſe daies cryed out with the Poet in theſe termes.

Quid facerent hoſtes capta crudeliùs urbe?
What could more cruelly be done,
By enemies, to Cities wonne?

But nere unto the River Avon, where carrying as yet but a ſmall ſtreame he cloſely entereth into this County, firſt offereth it ſelfe Rugby having a Mercat in it ſtanding chiefely of a number of Butchers. Then Newenham Regis, that is, Kings Newenham ſtanding upon the other ſide of the River, where three fountaines walme out Bagginton.

After it, Bagginton, which had a Caſtle to it, and belonged ſometime to the Bagottes, as noble a Family then, as moſt other. Within a little whereof ſtandeth

Stoneley, where King Henry the Second founded an Abbay; and juſt over againſt it ſtood in old time a Caſtle upon Avon called Stoneley-holme, built in Holmeſhal, which was deſtroyed when the flaming broiles of Daniſh Warres under king Canutus caught hold of all England.

Warwick.

Then runneth Avon unto the principall Towne of the whole Shire, which wee call Warwicke, the Saxons Wappýnȝ-wýc, Ninnius and the Britans Caer Guarvic, and Caer Leon. All which names, conſidering they ſeeme to have ſprung from Guarth a Britiſh word which ſignifieth a Gariſon, or from Legions, that were ſet in certaine places

A places for Guard and defence thereof, have in ſome ſort perſwaded mee (although in theſe Etymologies I love rather to bee a Scepticke than a Criticke) that this is the very Towne of Britaine, which the Romans called PRÆSIDIUM, where, as wee finde in the Noticia, or Abſtract of Provinces, the Captaine of the Dalmatian Horſemen abode under the command of Dux Britanniæ. This Cohort or Band was enrolled out of Dalmatia; and (to note thus much by the way) ſuch was the provident wiſedome and forecaſt of the Romans, that in all their Provinces they placed forraigne Souldiers in Gariſon, who by reaſon of their diverſity as well of manners as of language from the naturall Inhabitants, could not joyne with them in any conſpiracy: for (as hee writeth) Nations not inured to the bridle of bondage, eaſily o-
B therwiſe ſtart backe from the yoake impoſed upon them. Heereupon it was that there ſerved in Britaine, out of Africke the Moores; out of Spaine the Aſſures and Vettones; out of Germany the Batavi, Nervÿ, Tungri, and Turnacenſes; out of Gaul the Lingones, Morini; and from other remoter places, Dalmatians, Thracians, Alani, &c. as I will ſhew in their proper places: But now to the matter. Neither let any man thinke that the Britans got that word Guarth from the Frenchmen, ſeeing the originall is an Hebrew word (if wee may beleeve Lazius) and in that Originall moſt Nations doe accord.

Præſidium.

Florus lib. 4. c. ult.

Forreine Souldiers in Provinces.

But that this was PRÆSIDIUM, that is, The Gariſon Towne, both the Authority of our Chronicles teacheth, which report that the Romane Legions had their a-C boad heere; and the ſite alſo it ſelfe in the very navell and mids almoſt of the whole Province doth imply. For equally diſtant it is of the one ſide from the Eaſt Coaſt of Norfolke, and on the other ſide from the Weſt of Wales, which kinde of ſituation PRÆSIDIUM a Towne of Corſica, had, ſtanding juſt in the middeſt of the Iſland.

And no marvaile is it that the Romans kept heere Gariſon and a ſtanding Company of Souldiers, ſeeing it ſtandeth over the River Avon upon a ſteepe and high Rocke, and all the paſſages into it are wrought out of the very ſtone. That it was fortified with a Wall and Ditches it is apparent; and toward the South Weſt it ſheweth a Caſtle paſſing ſtrong, as well by Nature as handy-worke, the ſeat in times paſt of the Earles of Warwicke. The Towne it ſelfe is adorned with faire houſes, and is
D much bound to Ethelfled, Lady of the Mercians, who repaired it (when as it was greatly decaied) in the yeere 911. In very good ſtate alſo it was upon the Normans entring into this land, and had many Burgeſſes, as they tearme them: and twelve of them, as wee finde written in King William the Conquerours Domeſday Booke, Were bound to accompany the King of England into his Warres. He that upon warning given went not, paid an hundred Shillings to the King: but if the King made a voyage by ſea againſt his enemies, they ſent either foure Boteſwans, or foure pound of Deniers. In this Burgh the King hath in his Demeines one hundred and thirteene Burgeſſes, and the Kings Barons have an hundred and twelve. Roger the ſecond, of the Normans bloud, Earle of Warwicke, built afterwards in the very heart of the Towne a moſt beautifull
E Church to the bleſſed Virgin Mary: Which the Beauchamps that ſucceeded adorned with their Tombes: but eſpecially Richard Beauchamp, Earle of Warwicke, and Governour of Normandy, who dyed at Roan in the yeere 1439. and after a ſumptuous funerall ſolemnized, in this Church lyeth entombed in a magnificent Tombe with this Inſcription.

Pray

Pray devoutly for the ſoule whom God aſſoile of one of the moſt worſhipfull Knights in his daies of Manhood and cunning, Richard Beauchampe late Earle of Warwicke, Lord Deſpenſer, of Bergavenny, and of many other great Lordſhips, whoſe body reſteth heere under this Tombe, in a full faire Vault of ſtone, ſet in the bare Roche. The which viſited with long ſickneſſe in the Caſtle of Rohan, therein deceaſed full Chriſtianly the laſt day of April, in the yeere of our Lord God 1439. Hee being at that time Lieutenant Generall of France, and of the Dutchie of Normandie, by ſufficient authority of our Soveraigne Lord King Henry the ſixth. The which body by great deliberation and worſhipfull conduct by ſea and land, was brought to Warwick the fourth of October, the yeere abo-veſaid, and was laid with full ſolemne exequies in a faire Cheſt made of ſtone in the Weſt Doore of this Chappell, according to his laſt Will and Teſtament, therein to reſt till this Chappell by him de-viſed in his life were made: the which Chappell founded on the Roche, and all the members thereof his Executors did fully make and apparell, by the authority of his ſaid laſt Will and Teſtament. And thereafter by the ſaid authority they did tranſlate worſhipfully the ſaid body into the Vault aforeſaid. Honoured be God therefore.

Blacklow hill, which others call Gaverſden.

Neere unto Warwicke Northward is Blaclow hill to be ſeene, on which Piers de Gaveſton, whom King Edward the Second had raiſed from a baſe and low eſtate to bee Earle of Cornwall, was by the Nobles of the Kingdome beheaded: who preſuming of the Kings favor and fortunes indulgence, tooke unto him ſo great and licencious liberty, that when he had once corrupted the Kings heart, hee deſpiſed all the beſt men, and proudly ſeized upon the eſtates of many, and as hee was a crafty and old beaten Fox ſowed diſcords and variance betweene the Prince and the Peeres of the Realme.

Guy-cliffe.

Under this hill, hard by the River Avon ſtandeth Guy-cliffe, others call it Gib-cliffe, the dwelling houſe at this day of Sir Thomas Beau-foe deſcended from the ancient Normans line, and the very ſeat it ſelfe of pleaſantneſſe. There have yee a ſhady little Wood, cleere and criſtall Springs, moſſie bottomes and caves, medowes alwaies freſh and greene, the River rumbling heere and there among the ſtones with his ſtreame making a milde noiſe and gentle whiſpering, and beſides all this, ſolitary and ſtill quietneſſe, things moſt gratefull to the Muſes. Heere, as the report goes, that valiant knight and noble Worthy ſo much celebrated, Sir Guy of Warwicke, after hee had borne the brunt of ſundry troubles, and atchieved many painfull exploits, built a Chappell, led an Eremits life, and in the end was buryed. Howbeit, wiſer men doe thinke, that the place tooke that name of later time by farre, from Guy Beauchamp Earle of Warwicke; and certaine it is, that Richard Beauchamp Earle of Warwicke built Saint Margarets Chappell heere, and erected a mighty and giantlike ſtatue of ſtone, reſembling the ſaid Guy.

Charle-cot.

Avon now runneth downe from Warwicke with a fuller ſtreame by Charle-cot, the habitation of the renowned ancient family of the Lucies knights, which place long agoe

A agoe deſcended hereditarily to them from the Charlecots: who upon a pious and devout minde founded a religious Houſe at Thelliſford, for entertainment of poore folke and Pilgrims: For, that little River was called Thelley, which by Compton Murdacke, the poſſeſſion ſometime of the Murdackes, and now of the Vernaies, Knights, and by this, Thelliſford goeth into Avon, which within a while runneth hard by Stratford, a proper little mercate towne, beholden for all the beauty that it hath to two men there bred and brought up, namely, John of Stratford Archbiſhop of Canterbury, who built the Church; and Sir Hugh Clopton Major of London, who over Avon made a ſtone Bridge ſupported with foureteene Arches, not without exceeding great expenſes. This Hugh was a younger brother, out of that ancient family which from B Clopton a Manour adjoyning borrowed this ſirname, ſince the time that Walter de Cocksfeld called Knight Mareſchall ſetled and planted both himſelfe and his ſucceſſours at Clopton. The inheritance of theſe Cloptons is in our time deſcended to two ſiſters coheires: the one of which is married to Sir George Carew knight, Vicechamberlaine to our moſt gracious Lady Queen Anne: whom King James hath entituled Baron Carew of Clopton, and whom I am the more willing to name with honour in this reſpect, if there were none other, for that hee is a moſt affectionate lover of venerable antiquity. Neither ſeeth Avon any other memorable thing upon his bankes, but Bitford a Mercate Towne, and ſome Country Villages being now ready to enter into Worceſter-ſhire.

C Now let us enter into the Woodland, which beyond the River Avon ſpreadeth it ſelfe Northward much larger in compaſſe than the Feldon: and is for the moſt part thicke ſet with Woods, and yet not without paſtures, corne fields, and ſundry mines of Iron: This part, as it is at this day called Woodland, ſo alſo it was in old time knowne by a more ancient name Arden, but in the ſelfeſame ſenſe and ſignification, as I thinke. For, it ſeemeth that Arden among the ancient Britans and Gaules ſignified a Wood; conſidering that we ſee a very great Wood in France named ARDEN, a Towne in Flanders hard by another Wood, called Ardenburg, and that famous Wood or Foreſt in England by a clipped word likewiſe cleped DEN: to ſay nothing of that DIANA, which in the ancient inſcriptions of Gaule is ſirnamed ARDVVENA and ARDOI- D NA, that is, if I doe not miſ-conceive, Of the Wood; and was the ſame Diana which in the inſcriptions of Italy went under the name of NEMORENSIS. Of this Foreſt, Turkill of Arden, who flouriſhed heere in all honour under King Henry the Firſt, tooke his name: and his offſpring which was of great worſhip and reputation, ſpred very much over all England for many yeeres ſucceſſively enſuing. In the Weſt ſide of this Country, the River Arrow maketh haſte to joyne himſelfe in ſociety with Avon, by Studly Caſtle; belonging ſometime to John the ſonne of Corbutio. But whether this River Arrow tooke name of ſwiftneſſe, as Tigris in Meſopotamia (for Arrow with us, like as Tigris among the Perſians, betokeneth a ſhaft) or contrariwiſe, of the ſtill ſtreame and ſlow courſe, which Ar in the old French and Britiſh Tongue im- E plied, let other men looke who have better obſerved the nature of this River.

Upon this River ſtandeth Coughton, the principall manſion houſe of the Throckmortons a family of Knights degree, which being ſpred into a number of faire branches, and fruitfull of fine wits, flouriſhed in this tract eſpecially, ever ſince they matched in marriage with the daughter and heire of Speney. Not farre from hence is Ouſley, which alſo was in ancient time well knowne by the Lords thereof, the Butlers, Barons of Wem, from whom it was devolved hereditarily to the Ferrars of Ouſley. Whoſe inheritance, within a ſhort time, was divided betweene John Lord of Greiſtocke and Sir Raulph Nevill. Beneath it, upon Arrow, ſtandeth Beauchamps-Court ſo named of Baron Beauchamp of Powicke, from whom by the onely daughter of Edward Willoughbey, ſonne to Robert Willoughbey Baron Broke, it came to Sir Foulque Grevill a right F worſhipfull perſon both for his Knights degree, and for kinde courteſie: whoſe only ſonne, carrying likewiſe the ſame name, hath conſecrated himſelfe ſo to true Vertue and Nobility, that in nobility of minde he farre ſurmounteth his parentage and unto whom for his exceeding great deſerts toward me, although my heart is not able either

Henley. Under this Towne there runneth into Arrow, the River Alne, which holding on his courſe through the woods, paſſeth under Henley a prety mercate towne; a Caſtle joyning whereunto belonged the Family of the Mont-forts, being Noblemen of great name, which for the pleaſant ſituation among the Woods they called by a French name Bell-deſert, but this together with the ruines is now buried quite and ſcant to be ſeene at all. Theſe were deſcended not from the Almarian Family of the Mont-forts of France, but from Turſtan de Baſtanberg a Norman: whoſe inheritance paſſed away at length by the daughters unto the Barons of Sudley, and to the Frevills. In the very Aulceſter. place where Arrow and this Alne doe meete together, we ſaw Aulceſter, by Matthew Paris called (and that more rightly) Allenceſter, which the inhabitants affirme to have beene a moſt famous and ancient Towne, and thereupon they will have the name to be Ouldceſter. This, (as we reade in an old Inquiſition) was a Frank-burogh of our Lord King Henry the Firſt, and the ſame King gave that Burogh to Robert Corbet for his ſervice, and when the ſaid Robert died, it came by deſcent to Sir William of Botereux, and to Sir Peter Fitz-Herbert: and when William of Botereux dyed, the moity of that Burogh fell by deſcent into the hand of Sir Reginald of Botereux as to the heire, who now holdeth it: and when Peter Fitz-Herbert died, that moity deſcended into the hand of Herbert, the ſonne of Peter: which Herbert gave it to Sir Robert de Chaundoys: But now it is decaied and of a very great Towne become a ſmall Mercate of wares and trade. Howbeit exceeding much frequented for the Corne Faire there holden. This hath for a neere neighbour Arrow according to the name of the River, whoſe Lord Thomas Burdet for his dependance upon George Duke of Clarence, words unadviſedly uttered, and hardly conſtrued through the iniquity of the time, loſt his life. But by his grand daughter married to Edward Conway brother to Sir Hugh Conway of Wales a gracious favourite of King Henry the Seventh, the knightly Family of the Conwaies have ever ſince flouriſhed and laudably followed the profeſſion of Armes.

But Eaſt from the river, and higher among the Woods, which now begin to grow thin, ſtand theſe townes under named, Wroxhall, where Hugh de Hatton founded a little Priory; Badeſley belonging in times paſt to the Clintons, now to the Ferrars: Alſo Balſhall, ſometimes a Commandery of the Templars, which Roger de Mowbray gave unto them; whoſe liberality to the order of Templars was ſo great, that by a common conſent in their Chapiter they made a decree, that himſelfe might remit and pardon, any of the brotherhood whomſoever, in caſe hee had treſpaſſed againſt the ſtatutes and ordinances of that Order, and did withall before him acknowledge the crime: yea and the Knights of the Order of Saint Iohn of Ieruſalem, unto whom the Templars poſſeſſions in England were aſſigned over (for our Anceſtours in thoſe daies held it a deadly ſinne to prophane things conſecrated to God) granted in token of thankfulneſſe unto Iohn Mowbray of Axholme, the ſucceſſour of the foreſaid Roger, that himſelfe and his ſucceſſours in every of their Covents and aſſemblies ſhould be received and entertained alwaies in the ſecond place next unto the King.

More North-eaſt, where wilde Brookes meeting together make a broad poole among the Parkes, and ſo ſoone as they are kept in with bankes runne in a Chanell, is ſeated Kenelworth, in times paſt commonly called Kenelworde, but corruptly Killingworth: and of it taketh name a moſt ample, beautifull and ſtrong Caſtle, encompaſſed all about with Parkes, which neither Kenulph, nor Kenelm, ne yet Kenegiſe built, as ſome doe dreame, but Geffrey Clinton Chamberlaine unto King Henry the Firſt, and his ſonne with him (as may be ſhewed by good evidences) when he had founded there before a Church for Chanons Regular. But Henry his Nephew in the ſecond degree, having no iſſue, ſold it unto King Henry the Third, who gave it in franke marriage to Simon Montfort Earle of Leiceſter together with his ſiſter Æleonor. And ſoone after when enmity was kindled betweene the King and Earle Simon: and hee ſlaine in the bloody warres which he had raiſed upon faire pretexts againſt his Soveraigne, it endured ſix moneths ſiege, and in the end was ſurrendred up to the king aforeſaid, Kenelworth commonly Killingworth.

A said, who annexed this Caſtle as an inheritance to Edmund his ſonne Earle of Lancaſter. At which time, there went out and was proclaimed from hence an Edict, which our Lawyers uſe to call Dictum de Kenelworth, whereby it was enacted, That whoſoever had tooke Armes againſt the King ſhould pay every one of them five yeeres rent of their lands, &c. A ſevere, yet a good and wholſome courſe, without effuſion of bloud againſt rebellious ſubjects, who compaſſing the deſtruction of the State, built all their hopes upon nothing elſe but diſſentions. But this Caſtle through the bountifull munificence of Queene Elizabeth, was given and granted to Robert Dudleie Earle of Leiceſter, who, to repaire and adorne it, ſpared for no coſte: in ſo much as if a man conſider either the gallant building, or the large Parkes, it would ſcorne (as it were) to

B be ranged in a third place amongſt the Caſtles in England.

Next after this, to keepe on the journey that my ſelfe made, I ſaw Solyhill: but in it, ſetting aſide the Church, there is nothing worth ſight: Then, Bremicham, full of E Inhabitants, and reſounding with hammers and anvils, for the moſt of them are Smiths. The lower part thereof ſtandeth very wateriſh: the upper riſeth with faire buildings: for the credite and praiſe whereof, I may not reckon this in the laſt place, that the Noble and martiall Family of the * Bremichams Earles of Louth, &c. in Ireland fetched their originall and name from hence. Then, in the utmoſt skirt of this Shire North-weſtward, Sutton Colfield ſtanding in a woody and on a churliſh hard Soile, glorieth of John Voiſy Biſhop of Exceſter there borne and bred: who in the C Raigne of king Henry the Eighth, when this little Towne had lien a great while as dead, raiſed it up againe with buildings, priviledges, and a Grammar Schoole. As I went downe from hence Southward I came to Coleſhull, a Towne ſometime of the Clintons, and to Maxſtocke Caſtle neighbouring to it, which acknowledged by a continuall line of hereditary ſucceſſion for his Lords, the Limſeies, who were alſo Lords of Wolverley, the Odingſells that came out of Flanders, and the Clitons, men of greateſt worth and worſhip in their times.

* Or Birmingham.

Lower yet, in the mids of this Woodland ſtandeth Coventrey ſo called, as we take it, of a Covent of Monkes, conſidering that we terme in our tongue ſuch a brotherhood, a Covent and Coven: and it is oftentimes in our Hiſtories and Pontificall Decrees na-

D med Coventria: as for example in this one paſſage: Vel non eſt compos ſui Epiſcopus Conventrenſis, vel nimis videtur à ſe ſcientiam repuliſſe.* Yet there be, that would have this name to be taken from that little Brooke that runneth within the City at this day called Shirburn, and in an ancient Charter of the Priory, is written Cuentford. Well, whence ſo ever it was ſo called, in the foregoing age, growing wealthy by clothing and making of Caps, it was the onely Mart and City of trade in all theſe parts, frequented alſo and peopled more than ordinarily a midland place: as being a City very commodiouſly ſeated, large, ſweet, and neat, fortified with ſtrong Walles, and ſet out with right goodly houſes: among which there riſe up on high two Churches of rare workmanſhip, ſtanding one hard by the other, and matched, as it were, as concur-

E rents, the one conſecrated to the Holy Trinity, the other to Saint Michael. Yet hath it nothing within it, that one would ſay is of great antiquity. And the moſt ancient monument of all, as it may ſeeme, was the Monaſtery or Priory, the ruines whereof I ſaw neere unto thoſe Churches: which Priory king Canutus founded firſt for religious Nunnes, who when they were within a while after throwne out, in the yeere 1043 Leofricke Earle of the * Mercians enlarged, and in manner built anew, with ſo great a ſhew and bravery of gold and ſilver (theſe be the very words of William Malmesbury) that the wals ſeemed too narrow for to receive the treaſure of the Church, and the coſte beſtowed there was wonderfull to as many as beheld it: for, out of one beame were ſcraped 50. Markes of ſilver. And he endowed it with ſo great livings, that Robert de Limſeie, Biſhop of Lich-

F field and Cheſter tranſlated his See hither, as it were to the golden ſand of Lydia: to the end (for ſo writeth the ſaid Malmesbury) that out of the very treaſure of the Church hee might by ſtealth convey, wherewith to fill the Kings hand, wherewith to avoid the Popes buſineſſe, and wherewith to ſatisfie the greedineſſe of the Romaniſts. But this See, few yeeres after was removed againe to Lichfield: yet ſo, as that one and the ſelfe ſame Biſhop, car-carried the name both of Lichfield and of Coventry: The first Lord of this City, so farre as I can learne, was this Leofricke, who being very much offended and angry with the Citizens, oppressed them with most heavie tributes, which he would remit upon no other condition, at the earnest suite of his wife Godiva, unlesse she would herselfe ride on horse-backe naked through the greatest and most inhabited street of the City: which she did in deed, and was so covered with her faire long haire, that (if we may beleeve the common sort) shee was seene of no body, and thus shee did set free her Citizens of Coventry from many payments for ever. From Leofricke it came into the hands of the Earles of Chester, by Lucie his sonne Algars daughter: for, shee had beene married to Ranulph the first of that name, and the third Earle of Chester out of this line: who granted unto Coventrey the same liberties that Lincolne had, and gave a great part of the City unto the Monkes: the rest and Chilmore, which is the Lords Manour hard by the City, hee reserved to himselfe and to his heires. After whose death, when for want of issue male, the inheritance was divided betweene the sisters, Coventry came at length mediately by the Earles of Arundell unto Roger Mont-hault, whose grand sonne Robert, passed over all his right, for default of issue male of his body begotten, unto Queene Isabel mother to King Edward the Third: To have and to hold during the whole life of the Queene herselfe, and after her decease to remaine unto Iohn of Eltham the said Kings brother, and to the heires of his body begotten, and for default, the remainder to Edward King of England &c. For thus is it to be seene in the Fine, in the second yeere of King Edward the Third. Now, the said John of Eltham was afterwards created Earle of Cornwall, and this place became annexed to the Earldome of Cornwall. From which time it hath flourished in great state: Kings have bestowed sundry immunities upon it, and King Edward the Third especially, who permitted them to chuse a Major and two Bailiffes, and to build and embattle a Wall about it: also king Henry the Sixth, who laying unto it certaine small Townes adjoyning, granted, That it should bee an entire County corporate by it selfe, (the very words of the Charter runne in that sort) in deed and name, and distinct from the County of Warwicke. At which time in lieu of Bailiffes he ordained two Sheriffes, and the Citizens beganne to fortifie their City with a most strong Wall: wherein are beautifull Gates: and at one of them called Gosford Gate, there hangeth to bee seene a mighty great Shield bone of a wilde Bore, which any man would thinke that either Guy of Warwicke or else Diana of the Forest (Arden) slew in hunting, when he had turned up with his snout that great pit or pond, which at this day is called Swansewell, but Swinsewell in times past, as the authority of ancient Charters doe proove.

As touching the Longitude of this City, it is 25. Degrees, and 52. Scruples: and for the Latitude it is 52. Degrees, and 25. Scruples. Thus much of Coventrey: yet have you not all this of me, but (willingly to acknowledge by whom I have profited) of Henry Ferrars of Baddesley, a man both for parentage, and for knowledge of antiquity very commendable, and my especiall friend: who both in this place and also elsewhere hath at all times courteously shewed me the right way when I was out, and from his candle, as it were, hath lightned mine.

Ausley. Brand.

Neere unto Coventrey North-west ward are placed Ausley Castle the habitation in times past of the Hastings, who were Lords of Abergavenney: and Brand, the dwelling place in old time of the Verdons: Eastward standeth Caloughdon, commonly Caledon; the ancient seat of the Lords Segrave, from whom it descended to the Barons of Berkley, by one of the daughters of Thomas Mowbray Duke of Norfolke. These Segraves since the time that Stephen was Lord chiefe Justice of England, flourished in the honorable estate of Barons, became possessed of the Chaucombes Inheritance, whose Armes also they bare, viz. A Lion rampant, Argent crowned, Or, in a Shield Sable. But John the last of them married Margaret Dutchesse of Northfolke, Daughter of Thomas Brotherton; and begat Elizabeth a daughter, who brought into the Family of the Mowbraies the Dignity of Marshall of England, and Title of Duke of Norfolke. Brinklo also is not farre from hence, where stood an ancient Castle of the Mowbraies, to which many possessions and faire lands thereabout belonged: But the very rubbish of this

A this Caſtle time hath quite conſumed; as Combe Abbay is ſcant now apparent which the Camvills and Mowbraies endowed with poſſeſſions, and out of the ruines and reliques whereof, a faire houſe of the Lord Haringtons in this very place is now raiſed. As you goe Eaſt-ward, you meet anon with Ceſter-Over, whereof I ſpake incidently before, belonging to the Grevills: neere unto which the High port-way Watling-ſtreet, dividing this ſhire Northward from Leiceſter-ſhire, runneth on forward by High-croſſe, whereof alſo I have already written, neere unto Nun-Eaton, which in ancient time was named Eaton. But when Amice wife to Robert Boſſu Earle of Leiceſter, as Henry Knighton writeth, had founded a Monaſtery of Nunnes, wherein her ſelfe alſo became profeſſed, it began of thoſe Nunnes to be called B Nun-Eaton. And famous it was in the former ages by reaſon of thoſe religious Virgines holineſſe, who devoting themſelves continually to prayers, gave example of good life. Combe Abbay.

A little from this there flouriſhed ſometimes Aſtley-Caſtle, the principall ſeate of the Familie of Aſtley out of which flouriſhed Barons in the time of King Edward the Firſt, Second, and Third: the heire whereof in the end was the ſecond wedded Wife of Reginald Lord Grey of Ruthin; from whom came the Greies Marqueſſes of Dorſet: ſome of whom were enterred in a moſt fine and faire Collegiat Church which Thomas Lord Aſtley founded with a Deane and Secular Chanons. Aſtley, or Eſtley. Baron Aſtley.

C Somewhat higher, hard by Watling ſtreet (for ſo with the common people wee call the High-way made by the Romanes) where as the riuer Anker hath a ſtone bridge over it, ſtood MANDVESSEDUM a very ancient towne, mentioned by Antonine the Emperour, which being not altogether deprived of that name, is now called Manceſter, and in Ninnius his Catalogue Caer Mancegued. Which name, conſidering there is a ſtone-quarry hard by, I may gheſſe was impoſed upon it, of the ſtones digged forth and hewed out of it. For, out of the Gloſſaries of the Britiſh tongue, we finde, that Main in the Britiſh language ſignified a Stone, and Foſſwad in the Provinciall tongue to digge out: which being joyned together, may ſeeme very expreſſely to import that ancient name MANDVESSEDUM. But what, how D great, or how faire ſoever it hath been in old time, a very ſmall village it is at this day, containing in it ſcarce foureteene dwelling houſes, and thoſe but little ones, and hath no monument of antiquitie to ſhew, beſide an ancient mount which they call Old-burie. For on the one ſide, Atherſtone a mercate towne of good reſort, where there ſtood a Church of Auguſtine Friers, now turned into a Chappell (which nevertheleſſe acknowledgeth Manceſter Church for her mother) and Nun-Eaton on the other ſide, by their vicinity have left it bare and empty. Cloſe unto Atherſtone ſtandeth Mery-Vale, where Robert Ferrars erected a Monaſtery to God and the bleſſed Virgin Mary, wherein himſelfe enwrapped in an Oxe-hide for a ſhrouding ſheet was interred. Mandueſſedum. Manceſter. Merivall.

E Beyond theſe, Northeaſtward is Polleſworth, where Modwena an Iriſh Virgin, of whom there went ſo great a fame for her holy life, built a religious houſe for Nuns, which R. Marmion a Noble man repaired, who had his Caſtle hard by at Stipperſhull. Neere unto this place alſo there flouriſhed in the Saxons daies, a towne that now is almoſt quite gone, called then SECANDUNUM, and at this day Seckinton; where Æthelbald King of the Mercians in civill warre about the yeere of our Lord 749. was ſtabbed to death by Beared: and ſoone after Offa ſlew Beared, ſo that as by bloudy meanes he invaded the Kingdome of Mercia, he likewiſe loſt the ſame ſuddainely. Polleſworth. Seckinton.

It remaineth now that we reckon up the Earles of Warwick: for, to paſſe over F Guare, Morind, Guy of Warwick, of whoſe actes all England reſoundeth, and others of that ſtampe, whom pregnant wits have at one birth bred and brought forth into the world: Henry the ſonne of Roger de Beau-mont, and brother to Robert Earle of Mellent, was the firſt Earle deſcended of Normans bloud: who had married Mar- Earles of Warwick.

garet the daughter of Ernulph de Heſdin Earle of Perch, a moſt mighty and puiſſant man.

Out of this Family, there bare this Honourable title, Roger the ſonne of Henry, William the ſonne of Roger, who died in the thirtieth yeere of King Henry the Second, Walleran his brother, Henry the ſonne of Walleran, Thomas his ſonne, who deceaſed without iſſue in the ſixe and twentieth yeere of King Henry the Third, leaving behinde him Margery his ſiſter, who being Counteſſe of Warwicke, and barraine, departed this life: yet her two husbands, firſt, Iohn Mareſchal, then John de Pleſſetis or Pleſſey, in their wives right and through their Princes favour mounted up to the Honourable dignitie of Earles of Warwicke.

Placita E. 3. Rotulo 234.

Now when theſe were departed without any iſſue by that Margery, Walleran Uncle unto the ſaid Margery ſucceeded them: After whom, dying alſo childleſſe, his ſiſter Alice enjoyed the inheritance: Afterwards her ſonne William, called Malduit and Manduit of Hanſlap, who left this world and had no children. Then Iſabell the ſaid William Malduits ſiſter being beſtowed in marriage upon William de Beauchamp Lord of Elmeſly, brought the Earledome of Warwicke into the Familie of the Beauchamps; who, if I deceive not my ſelfe, for that they came of a daughter of Urſus de Abtot, gave the Beare for their cogniſance, and left it to their poſteritie. Out of this houſe there flouriſhed ſixe Earles and one Duke; William the ſonne of Iſabell, John, Guy, Thomas, Thomas the younger, Richard and Henry, unto whom King Henry the Sixth graunted this preheminence and prerogative without any precedent, to be the firſt and chiefe Earle of England, and to carry this ſtile, Henricus Præcomes totius Angliæ, & Comes Warwici, that is, Henry chiefe Earle of all England, and Earle of Warwicke: he nominated him alſo King of the Iſle of Wight, and afterwards created him Duke of Warwicke, and by theſe expreſſe words of his Patent, graunted, That he ſhould take his place in Parliaments and elſewhere next unto the Duke of Norfolke and before the Duke of Buckingham. One onely daughter he had named Anne, whom in the Inquiſitions wee finde entituled Counteſſe of Warwicke, and ſhee died a child. After her ſucceeded Richard Nevill who had married Anne ſiſter to the ſaid Duke of Warwicke, a man of an undaunted courage, but wavering and untruſtie, the very tenniſſe-ball, in ſome ſort, of fortune; who although he were no King, was above Kings, as who depoſed King Henry the Sixth (a moſt bountifull Prince to him) from his regall dignitie, placed Edward the Fourth in the royall throne, and afterwards put him downe too, reſtored Henry the Sixth againe to the Kingdome, enwrapped England within the moſt wofull and lamentable flames of civill warre, which himſelfe at the length hardly quenched with his owne bloud. After his death Anne his Wife by Act of Parliament was excluded and debarred from all her lands for ever, and his two daughters, heires to him, and heires apparant to their mother, being married to George Duke of Clarence, and Richard Duke of Glocester, were enabled to enjoy all the ſaid lands, in ſuch wiſe as if the ſaid Anne their mother were naturally dead. Whereupon the name, ſtile and title of Earle of Warwicke and Sarisbury was graunted to George Duke of Clarence, who ſoone after was unnaturally diſpatched by a ſweet death in a Butte of Malveſey by his ſuſpicious brother King Edward the Fourth: His young ſonne Edward was ſtiled Earle of Warwicke, and being but a very child was beheaded by King Henry the Seventh to ſecure himſelfe and his poſteritie.

The death of this Edward our Anceſtors accounted to be the full period, and finall end of the long laſting warre betweene the two royall houſes of Lancaſter and Yorke. Wherein, as they reckoned, from the twenty eight yeere of Henry the Sixth unto this, being the fifteenth of Henry the Seventh, there were thirteene fields fought, three Kings of England, one Prince of Wales, twelve Dukes, one Marques, eighteene Earles, with one Vicont, and twenty three Barons, beſides Knights and Gentlemen, loſt their lives. From the death of this young Earle of Warwicke this title lay aſleepe, which King Henry the Eighth feared as a fire-brand of

Period of the civill warre betweene Lancaſter and Yorke.

A of the State, by reaſon of the combuſtion which that Richard Nevill, that whip-king (as ſome tearmed him) had raiſed, untill that King Edward the Sixth conferred it upon Iohn Dudley, that derived his pedigree from the Beauchamps, who, like unto that Richard aboveſaid, going about in Queene Maries daies to turne and tranſlate Scepters at his pleaſure, for his Traiterous deepe ambition loſt his head. But his ſonnes, firſt Iohn, when his father was now Duke of Northumberland, by a courteous cuſtome uſually received held this title for a while: and afterwards Ambroſe a moſt worthy perſonage, both for warlike proweſſe and ſweetneſſe of nature through the fauour of Queene Elizabeth received in our remembrance, the Honour of Earle of Warwick to him and his heires males, and for defect of them, to Robert his brother, and B the heires males of his body lawfully begotten. This Honour Ambroſe bare with great commendation, and died without children in the yeere one thouſand five hundred eighty nine, ſhortly after his brother Robert Earle of Leiceſter.

In this County there be Pariſh Churches 158.

WORCESTER-SHIRE.

THe ſecond region of the ancient CORNAVII, having now changed the name, is called in Latine Wigornienſis Comitatus, in the Engliſh Saxon tongue Wiꝛe-ceaꝛꝛcep ſcyꝛe, and now commonly of the principall Towne in it WORCESTER-SHIRE: the inhabitants whereof, together with thoſe who joyning unto them round about in Bedes daies, before that England was divided into Shires, were termed Wiccii. Wichij. Which name, if it were not given them of the river having ſo many windings, which they dwell by (for ſuch turnings and curving reaches of a river, the Engliſh Saxons, as I have already ſaid, called Wic) may ſeeme to have been derived of thoſe Salt-pits, that the old Engliſh-men in their language named Wiches. For there be here very notable Salt-pits, and many ſalt ſprings often times Salt-pits. have been found, which notwithſtanding are ſtopped up, becauſe it was provided (as we read) that for the ſaving of woods ſalt ſhould not be boyled but in certaine places. Neither let it ſeeme ſtrange, that places have their names given them from Salt-pits, conſidering that wee may meet with many ſuch here and there in every Country, and our Anceſtors the Germans, as Tacitus writeth, had a religious perſwaſion and beliefe, that ſuch places approach neereſt to Heaven, and that mens prayers were no where ſooner heard of the gods.

This County, on which Warwick-ſhire confineth on the Eaſt, Gloceſter-ſhire on the South, bounded Weſt-ward with Hereford-ſhire and Shrop-ſhire, North-eaſt with Stafford-ſhire, to ſay all in one word, hath ſo temperate an ayre and ſoile ſo favourable, that for healthfulneſſe and plenty, it is not inferiour to their neighbour Countries, and in one part for deinty Cheeſe ſurpaſſeth them: yeelding ſuch Kings Norton. ſtore of Peares, as none other the like; and albeit they are not ſo pleaſing to theſe deinty and delicate mouthes, yet out of their winiſh juice, they make a baſtard kinde of wine called Pyrry, which they drinke very much, although it be (as other drinks Pyrry. of that kinde) both cold and full of winde. Neither is it if you reſpect waters, leſſe pleaſant and commodious: for, in every place there be paſſing ſweet rivers, which affoord in great abundance the moſt delicate kinde of Fiſhes. And to let thoſe runne by that are of leſſe account, Severne that noble and renowned river carrieth his ſtreame along, through the middeſt of the ſhire, from North to South: and Avon, that commeth downe out of Warwick-ſhire to meet with Severne, watereth the South part thereof.

Severn, firſt of all at his very entry, paſſeth betweene Kidderminſter and Beawdley. Kidderminſter. Beawdley. This Beawdley worthily ſo called for the beautifull ſite thereof, ſtandeth moſt pleaſantly upon the hanging of an hill, and hovereth over the river on the Weſt ſide: of late daies well knowne for the admirable tallneſſe of trees growing in the Forreſt of Wyre adjoyning, which now in a manner be all gone. Whence our Poet and Antiquary Leland wrote thus.

Delicium rerum Bellus Locus, undique floret Fronde coronatus Virianæ tempora Sylvæ.

Beawdley a fine and deinty thing, is goodly to be ſeene,
All dight about with guirland freſh of Wire that Foreſt greene.

But now is this little Towne in ſpeech and requeſt onely for the pleaſantneſſe and beautie of it ſelfe; and withall for the Kings houſe Tiken-hall: which King Henry the Seventh built to be a retyring place for Prince Arthur, at which time he graunted ſome liberties to Beawdley. But farther from the river banke, Eaſtward is Kidderminſter over againſt it, called alſo Kidelminſter, a faire Towne and hath a great Mercate of all commodities, well frequented, parted in twaine by the little River Stowre that runneth through it: and the greateſt ornaments now belonging thereto are first, a passing beautifull Church, wherein some of the worshipfull family of the Corkesets lie buried, and the goodly gallant house of the Blounts of knights degree, descended from those of Kinlet: but in old time this place was of most note for the Lords thereof, the Bissets, men in their time right honorable: whose rich possessions being at length dismembred and divided among sisters, came partly to the Barons of Abergevenny and in part to a Lazarhouse of women in Wilt-shire, which one of the said sisters, being her selfe infected with the Leprosie built for them that had the same disease, and enriched it with her owne patrimony and childs part. Afterwards it came to have a Baron, for King Richard the Second created Sir Iohn Beauchamp Steward of his household, Baron Beauchamp of Kiddermin∫ter, by letters Patents; and is accounted the first Baron so created. But he soone after by the Barons (who together with the Commons rose, and contemning the Kings authority, called as many as were most deere unto the King to give an account for their misgovernement of the Common-weale) was with other right worthy persons, in malice to the King, condemned and beheaded.

Baron Beauchamp of Kiddermin∫ter.

Hertlebury.

Holt, in old English, woods.

Severne turning his course somewhat awry from thence, saluteth Hertlebury a Castle of the Bishops of Worcester not far distant, and goeth amaine to Holt Castle, so called of a very thick wood there, belonging sometime to the Abtots; after to the Beauchamps; who springing from William Beauchamp surnamed the Blinde Baron, grew up afterwards to be a most honorable family; the inheritance whereof descended at length to Gyse and Penyston: from hence runneth Severne downe, feeding such a number of fresh-water Lampries, as that Nature may seeme in this place to have made a very pond or Stew for them: such as the Romanes devised in ancient times when they grew lavish in riotous excesse. These fishes we call Lampries of the Latin word Lampetra, as one would say of licking the rocks, are like to Eeles, slippery and blackish, howbeit beneath on their bellies, somewhat blew: on either side of their throates they receive and let in water at seven holes, for that they want gils altogether. Most commendable they are in the spring time, as being then very sweet: for, in Summer, the inner nerve or string, which stands them instead of a backe bone, waxeth hard. The Italians make them more delicate in tast, by a speciall and peculiar seasoning: For they take a Lamprie and in Malvesy kill it, the mouth they close up with a nutmeg, fill all the holes with as many cloves: and when it is rolled up round, putting thereto fillbard-nut kernels stamped, crums of bread, oile, malvesey, and spices, they boyle it with great care and certaine turnings over a soft and temperate fire of coles in a frying pan. But what have I to doe with such cookery and Apicius?

Lampreies.

Beneath Holt, Severne openeth his East banke to let in the river Salwarp comming a pace toward him. This hath his first veines out of Lickey hill most eminent in the North part of this Shire, neare unto which at Frankeley the family of the Littletons was planted by Iohn Litleton, aliàs Westcote the famous Lawyer, Justice in the Kings Bench in the time of King Edward the fourth, to whose Treatise of Tenures the students of our Common Law are no lesse beholden, than the Civilians to Iustinians Institutes. But to returne: This Salwarp which we speake of runneth downe by Bromesgrove a mercate towne not of the meanest reckoning and not far from Grafton the seat of a yonger family of the Talbots, since King Henry the Seventh gave it to Sir Gilbert Talbot, a yonger sonne of John, the second Earle of Shrewsbury: whom also for his martiall valour and singular wisdome he admitted into the society of the Order of the Garter, and made Governor of Callis. Then runneth Salwarp downe to Droitwich (Durt-wich some terme it, of the Salt pits and the wettish ground on which it standeth, like as Hyetus in Böetia tooke name of the durty situation) where three fountaines yeelding plenty of water to make Salt of, divided a sunder by a little brooke of fresh water passing betweene, by a peculiar gift of nature spring out: out of which most pure white Salt is boiled for sixe moneths every yeere, to wit, from Midsommer to Midwinter, in many set fornaces round about. Wherewith what a mighty deale of wood is consumed, Fekenham Forest (where trees grew sometime thicker) and the woods round about, if men hold their peace, will by their thinnesse, make manifest more more and more. But if I ſhould write that the learned Canoniſt Richard de la Wich Biſhop of Chicheſter, here borne, obtained with his fervent prayers theſe Salt ſprings out of the bowels of the earth, I feare me, leaſt ſome might thinke me both over injurious to the providence of God, and alſo too credulous of old wives traditions. Yet were our anceſtours in their pious devotion ſo haſty of beleefe, that they did not onely give credit hereto, yea and recorde it in their writings, but in conſideration heereof, yeelded unto that Prelate in ſome ſort divine honour, when Pope Urban the Fourth had for his ſanctity, and ſincere integrity of life canonized him a Saint. But before that ever this Richard was borne, Gervaſe of Tilbury wrote thus of theſe Salt ſprings, though not altogether truely. In the Biſhopricke of Worceſter there is a country towne not farre from the City named Wich, in which at the foote of a certaine little hill, there runneth a moſt freſh water: in the banke whereof are ſeene a few pits or wels, of a reaſonable depth, and their water is moſt ſalt. When this water is boyled in Caudrons, it becommeth thicke and turneth into paſsing white Salt, and all the Province fetcheth and carrieth it, for that betweene Chriſtmas and the feaſt of S. Iohn Baptiſts Nativitie, good the water floweth moſt Salt: The reſt of the yeere it runneth ſomewhat freſh, and nothing good to make Salt: and that which I take to be more wonderfull, when this ſalt water is run ſufficiently for the uſe of the Country, ſcarcely overfloweth it to any waſte: Alſo when the time is once come of the ſaltneſſe, the ſame is nothing at all aid for all the vicinity of the freſh river water, neither is it found in any place neere unto the Sea. Moreover in the very Kings booke which we call Domeſday, we read thus. In Wich the King and Earle have eight ſalt pits, which in the whole weeke wherein they boiled and wrought, yeelded on the Friday ſixteene Bullions.

* Richard de la Wich.

Salwarp having now entertained a ſmall brooke deſcending from Chedeſley, where anciently the family of Foliot flouriſhed, as afterward at Longdon, maketh haſt to Severne which hath not paſſed foure miles farther, before he runs hard by WORCESTER the principall City of this Shire; where he ſeemeth to paſſe with a ſlower ſtreame, as it were, admiring, and wondering thereat all the while he paſſeth by: and worthy it is I aſſure you of admiration whether you reſpect either the antiquity, or the beauty thereof. Certes, for antiquity the Emperour Antonine hath made mention of it under the name of BRANONIUM, and Ptolomee (in whom through the negligence of the tranſcribers it is miſplaced) under the name of BRANOGENIUM, after which name the Britans call it yet Caer Wrangon. In the Catalogue of Nennius, it is named Caer Guorangon, and Caer Guorcon, the old Engliſh-Saxons afterward called it Weogaпe-ceaſtep, and Wiпe-ceaſtep; I dare not ſay of Wire that woody Foreſt which in old time ſtretched farre. Since the Conqueſt, the Latine writers named it Vigornia and Wigornia. Which name Ioſeph the Monke of Exceſter a right elegant Poet in thoſe daies was one of the firſt that uſed (if my memory faile me not:) I meane him that is publiſhed under the name of Cornelius Nepos, in theſe his elegant verſes unto Baldwin Archbiſhop of Canterbury.

In numerum jam creſcit honor, te tertia poſcit Inſula, jam meminit Wigornia, Cantia diſcit,
Romanus meditatur apex, & naufraga Petri
Ductorem in mediis expectat cymba procellis.

A mitre third now waits for thee, for ſtill thine honour growes,
Thee Wigorne ſtill remembereth, now Canterbury knowes:
The See of Rome doth thinke of thee, and Peters ſhip in feare
Of wracke, amid the boiſtrous ſtormes expects thee for to ſteare.

Probable it is, that the Romanes built it, what time as they planted cities at certaine ſpaces and diſtances along the Eaſt banke of Severne, to keepe in the Britans beyond Severne, like as they did in Germany on the South banke of Rhene to repreſſe the incurſions of the Germans. It ſtandeth, in a place riſing ſomewhat with a gentle aſcent, by the rivers ſide that hath a faire bridge with a tower over it: proudly bearing it ſelfe in old time, as I finde it written in an ancient Manuſcript roule, of the Romanes wall: and even now alſo it is well and ſtrongly walled. But the fame and reputation that it now hath hath, ariſeth from the Inhabitants, who are many in number, courteous and wealthy by the trade of clothing; from their faire and neat houſes; from the number alſo of Churches, but moſt of all from the Biſhops See, which Sexwulph Biſhop of the Mercians erected there in the yeere of Chriſt 680. having built a Cathedrall Church at the South ſide of the City, which hath been often repaired, and which the Biſhops and Monkes by little and little have drawne out in length Weſtward, almoſt to the very brinke of Severn. Truly it is a paſſing faire and ſtately building adorned with the Monuments and Tombes of King Iohn, Arthur Prince of Wales, and divers of the Beauchamps; and in theſe daies, it is no leſſe notable by the Deane and Chapter, whom they call Prebendaries placed therein, than it was in times paſt for the Monkes, or the Cloiſter Prieſts: For, preſently upon the firſt foundation, likewas in other religious houſes of England, married Prieſts were placed heere, who carrying a long time a great opinion of holineſſe governed the Churches, untill that Dunſtane Archbiſhop of Canterbury had decreed in a Synode, That from thence forward the religious men in England ſhould live a ſingle life. For then Oſwald Biſhop of this City who promoted the Monaſticall life as buſily as any whoſoever, remooved the Prieſts, and brought in Monkes. Which King Eadgar teſtifieth in theſe words, The Monaſteries as well of Monkes, as of Virgins have beene deſtroied, and quite neglected throughout England, which I have now determined to repaire to the glory of God, for my ſoules health, and ſo to multiply the number of Gods ſervants and hand-maides. And now already I have ſet up ſeven and forty Monaſteries with Monkes and Nunnes in them; and if Chriſt ſpare me life ſo long, I am determined in offering my devout munificence to God, for to proceed to fifty, even the juſt number of a Iubilee. Whereupon at this preſent, that Monaſtery which the reverend Biſhop Oſwald in the Epiſcopall See of Wincheſter amply enlarged to the honour of Mary the holy Mother of God, and by caſting out thoſe Clerkes, &c. hath with my aſſent and favour appointed there Monkes the religious ſervants of God; I my ſelfe doe by my royall authority confirme, and by the counſell and conſent of my Peeres and Nobles, corroborate and configne to thoſe religious men living a ſole and ſingle life, &c. Long time after when the ſtate of the Church and Clergy here, partly by the Danes incurſion, and in part by civill diſſentions, was ſo greatly weakened and brought upon the very knees, that in lieu of that multitude of religious perſons whom Oſwald had heere placed, ſcarce twelve remained: Wolſtan Biſhop of this Church about the yeer of the worlds redemption 1090. put to his helping hand, raiſed it up againe, and brought them to the number of 50. yea and built a new Church for them. Wolſtan I ſay, a man not ſo learned (the times then were ſuch) but of that ſimple ſincerity without all hypocriſie, ſo ſevere alſo and auſtere of life, that as he was terrible to the wicked, ſo he was venerable to the good, and after his death the Church regiſtred him in the number of Saints. But King Henry the Eighth ſuppreſſed and expelled the Monkes after they had in all plenty and fulneſſe lived more than 500. yeeres, and in their roomes he ſubſtituted a Deane and Prebendaries, and withall erected a Grammar-ſchoole for the training up of youth. Hard by this Church the bare name and plot of a Caſtle remaineth, which (as wee reade in William of Malmesburies booke of Biſhops) Urſus appointed Sheriffe of Worceſterſhire by William the Conquerour, built under the very noſe and in the mouth well neere of the Monkes, in ſo much as he cut away from them a part of their Church-yard. But this Caſtle through the iniquity of time and caſuality of fire was conſumed many yeeres ago. The City it ſelfe alſo hath been burnt more than once: as being ſet on fire in the yeere of Chriſt 1041. by Hardy-Cnute, who exceedingly incenſed againſt the Citizens, becauſe they had ſlaine his Huſcarles (for ſo they tearmed thoſe domeſticall Gatherers of the Danes tribute) did not only ſet fire on the City, but ſlew the Citizens every mothers ſonne, unleſſe it were thoſe that ſaved themſelves in Beuerlez an Iſland compaſſed in with the River. Howbeit, as we finde written in King William the Conquerours booke, in King Edward the Confeſſours time, It had many Burgeſſes, and for fifteene Hides diſcharged it ſelfe: when the Mint went, every Minter gave twenty ſhillings at London for to receive coyning ſtamps of money. In the yeere 1113. a skarfire that came no man knew how, burnt the Caſtle, caught alſo with the flames to the roofes of the Church.

A Church. Likewiſe in the Raigne of Stephen, in the time of Civill Warres it was twice on fire: but moſt dangerouſly when King Stephen, who had to his owne damage given this City unto Wallerand Earle of Mellent, ſeized it into his owne hands: howbeit he was not able at that time to winne the Caſtle. Nevertheleſſe it raiſed it ſelfe up againe out of the aſhes in a goodlier forme alwaies than it had before: and flouriſhed in a right good ſtate of civill government, governed by two Bailiffes choſen out of 24. Citizens, two Aldermen, and two Chamberlains, with a Common Counſell conſiſting of 48. Citizens. As touching the Geographicall poſition of this City, it is diſtant in Longitude from the Weſt Meridian 21. Degrees and 52. Minutes: and the North Pole is elevated 52. Degrees and 12. Minutes. Anno 15. Stephen R.

B From Worceſter the River Severn running on ſtill Southward, paſſeth beſide Powicke, the ſeat in times paſt of Sir Iohn Beauchamp, whom King Henry the Sixth raiſed up to the ſtate of a Baron: and within a ſmall time, the female heires brought the inheritance to the Willoughbeies of Broke, the Reads, and the Lygons: then runneth it through moſt rich and redolent medowes by Hanley Caſtle, belonging ſometimes to the Earles of Gloceſter, and by Upton a Mercate Towne of great name: where peeces of Romane money are oftentimes found. Not farre from hence upon the banke on the right hand, the Severn beholdeth Malvern-Hills, hills in deed or rather great and high mountaines, which for the ſpace of ſeven miles or thereabout, doe as it were by degrees riſe higher and higher, dividing this Shire from the County of Hereford. On the brow of which Hills, Gilbert Clare Earle of Gloceſter did caſt a Ditch in times paſt, to make a partition betweene his poſſeſſions and the lands of the Church of Worceſter; a peece of worke which is at this day ſeene not without wonder. Over againſt thoſe hils, and in like diſtance almoſt from the other banke, Bredon Hills being farre leſſe, yet in emulation, as it were, to match them, mount aloft: among which Elmſley Caſtle belonging ſometimes to Urſus or Urſo D' Abtot maketh a goodly ſhew: by whoſe daughter and heire Emeline, it came hereditarily to the Beauchamps. At the foote of theſe hills lieth Bredon a Village, concerning the Monaſtery whereof Offa King of the Mercians ſaith thus: I Offa King of the Mercians will give land containing ſeven times five Acres of Tributaries unto the Monaſtery that is named Breodun in the Province of the Wiccij, and to the Church of bleſſed Saint Peter Prince of the Apoſtles there and in that place ſtanding, which Church Eanwulph my grandfather erected to the praiſe and glory of the everliving God. Barons de Powicke. Hanley. Upton. Malvern hils. Bredon hils. Elmeſley Caſtle. Bredon. The booke of Worceſter.

D Under theſe Bredon hils Southward you ſee two villages named Waſhborne (whence came the ſirname to a very ancient and worſhipfull Family in this Tract) ſtanding in a parcell of this Province diſmembred as it were from the reſt of the body: of which kinde there be other parcels here and there ſcattering all about. But what ſhould be the cauſe, I am not able to reſolve, unleſſe haply thoſe that in old time were governours, adjoined to their government their owne lands that lay neere unto the Region which they then governed. Now Avon, from above runneth downe and ſpeeds himſelfe to Severn, who in this ſhire watereth Eoveſham, ſo called, as the Monkes write, of one Eoves, Swinheard to Egwin Biſhop of Worceſter, whereas before time, the name of it was Eath-home and Heath-field. A very proper Towne ſituate upon an hill ariſing from the River: in the Suburb, as it were, whereof, was ſometime Bengeworth Caſtle at the Bridge head; which Caſtle William de Andevill the Abbot recovered by law againſt William Beauchamp, utterly raſed it, and cauſed the place to be hallowed for a Church-yard. A Towne this is, well knowne by reaſon of the Abbay, which that noble Egwin, with the helpe of King Kenred the ſonne of Wolpher King of the Mercians founded about the yeere of our Lord 700. knowne likewiſe for the vale under it, named thereof, The Vale of Eveſham, which for plentifull fertility hath well deſerved to be called the Garnary of all theſe countries; ſo good and plentifull is the ground in yeelding the beſt corne abounda[illegible]. But moſt knowne in elder time by occaſion of the great overthrow of the Barons and our Catiline, Simon Montfort, Earle of Leiceſter. For, this man being of a lewd diſpoſition and profound perfidiouſneſſe, hath taught us that which another truly ſaid, That good turnes are ſo long acceptable, as they Waſhborne. they may be requitable. For, when King Henry the Third had with full hand heaped upon him all the benefits he could, yea and given him his owne ſiſter in marriage, what other fruit reaped he of his ſo great bounty, but moſt bitter and deadly hatred? For, he raiſed a moſt dangerous Warre, hee ſpoiled ſhamefully a great part of England, under pretenſe of reſtoring the common wealth and maintaining liberty: neither left he any thing undone, to bring the King under, to change the State, and of a Monarchy to bring in an Oligarchy. But in the end, after that fortune had for a good while favourably ſmiled upon him, he was ſlaine at this place with many others of his complices by the proweſſe of Prince Edward: and forthwith, the ſinke of lawleſſe rebels, being as it were pumped and emptied out of the common weale, joyfull peace which hee had baniſhed, ſhone againe moſt comfortably on every ſide. Upon the ſame River hard by, ſtandeth Charleton, the poſſeſſion ſometime of the ancient family of Hanſacres, Knights, but now of the Dinleies, or Dingleies, who being deſcended from that ancient ſtocke of the Dinleies in Lancaſhire, came unto this by hereditary ſucceſſion. More beneath, in the primitive Church of our Engliſh Nation, there was another place wherein religious men lived to God, then called Fleotanbyriz, now, Flatbury: and neere unto it Perſhor, in the Engliſh Saxons language Pepiſcopan, taking the name from Peares: which, as we reade in that worthy Hiſtoriographer William of Malmesbury, Egelward Duke of Dorſet, a man bearing no nigardly minde, but exceeding liberall, founded and finiſhed in King Eadgars time. But what detriment hath it ſuſtained? one part of it the ambition of the rich ſeized upon, another part oblivion hath buried; but the greateſt portion King Edward the Confeſſour, and King William beſtowed upon the Church of Weſtminſter.

Then receiveth Avon a Riveret from the North, upon which ſtandeth Hodington a ſeat of the Winters, out of which were Robert Winter and his brother Thomas, who when as they were of the helliſh damned crew in the Gunpowder Treaſon, let their memory lie damned. From thence Avon running gently downe by Strenſham the habitation of the Ruſſels, Knights by degree, of ancient deſcent, in the end out-ladeth his owne ſtreame into Severn.

Neere to theſe places, on this South ſide, is Oſwaldſlaw Hundred, ſo called of Oſwald Biſhop of Worceſter, who obtained it for himſelfe of King Eadgar. The immunity whereof, when William Conquerour made a Survey and taxation of all England, was regiſtred in the Domeſday booke, after this manner: The Church of Saint Mary of Worceſter hath the Hundred called Oſwaldſlaw wherein lye 300. Hides, out of which the Biſhop of the ſame Church by ancient order and cuſtome hath all the revenewes of Sochs and all cuſtomes or duties there, appertaining to the Lords victuall, and the Kings ſervice and his owne: ſo that no Sheriffe may hold there any action or ſuit, neither in any plea nor in any other cauſe whatſoever. This witneſſeth the whole County.

Oſwaldſlaw Hundred.

A place there is about this Shire, but preciſely where it ſhould be, is not certainly knowne, called Augurtynerace, that is, Auguſtines Oke, at which Auguſtine the Apoſtle of the Engliſhmen and the Biſhops of Britaine met, and after they had diſputed and debated the matter hotely for a good while, touching the celebration of Eaſter, preaching Gods Word alſo to the Engliſh Nation, and of adminiſtring Baptiſme according to the rites of the Roman Church, in the end when they could not agree, they departed on both ſides with diſcontented mindes, upon their diſſenting opinions.

Anno Chriſti 603.

This Province ſince the Normans comming in, had for the firſt Sheriffe, Urſus or Urſo de Abtot, unto whom and his heires, King William the Conquerour granted that office together with faire and large poſſeſſions. After him ſucceeded his ſonne Roger, who (as William of Malmesbury the Hiſtoriographer reporteth) enjoying his fathers poſſeſſions, through the high diſpleaſure and indignation of King Henry the firſt was diſſeized thereof, becauſe in a furious fit of anger hee had commanded one of the Kings Officers to be killed. But this Sheriffedome was by Emeline this Rogers ſiſter, tranſlated hereditarily into the Family of the Beauchamps. For, ſhe was married to Walter Beauchamp, whom king Stephen, after he had put downe Miles of Gloceſter, ordained Conſtable of England. Within ſome few yeeres king Stephen created Walleran Earle of Mellent twin-brother Earles of Worceſter. Or, D'Abtot.

A twin-brother to Robert Boſſu Earle of Leiceſter, the firſt Earle of Worceſter, having given unto him the Citie of Worceſter: who afterwards, became a Monke and died at Pratellæ in Normandie, in the yeere 1166. As for his ſonne Robert, who had wedded the daughter of Reginald Earle of Cornwall, and advanced the Standard of rebellion againſt King Henry the Second, and Peter his ſonne, who in the yeere 1203. revolted to the French, neither of them uſed the title of Worceſter, but onely of Mellent, ſo farre as ever I could yet read. For King Henry the Second who ſucceeded Stephen, would not eaſily ſuffer that any under him ſhould enjoy the honors received from Stephen an uſurper, and his enemy. For (as I finde in the Annales of Waverley Abbay) he put downe thoſe imaginary and counterfeit Earles, among whom King B Stephen had inconſiderately diſtributed, and given away all the revenewes pertaining to the Exchequer. Neither to my knowledge, was there any one that bare the title of the Earldome of Worceſter, untill the daies of King Richard the Second. For he beſtowed it upon Sir Thomas Percy, who, when he conſpired againſt King Henry the Fourth, was taken at the battaile of Shrewsbury, and there beheaded. Then Sir Richard Beauchamp deſcended from the Abtots, received afterward this honor at the hands of King Henry the Fifth. Who ſhortly after in the French war loſt his life at the ſiege of Meaux in Brye, leaving one onely daughter married to Sir Edward Nevill, from whom deſcended the late Lords of Abergevenny. Afterward King Henry the Sixth created John Tiptoft, Earle of Worceſter: But when he preſently taking part C with King Edward the Fourth, had applied himſelfe in a prepoſterous obſequiouſneſſe to the humor of the ſaid King, and being made Conſtable of England plaied the part, as it were, of the butcher in the cruell execution of diverſe men of qualitie, himſelfe, when as King Henry the Sixth was now repoſſeſſed of the crowne, came to the blocke. Howbeit, his ſonne Edward recovered that honor when King Edward recovered his Kingdome: But after that this Edward died without iſſue, and the inheritance became divided among the ſiſters of the ſaid John Tiptoft Earle of Worceſter, of whom one was married to the Lord Roos, another to Sir Edmund Ingoldeſthorpe, and the third to the Lord Dudley; Sir Charles Somerſet, baſe ſonne to Henry D Duke of Somerſet, Lord Herbert, and Lord Chamberlaine to King Henry the Eighth, was by him created Earle of Worceſter. After whom ſucceeded in lineall deſcent, Henry, William, and Edward who now flouriſheth, and among other laudable parts of vertue and Nobility, highly favoureth the ſtudies of good literature.

STAFFORD-SHIRE.

THE third Region of the old CORNAVII, now called STAFFORD-SHIRE, in the Englisſh Saxons Language Staþfopð ſcýne, the Inhabitants whereof becauſe they dwelt in the middeſt of England, are in Bede termed Angli Mediterranei, that is, Midland Engliſhmen, having on the Eaſt Warwick-ſhire, and Darby-ſhire, on the South ſide Worceſter-ſhire, and Weſtward Shropp-ſhire bordering upon it, reacheth from South to North in forme of a Lozeng, broader in the middeſt and growing narrower at the ends. The North part is full of Hilles and ſo leſſe fruitfull: the middle being watered with the River Trent is more plentifull, clad with Woods, and embroidered gallantly with Corne fields and medowes: as is the South part likewiſe, which hath Coles alſo digged out of the earth and mines of Iron. But whether more for their commodity or hinderance, I leave to the Inhabitants who doe, or ſhall beſt underſtand it.

Midland Engliſhmen.

Iron.

In the South part in the very confines with Worceſter-ſhire upon the River Stour ſtandeth Stourton Caſtle, ſometimes belonging to the Earles of Warwicke, the natall place of Cardinall Pole; and then Dudley Caſtle towreth up upon an hill built and named ſo of one Dudo, or Dodo an Engliſh Saxon, about the yeere of our Salvation 700. In King William the Conquerours daies, as we finde in his Domeſday Booke, William Fitz-Auſculph poſſeſſed it: afterwards it fell to Noble men ſirnamed Somery; and by an heire generall of them to Sir Richard Sutton knight deſcended from the Suttons of Nottingham-ſhire: whoſe Poſterity commonly called from that time Lords of Dudley, but ſummoned to Parliament firſt by King Henry the Sixth, grew up to a right honourable Family.

Dudley caſtle.

Under this lyeth Penſneth Chace, in former times better ſtored with game; wherein are many Cole-pits, in which, as they reported to mee, there continueth a fire begunne by a candle long ſince through the negligence of a grover or digger. The ſmoke of this fire, and ſometime the flame is ſeene, but the ſavour oftener ſmelt: and other the like places were ſhewed unto mee not farre off. North-Weſtward upon the Confines of Shropp-ſhire, I ſaw Pateſhull a ſeat of the Aſtleies deſcended from honourable Progenitours; and Wroteſley an habitation of a Race of Gentlemen ſo ſirnamed, out of which Sir Hugh Wroteſley, for his approoved valour, was choſen by King Edward the Third Knight of the Garter, at the firſt inſtitution, and ſo accounted one of the founders of the ſaid honourable Order. Next after this, the memorable places that wee meet with in this Tract, more inwardly, are theſe, Chellington, a faire houſe and Manour of the ancient Family of the Giffards: which in the Raigne of Henry the Second Peter Corbuchin gave to Peter Giffard, upon whom alſo Richard Strongbow, that Conquerour of Ireland, beſtowed in free gift Tachmelin and other Poſſeſſions in Ireland. Theoten hall, which is by interpretation, The habitation of Heathens, or Pagans, at this day Tetnall embrued with Daniſh bloud in the yeere 911. by King Edward the Elder in a bloudy Battaile. Ulfrunes Hampton, ſo called of Wulfruna a moſt godly and devout woman, who enriched the Towne (called before ſimply Hampton) with a religious Houſe: and for Wulfrunes Hampton it is corruptly called Wulver Hampton: The greateſt name and note whereof, ariſeth by the Church there, annexed to the Warden or Deane and Prebendaries of Windſor. Weadsbury, in theſe dayes Weddsborrow fortified in old time, by Æthelfled Lady of the Mercians: and Walſhall a Mercate Towne, none of the meaneſt. Neere unto which the River Tame carryeth his ſtreame, which riſing not farre off, for certaine miles wandereth through the Eaſt part of this Shire ſeeking after Trent, neere unto Draiton Baſſet, the ſeat of the Baſſets, who ſpringing

Baſſets. out from Turſtan Lord of this place in the Raigne of Henry the Firſt, branched forth into a great and notable Family. For, from hence as from a ſtocke flouriſhed the Baſſets of Welleden, of Wiccomb, of Sapcot, of Cheddle, and others. But of this of Draiton, Ranulph was the laſt, who being a right renowned Baron had marryed the ſiſter of John Monfort Duke of Britaine, and in the Raigne of Richard the Second died without iſſue.

Tamworth. Then Tame paſſing through the Bridge at Falkeſley (over which an ancient high way of the Romanes went) runneth hard under Tamworth, in the Saxon Tongue Tamaweopð, Marianus calleth it Tamawordia, a Towne ſo placed in the Confines of the two Shires, that the one part which belonged ſometime to the Marmions, is counted of Warwick-ſhire, the other which pertained to the Haſtings, of Stafford-ſhire. As for the name, it is taken from Tame the Riuer running beſide it, and of the Engliſh Saxon word Weorð, which ſignifieth a Barton, Court, or Ferme-houſe, and alſo, an Holme or River Iſland, or any place environed with water: ſeeing that Keyſerwert and Romelſwert in Germanie, betoken as much as Cæſars Iſle and Romels Iſle. Whiles the Mercians Kingdome ſtood in ſtate, this was a place of their Kings reſiance, and as we finde in the Lieger Booke of Worceſter, a Towne of very great reſort and paſſing well frequented. Afterward, when in the Danes Warre it was much decaied, Ethelfled Lady of Mercia repaired and brought it againe to the former ſtate: alſo Edith King Eadgars Siſter, who refuſing Marriage, for the opinion that went of her for holineſſe was regiſtred in the roll of Saints, founded heere a little houſe for Nunnes and veiled Virgins, which after ſome yeeres, was tranſlated to Polleſworth by the Marmions of Normandie, Lords heereof; at what time they erected heere a Collegiat Church, wherein are ſeene ſome of their Sepulchres; and builded a faire Caſtle, which from them by the Frevills came to the houſe of thoſe Ferrars, that deſcended from a younger brother of the Barons Ferrars of Groby. Thoſe Marmions as wee finde written, were by inheritance the Kings Champions of England. For, whenſoever any new king of England is crowned, the heire of this Family was bound to ride armed in compleat harneis upon a barbd horſe into the Kings hall, and in a ſet forme of words challenge to combat with whoſoever durſt oppoſe himſelfe againſt the kings right and Title. And verily it appeareth upon Records, that Alexander Frevill, under king Edward the Third, by the ſame ſervice, held this Caſtle. Howbeit at the Coronation of king Richard the Second, when Baldwin Frevill exhibited his petition for the ſame, it was adjudged from this Family to Sir John Dimock his competitor, deſcended alſo from Marmion, as producing better Records and evidences.

Watling ſtreet. At Falkeſley Bridge aforeſaid (that I may retire a little) that Romane High way Watling ſtreet, of which I have already ſpoken and muſt often ſpeake, entreth into this Shire, and cutting it through (as it were by a ſtreight line) goeth Weſtward into Shropp-ſhire. Which Streete I have I aſſure you throughly viewed and Etocetum. peruſed, to finde out that ETOCETUM which Antonine the Emperour ſetteth downe for the next ſtation from MANVESSEDUM or Manceſter in Warwick-ſhire: and ſurely by good happe I have now found it; and freely confeſſe that heeretofore I was farre wide and quite out of the way. For, juſt at the ſame diſtance that Antonine ſetteth betweene MANVESSEDUM, and ETOCETUM, I lighted upon the carkaſſe of an old little Towne upon the ſaid High way, and ſcarce a mile Southward from Lichfield, a Biſhops See right well knowne. The name of the place at this day is in our common language, Wall, of the Reliques of an old wall there remaining and taking up much about two acres of ground, which they call Caſtle croft, as one would ſay, The Caſtle Field. Over againſt which on the other ſide of the ſtreet the Inhabitants relate by a tradition from their forefathers, that there ſtood an ancient Towne, deſtroyed long before the Conqueſt. And they ſhew the very place, where by the maine foundation they gheſſe the Temple there ſtood, and with all they produce peeces of money, coined by the Roman Emperours and found there, as moſt certaine teſtimonies in this behalfe. But (that which maketh moſt for the proofe heereof) from hence leadeth the Romane Way called Watling ſtreet, with a faire

Wall.

A a faire, apparent, and continued cauſey, in manner, throughout, untill it bee broken off with the River Penck, and hath upon it a Stone-bridge at PENNO CRUCIUM, ſo named of the River, juſt at the ſame diſtance that Antonine ſetteth downe. Which hath not yet laied away ſo much as the name, for in ſteed of PENNOCRUCIUM it is now called Penck-ridge. But at this day it is little better than a Village, famous for an Horſe-Faire which the Lord of the place Hugh Blunt, obtained of King Edward the Second. From hence, that way hath nothing memorable upon it in this Shire, but a little way off is Brewood a Mercate Towne, where the Biſhops of this Dioceſſe had an habitation before the Conqueſt: and then neere unto Weſton is a cleere Poole ſpread very broad, by which that notable way holdeth on a direct B courſe to Oken-Yate in Shrop-ſhire. Penck-ridge.

Now are wee to viſite the middle part of this Shire which Trent watereth: in the deſcription whereof, I purpoſe to follow the courſe and windings of the River, from the very ſpring and head thereof, as my beſt guide. Trent that by his due right challengeth to himſelfe the third place among all the Rivers of England, runneth out of two Fountaines being neere neighbours together in the North part of this ſhire among the moores. Certaine unskilfull, and idle headed, have dreamed that it was ſo named of Trent a French word that ſignifieth Thirty, and thereupon alſo have feigned, that thirty Rivers runne into it, and as many kindes of fiſhes live therein, the names whereof the people dwelling thereby were wont to ſing in an Engliſh rhyme: C neither make they doubt to aſcribe that unto this Trent, which the Hungarians avouch of their River Tibiſcus, namely, that two parts of it are water, and the third fiſh. The River Trent.

From his ſpring heads Trent trickleth downe firſt Southward fetching many a compaſſe, not farre from New Caſtle under Lime, ſo called of another more ancient Caſtle that flouriſhed in times paſt hard by at Cheſterton under Lime: where I ſaw tottered and torne the walls of a Caſtle, which by the gift of King John, belonged firſt unto Ranulph Earle of Cheſter, and afterwards by the bounteous favour of King Henry the Third, unto the Houſe of Lancaſter. Thence by Trent-ham, ſometime Tricing-ham, a little Monaſtery of that holy virgin Saint Werburg of the bloud royall, hee haſteneth to Stone a Mercate Towne, which having the beginning in the D Saxons time, tooke that name of the Stones, that our Anceſtours after a ſolemne ſort had caſt on a heape to notifie the place where Wolpher that heatheniſh King of the Mercians, moſt cruelly ſlew his two ſonnes Wulfald and Rufin, becauſe they had taken upon them the profeſſion of Chriſtianity. New Caſtle under Lyme. Trentham. Stone.

In which place when Poſterity in memoriall of them had conſecrated a little Church, ſtraight wayes there aroſe and grew up a Towne, which of thoſe ſtones, had the name Stone given unto it, as the Hiſtory of Peterborrough hath recorded. Beyond Stone runneth Trent mildly by Sandon, the ſeat in times paſt of the Staffords, moſt worthy Knights, but lately by inheritance from them, of Sampſon Erdeſwicke, a very great lover, and diligent ſearcher of venerable Antiquity, and in this E regard no leſſe worthy of remembrance than for that he is directly in the male line deſcended from Sir Hugh Vernon Baron of Shipbroc, the name being changed, by the uſe of that age according to ſundry habitations, firſt into Holgrave, and afterwards into Erdeſwicke. Erdeſwick. Names altered according to divers habitations.

Heere Trent turneth his courſe aſide Eaſtward, and on the South hath Canocwood, commonly called Cankwood, ſpred farre and wide, and at length entertaineth the River Sow, which breaketh out in a hard Country neere Healy Caſtle, built by the Barons of Aldalegh, or Audley, unto whom Hervey Lord Stafford gave that place; like as Theobald Verdon, gave Aldelegh it ſelfe. Cankwood. LL. Audley.

This hath beene a Family of high reſpect and great honour, and of the ſame ſtem F out of which the Stanleies Earles of Darby derive their Deſcent. Strange it is to reade, what lands King Henry the Third confirmed unto Henry Audeley, which were beſtowed upon him by the bounty of the Peeres; yea and private Gentlemen, not only in England but alſo in Ireland, where Hugh Lacy Earle of Vlſter gave him lands with * the Conſtableſhip of Vlſter. So that doubtleſſe he was either a man of rare vertue, or a gracious favourite, or a great Lawyer; or elſe all jointly. His poſterity matched in marriage with the heires of the Lord Giffard of Brimsfield, of Baron Martin Lord of Keimeis, and Barſtaple; and a younger brother of this houſe with one of the heires of the Earle of Gloceſter, and was by King Edward the Third created Earle of Gloceſter. About which time James Lord Audley flouriſhed in Chivalry, who (as the French write) being grievouſly wounded in the battaile at Poitiers, when the blacke Prince with many comfortable commendations had given him 400. Markes of yeerely revenewes; he beſtowed the ſame forthwith upon his foure Eſquires, who alwaies valiantly attended him, and ſatisfied the Prince, doubting that his gift was too little for ſo great ſervice, with this anſwer, dutifully acknowledging his bounty: It is meet that I doe well for them who deſerved beſt of me. Theſe my Eſquiers ſaved my life amidſt my enemies: And God be thanked, my anceſtours have left me ſufficient revenewes to maintaine me in your ſervice. Whereupon the Prince approving this prudent liberality, both confirmed his gift to his Eſquires, and aſſigned him moreover lands to the value of ſix hundred Markes yeerely. But by his daughter one of the coheires to her brother, the Title of Lord Audley came afterward to the Touchets, and in them continueth. Neither muſt I heere paſſe over in ſilence an houſe in this tract called Gerards Bromley, both for the magnificence thereof, and alſo becauſe it is the principall ſeat of Sir Thomas Gerard, whom King James in the firſt yeere of his Raigne created Baron Gerard of Gerards Bromley.

This Sow as it were a parallell river unto Trent runneth even with him, and keeping an equall diſtance ſtill from him, by Chebſey, which had in times paſt for Lords thereof the Haſtangs reputed among the prime Nobility in the time of King Edward the Firſt; not farre from Eccleſhall the habitation of the Biſhop of Lichfield, and Ellenhall which was ſometime the ſeat of the Noels a worſhipfull houſe, who founded heere a Monaſtery at Raunton, and from whom it deſcended hereditarily to the Harcourts, who being of the ancient Norman nobility, flouriſhed a long time in great dignity. But yet of the male heires of the Noels there remaine ſtill Sir Edward Noel of Daby in Leiceſter-ſhire, and the Noels of Wellesborow in Leiceſter-ſhire, with others. Then runneth Sow under Stafford, in times paſt called Statford, and before time Bethney, where Bertelin reputed a very holy man led in ancient times an Eremits life in ſerving God. And King Edward the Elder built on the South banke of the River a Caſtle in the yeere of Chriſt 914. What time as King William the Conqueror regiſtred the Survey of all England, as we reade in his Domeſday Booke, The King had in it only 18. Burgeſſes in his owne domaine, and 20. Manſions of the honour of the Earle: it paid for all cuſtomes nine pounds of deniers, and had thirteene Chanons, Prebendaries who held in franke Almoine: and the King commanded a Caſtle to bee made, which now is deſtroyed. But then, as now alſo, it was the head Towne of the whole Shire: howbeit the greateſt credite and honor thereof came from Stafford Caſtle adjoyning, which the Barons of Stafford, of whoſe progeny were the Dukes of Buckingham, built for their owne ſeat, who procured of King John that it was made a Burrough with ample liberties, cauſed it to be partly fenſed with a Wall, and erected a Priory of Blacke Chanons to the honour of Saint Thomas of Canterbury: Beneath which, the Riveret Penke, which gave name to Pennocrucium or Penkridge, whereof I have already ſpoken, joyneth with that Sow aforeſaid. And neere unto the confluence of Sow and Trent ſtandeth Ticks hall, the dwelling place of the Aſtons, a Family which for antiquity, kinred, and alliance, is in theſe parts of great name.

Trent having harboured theſe rivers in his chanell, paſſeth now through the mids of the Shire with a gentle ſtreame, taking a view of Chartley Caſtle ſtanding two miles aſide from the banke on the left hand: which Caſtle came from Ranulph Earle of Cheſter, who built it, unto the Ferrars by Agnes his ſiſter, whom William Ferrars Earle of Darby had marryed: out of whoſe Race the Lords Ferrars of Chartley flouriſhed: and Anne the Daughter of the laſt of them brought this Honour

On the right side of the river about the same distance, standeth most pleasantly among the woods, Beaudesert, the lodge in times past of the Bishops of Lichfield, but now the house of the Lord Paget. For Sir William Paget, who for his approoved wisdome both at home and abroad, stood in high favour with King Henry the Eight, and King Edward the Sixth, and obteined at their hands faire possessions, was by the said K. Edward the Sixth created Lord Paget of Beaudesert. He was (that I may note so much out of his Epitaph) Secretary, and Privy Counsellour to King Henry the Eighth, and appointed by his Testament Counsellour and aidor to King Edward the Sixth, during his minority. To whom he was Chauncellor of the Dutchy of Lancaster, Controller of the house, and by him made, as I said, Baron and knight of the Garter, as by Queene Mary Lord Privy Seale: Whose grandsonne William is now the fourth Baron Pagets, and for his vertue and studies of the best arts, is an honour to his house, and in this respect deserveth to be honorably remembred. Beaudesert. L.L. Paget.

From thence may you descrie Lichfield, scarce foure miles from this right-side banke of Trent. Bede calleth it Licidfeld, which Rosse of Warwick interpreteth, Cadaverum campus, that is, The field of dead bodies, and reporteth that a number of Christians were there Martyred under the persecutor Diocletian. This City is low seated, of a good largenesse and faire withall, divided into two parts with a shallow poole of cleere water: which parts notwithstanding joyne in one by the meanes of two bridges or causeies made over, that have their sluces to let out the water. The South part, which is on the hither side is the greater, consisting of divers streets, hath in it the schoole, and an hospitall of Saint John, founded for reliefe of the poore. The farther part is the lesse, but beautified with a very goodly Cathedrall Church, which being round about compassed with a faire wall castle-like, and garnished beside with faire houses of Prebendaries, and with the Bishops palace also, doth mount upon high with three pyramids or spires of stone making an excellent shew, and for elegant and proportionall building, yeeldeth to few Cathedrall Churches. Lichfield.

In this place many ages past, a Bishops See was established, for in the 656. yeere after the Worlds redemption, Oswie King of Northumberland, having vanquished the Mercians, as then Pagans, for the propagation of Christs true religion, built heere a Church, and ordeined Duina the first Bishop: whose successors found such favour at their Princes hand, that they had not onely the preheminence among all the Bishops of the Mercians, and the greatest possessions given unto them for their use, as Cankwood or Canock a very great wood, and other faire lands and Lordships; but also this Church had an Archbishop that sat in it, namely Eadulph, unto whom Pope Adrian granted an Archiepiscopall Pall, and subjected under him all the Bishops of the Mercians and East Angles; mooved thereunto with golden reasons by Offa King of the Mercians, to spite Lambert the Archbishop of Canterbury, who had promised to aide Charles the Great, if he would invade England. But this Archiepiscopall dignity died together with Offa and Eadulph. But, among all the Bishops of this See * Chadd was of greatest fame, and canonized a Saint for his holinesse, who, as Bede saith, when riotous excesse had not yet possessed the hearts of Bishops, made himselfe a mansion house standing not farre remote from the Church, wherein he was wont secretly to pray and reade, together with a few, that is to say, seven or eight religious men, as oft as he had any vacant time from painefull preaching and ministery of the word unto the people. In those daies, Lichfield was a small towne farre short of the frequency of Cities; the Country about it full of woods: and a little river runneth hard by it. The Church was seated in a narrow roome, evidently shewing the meane estate and abstinence of our ancestours. When as in the Synode holden in the yeere of our Lord 1075. it was forbidden that Bishops Sees should lie obscure in meane and small Townes, Peter Bishop of Lichfield translated his See to Chester: but Robert Linsey his successour remooued the same unto Coventry. About the yeere 779. History of Rochester. * Cedda. Wil. Malmesbur. A.

A little after, Roger Clinton brought it backe againe to Lichfield, and beganne to build in the yeere of Christ 1148. this most beautifull Church in the honour of the blessed virgin Mary at Saint Ceda, or Chad: and repaired the Castle which now is utterly vanished. As for the towne, it was made first an Incorporation in our Fathers remembrance by King Edward the Sixth, by the name of Bailiffs and Burgesses. It seeth the Pole Artick elevated two and fifty degrees and two and forty minutes: and from the farthest point of the West counteth one and twenty degrees and tweny minutes. This Poole of Lichfield being by and by kept and restreined within bankes, and spreading broader the second time, but gathering againe into a chanell is quickly swallowed into Trent, who continueth his course East-ward, untill he meeteth with the river of Tame from the South: with whom Trent being now coupled, turneth aside his streame Northward through places that yeeld great store of Alabaster, that he might the sooner entertaine Dow, and so almost insulateth or encompasseth Burton, a Towne in times past of name, by reason of workers in Alabaster, a Castle of the Ferrars built in the Conquerors time, an ancient Abbay founded by Ulfrick Spot Earle of Mercia, and the retyring place of Modwen that holy Irish woman, who there dedicated her selfe first to the service of God. Concerning which Abbay, the Leger-booke of Abingdon recordeth thus. A certaine servitour of King Ætheldred named Ulfrick Spot, built the Abbay of Burton, and gave unto it all the inheritance that came by his Father, esteemed worth seven hundred pounds, and that this his donation might stand good and sure, he gave unto King Ætheldred three hundred Mankus of gold for his confirmation, and to every Bishop five Mankus, and beside to Alfrick Archbishop of Canterbury, the Towne Dumbleton. Whereby wee may understand, that there was a golden world then, and that gold swaied much yea in Church matters, and among Church-men. In this abbay, the said Modwen, whose holinesse was much celebrated in this tract, lay buried, and upon her Tombe were engraven for an Epitaph these verses.

Ortum Modwennæ dat Hibernia, Scotia finem.
Anglia dat tumulum, dat Deus astra poli.
Prima dedit vitam, sed mortem terra secunda,
Et terram terra tertia terra dedit:

In Ireland Modwen who began, in Scotland tooke her end, England on her a Tombe bestow'd, to Heaven God did her send:
The first of these lands gave her life, the second wrought her death,
And earth to earth in decent sort, the third land did bequeath.
Lanfortin taketh that away, which once Tir-Connell gave,
And Burton blest, whose hap it is this virgines bones to have.

Neere unto Burton, betwixt these three rivers, Dove, Trent and Blith the which watereth and nameth Blithfield a faire house of the ancient and worthy Family of the Bagots; Needwood a very large wood and full of parkes spreadeth it selfe. Wherein the Nobility and Gentlemen dwelling thereabout, take their jolly pleasure and disport themselves in hunting. Thus much of the places in the midle part of this shire.

The River Blith. Needwood Forest.

The North part riseth up and swelleth somewhat mountainous, with moores and hilles, but of no great bigneſſe, which beginning here, runs like as Apennine doth in Italie, through the middest of England with a continued ridge, rising more and more with divers tops and cliffs one after another even as far as to Scotland, although oftentimes they change their name. For heere they are called Mooreland, after a while the Peak, Blackstone edge, then Craven, anon as they goe further Stanmore, and at length being parted diversly, as it were into hornes, Cheviot. This Mooreland, so called for that it riseth higher into hils and mountaines, and is withall lesse fruitfull (which kind of places we call in our language Moores) is a small country verily, so hard, so comfortlesse, bare and cold, that it keepeth snow lying upon it a long while: in so much as that of a little country village named Wotton lying here under Woverhill the neighbor inhabitants have this rime rife in their mouth, as if God, forsooth, had never visited that place.

Wotton

Wotton under Wever,
A Where God came never.

Yet in ſo hard a ſoile it breedeth and feedeth beaſts of large bulke, and faire ſpread. The people heere dwelling obſerve, that when the winde ſitteth Weſt, it is alwaies raine: but the Eaſt and Southwinde, which in other places brew and broach raine, bring faire weather, unleſſe the winde turne from Weſt into the South: and this they aſcribe unto the vicinity of the Iriſh Sea. Out of theſe Moores moſt rivers in this ſhire doe ſpring, but the chiefe are, Dove, Hanſe, Churnet, Teyn, Blith, and Trent himſelfe who receiveth every one of them, and conveieth them all to the Sea. Dow or Dove, whoſe bankes are reared out of ſolid hard lime ſtone, which they burne and uſe for compaſt to manure and enrich their fields with all, doth ſwiftly runne along the B moſt part of the Eaſt ſide of this Country, and ſeparateth it from Darby-ſhire, holding on his courſe in a Cleyiſh channell without any beds or ſhelves of mud, through a ſoile conſiſting of the ſaid Lime-ſtone: from whence it ſucketh out ſuch fertilitie, that in the very middeſt of Winter, the Medowes on both the bankes ſides carry a moſt pleaſant and freſh greene hew: but if it chance to ſwell above the bankes and overflow the Medowes in Aprill, it battelleth them like another Nilus, and maketh them ſo fruitfull that the inhabitants uſe commonly to chant this joyfull note.

The River Dove.

In Aprill Doves flood,
Is worth a Kings good.

C This river in twelve houres ſpace uſeth ſo to riſe, that it harieth and carrieth away with it ſheepe and other cattaile, to the great terror of the people dwelling thereby: but within the ſame time againe it falleth and returnes within his owne bankes: whereas Trent being once up and over his bankes floweth upon the fields foure or five daies together: but now come we to the rivers that run into it. The firſt is Hans, which being ſwallowed up under the ground, breaketh up againe three miles off. Then admitteth he the fellowſhip of the river Churnet, who paſſeth by De-la-Cres Abbay, built by Ranulph the third of that name Earle of Cheſter: by Leike alſo a well knowne Mercat towne, and by Aulton a Caſtle in times paſt belonging to the Barons Verdon (who founded heere the Abbay of Croxden) from whom by the Furnivals it D deſcended to the Talbots Earles of Shrewsbury. A little below runneth Teyn a ſmall brooke into Dove, which having his head not far from Cheddle the ancient ſeat of the Baſſets, who derive their pedegree from the Baſſets of Drayton, creepeth on in ſuch a winding and crooked chanell, that within one mile I was faine to paſſe over it foure times. Neere unto it in Checkley Church-yard, there ſtand three ſtones upright erected in maner of a Pyramides; two of them have little images engraven upon them: but that in the middeſt is higheſt. The inhabitants report by tradition, that a battaile was fought there betweene two hoſts, of which the one was armed, the other unarmed; and that in it were three Biſhops ſlaine, in memoriall of whom theſe ſtones were ſet up. But what Hiſtoricall truth indeed lieth heerein enfolded, I know not as yet: As for E Blith, it hath in this Moreland Careſwell a Caſtlet ſituate upon it which Sir William Careſwell built with great ponds having their heads made of ſquare ſtones, and Draicot, which gave ſurname to a family of great antiquity in this County.

Hans. Churnet. De-la-cres. Aulton. Teyn. Checkley.

But Dove after it hath received Tine having a faire bridge made over it of moſt hard ſtone, and defended with piles runneth under Uttceſter, in the Saxons tongue Uttoxeter, and Uttoxather, ſituate upon the ſide of an hill with a gentle aſcent: a towne more rich in gay flowring medowes, and in cattaile, than faire built; which before I ſaw it (the name was ſo favourable to my conjecture) I thought, in vaine, to have been the ancient ETOCETUM. But now, time hath taught me more certeinty. After this, when Dove is now come neerer unto Trent, it viſiteth Tutbury Ca- F ſtle, in times paſt a large and ſtately thing, which alſo is called Stutesbury, and from an Alabaſter hill top on which it ſtands, threatneth, as it were, the whole country underneath. It was built together with a little Monaſtery by Henry de Ferrars a Noble man of Normandy, unto whom King William the Firſt had given great lands and revenewes in this ſhire: all which Robert de Ferrars Earle of Darby loſt after he had revolted Uttceſter. Tutesbury.

volted a ſecond time from King Henry the Third. For, this Robert, when, after many troubles which he had raiſed in the Barons war, hee was received into the Kings favour, and had bound himſelfe with a corporall oth in expreſſe and formall words that he would continue ever after loyall to his liege Lord, yet was the man of ſuch a ſtirring and reſtleſſe ſpirit, that to break and knap in peeces quite that fortune which he could not bend, he put on armes againſt his Soveraigne, and being at length taken priſoner (that I may uſe the very words of the Record, according to the forme of his obligation) made this great forfeiture both of his fortunes and dignities. There is in ſome place of this ſhire a lake, if Alexander Necham deceive us not, into which no wilde beaſt will in any wiſe enter: but ſince the place is uncertaine and the thing it ſelfe more uncertaine, I will onely put downe underneath theſe his verſes, before which he prefixed this Title.

In his booke entituled the praiſes of Divine wiſdome.

De Lacu in Staffordia.

Rugitu Lacus eſt eventus praco futuri,
Cujus aquis fera ſe credere nulla ſolet.
Inſtet odora canum virtus, mors inſtet acerba,
Non tamen intrabit exagitata lacum.

Of a Lake in Stafford-ſhire.

A Lake there is that roreth loud, whereby things are fore-ſhowne,
The water whereof once to take wild beaſts were never knowne.
Let hounds, let death purſue apace them for to overtake,
For all this chaſe and hot purſuite, none enter will the Lake.

Gervaſe of Tilbury.

Of another Poole or Lake alſo in this Country thus writeth Gervaſe of Tilbury in his Otia Imperialia, unto Otho the fourth. In the Biſhopricke of Coventry and County of Stafford, at the foot of an hill, which the inborne people of the Country have named Mahull, there is a water ſpread abroad in maner of a Meere, in the territory of a Village which they tearme Magdalea. In this Meere or Marſh there is a moſt cleere water (and an infinite number of woods beſide joyning one unto another) which hath ſuch an effectuall vertue in refreſhing of bodies, that ſo often as Hunters have chaſed Stagges and other Deere untill their Horſes be tired, if in the greateſt heate of the ſcorching Sunne they taſte of this water, and offer it unto their Horſes for to drinke, they recover their ſtrength of running againe which they had loſt, and become ſo freſh, as one would thinke they had not run at all. But whereabout this is I cannot yet learne by all my diligent inquiry.

Earles and Barons of Stafford.

As for the title of Stafford, it remaineth ever ſince Robert de Stafford, whom King William of Normandy enriched with great poſſeſſions, even untill our time in his line and progeny. A family as noble and ancient as any other: but upon which fortune hath otherwhiles by turnes both frowned and fawned. For, firſt they were Barons of Stafford, then five of them Earles of Stafford, Ralfe created by King Edward the Third, Earle of Stafford, who married the heire of Sir Hugh Audley Earle of Glocester, Hugh his ſonne who died in Pilgrimage at Rhodes, and his three ſonnes ſucceſſively, Thomas and William, both iſſueleſſe, and Edmund who married the daughter and heire of Thomas of Woodſtock Duke of Buckingham. Afterward three of them were Dukes of Buckingham and Earles of Stafford, &c. as is before ſhewed. By the attainder of the laſt of them, thoſe ſo great inheritances which their moſt honorable marriages brought unto them, floted away as it were, and ſcattered heere and there. In lieu whereof hath enſued a more ſecure quietneſſe, which can never cohabite with Greatneſſe.

See Dukes of Buckingham.

There are accounted in this Shire Pariſhes. 130.

SHROPP-SHIRE.

THe fourth Country of thoſe, which, as I ſaid, the CORNAVII in times paſt inhabited, the Engliſh Saxons called Scipŷp-rcŷpe and Sŋobbe-rcŷpe, wee SHROPP-SHIRE, and the Latiniſts Comitatus Salopienſis, is farre greater than the reſt in quantity, and not inferiour to them either for plenty or pleaſure. On the Eaſt ſide it hath Stafford-ſhire, on the Weſt Montgomery ſhire, and Denbigh-ſhire, on the South ſide Worceſter, Hereford, and Radnor-ſhires, and on the North Cheſhire. It is repleniſhed with Townes and Caſtles ſtanding thicke on every ſide, by reaſon that it was a Frontier Country, or (that I may uſe the tearme of Siculus Flaccus) Ager arciſinius, in regard of repelling and repreſſing the Welſhmen in the Marches bordering heerupon: whereupon our Anceſtours by an ancient word, named the Confines of this Shire toward Wales the Marches, for that they were bounds and limits betweene the Welſh and Engliſh, and divers Noblemen in this Tract were called Barons of the Marche, and Lords Marchers, who had every one in their Territory a certaine peculiar juriſdiction, and in their owne Courts miniſtred law unto the Inhabitants, with ſundry priviledges and immunities, and this among other, that Writs out of the Kings Courts, ſhould in certaine caſes have no place nor runne among them. Nevertheleſſe, if any controverſie aroſe about a Lordſhip it ſelfe, or the limits of Lordſhips, they were to reſort unto the Kings Courts of juſtice. Theſe alſo were in times paſt named in Latin Records Marchiones de Marchia Walliæ, as Marqueſſes of the Marches of Wales, or Lords Marchers, as appeareth evidently by the Red Booke in the Kings Exchequer, where wee reade, how at the Coronation of Queene Æleonor, Wife to King Henry the Third, Marchiones de Marchia Walliæ, &c. that is, The Marqueſſes of the Marches of Wales, (or Lord Marchers) Iohn Fitz-Alane, Raulph Mortimer, Iohn of Monmouth, and Walter Clifford, in the name of the Marches, ſaid it was the right of the Marches to finde ſilver ſpeares and to bring them for to ſupport the foure ſquare purple ſilke cloth at the Coronation of Kings and Queenes of England. But the happy tranquillity of peace betweene Wales and England, and the Kings authority hath by little and little abrogated all thoſe royalties, prerogatives, and priviledges, which the Lords Marchers enjoyed, and inſolently exerciſed over the poore Inhabitants in the Marches.

The Marchers. L. Marchers. Marchiones in old Hiſtories.

The Canopy.

Neither yet doe I thinke (I thought good to ſay ſo much afore-hand) that all this Country belonged anciently to the CORNAVII, but that part onely which is on this ſide Severn: as for that on the farther ſide of Severn, it pertained to the ORDOVICES, who inhabited heere a great Country in this Tract: a parcell whereof, as alſo ſome little Territories on this ſide Severn, which belonged unto the Lords Marchers, were not long ſince laid to this Shire by authority of the Parliament. For, into theſe two parts the whole Shire may bee fitly divided, ſeeing that the River Severn cutteth it through in the mids from the Weſt to the South-Eaſt.

27. Hen. 8.

In that part beyond Severn, the River Temd, in Britiſh Tiſidiaue, for ſome ſpace maketh the South limite, into which at length the River Colun, in Britiſh Colanwy, and called contractly Clun, iſſueth it ſelfe. This River Clun breaking forth farther within the Country, not farre from a pretty Towne well frequented, named Biſhops Caſtle, (becauſe it belonged to the Biſhops of Hereford whoſe Diœceſe and juriſdiction is large in this Shire) giveth name to * Clun Caſtle: which, the Fitz Alans deſcended from one Alan the ſonne of Flaold a Norman (who were afterwards Earles of Arundell) built, when they were Lords Marchers againſt the Welſhmen, and annoyed them with continuall inrodes into their Country. But where it meeteth with Temd, among divers doubtfull Fourds, there mounteth up an Hill of a very ancient memory, which they call Caer Caradoc, becauſe about the yeere of our Salvation

Clun River.

Biſhops Caſtle.

* Coluno caſtrum. Clun Caſtle.

Caer Caradoc. King Caratacus. Tacitus.

vation 53. Caratacus a moſt noble and renowned Britiſh King, raiſed in the front of it a mighty Wall or Rampire of ſtone, and with his people reſolutely made it good againſt Oſtorius Lieutenant for the Romanes and the Legionary Romane Souldiers. Untill the Romans having forcibly broken through that fence of ſtones ſo rudely laid, (the remaines whereof are to be ſeene at this day) forced the unarmed Britans, to quit the place, and flie up to the mountaines. Caratacus himſelfe notwithſtanding eſcaped by flight, but his wife, daughter, and brethren were taken priſoners: And he afterwards, (as adverſity in no place findeth ſafety) being delivered into the hands of Oſtorius by Queene Cartiſmandua (unto whoſe protection he had commited himſelfe) was carried away to Rome, after he had vexed and wearied the Romanes in a long and troubleſome warre. Where hee obtained pardon for himſelfe and his of Claudius the Emperour, not by way of any baſe ſuppliant intreaty, but by a generous and honourable liberty of ſpeech. For the winning of this hill and taking of this King captive, it was decreed, that Oſtorius ſhould have Triumphall Ornaments: neither did the Senate judge the taking of Caratacus leſſe honorable, than when Publius Scipio ſhewed Siphax, and L. Paulus preſented Perſes, two vanquiſhed Kings in triumphant manner at Rome. And although the compiler of our Hiſtory hath made mention neither of this Warre, nor of this worthy Britan, yet the memory thereof is not quite gone with the common people. For, they confidently give out by tradition, that a King was diſcomfited and put to flight upon this hill: and in the Britiſh Booke entituled Triades, among three of the moſt renowned Britans for warlike exploits, Caradauc * Vrichfras is named firſt; ſo that, as I thinke, wee ſhould make no doubt, but that he was this very Caratacus. Then Ludlow, in Britiſh formerly named Dinan, and in later ages Lyſ-twyſoc, i. The Princes Palace, ſtandeth upon an hill at the meeting of the ſame Temd with the River Corve, a Towne more faire than ancient. Roger Montgomery firſt laid unto it a Caſtle no leſſe beautifull, than ſtrong, which hangeth over Corve, and then raiſed a Wall about the Towne that taketh about a mile in compaſſe. But when his ſonne Robert was attainted, King Henry the Firſt kept it in his owne hands: and afterwards, when it was beſieged, it valiantly endured the aſſaults of King Stephen: and during that ſtreight ſiege, Henry ſonne of the King of Scots, being plucked from his ſaddle with an iron hooked engine, had like to have beene haled violently within the Towne wals, had not Stephen in perſon reſcued him, and with ſingular valour delivered him from ſo great a danger. After this, King Henry the Second gave this Caſtle together with the Vale underneath along Corve, which commonly is called Corveſ-dale, to Sir Foulque of Dinan. Afterwards it belonged to the Lacies of Ireland, and by a daughter fell to Sir Geffrey de Ienevile a Poictevin, or, as ſome will have it, of the houſe of Lorain: from whoſe heires it deſcended againe by a daughter to the Mortimers, and from thence hereditarily to the Crowne. Then the Inhabitants in proceſſe of time, built in the very boſome of the Towne, and on the higheſt ground a very faire Church, and the onely Church they have. And ſo it beganne to be of great account and to excell other neighbour Townes adjoyning. And although by King Stephen, Simon Montfort, and King Henry the Sixth it ſuffered much damage in the civill Warres, yet it alwayes flouriſhed againe: and now eſpecially, ever ſince that King Henry the Eighth ordained the Councell of the Marches, not unlike to thoſe Parliaments in France: the Lord Preſident whereof doth for the moſt part keepe Courts and Terme here: which a man could hardly have ſeene at any time without Suites, whether it were for the great ſtate and authority that it carryed, or becauſe the Welſhmen are ſo forward and hote to goe to Law. This Councell conſiſteth of the Lord Preſident, ſo many Counſellers as it ſhall pleaſe the Prince to appoint, a Secretary, an Attorney, a Sollicitour, and the foure Iuſtices of the Counties in Wales.

Burford.

Somewhat lower, upon the River Temd, is ſeene Burford, which from Theodoricke Saie and his Poſterity, came unto Robert Mortimer, and from his poſterity likewiſe unto Sir Geffrey Cornwaile, who derived his Deſcent from Richard Earle of Cornwall and King of the Alemans: and his Race even unto theſe daies hath flouriſhed Cornwaile.

A riſhed under the name of Barons of Burford (but not in the dignity of Parliamentary Barons) whereas it is holden (as we reade in the Inquiſition) of the King for to finde five men for the Army of Wales, and by ſervice of a Baronie. As for thoſe (that I may note thus much by the way) who held an entire and whole Barony, they were commonly in times paſt reputed Barons; and as ſome learned in our common lawes are of opinion, Baron and Barony, like as Earle and Earledome, Duke and Dukedome, King and Kingdome, were Conjugata, that is, Originally yoke-fellowes. When Temd now is leaving Shropp-ſhire behinde it, not farre from the bankes thereof, there raiſe themſelves up Northward certaine hils of eaſie aſcent, Clebill they call them, much commended for yeelding the beſt Barly in great plenty, neither are they without
B iron mines: at the deſcent whereof, in a Village called Cleybury, Hugh Mortimer built a Caſtle, which King Henry the Second forthwith ſo raſed (becauſe it was a nourſery of ſedition) that ſcarce there remaine any tokens thereof at this day: alſo hard by ſtandeth Kinlet where the Blunts flouriſhed. Their name in this Tract is very great, ſo ſirnamed at firſt of their yellow haire; the Family noble and ancient, and the branches thereof farre ſpread. Then ſaw we on the right hand banke of Severn, Brug Morſe (commonly, but corruptly called Bridg-North,) ſo called of Burg or Burrough, and Morſe, a Foreſt adjoyning, whereas before time it was named ſimply Burgh. A Towne, fortified with wals, a ditch, a ſtately Caſtle, and the Severn, which betweene the Rockes runneth downe with a great fall: ſeated alſo upon a Rocke,
C out of which the waies leading into the upper part of the Towne were wrought out, Achelfleda Lady of the Mercians firſt built it, and Robert de Beleſme Earle of Shreweſbury walled it: who, truſting to the naturall ſtrength of the place rebelled againſt King Henry the Firſt, like as afterward Roger Mortimer againſt King Henry the the Second: but both of them with ill ſucceſſe; for they were both forced to yeeld, and ſubmit themſelves, abſolutely to the Kings command. At the Siege of this Caſtle, (as we reade in our Annales) King Henry the Second being levelled at with an arrow, had beene ſhot therewith quite through the body, had not Sir Hubert Syncler a noble and truſty Servitour to the King interpoſed himſelfe, and to ſave the King received both the arrow and his deaths wound withall.

D Before time alſo Sir Raulph de Pichford bare himſelfe ſo valiantly heere, that king Henry the Firſt gave unto him the little Burgh hard by, To hold by ſervice, for to finde drywood for the great chamber of the Caſtle of Burgh againſt the comming of his Soveraigne Lord the King. Willeley or Willey is not farre from hence, the habitation in old time of Sir Warner de Willeley, from whoſe Poſterity by the Harleis and Peſhall, it came to the notable Family of Lacon; advanced by marriage long ſince with the heire of Paſſelew, and of late by the Poſſeſſion of Sir I. Blunt of Kinlet.

There be in like manner other Townes and Caſtles heere and there in this Tract, as Newcaſtle, Hopton Caſtle, Shipton, and upon the River Corve, Corveſham, which Walter Clifford had by the gift of king Henry the Second, alſo Brancroft and Holgot, com-E monly Howgate: which belonged ſometime to the Manduits, then, to Robert Blunt Biſhop of Bath, and afterwards to the Lovells. More higher, are Wenlocke, now knowne for the lime, but in king Richard the Seconds time for a mine of Copper there: But much more knowne in the Saxons dayes for a moſt ancient Nunnery, where Milburga that moſt holy virgin lived in great devotion, and was entombed: the which Nunnery Earle Roger de Montgomerie repaired and repleniſhed with Monkes. In later times Sir Iohn Winell, called alſo Wenlocke becauſe he heere inhabited, for his faithfull ſervice to king Henry the Sixth, was by him advanced to the ſtate and honor of Baron Wenlocke, and elected knight of the Garter; in whoſe cauſe he manfully loſt his life in the Battaile of Tewkesbury, leaving no iſſue: but from his F cozin and heire generall the Lawleys of this County are lineally deſcended. A little more Weſt is Acton Burnell, a Caſtle of the Burnels, and after of the Lovels, made famous by the Court of Parliament there held in the time of king Edward the Firſt. This Family of the Burnells was in old time of great name and antiquity, very much enriched alſo by that Biſhop aforenamed. But it failed and had an end in the Raigne of ſecondly to John Haudlow, whoſe ſonne Nicholas aſſumed to himſelfe the name of Burnell: from whom the Ratcliffes Earles of Suſſex and others draw their pedegree.

Langley. Scarce a mile from hence ſtandeth Langley, ſeated very flat and low in a Parke full of Woods, the dwelling place of the Leas, which may well challenge to be ranged among the Families that are of the better worth and greater Antiquity in this Tract.

Condover. Next unto theſe is Condover, a Manour ſometime of the Lovells, but of late, the poſſeſſion of Thomas Owen, Iuſtice of the Common Pleas and a very great lover of learning. But he hath now taken his quiet ſleepe in Chriſt, and left his ſonne Sir Roger Owen; for his manifold learning, a right worthy ſonne of ſo good a father. This is holden of the King, as we reade in the Records, In chiefe, to finde two footmen one day in the army of B
Wales, in time of warre. Which I note heere once for all, to this end, that I may give to underſtand, that Gentlemen and Noblemen heereabout held their inheritances of the Kings of England by this tenure, to be ready in ſervice with Souldiers for defence of the Marches, whenſoever there ſhould be any warre betweene England and Wales.

Pichford. Neere unto this, there is a little Village named Pichford, that imparted the name in times paſt to the ancient Family of Pichford: now the Poſſeſſion of Oteley, which our Anceſtours (for that they knew not pitch from Bitumen) ſo called

A fountaine of Pitch, or Bitumen. of a fountaine of Bitumen there in a private mans yard; upon which there riſeth and ſwimmeth a kinde of liquid Bitumen daily, skumme it off never ſo diligently, even as it doth in the Lake Aſphaltites in Iewry, in a ſtanding water about Samoſata, and in a C ſpring by Agrigentum in Sicilie. But whether this bee good againſt the falling ſickneſſe, and have a powerfull property to draw, to cloſe up wounds, &c. as that in Iewry, none that I know as yet have made experiment. More Weſtward, you may ſee Pouderbach Caſtle, now decayed and ruinous, called in times paſt Pulrebach the ſeat of Pouderbach. Sir Raulph Butler a younger ſonne of Raulph Butler Lord Wem, from whom the Butlers of Woodhall in Hertford-ſhire are lineally deſcended. Beneath this, Huckſtow Forreſt, ſpreadeth a great way among the mountaines: where, at Stipperſtons hill there

Stipperſtons. be great heapes of ſtones, and little rockes as it were, that riſe thicke together: the

*Or Welſhmen. * Britans call them Carneddau tewion. But whereas as theſe ſeeme naturall I dare not with others ſo much as conjecture, that theſe were any of thoſe ſtones which Giraldus D Cambrenſis ſeemeth to note in theſe words: Harald in perſon being himſelfe the laſt footeman in marching with footemen, and light Armours, and victuals anſwerable for ſervice in Wales, valiantly went round about and paſſed through all Wales, ſo as that he left but few or none alive. And for a perpetuall memory of this Victory, you may finde very many ſtones in Wales erected after the antique manner upon hillockes, in thoſe places wherein he had beene Conquerour, having theſe words engraven.

Caurſe. More Northward, Caurſe Caſtle ſtandeth, which was the Barony of Sir Peter Corbet;

Routon. from whom it came to the Barons of Stafford: and Routon Caſtle neere unto it, the moſt ancient of all the reſt, toward the Weſt borders of the Shire, not farre from Severn, which Caſtle ſometimes belonged to the Corbets, and now to the ancient Family of the Liſters. Before time it was the poſſeſſion of Iohn le Strange of Knocking; in deſpite of whom Lhewellin Prince of Wales laid it even with the ground, as we read in the life of Sir Foulque Fitz-Warin. It flouriſhed alſo in the Romans time under the F

Rutunium. ſame name, tearmed by Antonine the Emperour, RUTUNIUM. Neither can wee miſtake herein, ſeeing both the name and that diſtance from URICONIUM a towne full well knowne, which he putteth downe, doe moſt exactly agree. Neere unto this are Abberbury Caſtle and Watlesbury, which is come from the Corbets to the notable family

A family of the Leightons Knights. As for the name, it ſeemeth to have taken it from that High Port-way called Watling ſtreet, which went this way into the fartheſt part of Wales (as Ranulph of Cheſter writeth) by two little Townes, of that ſtreet called Strettons: betweene which in a valley, are yet to be ſeene the rubbiſh of an old Caſtle called Brocards Caſtle, and the ſame ſet amiddeſt greene medowes, that before time were fiſh-pooles. But theſe Caſtles with others which I am ſcarce able to number and reckon up, for the moſt part of them are now ruinate not by the fury of warre, but now at length conquered even with ſecure peace, and proceſſe of time. Brocards Caſtle.

Now croſſing over Severne unto that part of the ſhire on this ſide the River, which I ſaid did properly belong to the ancient CORNAVII. This againe is divided after a B ſort into two parts by the river Terne running from the North Southward: ſo called, for that it iſſueth out of a very large Poole in Stafford-ſhire, ſuch as they of the North parts call Tearnes. In the hither part of theſe twaine, which lyeth Eaſt, neere to the place where Terne diſchargeth his waters into Severn ſtood the ancient URICONIUM (for ſo Antonine the Emperor termeth it) which Ptolomee calleth VIROCONIUM, Ninnius, Caer Uruach, the old Engliſh Saxons Wreken-Ceaſtep, wee Wreckceter and Wroxceſter. This was the chiefe City of the CORNAVII, built as it ſeemeth by the Romans, what time as they fortified this banke of Severn in this place where the river is full of fourds, as it is not elſewhere lower toward the mouth thereof. But this being ſore ſhaken in the Saxons warre, fell to utter decay in the Daniſh broiles: and
C now it is a very ſmall country Towne of poore Husbandmen, and preſenteth often times to thoſe that aire the ground, Roman Coines, to teſtifie in ſome ſort the antiquity thereof. Beſides them I ſaw nothing of antiquity but in one place ſome few parcels of broken walles (which the common people call The old worke of Wroxceter) This Wall was built of rough ſtone diſtinguiſhed outwardly with ſeven rowes of Britiſh brickes in equall diſtance, and brought up with arched worke inwardly. Uriconium. Wroxceſter.

I conjecture, by the uneven ground, by the Rampires and the rubbiſh of the wall heere and there on either ſide, that the Caſtle ſtood in that very place where theſe ruines remaine. But where the plot of the City lay (and that was of a great compaſſe) the Soile is more blackiſh than elſewhere, and plentifully yeeldeth the beſt
D barley in all this quarter. Beneath this City that Port-way of thoſe Romans, knowne by the name of Watling ſtreet, went, as I have heard ſay, directly (albeit the ridge thereof now appeareth not) either through a fourd or over a Bridge (the foundations whereof were of late, a little higher, diſcovered, when they did ſet a Weare in the River) unto the Strattons, that is to ſay, Townes upon the Streete, whereof I ſpake even now. The ancient name of this decaied URICONIUM, ſheweth it ſelfe very apparently in an hill loftily mounting neere thereunto, called Wreken hill (ſome Writers terme it Gilberts hill) from the top whereof, which lyeth in a plaine pleaſant levell, there is a very delightfull proſpect into the Country beneath on every ſide. Strattons. Wreken-hill.

This Hill runneth out in length a good ſpace, as it were attired, on the ſides, E with faire ſpread trees. But under it, where Severn rolleth downe with his ſtreame, at Buldewas, commonly Bildas, there flouriſhed a faire Abbay, the Sepulture in times paſt of the noble Family of the Burnels, Patrons thereof. Higher into the Country there is a Manſion or Baiting Towne named Watling ſtreet of the ſituation upon the foreſaid Rode way or ſtreet. And hard by it are ſeene the Reliques of Caſtle Dalaley, which after that Richard Earle of Arundell was attainted, King Richard the Second by authority of the Parliament annexed to the Principality of Cheſter, which hee had then erected. Bildas. Dalaley.

And not farre from the foote of the foreſaid Wreken, in an hollow Valley, by that high ſtreet before mentioned, Oken-yate, a little Village well knowne for the plenti-
F full delfe there of pit-cole, lieth ſo beneath, and juſt at the ſame diſtance as Antonine placeth USOCONA both from URICONIUM and alſo from PENNOCRUCIUM that no man need to doubt, but that this Oken-yate was that USOCONA. Neither doth the name it ſelfe gainſay it: for, this word Yſ, which in the Britiſh tongue ſignifieth Lowe, may ſeeme added for to note the low ſituation thereof. On the other Uſocona. Oken-yate.

Charleton. side, beneath this Hill, appeareth Charleton Castle, in ancient times belonging to the Charletons, Lords of Powis: and more Eastward next of all unto Staffordshire, Tong-Castle, called in old time Toang, which the Vernons not long since repaired, as also the College within the Towne, which the Pembridges, as I have read, first founded. Neither have the Inhabitants any thing heere more worth shewing, than a Bell for the bigneſſe thereof very famous in all those parts adjoyning. Hard to this, lieth Albrighton, which in the Raigne of King Edward the First, was the seat of Sir Raulph de Pichford, but now of the Talbotts, branched from the Family of the Earles of Shrewesbury. But above Tong was Lilleſhul Abbay in a woodland Country, founded by the family of Beaumeis, whose heire was marryed into the house of De La Zouch. But seeing there is little left but ruines, I will leave it and proceed forward.

Tong. A

Draiton. Beyond the river Terne, on the brinke thereof standeth Draiton, where in the civill warres between the houses of Lancaster and Yorke, a field was fought that cost many a Gentleman of Cheshire his life. For they, although the battaile was given up almost on even hand, when they could not agree among themselves but tooke part with both sides, were slaine by heapes and numbers on either side. Beneath this Draiton, and nere enough to Terne, lieth Hodnet, wherein dwelt sometimes Gentlemen of the same name, from whom hereditarily it is come by the Ludlows unto the Vernons. It was held in times past, of the Honour of Mont-Gomery, by service, to bee Seneschall or Steward of the same Honour. After this, Terne, having passed hard by certaine little rurall Townes, taketh in unto him the Riveret Roden, and when hee hath gone a few miles further, neere unto Uriconium, of which I spake even now, falleth into the Severn. Upon this Roden, whiles hee is but new come from his spring head, standeth Wem, where are to be seene the tokens of a Castle long since begun there to be built.

This was the Barony, after the first entry of the Normans, of William Pantulph, from whose Posterity it came at length to the Butlers, and from them by the Ferrars of Ousley, and the Barons of Greyſtock, unto the Barons D' acre of Gilleſland. Within a little of this, upon an high hill well wooded, or upon a cliffe rather which sometime was called Radcliffe, stood a Castle mounted aloft, called of the reddish stone Red-Castle, and in the Normans language Castle Rous, the seat in old time of the Audleies, through the liberall bounty of Lady Maude Le Strange. But now there remaineth no more but desolate walles, which yet make a faire shew. Scarce a mile from hence lyeth all along the dead carcasse, as it were, of a small City now well neere consumed. But the peeces of Romane money, and those brickes which the Romans used in building there found, doe testifie the antiquity, and founders thereof. The neighbour Inhabitants use to call it Bery, as one would say Burgh, and they report that it was a most famous place in King Arthurs daies, as the common sort ascribe whatsoever is ancient and strange to King Arthurs glory.

Red-castle. C

Morton Corbet. Then, upon the same River Morton Corbet, anciently an house of the Family of Turet, afterward a Castle of the Corbets, sheweth it selfe, where within our remembrance, Robert Corbet, carryed away with the affectionate delight of Architecture, began to build in a barraine place a most gorgeous and stately house, after the Italians modell: But death prevented him, so that he left the new worke unfinished and the old Castle defaced. These Corbets are of ancient Nobility in this Shire, and held Lordships by service, of Roger Montgomery Earle of this County, about the comming in of the Normans, for Roger the son of Corbet held Huclebec, Hundeſlit, Acton, Fernleg, &c. Robert, the sonne of Corbet, held land in Uleſtanton, Roilinghop, Branten, and Udecot. And in later ages this family farre and fairely propagated received encrease both of revenew and great alliance by the marriage of an heire of Hopton. More Southward standeth Arcol the habitation of the Newports knights of great worship, descended from the Barons Grey of Codnor, and the Lords of Motbwy: and neere unto it is Hagmond Abbay, which the Lords Fitz Alanes if they did not found, yet they most especially endowed.

Not much lower upon Severn standeth most pleasantly the famouſest City (for so it was called in Domeſday booke) of this Shire (risen by the ruine of Old Uriconium) which

A which wee at this day call Shrewsbury and Shrowsbury, having mollified the name, whereas our Anceſtours called it Scrobbes-byrig, for that it was anciently a very thicket of ſhrobs upon an hill. In which ſenſe both the Greekes tearmed their Beſſa, and our Welſh Britans named this alſo Pengwerne, that is, The high plot planted with Alders, and a Palace ſo named continued heere a long time. But whence it is that it is called now in the Britiſh tongue Ymwithig, and by the Normans Scropesbery, Sloppesbery, and Salop, and in the Latin tongue Salopia, I am altogether ignorant, unleſſe it ſhould bee the ancient name Scobbes-beng diverſely diſtorted and dis-jointed. Yet ſome skilfull in the Britiſh tongue, thinke verily it is called Ymwithig, as one would ſay, Placentia or Plaiſance, of a Britiſh word Mewithau, and that their Poets the Bardi ſo named it, becauſe of all others, it beſt pleaſed the Princes of Wales in times paſt. Shrewsbury.

B It is ſeated upon an Hill of a reddiſh earth, and Severn, having two very faire Bridges upon it, gathering himſelfe in manner round in forme of a circle, ſo compaſſeth it, that were it not for a ſmall banke of firme land, it might goe for an Iſland. And thence it is that Leland the Antiquarian Poet wrote thus:

Edita Penguerni latè faſtigia ſplendent,
Urbs ſita lunato veluti mediamnis in orbe,
Colle tumet modico, duplici quoque ponte ſuperbit,
Accipiens patriâ ſibi linguâ nomen ab alnis.

C

The buildings high of Shrewsbury doe ſhine both farre and nere,
A Towne within a River ſet, an Iſland as it were,
Mounted upon a prety hill, and Bridges hath it twaine,
The name it tooke of Alder trees in Britiſh tongue they ſayne.

Neither is it ſtrengthned onely by nature, but fortified alſo by art: for Roger of Montgomery, unto whom by the Conquerors gift it was allotted, pulling downe 50. houſes or thereabout, built a ſtrong ſtately Caſtle on the North ſide upon a riſing rocke, and Robert his ſon when hee revolted from King Henry the Firſt, walled it a-

D bout, on that ſide where it was not fenſed with the River, which notwithſtanding never, that I know of, ſuffered aſſault or hoſtility but once in the Barons Warre againſt King John. At the firſt entring of the Normans it was a City well inhabited and of good trade. For, as we reade in Domeſday booke, In King Edward the Confeſſors time it paid Gelt according to an hundred Hides: In the Conquerours time, it paid yeerely ſeven pounds and ſixteene ſhillings de Gablo: They were reckoned to bee two hundred and fifty two Citizens: whereof twelve were bound to watch about the Kings of England when they lay at this City, and as many to accompany them when they went forth on hunting. Which I would verily thinke to have beene ordained, becauſe not many yeeres before Edricke Streona Duke of the Mercians, a man notoriouſly diſteined with wicked-

E neſſe, lay in wait heere for Prince Aſhelm, and ſlew him as he rode on hunting. At which time (as that Booke ſheweth) the cuſtome was in this City, That a woman taking, howſoever it were, a husband, if ſhe were a widdow, gave unto the King twenty ſhillings; if a maide, tenne, in what manner ſoever ſhe tooke a man. But to returne unto our matter, the ſaid Earle Roger not onely fortified it, but alſo adorned it with other buildings both publique and private, yea and founded a very goodly Abbay to the honour of Saint Peter and Saint Paul, unto which he granted many Poſſeſſions, and therewith, Saint Gregories Church, And namely in that tenour, (I exemplifie the words out of the private Hiſtory of the ſaid Abbay) That when the Chanons who held Prebends therein ſhould any of them die, the ſaid Prebends ſhould come unto the Demaine and Poſſeſſion of the Prebends paſſing hereditarily.

F Monkes. Whereupon aroſe no ſmall controverſie: For, the ſonnes of the ſaid Chanons ſued the Monkes at Law, that they might ſucceed in their fathers Prebends. For, at that time, the Chanons and Prieſts in England were married, and it grew to be a cuſtome, that Eccleſiaſticall livings ſhould deſcend by inheritance to the next of the bloud. But this controverſie was decided under King Henry the Firſt, and concluded it was, that the heire ſhould not ſucceed in Eccleſiaſticall Livings; yea and about that time lawes were enacted touching the ſingle life of Prieſts. Soone after in proceſſe of time, other Churches alſo were heere erected. For, to ſay nothing of the houſes or Frieries of Dominicans, Franciſcans, and Auguſtine Friers, which the Charletons, Jenevils, and Staffords founded, there were two Collegiat Churches erected, Saint Chadds with a Deane and ten Prebendaries, and Saint Maries with a Deane likewiſe and nine Prebendaries. And even at this day, a faire and goodly City it is, well frequented and traded, full of good merchandiſe, and by reaſon of the Citizens painfull diligence, with cloth making and traffique with Welſhmen, rich and wealthy. For, hither, almoſt all the commodities of Wales, doe conflow as it were to a common Mart of both Nations. Whereupon it is inhabited both with Welſh and Engliſh ſpeaking both languages: who among other things deſerve eſpeciall commendation for this, in that they have ſet up a Schoole for the training up of children, wherein were more Schollers in number, when I firſt ſaw it, than in any one Schoole throughout all England againe: unto which Thomas Aſton the firſt head Schoolmaſter a right good man procured by his meanes a very honeſt Salarie and Stipend for the Teachers. It ſhall not now I hope bee impertinent to note, that when diverſe of the Nobility conſpired againſt King Henry the Fourth with a purpoſe to advance Edmund Mortimer Earle of March to the Crowne, as the undoubtfull and right heire, whoſe father King Richard the Second had alſo declared heire apparent: and Sir Henry Percy called Hote-ſpurre then addreſſed himſelfe to give the aſſault to Shrewsbury: upon a ſuddaine all their deſignes were daſhed, as it were, from above. For the King with ſpeedy marches was upon his backe before hee imagined. To whom yet the young Hote-ſpurre with courageous reſolution gave battaile, and after a long and doubtfull fight, wherein the Scotiſhmen, which followed him, ſhewed much manly valour, (when the Earle of Worceſter his Unckle, and the Earle of Dunbar were taken) hee deſpairing of Victory ran undaunted upon his owne death amiddeſt the thickeſt of his enemies. Of this battaile the place is called Battaile-field. Where the King after Victory erected a Chappell and one or two Prieſts, to pray for their ſoules, who were there ſlaine. As for the poſition of this Shrewsbury, it is from the Iſlands Azores twenty Degrees, and ſeven and thirty minutes diſtant in Longitude, and from the Æquinoctiall Line two and fifty Degrees and three and fifty minutes in Latitude.

From out of this city (I wot not whether it may be thought worth my labour, or pertinent to my purpoſe to relate ſo much) brake forth the laſt time, namely in the yeere of our Salvation 1551. that diſmall diſeaſe, The Engliſh Sweat, which preſently diſperſed over the whole Realme, made great mortality of people eſpecially thoſe of middle age: for, as many as were taken ſuddenly with this Sweat, within one foure and twenty houres either dyed or recovered. But a preſent remedy was found, namely that ſuch as in the day time fell into it, ſhould preſently in their clothes as they were goe to bed; if by night and in bed, ſhould there reſt, lye ſtill and not ſtirre from thence for foure and twenty houres: provided alwayes, that they ſhould not ſleepe the while but by all meanes bee kept waking. Whereof this diſeaſe firſt aroſe, the learned of Phyſicians know not for certaine. Some ſtrangers aſcribe it to the ground in England, ſtanding ſo much upon plaſtre (and yet it is but in few places of that nature.) In certaine moiſt Conſtitutions of weather (ſay they) it happeneth that vapours ariſe out of that kinde of Soile, which although they bee moſt ſubtile, yet they are corrupt. which cauſe likewiſe a ſubtile contagion, and the ſame is proportionate either unto the ſpirits or to the thinne froth that floateth upon the bloud. But whatſoever the cauſe is, no doubt there is an Analogie betweene it and the ſubtile parts of bloud: by reaſon whereof within one day the Patient either mends or ends. As for the cauſe let others ſearch: for mine owne part, I have obſerved that this malady hath runne through England thrice in the age aforegoing; and yet I doubt not, but long before alſo, it did the like (although it were not recorded in writing:) firſt, in the yeere of our Lord 1485. in which King Henry the Seventh began his Raigne, a little after a great con-

But perhaps I have inſiſted too long herein; for, theſe may ſeeme vaine toies to ſuch as attribute nothing at all to celeſtiall influence, and learned experience.

Neere unto this Citie, Severne fetcheth many a compaſſe, turning and winding in and out, but ſpecially at Roſſall, where hee maketh ſuch a curving reach that hee B commeth well neere round and meeteth with himſelfe. Heere about is that moſt ancient kinde of boat in very great uſe which in the old time they called in Latine Rates commonly, to wit, Flotes, certaine peeces of timber joyned together with rough plankes and rafters running overthwart, which ſerve to convey burdens downe the River with the ſtreame: the uſe and name whereof our countrimen have brought from Rhene in Germanie, and tearme them as the Germans doe Flotes. By the River ſide, ſtand Shrawerden, a Caſtle ſometime of the Earles of Arundell, but afterwards, belonging to Sir Thomas Bromley, late Lord Chancellor of England: Knocking Caſtle, built by the Lords Le Strange, from whom it deſcended hereditarily unto the Stanleies Earles of Darbie; and neere unto it Neſſe, over which there mounteth up C right a craggie cliffe, with a cave much talked of: which together with Cheſwarden, King Henry the Second gave unto John Le Strange; from whom by divers branches are ſprung the moſt Honorable families of the Stranges de Knocking, Avindelegh, Elleſmere, Blackmere, Lutheham and Hunſtanton in Norfolke. Now from thoſe of Knocking, when as the laſt died without any iſſue male, the inheritance deſcended by Joan a ſole daughter, and the wife of George Stanley, unto the houſe of Darby. Farther from the River, even upon the Weſt frontier of the ſhire, lieth Oſweſtre, or Oſwaldſtre, in Britiſh Croix Oſwalds, a little Towne encloſed with a ditch and a wall, fortified alſo with a pretie Caſtle: and in it there is great trafficke, eſpecially of Welſh Cottons of a ſlight and thin webbe, which you may call in Latine Levidenſus, whereof there is bought and ſold heere every weeke great ſtore. It hath the D name of Oſwald King of the Northumbers (whereas before time it was called Maſerfield) whom Penda the Pagan Prince of the Mercians both ſlew heere in a bloudy battaile, and after he had ſlaine him, with monſtrous cruelty tare in peeces. Whence a Chriſtian Poet of good antiquity verſified thus of him.

But Madoc brother of Mereduc (as Caradoc of Lancarvan writeth) built it, and the Norman Fitz-Allans, who were Lords afterwards thereof, and Earles of Arundell, walled it about. A Eclipses in Aries.

The Eclipses of the sunne in Aries have been most dangerous unto it: for, in the yeers of our Lord 1542. and 1567. when the Eclipses of the sunne in Aries wrought their effects, it suffered very grievous losse by fire. And namely after this later Eclipse, the fire spread it selfe so far, that there were burnt within the Towne and suburbs about two hundred houses. A little beneath this Northwestward there is an hill entrenched round about with a threefold ditch (they call it Hen-Dinas, that is, The old palace) The neighbour dwellers say confidently, it hath been a Citie: but others B there be that thinke it was the Campe of Penda, or Oswald. Scarce three miles from Whittington.

hence standeth Whittington, a Castle not long agoe of the Fitz-Guarins, who deduced their pedegree from Sir Guarin de Metz, a Loraineis: but he tooke to wife the daughter and heire of William Peverell, who is reported to have built Whittington, and begat Fulke the Father of that most renowned Sir Fulke Fitz-Warin, of whose doubtfull deedes and variable adventures in the warres our Ancestours spake great wonders, and Poems were composed. In the reigne of Henry the Third, I finde that licence was granted unto Foulk Fitz-Warin to strengthen the Castle of Whittington, in competent manner, as appeareth out of the Close rolles in the fifth of King Henry the Third.

The life of Fulke, written in French.

Barons Fitzwarin.

The dignity of these Barons Fitz-Warins, had an end in an heire Female, and in the C age aforegoing passed by Hancford unto the Bourchiers now Earles of Bath. Beneath this Whittington, one Wrenoc sonne of Meuric held lands, who for his service ought to be Latimer, that is, Truchman or Interpreter, betweene the English and the Welshmen. This note I out of an old Inquisition, that men may understand what the said name Latimer importeth: which no man almost knew heretofore, and yet it hath been a surname very currant and rife in this kingdome. At the North-west border of this shire, there offer themselves to be seene, first Shenton the seat of the respective familie of the Needhams; Blackemere an ancient Manour of the Lords Le Strange; and then Whitchurch, or Album Monasterium, where I saw some Monuments of the Talbots, but principally of that renowned English Achilles Sir John Talbot the first D Earle of Shrewsbury out of this house: whose Epitaph, that the reader may see the forme of the Inscriptions, according to that age, I will here put downe, although it is little beseeming so worthy and heroicall a Knight.

Latimer what it signifieth.

White-Church. Album Monasterium.

ORATE PRO ANIMA PRÆNOBILIS DOMINI, DOMINI JOANNIS TALBOTT QVONDAM COMITIS SALOPIÆ, DOMINI TALBOTT, DOMINI FURNIVALL, DOMINI VERDON, DOMINI STRANGE DE BLACK-MERE, ET MARESCALLI FRANCIÆ, QUI OBIIT IN BELLO APUD BURDEVVS. VII. IULII, M. CCCC. LIII. E

That is:

Pray for the Soule of the right Noble Lord, Sir John Talbot, sometimes Earle of Shrewsburie, Lord Talbot, Lord Furnivall, Lord Verdon, Lord Strange de Black-Mere, and Mareshall of France: Who died in the battaile at Burdews. VII. Iulii, M. CCCC. LIII. F

Unto this Family of the Talbots there accrued by marriage-right the inheritance of the Barons Le Strange of Blackmere, who were surnamed Le Strange commonly, and Extranei in Latine records, for that they were strangers brought hether by King Henrie

A rie the Second, and in ſhort time their houſe was far propagated. Theſe of Blackmere were much inriched by an heire of W. de Albo-monaſterio, or this Whit-Church, and alſo by one of the heires of John Lord Giffard of Brimsfield, of ancient Nobility in Gloceſter-ſhire, by the onely daughter of Walter Lord Clifford.

More Weſtward lieth Elleſmer a little territorie, but rich and fruitfull, which, as the Chronologie of Cheſter teſtifieth, King John gave with the Caſtle, to Lhewellin Prince of North-Wales in marriage, with Joane his baſe daughter. Afterwards in the time of King Henry the Third it came to the Family of the Stranges. But now it hath his Baron Sir Thomas Egerton, a man whom for his ſingular wiſdome and ſincere equity Queene Elizabeth choſe to be Lord Keeper of the great Seale, and King
B Iames making him Lord Chancellour advanced to the higheſt Honour of the long roabe, and withall adorned with the Honorable title of Baron of Elleſmer. Elleſmer. 1205. Baron of Elleſmer.

Now let us briefely adde ſomewhat of the Earles of Shrewsbury: Roger de Beleſme, otherwiſe, Montgomery, was created the firſt Earle of Shrewsbury by King William the Conquerour, unto whom he allotted alſo the greateſt part of this Shire. After him ſucceeded firſt, his eldeſt ſonne Hugh, ſlaine in Wales without iſſue. Then Robert another of his ſonnes, a man outragiouſly cruell toward his owne ſonnes and hoſtages, whoſe eyes with his owne hands he plucked out and gelded. But afterwards being convict of high Treaſon, he was kept in perpetuall priſon by King Henry the firſt, and ſo ſuffered condigne puniſhment for his notorious wickedneſſe. Then was
C his Earledome made over unto Queene Adeliza for her dowry. Many ages after, King Henry the Sixth in the 20. yeere of his reigne, promoted to this honour Iohn Lord Talbot, whom both Nature bred, and his diſpoſition inured unto warlike proweſſe. And in the 24. yeere of his reigne he beſtowed moreover upon the ſame Iohn, whom in the Patent he calleth Earle of Shrewsbery, and of Weisford, the title of Earle of Waterford, the Barony of Dongarvan, and the Seneſchalſie or Stewardſhip of Ireland. But when he was ſlaine at Caſtilion upon Dordon neere Burdeaux together with his younger ſonne Sir John Talbot Vicount L'iſle, after he had foure and twenty yeeres together marched with victorious armes over a great part of France; his ſonne Iohn by the daughter and one of the heires of Sir Thomas Nevill Lord Furnivall, ſucceeD ded: who fiding with the houſe of Lancaſter was ſlaine fighting valorouſly in the forefront of the battaile of Northampton. From him by a daughter of the Earle of Ormond came Iohn the third Earle of Shrewsbury, and Sir Gilbert Talbot Captaine of Callis, from whom the Talbots of Grafton deſcended. This third Iohn had by his wife Katherine daughter to H. Duke of Buckingham, George the fourth Earle, who ſerved King Henry the Seventh valiantly and conſtantly at the battaile of Stoke. And he by Anne his wife, daughter of William Lord Haſtings, had Francis the fifth Earle who begat of Mary daughter to Thomas Lord Dacre of Gilleſland George the ſixth Earle, a man of approoved fidelity in weighty affaires of State, whoſe ſonne Gilbert by his wife Gertrud daughter to Thomas Earle of Rutland, the ſeventh Earle main-E taineth at this day his place left unto him by his anceſtours, with right great honour and commendation for his vertues. Earles of Shrewsbury. H. Hunt. in his booke of the mileries of life. See in Ireland.

CHES-SHIRE.

THE fifth and laſt of thoſe Countries, which in old time the CORNAVII held, is the County of CHESTER; in the Saxons Tongue Cerꝛen-ſcỳre, commonly CHESSHIRE, and The County Palatine of Cheſter, (for that the Earles thereof had Royalties and princely Priviledges belonging to them; and all the Inhabitants owed Allegeance and fealty to them, as they did to the King.) As for this tearme Palatine, that I may rehearſe againe, that which I have ſaid before of this name, was in times paſt common to all thoſe, who bare any Office in the Kings Court or Palace: and in that age Comes Palatinus, was a Title of Dignity conferred upon him who before was Palatinus, with authority to heare and determine Cauſes in his owne Territory; and as well his Nobles, whom they called Barons, as his Vaſſals were bound to repaire to the Palace of the ſaid Count, both to give him adviſe and alſo to give their attendance, and furniſh his Court with their preſence.

County Palatine.

Petr. Pithœus in the deſcription of Campaine.

This Country (as William of Malmesbury ſaith) Is ſcarce of Corne, but eſpecially of Wheat, yet plentifull in Cattaile and fiſh. Howbeit Ranulph the Monke of Cheſter, affirmeth the contrary: Whatſoever Malmesbury dreamd (ſaith hee) upon the relation of others, it aboundeth with all kinde of victuals, plenteous in Corne, fleſh, fiſh, and ſalmons eſpecially, of the very beſt: it maintaineth trade with many commodities, and maketh good returne. For why, in the Confines thereof it hath ſalt pits, mines, and metals. And this moreover will I adde: the graſſe and fodder there, is of that goodneſſe and vertue, that cheeſes bee made heere in great number of a moſt pleaſing and delicate taſte, ſuch as all England againe affordeth not the like; no, though the beſt dayriwomen otherwiſe and skilfulleſt in cheeſe making be had from hence. And whiles I am writing this, I cannot chuſe but mervaile by the way at that which Strabo writeth, That in his time ſome Britans could not skill of making Cheeſe: and that Plinie afterwards wondered: That barbarous Nations, who lived of milke, either knew not or deſpiſed, for ſo many ages, the commodity of Cheeſe, who otherwiſe had the ſeat of crudding it to a pleaſant tartneſſe, and to fat butyr. Whereby it may be gathered, that the deviſe of making Cheeſe came into Britaine from the Romans. But howſoever this Region in fertility of ſoile commeth behinde many Countries in England, yet hath it alwaies bred and reared more Gentry than the reſt: For, you have not in all England againe any one Province beſide, that in old time either brought more valorous Gentlemen into the field, or had more Families in it of Knights degree. On the Southſide it is hemmed in with Shropp ſhire, on the Eaſtſide with Stafford-ſhire and Darby-ſhire, on the North with Lancaſhire, and on the Weſt, with Denbigh and Flint-ſhires. Toward the North-Weſt it runneth farre into the ſea with a long cantle * or Promontory, which being encloſed within two Creekes receiveth the Ocean on both ſides entring into the land: into which two Creekes alſo all the Rivers of this Shire doe diſcharge themſelves. Into that Creeke which is more Weſterne paſſeth the River Dee that divideth the country from Denbigh-ſhire: into that on the Eaſtſide, both Wever, which runneth through the mids of the Shire, and Merſey alſo, that parteth it from Lancaſhire, iſſue themſelves. Neither ſee I any better way of deſcribing this County, than if I follow the very tracts of theſe Rivers. For, all the places of greateſt note, are ſituate by the ſides of them. But before I enter into any particular deſcription, I will firſt propoſe out of Lucian the Monke, thus much in commendation of Cheſ-ſhire: for he is a rare Author and lived a little after the Conqueſt. If any man be deſirous (ſaith hee) either fully, or as neere as may bee, to treat of the Inhabitants, according to the diſpoſition of their manners, in reſpect of others that live in ſundry places of the Realme. They are found to bee partly different from the reſt of Engliſh, partly better, and partly equall unto them.

The moſt commendable Cheeſes.

* Wirrall.

Lucian the Monke, of the praiſe of Cheſter.

But they ſeeme eſpecially (the beſt point to bee conſidered in generall triall of manners) in A feaſting freindly, at meat cheerefull, in giving entertaiment liberall, ſoone angry, but not much, and as ſoone pacified, laviſh in words, impatient of ſervitude, merciſull to the afflicted, compaſsionate toward the poore, kinde to their kinred, ſpary of their labour, void of diſſimulation and doubleneſſe of heart, nothing greedy in eating, farre from dangerous practiſes, yet by a certaine licentious liberty, bold in borowing many times other mens goods. They abound in Woods and paſtures, they are rich in fleſh and Cattaile, confining on the one ſide upon the Welſh Britans, and by a long entercourſe and transfuſion of their manners, for the moſt part like unto them. This alſo is to be conſidered, in what ſort the Country of Cheſter encloſed upon one ſide with the limite of the Wood Lime, by a certaine diſtinct priviledge from all other Engliſhmen is free, and by the Indulgentes of Kings and Excellencies B of Earles hath beene wont in Aſſemblies of the people to attend upon the Earles ſword rather than the Kings Crowne: and within their precinct to heare, and determine the greateſt matters with more liberty. Cheſter it ſelfe is a place of receit for the Iriſh, a neighbour to the Welſh, and plentifully ſerved with Corne by the Engliſh: Finely ſeated, with Gates anciently built, approoved in hard and dangerous difficulties. In regard of the River and proſpect of the eye together, worthy according to the name to be called a City: garded with watch of holy and religious men, and, through the mercy of our Saviour, alwaies fenſed and fortified with the merciſull aſsiſtance of the Almightie.

Deva. * The River Dee.

The River* Dee, called in Latin Deva, in Britiſh Dyffyr-dwy, that is, the water of Dwy, breeding very great plenty of Salmons, ariſeth out of two fountaines in Wales; C and thereof men thinke it tooke the name: for Dwy in their tongue ſignifieth Two. Yet others, obſerving alſo the ſignification of the word, interpret it Black-water, others againe, Gods water, or Divine water. But although Auſonius noteth that a Spring

Divona.

hallowed to the Gods was named Diuvana in the ancient Gaules tongue (which was all one with the Britiſh) and in old time all Rivers were reputed, Διόπετες, that is, Deſcending from Heaven, yea and our Britans yeelded divine honour unto Rivers, as Gilda writeth, yet I ſee not why they ſhould attribute Divinity to this River Dwy above all others. The Theſſalians, as we reade, gave to the River Pæneus divine honour, for the pleaſantneſſe thereof; the Scythians to Danubius for the largeneſſe; the Germans to Rhene becauſe it was counted a judge in the queſtion of true and undefiled wedlocke: D
But wherefore they ſhould impoſe a divine name upon this River I ſee no reaſon, as I ſaid before; unleſſe peradventure, becauſe now and then it changed the Chanell, and thereby foreſhewed a ſure token of Victory to the Inhabitants upon it, when they were in hoſtility one with another, according as it inclined more to this ſide or to that, after it had left the Chanell: for, thus hath Giraldus Cambrenſis recorded, who in ſome ſort beleeved it: Or elſe, becauſe they obſerved that contrary to the wonted manner of other Rivers, upon the fall of much raine it aroſe but little, and ſo often as the South winde beateth long upon it, it ſwelleth and extraordinarily overfloweth the grounds adjoyning. Peradventure alſo the Chriſtian Britans thought the water of this River to be holy: For, it is written, that when they ſtood ready to joyne battaile E with the Engliſh Saxons and had kiſſed the earth, they dranke alſo very devoutly of this River, in memoriall of Chriſts moſt ſacred and pretious bloud. But, Dee which ſeemeth to ruſh rather than to run out of Wales, no ſooner is entred into Cheſhire

but he paſſeth more mildely with a ſlower ſtreame by Bonium, in ſome written copies of Antonine, Bovium, a City that had been of great name in that age, and afterward a famous Monaſtery. Of the Chore or quire whereof, it was called by the Banchor.

Britans Bon-chor and Banchor, of the ancient Engliſh Bancopna-bypiȝe, and Banchor, and among many good and godly men, it foſtered and brought up (as ſome write) that moſt wicked Arch-heretick Pelagius, who injuriouſly derogating from the grace of God, troubled a long time the Weſt Church with his peſtiferous Doctrine. Proſper Aquitanus in this Verſe of his, termeth him the Britiſh Adder, or Land-ſnake. F

Peſtifero vomuit coluber ſermone Britannus.

A Britiſh Snake, with venemous tongue,
Hath vomited his poiſon ſtrong.

Neither

A Neither have I made mention of him for any other reaſon, but becauſe it is behoveable to each one to know vices and venims. In this Monaſtery, as ſaith Bede, There was ſuch a number of Monkes that being divided into ſeven portions, which had every of them a ſeverall head and Ruler over them, yet every one of theſe had no fewer than three hundred men who were wont to live all of their handy labour. Of whom Edilfred King of the Nordan-humbers ſlew 12. hundred, becauſe they had implored in their prayers Chriſts aſſiſtance for the Chriſtian Britans againſt the Engliſh-Saxons, then infidels. The profeſſion of this Monaſticall life (that I may digreſſe a little) began, when Pagan Tyrans enraged againſt Chriſtians purſued them with bloudy perſecutions. For then good devout men, that they might ſerve God in more ſafety and ſecurity, withdrew themſelves into the vaſt Wilderneſſes of Ægypt, and not (as the Painims are wont with open mouth to give it out) for to enwrap themſelves willingly in more miſeries becauſe they would not be in miſery. Monkery. Rutilius Claudius.

Where they ſcattered themſelves among Mountaines and Deſerts, living in caves and little cells heere and there in holy meditations. At firſt ſolitary and alone, whereupon in Greeke they were called Monachi, that is, Monkes: but after they thought it better (as the ſociable nature of mankinde required) to meete together at certaine times to ſerve God, and at length they beganne to cohabite and live together for mutuall comfort, rather than like wilde beaſts to walke up and downe in the Deſerts. Their profeſſion was to pray, and by the labour of their owne hands, to get living for themſelves, and maintenance for the poore, and withall they vowed poverty, obedience and chaſtity. Athanaſius firſt brought this kinde of Monkes conſiſting of Laymen into the Weſt Church. Whereunto after that Saint Auſten in Africke, Saint Martin in France, and Congell in Britaine and Ireland had adjoyned the function of Regular Clergy: It is incredible, how farre and wide they ſpred, how many and how great Cœnobies were built for them, ſo called of their communion of life; as alſo Monaſteries, for that they kept ſtill a certaine ſhew of ſolitary living: and in thoſe daies none were more ſacred and holy than they, and accordingly they were reputed; conſidering how by their praiers to God, by their example, Doctrine, labour, and induſtry, they did exceeding much good not onely to themſelves, but alſo to all mankinde. But as the world grew worſe and worſe, ſo thoſe their holy manners, as one ſaid, rebus ceſſere ſecundis, that is, Gave backward in time of proſperity. Now let mee returne unto my matter, craving your pardon for this ſhort digreſſion.

After theſe dayes, this Monaſtery fell utterly to ruine; for, in the time of William of Malmesbury who lived preſently after the Normans comming in, There remained heere, as hee ſaith, ſo many tokens of Antiquity, ſo many walles of Churches halfe downe, ſo many windings and turnings of Gates, ſuch heapes of rubbiſh and rammell, as hardly a man ſhould have found elſewhere. But now is left to bee ſeene ſcarcely the face and outward ſhew of a dead City or Monaſtery, and the names only remaine of two Gates Port Hoghan and Port Cleis, which ſtand a mile aſunder, betweene which are found very oft peeces of the Romans money. But, that I may tell you of one thing, this BONIUM or Banchor is not reckoned within this County but in Flintſhire, a peece whereof ſevered (as it were) from the reſt lyeth heere betweene Cheſhire and Shropp-ſhire. That Banchor of which Saint Bernard ſpeaketh in the life of Malachie was in Ireland. Bonium or Banchor is of Flintſhire.

Dee, where he entreth firſt into this ſhire ſeeth above him not farre from his banke, Malpas, upon an high hill: which had in it a Caſtle; and for the bad, narrow, and combrous way was termed in Latin Mala platea, that is, Ill ſtreet, and thence alſo tooke this later name Mal-pas from the Normans, whereas in times paſt the Engliſhmen, almoſt in the very ſame ſenſe, called it Depenbach. The Barony hereof Hugh Earle of Chester gave to Robert Fitz-Hugh: In the Raigne of Henry the Second, William Patricke the ſonne of William Patricke held the ſame: of whoſe line Robert Patricke ſtanding outlawed, loſt it. After ſome few yeeres David of Mal-pas by * a Writ of Recogniſance, gat the one halfe of that Towne which was Gilbert Clerkes: But a great part of this Barony went afterwards hereditarily to thoſe Suttons that are Barons of Dudley: and a part alſo thereof came to Urian Sampier. And from Philip a younger ſonne of David of Mal-pas, is deſcended that worſhipfull family of the Egertons, who Out of the Roll of Domeſday of Cheſ-ſhire. Barons of Mal-pas. Per breve recognitionis.

who tooke this name from the place of their habitation: like as from other places, diverſe Gentlemen of this Race received their ſirnames Cotgrave, Overton, Codington, and Golborn. As touching the name of this place, give mee leave before I depart hence, in this ſerious worke, to inſert a prety jeſt out of Giraldus Cambrenſis. It happened, ſaith hee, in our daies, that a certaine Jew travailing towards Shrewsbury, with the Archdeacon of this place, whoſe ſirname was Peche, that is, Sinne, and a Deane named Devill; when he heard by chance the Archdeacon telling, That his Archdeaconry beganne at a place called Il-ſtreet, and reached as farre as to Mal-pas toward Cheſter: Hee conſidering and underſtanding withall as well the Archdeacons ſirname as the Deanes, came out with this pleaſant and merry conceit, Would it not bee a wonder (quoth hee) and my fortune very good, if ever I get ſafe againe out of this country, where Sinne is the Archdeacon, and the Devill the Deane; where the entry into the Archdeaconry is Il-ſtreet, and the going forth of it, Mal-pas.

Shoclach.

From hence Dee runneth downe amaine by Shoclach, where ſometime was a Caſtle, by Aldford, belonging in times paſt to the Arderns; by Poulefourd, where in the Reigne of Henry the Third, Sir Rauiph of Ormesby had his Caſtle, and by Eaton the ſeat of the famous Family of Groſ-venour, that is, The great Hunter, whoſe poſterity now corruptly goe under the name of Gravenor.

Groſ-venour.

Somewhat higher, upon the ſame River neere unto Dee-mouth, which Ptolomee calleth SETÈIA for Deia, ſtandeth the noble City which the ſaid Ptolomee named DEUNANA, Antonine the Emperour DEVA, of the River, the Britans Caer-Legion, Caer-Leon Vaur, Caer-Leon ar Dufyr Dwy, and by way of excellency Caer, like as our Anceſtours, the Engliſh Saxons Legea-ceaſtep, of the Legions Campe, and wee more ſhort, Weſt-Cheſter, of the Weſt ſituation, and ſimply Cheſter, according to the Verſe.

Deunana. Deva.

Cheſter.

Ceſtria de caſtris nomen quaſi Caſtria ſumpſit.
Cheſter of Caſtria tooke the name,
As if that Caſtria were the ſame.

For theſe Britiſh names, without all doubt were derived from the Twentieth Legion named Victrix: This Legion in the yeere that Galba the Emperour was the ſecond time Conſull, together with Titus Vinius, was tranſported over into Britaine which being out of awe and therefore dreaded of the Lieutenants, as well thoſe which had beene Conſuls as Pretours, had Julius Agricola appointed Lieutenant over it by Veſpaſian the Emperour; was at length placed and ſeated in this City which I ſuppoſe was not built many yeeres before, and ſet as one would ſay at the backe of the ORDOVICES, to reſtraine them: although there are ſome, who avouch it to be of greater antiquity, as they ſay than the Moone: as founded forſooth by Leon-Vaur the Giant, I know not how many hundred yeeres before. But the very name it ſelfe might give the checke unto theſe triviall Antiquaries, and withhold them from ſo groſſe an errour. For, they cannot deny, but that Leon-Vaur in Britiſh ſignifieth A great Legion. Now, whether it ſtands more with reaſon and equity, that a City ſhould take name of a Great Legion, than of Leon a Giant, let the learned judge; ſeeing, that in the part of Spaine called Tarraconenſis, there is a Realme now called Leon of the ſeventh Legion Germanica; conſidering alſo, that the twentieth Legion, which they tearmed Britannica, Valens Victrix, and ſome falſely Valeria Victrix, abode in this City, as Ptolomee, Antonine, and the ancient Coine of Septimius Geta doe prove: by which, it appeareth for certaine, that this City alſo was a Colony: For, in the reverſe or back-ſide thereof ſtandeth this Inſcription COL. DIUANA LEG. XX. VICTRIX. But to teſtifie the Romanes magnificence, there are remaining indeed at this day very few tokens, beſide pavements of foure ſquare checker worke: howbeit in the former ages it preſented many: which, Ranulph a Monke of this City ſhall tell you out of his Polychronicon in theſe his owne words. There be waies heere under the ground vaulted marveilouſly with ſtone worke, chambers having arched roofes over head

Cheſter, a Colony of the Romans.

A head, huge ſtones engraven with the names of ancient men: heere alſo are ſometimes digged up peeces of money coined by Julius Cæſar and other famous perſons, and ſtamped with their inſcriptions. Likewiſe Roger of Cheſter in his Policraticon, When I behold (ſaith he) the ground worke of buildings in the ſtreets laid with monſtrous big ſtones, it ſeemeth that it hath beene founded by the painfull labour of Romans or Giants, rather than by the ſweat of Britans. This City built in forme of a quadrant, foure ſquare, is encloſed with a wall that taketh up more than two miles in compaſſe, and hath eleven pariſhes. But that of S. Johns without the Northgate was the faireſt, being a ſtately and ſolemne building, as appeareth by the remaines, wherein were anciently Prebendaries, and, as ſome write, the Biſhops See. Neere unto the River ſtandeth the Caſtle upon a rocky hill, built by the Earles:
B where the Courts Palatine, and the Aſſiſes, as they call them, are kept twice a yeere.

The houſes are very faire built and along the chiefe ſtreets are galleries or walking places, they call them Rowes having ſhops on both ſides, through which a man may walke dry from one end unto the other. But it hath not continued evermore in one tenor of proſperity. Firſt it was raſed by Egfrid King of Northumberland, then by the Danes, yet reedified againe by Ædelfled Lady of the Mercians: and ſoone after it ſaw King Eadgar in magnificent maner triumphing over the Britiſh Princes. For, ſitting himſelfe in a Barge at the fore-decke, Kennadie King of the Scots, Malcoline King of Cumberland, Macon King of Mann and of the Iſlands, with all the Princes of Wales brought to doe homage, and like watermen working at the Oare, rowed him a-
C long the River Dee, in a triumphant ſhew, to his great glory and joy of the beholders.

About the yeere. 960.

Certaine yeeres after, and namely about the yeere of our Redemption 1094. when as in a devout and religious emulation, as one ſaith, Princes ſtrove avie, That Cathedrall Churches and Minſters ſhould bee erected in a more decent and ſeemely forme, and when as Chriſtendome rouzed as it were her ſelfe, and caſting away her old habiliments, did put on every where the bright and white robe of Churches; Hugh the firſt of the Norman bloud, that was Earle of Cheſter, repaired the Church which Earle Leofrick had formerly founded in honour of the Virgin Saint Werburga, and by the adviſe of Anſelm, whom he had procured to come out of Normandy granted the ſame unto Monkes. And now, it is notorious for the Tombe of Henry the Fourth, Emperour of Al-
D maine, who as they ſay gave over his Empire and lived heere an Eremits life; and for the Biſhops See, therein eſtabliſhed. Which See immediately after the Normans Conqueſt, Peter Biſhop of Lichfield, tranſlated from Lichfield hither: but when it was brought to Coventry, and from thence into the ancient ſeat againe, Weſt-Cheſter lay a long time bereft of this Epiſcopall Dignity, untill in our fathers dayes King Henry the Eighth, having thruſt out the Monkes, ordeined Prebendaries, and reſtored a Biſhop againe, under whom for his Diœceſſe he appointed this County, Lancaſhire, Richmond, &c. and appointed the ſame to be within the Province of the Archbiſhop of Yorke. But returne wee now to matters of greater antiquity. When as now the ſaid Cathedrall Church was built, the Earles that were of the Normans
E line, fortified the City both with Walles and Caſtle. For as the Biſhop held of the King that which belongeth to his Biſhopricke (theſe are the words of Domeſday booke made by King William the Conquerour) ſo the Earles with their men held of the King wholly, all the reſt, of the City. It paid Geld or Tribute for fifty hides: and foure hundred and thirty and one houſes were thus Geldable: and ſeven Mint-maſters. When the King himſelfe in perſon came thither every Carrucata yeelded unto him two hundred Heſtas, and one tun full of Ale, and one Ruſca of butyr. And in the ſame place, for the reedification of the City wall and the bridge, the Proveſt gave warning by an edict, that out of every hide in the County one man ſhould come: and looke whoſe man came not, his Lord or Maſter was fined in forty ſhillings to the King and the Earle. If I ſhould particulate the ſcuffling and skirmi-
F ſhes heereabout betweene the Welſh and the Engliſh in the beginning of the Normans time, their inrodes and outrodes, the often ſcarfires of the Suburbs of Hanbrid beyond the Bridge, whereupon the Welſhmen call it Treboeth, that is, The burnt towne, as alſo the Wall made there of Welſhmens ſkuls that went a great length, I ſhould ſeeme to forget my ſelfe and thruſt my ſicle into the Hiſtorians Harveſt.

Churches repaired. Rodulphus Glaber.

But ever ſince the ſaid time, hath Cheſter notably flouriſhed, and King Henry the Seventh made it a County by it ſelfe incorporate. Neither wanteth any thing there that may be required in a moſt flouriſhing City, but that the Ocean being offended and angry (as it were) at certaine Mills in the very chanell of the River Dee, hath by little withdrawne himſelfe back, and affoordeth not unto the City the commodity of an Haven, as heretofore. The Longitude of this place is twenty Degrees and three and twenty Scruples: the Latitude three and fifty Degrees and eleven Scruples. If you deſire to know more touching this City, have here theſe reports out of Lucian that Monke aboveſaid, who lived almoſt five hundred yeeres agoe. Firſt, it is to bee conſidered, that Cheſter is built as a City, the ſite whereof inviteth and alloureth the eye, which being ſituate in the Weſt parts of Britaine, was in time paſt a place of receipt to the Legions comming a farre off to repoſe themſelves, and ſerved ſufficiently to keepe the Keies, as I may ſay, of Ireland, for the Romanes, to preſerve the limite of their Empire. For, being oppoſite to the North-Eaſt part of Ireland, it openeth way for paſſage of ſhips and Mariners with ſpread ſaile paſſing not often but continually to and fro, as alſo for the commodities of ſundry ſorts of Merchandiſe. And whiles it caſteth an eye forward into the Eaſt; it looketh toward not onely the See of Rome and the Empire thereof, but the whole world alſo: ſo that it ſtandeth forth as a kenning place to the view of eyes: that there may bee knowne valiant exploites, and the long traine and conſequents of things; as alſo whatſoever throughout the world hath beene done by all perſons, in all places, and at all times: and what ever hath beene ill done may alſo bee avoided and taken heed of. Which City having foure Gates from the foure cardinall Windes on the Eaſt ſide, hath a proſpect toward India, on the Weſt toward Ireland, North-Eaſtward the greater Norway, and Southward that ſtreight and narrow Angle, which divine ſeverity, by reaſon of civill and home-diſcords, hath left unto the Britans. Which long ſince by their bitter variance have cauſed the name of Britaine to bee changed into the name of England. Over and beſide, Cheſter hath by Gods gift a River to enrich and adorne it, the ſame faire and fiſhfull, hard by the City Walles: and on the South ſide a rode and harbour for ſhippes comming from Gaſcoine, Spaine, and Germany, which with the helpe and direction of Chriſt, by the labour and wiſedome of Merchants, repaire and refreſh the heart of the City with many good things: that wee being comforted every way by our Gods Grace, may alſo drinke Wine often, more frankely and plenteouſly: becauſe thoſe Countries enjoy the fruite of the Vineyards aboundantlie; Moreover the open Sea ceaſeth not to viſite it every day with a Tide, which according as the broad ſhelves and barres of ſands are opened or hidden by Tides and Ebbes inceſſantly, is wont more or leſſe, either to ſend or exchange one thing or other, and by his reciprocall Flow and returnes, either to bring in or to carry out ſomewhat.

From the City, North-Weſtward, there ſhooteth out a languet of land, or Promontory of the maine land into the Sea, encloſed on the one ſide with Dee mouth, Wirall. on the other ſide with the River Merſey: wee call it Wirall: the Welſh Britans, for that it is an Angle, tearme it Kill-gury. In old time it was all foreſt and not inhabited, as the Dwellers report, but King Edward the Third diſforeſted it: Yet now, beſet it is with Townes on every ſide: howbeit more beholding to the Sea than to the Soile: for, the land beareth ſmall plenty of Corne, the water yeeldeth great ſtore of fiſh. At the entry into it on the South ſide ſtandeth Shotwich a Caſtle of the Kings, upon the ſalt water: Upon the North ſtandeth Hooten, a Mannour, which in King Richard the Second his time, came to the Stanleies, who fetch their Pedegree from Alane Silveſtre upon whom Ranulph the firſt of that name, Earle of Cheſter, conferred the Bailly-wick of the Foreſt of Wirall, by delivering unto him an horne. Cloſe unto this is Poole, from whence the Lords of the place that have a long time flouriſhed, tooke their name: and hard by it Stanlaw, as the Monkes Law, what it is. of that place interprete it, A Stony hill: where John Lacy Conneſtable of Cheſter founded a little Monaſtery, which afterwards by reaſon of inundations was tranſlated 1173. to Whaley in Lancaſhire.

In the utmoſt brinke of this Promontory, lieth a ſmall, hungry, barren, and ſandy Iſle

A Isle, called Il-bre, which had sometime a little Cell of Monkes in it. More within the Country and Eastward from Wirall, you meet with a famous Forest, named the Forest of Delamere, the Foresters whereof by hereditary succession, are the Dawns of Vikinton, descended of a worshipfull stocke, from Rannlph de Kingleigh, unto whom Ranulph the first, Earle of Chester gave that Forestership, to bee held by right of inheritance. In this Forest Ædelsted, the famous Mercian Lady, built a little City called Caer-burg, that is, by interpretation, Happy Towne, which now having quite lost it selfe hath likewise lost that name, and is but an heape of rubbish and rammell, which they call, The Chamber in the Forest. And about a mile or two from hence, are to bee seene the ruines of Finborrow, another Towne built by the same Lady Ædelsted. Il-bre. Finborrow.

B Through the upper part of this Forest the River Wever runneth, which ariseth out of a Poole in the South side of the Shire at Ridly, the dwelling house of the worshipfull Family of the Egertons: who flowered out of the Barons of Malpas, as I have said. Neere hereunto is Bunbury contractly so called for Boniface Bury, for Saint Boniface was the Patron Saint there, where the Egertons built a College for Priests. Over against which is Beeston which gave firname to an ancient family, and where upon a steepe rising hill, Beeston Castle towereth aloft with a turretted wall of a great circuit. This Castle the last Ranulph Earle of Chester built: whereof Leland our Countriman being rapt both with a Poeticall and Propheticall fury, writeth thus. Ridly. Beeston.

Assyrio rediens victor Ranulphus ab orbe,
Hoc posuit Castrum terrorem gentibus olim
Vicinis, patriaque sua memorabile vallum.
Nunc licet indignas patiatur fracta ruinas,
Tempus erit quando rursus caput exeret altum,
Vatibus antiquis si fas mihi credere vati.

When Ranulph from Assyria return'd with victory;
As well the neighbour Nations to curbe and terrifie, D As for to fense his owne Country, this famous Fort he rais'd, Whilom a stately thing, but now the pride thereof is raz'd.
And yet though at this present time, it be in meane estate
With crackes and breaches much defac'd, and fouly ruinate;
The day will come when it againe the head aloft shall heave,
If ancient Prophets I my selfe a Prophet, may beleeve.

But to returne to the River, Wever first holdeth his course Southward, not farre from Woodhay, where dwelt a long time that family of the Wilburhams knights in great reputation; also by Bulkeley and Cholmondley which imparted their names to worE shipfull houses of knights degree; not farre off on the one hand from Baddeley the habitation in times past of the ancient Family de Praeris: of the other, from Cambermer, in which William Malbedeng founded a little religious house. Where this River commeth to the South limit of this Shire, it passeth through low places, wherein, as also elsewhere, the people finde oftentimes and get out of the ground, trees that have lien buried, as it is thought, there, ever since Noahs floud. But afterwards, watering fruitfull fields, he taketh to him out of the East a riveret by which standeth Wibbenbury, so called of Wibba, King of the Mercians. Hard to it lie, Hatherton, the seat in old time of the Orbeies, then of the Corbetts, but now of the Smithes; Dodinton, the possession of the Delveses; Batherton, of the Gripbins; Shavinton of the Wodenoths F (who by that name may seeme to have descended from the English Saxons) beside the places of other famous Families wherewith this County every where aboundeth. From thence runneth Wever downe by Nant-wich, not farre from Middlewich, and so to Northwich. These are very famous Salt-wiches, five or sixe miles distant asunder, where brine or salt water is drawne out of Pittes, which they Woodhay. Bulkley. 1134. Trees under ground. Saltpits.

powre not upon wood while it burneth; as the ancient Gaules and Germans were A wont to doe, but boyle over the Fire, to make Salt thereof. Neither doubt I, that theſe were knowne unto the Romanes, and that from hence was uſually paied the Cuſtome for ſalt called Salarium. For, there went a notable high way from Middlewich to Northwich, raiſed with gravell to ſuch an height, that a man may eaſily acknowledge that it was a worke of the Romanes, ſeeing that all this Country over, gravell is ſo ſcarce: and from thence at this day it is carryed to private mens uſes.

Matthew Paris writeth, that King Henry the Third ſtopped up theſe Salt-pits, when in hoſtile manner he waſted this Shire: becauſe the Welſhmen, ſo tumultuous in thoſe dayes, ſhould not have any victuals or proviſion from thence. But B when the faire beames of peace beganne once to ſhine out, they were opened a-Nantwich. gaine. Nantwich, which the River Wever firſt viſiteth, is reputed the greateſt and faireſt built Towne of all this Shire after Cheſter, the Britans call it Hellath wen, that is, The white Wich, or Salt pitte, becauſe the whiteſt ſalt is there boiled: and ſuch as writ in Latine named it Vicus Malbanus, haply of one William named Malbedeng and Malbanc, unto whom, at the Normans Conqueſt of England, it was allotted. It hath one onely Salt pitte, they call it the Brine pitte, about ſome foure-teene foote from the River, out of which they convey ſalt water by troughes of wood into houſes adjoyning, wherein there ſtand little barrels pitched faſt in the ground, which they fill with that water, and at the ringing of a bell, they beginne C to make fire under the leades; whereof they have ſixe in every houſe, and therein ſeeth the ſaid water: then certaine women, they call them Wallers, with little wooden rakes fetch up the ſalt from the bothom, and put it in baskets, they call them Salt barowes, out of which the liquor runneth, and the pure ſalt remaineth.
The Church (and but one they have) is paſſing faire, and belonged, as I have heard, unto the Abbay of Cumbermer: from hence, Wever holding on his courſe crooked enough, is augmented with a brooke comming out of the Eaſt, which runneth downe from Crew, a place inhabited in old time by a notable family of that name. And far-Calveley. ther yet from the Weſt ſide of the River, Calveley ſheweth it ſelfe, which gave both habitation and name to the worthy Family of the Calveleys, out of which in D the Raigne of Richard the Second, Sir Hugh Calveley Knight, was for his Chivalry in France ſo renowned, that there occurred no hardy exploit but his proweſſe would goe through it. From thence Wever hieth apace by Minſhull, the houſe of the Vale Royall. Minſhuls, and by Vale Royall, an Abbay founded by King Edward the Firſt in a moſt pleaſant valley, where now dwelleth the ancient Familie of the Holcroſts, unto Northwich. Northwich, in Britiſh called Hellath Du, that is, The blacke ſalt pitte: where alſo very neere the brinke of the river Dan, there is a moſt plentifull and deepe Brine-pit, with ſtaires made about it, by which they that draw water out of it in leather buckets, aſcend halfe naked into the troughes, and powre it therein-to, by which it is carried into the wich houſes, about which there ſtand on every ſide many ſtakes and piles of E wood. Heere Wever receiveth into his Chanell the River Dan, whoſe tract and ſtreame I will now follow.

This Dan or more truly Daven, flowing out of thoſe hilles which on the Eaſt ſide ſever Staffordſhire from Cheſhire, runneth along to CONDATE a towne mentioned by Antonine the Emperour, now called corruptly Congleton, the middle whereof the little brooke Howty, on the Eaſt ſide Daning-ſchow, and Northward Dan it ſelfe, watereth. And albeit this Towne for the greatneſſe and frequency thereof, hath deſerved to have a Major and ſix Aldermen, yet hath it but a Chappell and no more: and the ſame made of timber, unleſſe it bee the quire and a little Towre-ſteeple, which ac-knowledgeth Aſtbury about two miles off, her mother-Church: which verily is a ve- F ry faire Church, the Weſt Porch whereof is equall in height to the very Church as high as it is, and hath a ſpire ſteeple adjoyning thereto. In the Church-yard lie two portraictures of Knights upon Sepulchres, in whoſe Shields are two barres. But for that they be without their colours, hardly can any man ſay, whether of the Brereton's, Manwarings,

A Manwarings or Venables, which are the moſt noble Families in thoſe parts, and indeed ſuch Barres doe they beare in their Coates of Armes, but in divers colours.

Then commeth Daven to Davenport, commonly Damport, which hath adopted into her owne name a notable family: and Holmeſchappell, a Towne well knowne to waifaring men: where within the remembrance of our Grandfathers, I. Needham built a Bridge: Neere unto which, at Rudheath there was ſometime a place of refuge and Sanctuary as well for the Inhabitants of this Shire as ſtrangers, who had treſpaſſed againſt the lawes: that there they might abide in ſecurity for a yeere and a day. Then runneth it under Kinderton the old ſeat of the ancient race of the Venables; who ever ſince the firſt comming in of the Normans have been of name and reputation here,
B and commonly are called Barons of Kinderton. Beneath this, Southward, the little river Croco runneth alſo into Dan, which flowing out of the Poole called Bagmere paſſeth by Brereton: which, as it hath given name to the worſhipfull, ancient and numerous family of the Breretons knights; ſo Sir William Brereton knight, hath of late added very much credit and honour to the place, by a magnificent and ſumptuous houſe that hee hath there built. A wonder it is that I ſhall tell you, and yet no other than I have heard verified upon the credit of many credible perſons, and commonly beleeved: That before any heire of this houſe of the Breretons dyeth, there bee ſeene in a Poole adjoyning, bodies of trees ſwimming for certaine daies together. Like unto that which Leonardus Vairus reporteth from the teſtimony of Cardinall Granvell, namely, that neere unto the Abbay of Saint Maurice in Burgundy, there is a fiſh-
C pond, in which are fiſhes put according to the number of the Monkes of that place: And if any one of them happen to bee ſicke, there is a fiſh ſeene alſo to floate, and ſwimme above the water halfe dead: and if the Monke ſhall dye, the ſaid fiſh a few daies before dieth. Lib. 2. de Faſcino.

As touching theſe matters, if they bee true, I wote not what to ſay: for, I am no Wiſard to interpret ſuch ſtrange wonders: But theſe and ſuch like things are done either by the holy tutelar Angels of men, or elſe by the devils who by Gods permiſſion mightily ſhew their power in this inferiour world. For, both the ſorts of them being intelligent natures, upon a deliberate purpoſe and to ſome certaine end, and D not for nought, worke ſtrange things. The Angels ſeeke after and aime at the ſafety and health of man-kinde: the devils contrariwiſe plot to miſchieve, vexe, or elſe to delude them. But all this may ſeeme impertinent to our purpoſe. Angels. Devils.

Croke the Riveret aforeſaid, being paſt Brereton, within a while after viſiteth Middlewich, neere unto his confluence with Dan, where there bee two Welles of ſalt water parted one from the other by a ſmall Brooke; Sheathes they call them: the one ſtands not open, but at certaine ſet times, becauſe folke willingly ſteale the Water thereof, as beeing of greater vertue and efficacy. From hence runneth Dan to Boſtoke, in times paſt Boteſtoc, the ancient ſeat of the Family of the Boſtokes Knights, which by the marriage with Anne onely Daughter of Raulph,
E ſonne and heire to Sir Adam Boſtoke knight, paſſed together with a very great livelode unto Sir John Savage. Out of this ancient houſe of the Boſtokes, as out of a ſtocke, ſprung a goodly number of the ſame name, in Cheſ-ſhire, Shropp-ſhire, Bark-ſhire and elſewhere. Middlewich. Boſtock.

When as Dan now, beneath Northwich that I ſpake of, hath united his ſtreame with Wever, then Wever runneth forthright, and taketh in from the Eaſt, Pever, that floweth hard by Pever and giveth it the name: where, that ancient notable Family of Meinilwarin, commonly Manewaring is ſeated; out of which Raulph married the daughter of Hugh Keveliog Earle of Cheſter, as appeareth by an old Charter in the cuſtody of Ranulph the heire now of the ſame houſe. Pever.

F From thence ſpeedeth Wever by Winington which gave both habitation and name to the renowned family of the Winingtons; and not farre from Merbury, which being ſo called of a Mere under it, conferred likewiſe the name upon that reſpective ancient Family of the Merburies. Hence the River holdeth on his courſe neere unto Dutton, the Inheritance of that great and worthy Family of Duttons, who Dutton.

derive their deſcent from one Hudard, allied to the Earles of Cheſter: and who by an old order and cuſtome have great authority over all the pipers, fidlers, and minſtrels of this Province, ever ſince that one of the Duttons a young Gentleman full of ſpirit and active withall, having haſtily gathered a tumultuary power of thoſe kinde of people, valiantly delivered Ranulph the laſt Earle of Cheſter from danger, when hee was beſet with Welſh enemies. Neither muſt I paſſe over in ſilence Nether Whitley in this tract, out of which came the Tuſchetts or Towchetts, who are now Barons Audley. By this time Wever aforeſaid flowing betweene Prodeſham a Caſtle of ancient note and Clifton, now Rock-Savage, an houſe of the Savages new built, who here by marriage attained to rich and faire revenewes; entreth at length into Merſey mouth. And this is ſo called of the River Merſey, which running as a bounder betweene Cheſ-ſhire and Lancaſhire, is there at length diſcharged into the Sea, after it hath among other ſmall townes of meaner note watered Stockport, which had ſometime a Baron, of the Earles of Cheſter, and Warburgton ſo named of S. Werburgh, the habitation of a family thereof ſirnamed, but branched from the Duttons: Hereby it entertaineth the River Bollin out of that ſpacious Foreſt of Maclesfield. Upon this Bollin ſtandeth Maclesfield one of the faireſt Townes of this County, which gave name unto that Foreſt: where T. Savage, firſt Biſhop of London, and afterwards Archbiſhop of Yorke, built a College, wherein ſome of that Race of the Savages lye entombed: alſo Dunham, which from Sir Hamon of Maſcy, by the Fittones and Venables deſcended hereditarily unto the Family of Booth. From thence Merſey commeth to Thelwall before it bee farre paſt Knotsford, that is, Canutus his Foord; which is divided into the upper and the nether: alſo to Lee; from whence there is a Family bearing the ſame ſirname, that is not onely of gentle bloud and of eſpeciall note, but alſo farre and fairely propagated into a number of branches. As for Thelwall, now it is an obſcure Village, but in times paſt a large Towne, built by King Edward the elder, and ſo called, as Florilegus witneſſeth, of bodies of trees the boughes being cut off, firmely faſtened in the ground wherewith hee walled it round. For the Saxons in their tongue called the Trunkes and bodies of Trees, Ðel, and a Wall, as wee doe now.

At the very mouth of the River ſtandeth Runkhorne, founded in the ſame age by Lady Edelfiede commonly called Eſfled, and brought now by the mutability of time to a few cotages. This Lady Edelfleda (to tell you at once, of whom I have oft made mention) ſiſter to K. Edward the elder, and wife to Ethelred a pety King of the Mercians, after her husbands death, governed the Mercians in moſt dangerous and troubleſome times, for eight yeeres, with high commendation: touching whom theſe laudatory Verſes in praiſe of her, wee reade in the Hiſtory of Henry of Huntingdon.

Runkhorne.

Elfled or Ethelfled.

D

O Elfleda potens, ô terror virgo virorum, Victrix naturæ, nomine digna viri.
Te, quo ſplendidior fieres, natura puellam,
Te probitas fecit nomen habere viri.
Te mutare decet, ſed ſolam, nomina ſexus,
Tu regina potens, Rexque trophæa parans,
Jam nec Cæſarei tantum meruere triumphi, Cæſare ſplendidior virgo virago, vale.

O mighty Elfled, virgin pure, that men do'ſt terrifie,
And nature paſſe, right worthy thou, in name a man to be.
To grace thee more, dame Nature once thee ſhap'd a maiden brave,
But vertue thee hath cauſed now the name of man to have.
It thee becomes, but thee alone, the name of Sex to change:
Of great Queenes and triumphant Kings thou ſtandeſt in the range.
From Cæſars triumphes for deſert thou bear'ſt away the bell,
No Cæſar ever was thy match: Thus, Manly-maide, fare well.

Beneath

A Beneath Runckhorne, ſomewhat within the Country, Haulton, the Towne and Caſtle both ſhew themſelves, which Hugh Lupus Earle of Cheſter gave unto Niel a Norman, to be by tenure and ſervice Conſtable of Cheſter: by whoſe poſterity, through the variable change of times, it is come unto the Houſe of Lancaſter. Neither would this be overpaſſed in ſilence, that William the ſaid Nieles ſonne, founded the Abbay adjoyning, at Norton, which now appertaineth to the Broks of ancient deſcent. Whether I ſhould place in this Shire, or elſewhere the CANGI, an ancient Nation of Britans, that have beene ſo much and ſo long ſought for, I have as long and as much doubted: For continuance of time hath now ſo obſcured them, that hitherto by no footings they could be traced and found out. And albeit Juſtus Lipſius that Flower
B of exquiſite learning taketh mee for a Judge heerein, I frankly confeſſe, I know not what judgement to give, and rather would I commend this office of judging to any other man, than aſſume it to my ſelfe. Yet nevertheleſſe, if CEANGI and CANGI were the ſame, as why not? it may bee probable enough, that they were ſeated in this tract. For, whiles I peruſed theſe my labours, I underſtood by ſome of good credit, that there were heere upon the very ſhore gotten out of the ground twenty ſowes of lead long in forme, but foure ſquare: On the upper part whereof in an hollow ſurface is to be read this inſcription.

Which Monument ſeemeth to have beene erected for a Victory over the Cangi. Heereto maketh alſo the very ſite upon the Iriſh ſea: For, thus writeth Tacitus in the 12. booke of his Annales. Whiles Nero was Emperour, There was an Army led by Oſtorius againſt the Cangi: the fields were waſted, booties raiſed every where, for that the enemies durſt not come into the field: but if they attempted cloſely and by ſtealth to cut off the Army as it marched, they paid for their deceitfull cunning. Now were they no ſooner come neere
E unto the Sea-Coaſt toward Ireland, but certaine tumults and inſurrections among the Brigantes, brought the Generall backe. But by the inſcription aboveſaid, it ſhould ſeeme that they were not ſubdued before Domitians time: and then by computation of the times; when as that moſt warlicke Julius Agricola was Propretour in Britaine. Ptolomee likewiſe placed the Promontory ΚΑΤΙΑΝΩΝ, that is, of the Cangi on this ſhore. Neither dare I ſeeke elſewhere than in this tract that Station CONGANII, where, in the declining eſtate of the Roman Empire, a Company or Band called Vigiles, that is, Watchmen, with their Captaine under the Dux Britanniæ, kept watch and ward. Notwithſtanding I leave to every man for mee his owne judgement heerein, as in all things elſe of this nature. Anno 51.

F Touching the Earles, that I may paſſe over the Engliſh Saxons, Earles only by office and not by inheritance: king William the firſt created Hugh ſirnamed Lupus, ſon to the Vicount of Auranches in Normandy the firſt hereditary Earle of Cheſter and Count Palatine, and gave unto him and his heires all this County to be holden as freely by his ſword, as the King himſelfe held England by his Crowne (For theſe are the words of the Donation:) Earles of Cheſter.

nation:)who forthwith appointed under him theſe Barons, viz. Niele Baron of Haulton, whoſe poſterity afterwards tooke the name of Lacies, for that the Lacies inheritance had fallen unto them, and were Earles of Lincolne: Robert Baron of Mont-hault, Seneſchall of the County of Cheſter, the laſt of whoſe line, having no iſſue, ordained by his laſt Will Iſabel Queene of England, and John of Eltham Earle of Cornwall, his heires: William Malbedeng Baron of Malbanc, whoſe nephewes daughters, by marriage brought the inheritance to the Vernons and Baſſets: Richard Vernon Baron of Shipbroke, whoſe inheritance for default of heires males in the end came by the ſiſters unto the Wilburhams, Staffords, and Littleburies: Robert Fitz-Hugh Baron of Malpas, who, as it ſeemeth, dyed, as I ſaid before, without iſſue: Hamon de Maſcy, whoſe poſſeſſions deſcended to the Fittons of Bollin: Gilbert Venables Baron of Kinderton, whoſe poſterity in the right line have continued and flouriſhed unto theſe our dayes: N. Baron of Stockeport; to whom at length the Warrens of Pointon, budded out of the honorable family of the Earles of Warren and Surry, in right of marriage ſucceeded. And theſe were all the Barons of the Earles of Cheſter that ever I could hitherto finde: Who, as it is written in an old Booke, Had their free Courts of all Plees and Suits or Complaints, except thoſe Plees which belong unto the Earles ſword. And their Office was, To aſſiſt the Earle in Councell, to yeeld him dutifull attendance, and oftentimes to repaire unto his Court for to doe him honor, and, as we finde in old parchment Records, Bound they were in time of warre in Wales, to finde for every Knights fee, one horſe with capariſon and furniture, or elſe two without, within the Diviſions of Cheſ-ſhire: Alſo, that their Knights and Freeholders ſhould have Corſlets and * Haubergeons, and defend their * Foees by their owne bodies.

* Lands and poſſeſſions.

After Hugh the firſt Earle beforeſaid, ſucceeded Richard his ſonne, who in his tender yeeres periſhed by ſhipwracke, together with William the onely ſonne of King Henry the Firſt, and other Noblemen betweene Normandy and England in the yeere 1120. After Richard, ſucceeded Ranulph de Meſchines, the third Earle, ſonne to the ſiſter of Earle Hugh: and left behinde him his ſonne Ranulph, named de Gernonijs, the fourth Earle of Cheſter, a Warlike man, and who at the Siege of Lincolne tooke King Stephen Priſoner. Hugh ſirnamed Kevelioc, his ſonne was the fifth Earle, who died in the yeere 1181. and left his ſonne Ranulph named de Blundeuill the ſixth Earle; who after he had built the Caſtles of Chartley and Beeſton, and the Abbay alſo De la Creſſe, died without children, and left foure ſiſters to be his heires, Maude the wife of David Earle of Huntingdon, Mabile eſpouſed to William D' Albeney Earle of Arundell, Agnes married to William Ferrars Earle of Darby, and Avis wedded to Robert de Quincy. After Ranulph the ſixth Earle, there ſucceeded in the Earledome John ſirnamed the Scot, the ſonne of Earle David by the ſaid Maude the eldeſt daughter. Who being deceaſed likewiſe without any iſſue, King Henry the Third caſting his eye upon ſo faire and large an inheritance, laid it unto the Domaine of the Crowne, and aſſigned other revenewes elſewhere to the heires: not willing, as the King himſelfe was wont to ſay, that ſo great an eſtate ſhould bee divided among diſtaves. And the Kings themſelves, in perſon, after that this Earledome came unto their hands, for to maintaine the honor of the Palatineſhip, continued here the ancient rights and Palatine priviledges, and Courts, like as the Kings of France did in the County of Champan. Afterward, this honour of Cheſter was deferred upon the Kings eldeſt ſonnes, and firſt unto Edward, King Henry the Third his ſonne; who being taken priſoner by the Barons and kept in ward delivered it up for his ranſome unto Simon Montford Earle of Leiceſter: But when Simon was ſoone after ſlaine, it returned quickly againe unto the bloud Royall, and King Edward the Second ſummoned his eldeſt ſonne, being but a childe, unto the Parliament by the Titles of Earle of Cheſter and Flint. Afterwards, King Richard the Second by authority of the Parliament, made it of an Earldome a Principality, and to the ſame Principality annexed the Caſtle of Leon with the territories of Bromfield and Yale, Chircke Caſtle with Chircke land, Oſwalds-ſtreet Caſtle, the whole hundred and eleven townes belonging to that Caſtle, with the Caſtles of Iſabell and Delaley, and other goodly lands, which, by reaſon that Richard Earle of Arundell ſtood

then

A then proſcript and outlawed, had beene confiſcate to the Kings Exchequer: and King Richard himſelfe was ſtiled Prince of Cheſter: but within few yeeres after, that Title vaniſhed away, after that King Henry the Fourth had once repealed the Lawes of the ſaid Parliament, and it became againe a County or Earledome Palatine: and at this day retaineth the juriſdiction Palatine: and for the adminiſtration thereof, it hath a Chamberlaine who hath all juriſdiction of a Chancellour within the ſaid County Palatine, a Juſtice for matters in Common Plees, and Plees of the Crowne, to bee heard and determined in the ſaid County, two Barons of the Exchequer, Sergeants at Law, a Sheriffe, an Attourney, an Eſchetour, &c. And the Inhabitants of the ſaid County for the enjoying of their liberties were to pay at the change of every Owner of the ſaid Earledome a

B ſumme of money (about 3000. markes) by the name of a Mize, as the County of Flint being a parcell thereof about 2000. markes, if I have not bin miſ-informed.

This County containeth about 68. Pariſhes.

Now

The Kingdome of the Mercians.

NOw have I ſuperficially ſurveyed the Regions of the CORNAVII, which together with the CORITANI, DOBUNI, and CATVELLANI, made that Kingdome in the Saxons Heptarchie, which they called Wÿpc-nanic, and Meanc-lonꝺ, the Latine Writers Mercia of Meanc, an old Engliſh word, that ſignified a Limite; for, all the other Kingdomes bordered and confined upon it. This was the largeſt Kingdome by farre of all the reſt, begunne by Crida the Saxon, about the yeere of our Lord 586. augmented by Penda, who extended the Marches thereof every way, and within a while after inſtructed in Chriſtian Religion. But having come to the full period, within the revolution of 250. yeeres, fell at laſt, into the Dominion of the Weſt-Saxons, after that the Danes had ſpoiled, weakned, and waſted it many yeeres in all manner of barbarous hoſtility.

SILVRES.

SILURES.

I Thinke it now my beſt way, before I treat of the other parts of England, to digreſſe a while and turne a little aſide toward Wales, called in Latin Cambria, or Wallia, where the ancient Britans have yet their ſeat and abode: neither ſhall I in ſo doing, as I thinke, digreſſe, but directly follow the order of nature. For, it lieth adjacent to the CORNAVII, and ſeemeth, as it were, of right and equity to demand, that it may be ſpoken of in due courſe and place: eſpecially ſeeing the Britans or Welſh, the inhabitants thereof, enioy the ſame lawes and rights that we doe, and have long ſince beene engraffed and incorporate with us into our Common-wealth.

WALES therefore, which name compriſed in times paſt before the Conqueſt, the whole Countrey beyond Severn, but afterward reached not ſo farre, was when the Romanes ruled in Britaine, inhabited by three ſorts of people, the SILURES, DIMETAE, and ORDOVICES. For, theſe held not onely the twelve Shires, as they call them, of Wales, but thoſe two alſo beyond Severn, Hereford-ſhire, and Monmouth-ſhire, which have beene now long reckoned among the Counties of England. And to beginne firſt with thoſe that we firſt come unto and which lye next unto us: the SILURES, according to Ptolomees deſcription, inhabited thoſe Regions which in Welſh are called by one name Deheubarth, that is, the Southpart, and at this day by new names, Hereford-ſhire, Radnor-ſhire, Brecknock-ſhire, Monmouth-ſhire, and Glamorgan-ſhire, wherein are as yet ſome remaines alſo of the name SILURES. As for the derivation of that name, I have nothing that ſorteth with the nature of the Nation. But touching the originall of the people, Tacitus gheſſeth by their coloured faces, their countenances, their curled haire, and their ſituation over againſt Spaine, that they had their originall from the Spaniards: But Florianus del campo a Spaniard flatly affirmeth it, who troubleth and toileth himſelfe exceedingly to finde the Silures in Spaine, and thruſts upon us, I know not what, of Soloria and Siloria in Biſcaie. But to ſpeake of the nature of theſe Silures: they were a Nation very great (for as wee may gather out of Plinie and Tacitus, they ſeeme to have poſſeſſed all South-Wales) fierce, valiant, given to warre, impatient of ſervitude, forward to adventure with a reſolution (the Romanes call it Pervicacia) and who would not bee brought in either withfaire meanes or foule; in all and every of which qualities their their Posterity have in no point as yet degenerated from their Ancestours. A

When the Romanes upon an ambitious desire of rule did set upon them, they trusting to the strength and prowesse of King Caratacus, provoked also and exasperated with a word that Claudius the Emperour let fall, who had said, These were so to bee destroied, and their name to bee extinguished as the Sugambri had beene rooted out aforetime, annoied the Romanes with so dangerous a Warre, by intercepting their Bands of auxiliary forces, by putting to flight that Legion over which Marius Valens was Captaine, and by wasting the lands of their Associates; that P. Ostorius Prætor of Britaine being tired with travaile and with the sense of these griefes and troubles gave up his ghost. Veranius also Governour under Nero, assailed them in vaine: For, whereas we reade in Tacitus; illum modicis excursibus sylvas populatum esse, that is, That he made spoile and forraied the woods with small outrodes; reade in lieu of Sylvas, that is, woods, Siluras, that is, The Silures, as our friend that most learned Lipsius doth, and you shall reade aright. Yet was not this Warre husht and finished before the time of Vespasian. For then, Iulius Frontinus subdued them by force, and kept them C under with Bands of Legionary Souldiers. But whereas a Countryman of ours hath wrested this Verse of Iuvenal against Crispine, to these SILURES,

As though our Silures being taken prisoners were set to sale at Rome: upon my credite he hath not attained to the right and proper sense of the Poet: For by that word Siluros he that will reade the place and weigh it well, shall easily perceive he spake of fishes, and not of men.

HEREFORD-SHIRE.

THE County which we call HEREFORD-SHIRE, and the Britans name Ereinuc, lying in compaſſe round, as it were a Circle, is bounded on the Eaſt ſide with Worceſter, and Glocester-ſhires, on the South with Monmouth-ſhire, on the Weſt ſide with Radnor and Brecknor-ſhires, and on the North with Shropſhire; This Country beſides that it is right pleaſant, is for yeelding of Corne, and feeding of Cattaile, in all places moſt fruitfull, and therewith paſſing well furniſhed with all things neceſſary for mans life: In ſo much, as it would ſcorne to come behinde any one Country throughout all England for fertility of Soile, and therefore ſay that for three W.W.W. wheat, wooll, and water it yeeldeth to no Shire of England. And verily, it hath alſo diverſe notable rivers, namely Wye-Lug and Munow, which after they have watered the moſt flowring meddowes and fruitfull corne fields, at length meet together and in one chanell paſſe on to the Severn ſea.

Munow ſpringing out of Hatterell hilles, which reſembling a chaire doe riſe aloft, and fenſe this ſhire on the South-Weſt, as it deſcendeth downe, firſt ſtrugleth to paſſe through by the foote of the ſaid hilles to BLESTIUM, a towne which Antonine the Emperour ſo placeth that for ſituation and diſtance it can bee no other than that, which ſtanding by the ſide of this River is in Britiſh called Caſtle Hean, that is, The Old Caſtle, and in Engliſh, The Old Towne: A poore ſmall Village now, but this new name is a good proofe for the antiquity thereof: for, in both tongues it ſoundeth as much as an Old Caſtle or towne. Next unto this Old Towne, Alterynnis lieth in manner of a River-Iſland, inſulated within waters: the ſeat in old time of that ancient family of the Sitſilts or Cecils, knights, whence my right honourable Patron, accompliſhed with all the ornaments of vertue, wiſdome, and Nobility, Sir William Cecil, Baron of Burghley, and Lord high Treaſurer of England derived his deſcent.

From hence, Munow turning Eaſtward, for a good ſpace ſeparateth this Country from Monmouth-ſhire and at Caſtle Map-harald, or Harold Ewias, is encreaſed with the River Dor. This Ewias Caſtle (that I may ſpeake out of K. William the Firſt his Booke) was repaired by Alured of Marleberg. Afterwards it pertained to one Harold a Gentleman, who in a Shield argent bare a Feſſe Geules betweene three Eſtoiles Sable for his Armes: of whom it beganne to bee called Harold Ewias: but Sibyll his niece in the ſecond degree and one of the heires, by her marriage transferred it to the Lords of Tregoz, frō whom it came at length to the Lords of Grandiſon deſcended out of Burgundie. But of them elſewhere. Now the ſaid Dor, which running downe frō the North by Snodhill, a Caſtle, and the Barony ſometime of Robert Chandos (where is a quary of excellent marble) cutteth through the midſt of the Vale, which of the River the Britans call Diffrin Dore: but the Engliſhmen that they might ſeeme to expreſſe the force of that word termed it the Gilden Vale, which name it may by good right and juſtly have, for the golden, wealthy and pleaſant fertility thereof. For, the hils that compaſſe it in, on both ſides are clad with woods; under the woods lie corne fields on either hand, and under thoſe fields moſt gay and gallant medowes: then runneth in the midſt between them a moſt cleere and cryſtall River, on which Robert Lord of Ewias placed a faire Monaſtery, wherein moſt of the Nobility and Gentry of theſe parts were interred.

Part of this ſhire, which from this Vale declineth and bendeth Eaſtward, is now called Irchenfeld, in Domeſday Booke Archenfeld, which, as our Hiſtorians write, was layed waſt with fire and ſword by the Danes in the yeere 715. at what time Camalac alſo a Britan Biſhop was carried away priſoner. In this part ſtood Kilpeck a Caſtle of great name, and the ſeat it was of the noble Family of the Kilpecks, who were as ſome ſay the Champions to the Kings of England in the firſt age of the Normans: And I my ſelfe alſo will eaſily aſſent unto them. In the Raigne of Edward the Firſt, there dwelt heere Sir Robert Wallerond, whose nephew Alane Plugenet lived in the honourable state of a Baron. In this Archenfeld likewise, as wee reade in Domesday booke, certaine revenewes by an old custome were assigned to one or two Priests, on this condition that they should goe in Embassages for the Kings of England into Wales; and to use the words out of the same booke, The men of Archenfeld, whensoever the Army marcheth forward against the enemy by a custome make the Avantgard, and in the returne homeward, the Rereward.

The river Wy. As Munow runneth along the lower part of this shire, so Wy with a bending course cutteth over the middest; upon which River in the very West limit Clifford Castle standeth; which, William Fitz Osborn Earle of Hereford built upon his owne Waste (as it is in King William the Conquerours booke) but Raulph de Todeney held it. Afterward it seemeth to have come unto Walter the sonne of Richard Fitz Punt a Norman; for he was sirnamed De Clifford, and from him the right honorable family of the Earles of Cumberland doe truly deduce their descent. But in the daies of King Edward the First, John Giffard who married the heire of Walter L. Clifford had it in his hands. Then Wy with a crooked and winding streame rolleth downe by Whitney, which hath given name to a worshipfull Family, and by Bradwardin Castle, which gave both originall and name to that famous Thomas Bradwardin Archbishop of Canterbury, who for his variety of knowledge, and profound learning, was in that age tearmed The Profound Doctour: and so at length commeth to Hereford the head City of this County.

How farre that little Region Archenfeld reached I know not, but the affinity betweene these names, Ereinuc, Archenfeld, the towne ARICONIUM, of which Antonine in the description of this Tract maketh mention, and Hareford or Hereford, which now is the chiefe City of the Shire, have by little and little induced mee to this opinion, that I thinke every one of these was derived from ARICONIUM. Yet doe I not thinke that Ariconium and Hereford were both one and the same: but like as Basil in Germany chalenged unto it the name of Augusta Rauracorum, and Baldach in Assyria the name of Babylon, for that as the one had originall from the ruines of Babylon, so the other from the ruines of Augusta: even so this Hariford of ours, (for so the common people call it) derived both name and beginning, in mine opinion, from his neighbour old ARICONIUM, which hath at this day no shape or shew at all of a Towne: as having beene by report, shaken to peeces with an earthquake.

Hereford.

Kenchester. Onely it reteineth still a shadow of the name, being called Kenchester, and sheweth to the beholders some ruines of walles, which they tearme Kenchester walles; about which are often digged up foure square paving stones of Checker worke, British brickes, peeces of Romane money and other such like remaines of Antiquity. But Hereford, her daughter, which more expresly resembleth the name thereof, standeth Eastward scarce three Italian miles from it, seated among most pleasant medowes and as plentifull corne fields, compassed almost round about with Rivers, on the North side and on the West with one that hath no name, on the South side with Wy, that hasteneth hither out of Wales. It is thought to have shewed her head first what time as the Saxons Heptarchie was in the flower and prime, built as some write by King Edward the Elder: neither is there, as farre as I have read, any memory thereof more ancient. For, the Britans, before the name of Hereford was knowne, called the place Tresawith, of Beech trees: and Hereford of an Old way; and the Saxons themselves Fern-lez of ferns. The greatest encrease, if I be not deceived, that it had, came by Religion and by the Martyrdome of Ethelbert King of the East England. Who when he wooed himselfe the daughter of Offa K. of the Mercians, was villanously forlaid and murdered by the procurement of Quendred, Offaes wife, respecting more the countries of the East England, than the honest and honorable match of her daughter: which Ethelbert being registred in the Catalogue of Martyrs, had a Church here built and dedicated unto him by Milfrid a pety K. of the country, wherein when a Bishops See was established, it grew to great wealth, first, through the devout liberality of the Mercians, and then of the West Saxons kings: for they at length were possessed 793. S. Ethelbert Martyr.

A of this City, as may be gathered out of William of Malmesbury, where he writeth, That Athelſtan the Weſt Saxon brought the Lords of Wales in this City to ſo hard paſſe, that by way of Tribute they were to pay every yeere (beſides Hounds and Hawkes) twenty pounds of gold, and three hundred pound of ſilver by weight. This Citie as farre as I can reade, had never any misfortune, unleſſe it were in the yeere of our Lord 1055. wherein Gruffith Prince of South Wales, and Algar an Engliſh man, rebelling againſt King Edward the Confeſſour, after they had put to flight Earle Ralph, ſacked the Citie, deſtroyed the Cathedrall Church, and led away captive Leofgar the Biſhop. But Harold ſtraightwaies after that hee had daunted their audacious courage, fenſed it, as Floriacenſis ſaith, with a broade and high Rampier. Hence it
B is, that Malmesbury writeth thus in his treatiſe of Biſhops, Hereford is no great Citie, and yet by the heigth of thoſe ſteepe and upright bankes caſt up, it ſheweth that it hath beene ſome great thing: and, as wee reade in the Domeſday booke of King William the Conquerour: there were in all but an hundered and three men within the Walles and without.

The Normans afterwards neere the Eaſt end of the Church along the ſide of Wy, built a mighty great and ſtrong Caſtle: the worke as ſome report, of Earle Miles, which now yeeldeth to Time, and runneth to ruine. After this, they walled the Citie about. Biſhop Reinelm, in the reigne of Henry the Firſt founded that beautifull Cathedrall Church, which now we ſee there, whoſe ſucceſſours enlar-
C ged it by adioyning thereto a proper Colledge for Prieſts, and faire houſes for the Prebendaries. For, beſides the Biſhop who hath 302. Churches in his Diœceſe, there are in this Church, a Deane, two Archdeacons, a Chaunter, a Chauncellour, a Treaſurer and eight and twenty Prebendaries. In the Church, I ſaw in manner no Monuments, but the Biſhops Tombes. And I have heard that Thomas Cantlow the Biſhop, a man of Noble birth, had here a very ſtately and ſumptuous Sepulcher, who for his holineſſe being canonized a Saint, went within a little of ſurmounting that princely Martyr King Ethelbert, ſuch was the opinion of ſingular pietie and devotion. Geographers meaſure the poſition or ſite of this Citie by the Longitude of twenty degrees and foure and twenty ſcruples: and by the Latitude of two and fifty D degrees and ſixe ſcruples.

Wy is not gone full three miles from hence, but he intercepteth by the way the river Lug, who running downe a maine out of Radnor hils, with a ſtill courſe paſſeth through the mids of this country, from the North-weſt to the South-eaſt. At the firſt entrance, it ſeeth a farre off, Brampton Brian Caſtle, which, a famous family named hereof de Brampton, wherein the forname was uſually Brian, held by continuall ſucceſſion unto the time of King Edward the Firſt: but now, by the female heires it is come to R. Harleie: neere at hand it beholdeth Wigmore, in the Engliſh Saxons tongue Wynginga-mepe, repaired in elder times by King Edward the elder, afterward, fortified by William Earle of Hereford with a Caſtle, in the waſt of a ground
E (for ſo reade we in Domeſday booke) which was called Mareſtun, in the tenure of Radulph de Mortimer, from whom thoſe Mortimers that were afterwards Earles of March lineally deſcended, of whom, you may reade more in Radnor-ſhire. Three miles off, there is another neighbour Caſtle, called Richards Caſtle, the poſſeſſion firſt of the Sayes, then of the Mortimers, and afterwards of the Talbots by hereditarie ſucceſſion. At length by the heires of Sir Iohn Talbot, the inheritance was divided betweene Sir Guarin Archdeacon and Sir Matthew Gurnay. Beneath this Caſtle, Nature, who no where diſporteth her ſelfe more in ſhewing wonders, then in waters, hath brought forth a prety well, which is alwaies full of little fiſh bones, or as ſome thinke, of ſmall frog-
F bones, although they be from time to time drawne quite out of it, whence it is commonly called Bone well. And not farre off, is placed Croſt Caſtle, the poſſeſſion of that very ancient family of the Croſts Knights, who have there now a long time flouriſhed in great and good eſteeme.

Thence paſſeth Wy to Lemſter, which alſo was called Leon Minſter, and Lions Monaſtery, of a Lyon that appeared to a religious man in a viſion (as ſome have dreamed.)

Lemſter.

But whereas the Britans call it Lhan Lieni: which ſignifieth a Church of Nunnes, and that it is certainely knowne, that Merewale a King of the Mercians, built here a Church for Nunnes (that afterwards became a Cell belonging to the Monaſtery of Reading) to ſeeke any other originall of the name, than from thoſe Nunnes: what were it elſe but to hunt after the windes? Yet there want not ſome, who derive it from Line, whereof the beſt kinde groweth here. The greateſt name and fame that it hath at this day is of the wooll in the territories round about it, (Lemſter Ore they call it) which ſetting aſide that of Apulia and Tarentum all Europe counteth to be the very beſt. So renowned alſo it is for Wheat, and bread of the fineſt floure, that Lemſter bread and Weabley Ale (a towne belonging to the noble Familie D'Eureux) are growne unto a common proverbe. By reaſon of theſe commodities the mercates at Lemſter were ſo frequented, that they of Hereford and Worceſter complaining that the confluence of people thither impaired their mercates, procured that by Royall authoritie the mercat day was changed. Now have I nothing more concerning Lemſter, but that William Breoſa Lord of Brecknock, when hee revolted from King John, did ſet it on fire and defaced it. As for that Webley aforeſaid, it is ſituate more within the Country, and was the Baronie of the Verdons: the firſt of which houſe named Bertram de Verdon came into England with the Normans; whoſe poſteritie by marriage with an inheretrice of Laceies of Trim in Ireland, were for a good while hereditary Conſtables of Ireland: and at laſt the poſſeſſions were by the daughters devolved to the Furnivalls, Burgherſh, Ferrars of Groby, Crop-hulls, and from the Crop-hulls by the Ferrars of Chartly, unto D'Eureux Earles of Eſſex. Neere neighbours unto Webley, more Weſtward are theſe places, Huntingdon Caſtle, the poſſeſſion in times paſt of the Bohuns Earles of Hereford and of Eſſex: Kinnerſley, belonging to the auncient Family De la-bere, and Erdſley: where the auncient Family of the Baskervills, have long inhabited, which bred in old time ſo many worthie Knights, who deduce their pedigree from a Neice of Dame Gunora that moſt famous Lady in Normandy, and long agoe flouriſhed in this County and Shrop-ſhire adjoyning, and held, (that I may note ſo much by the way) the Hamelet of Lanton in chiefe, as of the Honour of Montgomery, by the ſervice of giving to the King a barbd-headed Arrow, whenſoever he commeth into thoſe parts to hunt in Cornedon Chace.

Lugg haſteneth now to Wy, firſt by Hampton, where that worthy Knight Sir Rouland Lenthal, who (being Maiſter of the Wardrobe unto King Henry the Fourth, had married one of the heires of Thomas Earle of Arundell) built a paſſing faire houſe, which the Coningsberes (men of good worſhip and great name in this tract) have now a good long time inhabited: then, by Marden and Southton, or Sutton: of which twaine, Sutton ſheweth ſome ſmall remaines of King Offaes Palace, ſo infamous for the murdering of Ethelbert: and Marden is counted famous for the Tombe of the ſaid Ethelbert, who had lien heere a long time without any glorious memoriall, before that he was tranſlated to Hereford.

Neere unto the place where Lugg and Wy meete together, Eaſtward, a hill which they call Marcley hill, in the yeere of our redemption, 1571. (as though it had wakened upon the ſuddaine out of a deepe ſleepe) rouſed it ſelfe up, and for the ſpace of three daies together mooving and ſhewing it ſelfe (as mighty and huge an heape as it was) with roring noiſe in a fearefull ſort, and overturning all things that ſtood in the way, advanced it ſelfe forward to the wonderous aſtoniſhment of the beholders: by that kinde of Earthquake which as I deeme, naturall Philoſophers call Braſmatias. And not farre from this hill, toward the Eaſt alſo, under Malvern hills (which in this place bound the Eaſt part of this ſhire) ſtandeth Ledbury upon the River Ledden, a Towne well knowne, which Edwin the Saxon, a man of great power, gave unto the Church of Hereford, being aſſuredly perſwaded that by Saint Ethelberts interceſſion he was delivered from the Palſey. Touching the Military fort on the next hill, I need not to ſpeake, ſeeing that in this tract which was in the Marches, and the ordinary fighting ground plot, firſt betweene the Romanes and Britans, afterwards betweene the Britains and the Engliſh, ſuch holds and entrenchments are to be ſeene in

But Wy now carrying a full ſtreame, after it hath entertained Lugg runneth downe with more bendings and bowings, firſt by Holm Lacy, the ſeate of the ancient and noble Family of Scudamore unto which accrewed much more worſhip by marriage with an heire out of the race of Ewias in this ſhire, and Huntercombe, &c. elſe where. From hence paſſeth Wy downe betweene Roſſe, made a free Burrough by King Henry the Third, now well knowne by reaſon of iron Smiths and Wilton over againſt it, a moſt ancient Caſtle of the Greis, whence ſo many worthy Barons of that name have drawne their originall. This was built as men ſay by Hugh de Long-champ, but upon publique and certaine credit of Records it appeareth, that King John gave Wilton with the Caſtle to H. de Longchamp; and that by marB riage it fell to William Fitz-Hugh, and likewiſe not long after to Reinold Grey in the daies of King Edward the firſt. Now, when Wy hath a little beneath ſaluted Goderick Caſtle, which King John gave unto William Earle Mareſchall, and was afterward for a time the principall ſeate of the Talbots, hee ſpeedeth himſelfe to Monmouth-ſhire, and bids Hereford-ſhire farewell.

When the ſtate of the Engliſh-Saxons was now more than declining to the downe-fall, Ralph ſonne to Walter Medantinus by Goda King Edward the Confeſſours ſiſter, governed this Countie, as an Officiall Earle: but he infamous for baſe cowardiſe, was by William the Conquerour remooved, and William Fitz-Osbern of Crepon a martiall Norman who had ſubdued the Iſle of Wight, and was neere alC lied to the Dukes of Normandy, was ſubſtituted in his place: When he was ſlaine in aſſiſtance of the Earle of Flanders, his ſonne Roger ſurnamed De Bretevill ſucceeded, and ſoone after for conſpiracie againſt the Conquerour was condemned to perpetuall priſon, and therein died leaving no lawfull iſſue. Then King Stephen granted to Robert Le Boſſu Earle of Leiceſter who had married Emme or Itta (as ſome call her) heire of Bretevill (to uſe the words of the Graunt) the Burrough of Hereford, with the Caſtle, and the whole County of Hereford, but all in vaine. For Maude the EmD preſſe who contended with King Stephen for the Crowne, advaunced Miles the ſonne of Walter Conſtable of Gloceſter unto this Honour, and alſo graunted to him Conſtabulariam Curiæ ſuæ, i. The Conſtableſhip of her Court, whereupon his poſteritie were Conſtables of England, as the Marſhalſhip was graunted at the firſt, by the name of Magiſtratus Mareſcalſiæ Curiæ noſtræ. Howbeit, Stephen afterwards ſtript him out of theſe Honours which he had received from her.

* Earles of Hereford.

Conſtables of England.

This Miles had five ſonnes; Roger, Walter, Henry, William, and Mahel, men of eſpeciall note, who were cut off every one iſſueleſſe by untimely death, after they had all but William, ſucceeded one another in their Fathers inheritance. Unto Roger King Henry the Second among other things gave, The Mote of Hereford with the whole Caſtle, and the third peny iſſuing out of the revenewes of Plees of the whole County of Hereford, whereof he made him Earle. But after Roger was deceaſed, the ſame King, if wee may beleeve Robert Abbot De Monte, kept the Earledome of Hereford to E himſelfe.

The eldeſt ſiſter of theſe named Margaret, was married to Humfrey Bohun the third of that name, and his heires were high Conſtables of England, namely, Humfrey Bohun the Fourth; Henry his ſonne, unto whom King Iohn graunted twenty pounds yeerely to be received out of the third penny of the County of Hereford, whereof he made him Earle. This Henry married the ſiſter and heire of William Mandevill Earle of Eſſex, and died in the fourth yeere of Henry the Third his reigne: Humfrey the Fifth his ſonne, who was alſo Earle of Eſſex: whoſe ſonne Humfrey the Sixth of that forename died before his Father, having firſt begotten Humfrey the Seventh by a daughter and one of the heires of William Breos Lord of Brecknock: His ſonne HumF frey the Eighth was ſlaine at Burrowbrig, leaving by Elizabeth his wife, daughter unto King Edward the Firſt and the Earle of Hollands widow, among other children, namely, Iohn Bohun, Humfrey the Ninth, both Earles of Hereford and Eſſex, and dying without iſſue: and William Earle of Northampton, unto whom Elizabeth a

But after this, Edward Stafford laſt Duke of Buckingham was ſtiled Earle of Hereford, for that hee deſcended from Thomas of Woodſtock his Daughter, who was after remarried to Sir William Burchier called Earle of Ew. And in our memorie, King Edward the Sixth Honoured Walter D'Eureux, the Lord Ferrars of Chartley deſcended by the Bourgchiers from the Bohuns, with the title of Vicount Hereford, whoſe Grand-ſonne Walter Vicount Hereford, Queene Elizabeth created afterwards Earle of Eſſex.

RADNOR-SHIRE.

VPon Hereford-ſhire, on the North-Weſt, joyneth Radnor-ſhire, in the Britiſh tongue, Sire Maiſeveth; in forme three ſquare, and the farther Weſt it goeth, the narrower ſtill it groweth. On the South-ſide, the River Wy ſeparateth it from Brecknock-ſhire, and on the North part, lieth Montgomery-ſhire. The Eaſt and South parts thereof bee more fruitfull than the reſt, which lying uneven and rough with Mountaines, is hardly bettered by painfull Husbandry: yet it is ſtored well enough with Woods, watered with running Rivers, and in ſome places with ſtanding Meres. The Eaſt-ſide hath to beautifie it, beſides other Caſtles of the Lords Marchers, now all buried well neere, in their owne ruines, Caſtle Paine; built and ſo named of Paine a Norman; and Caſtle Colwen, which, if I be not deceived, was ſometime called the Caſtle of Maud in Colewent. For a very famous Caſtle that was, and Robert de Todeney a great Noble man, in the reigne of Edward the Second was Lord of it. It is verily thought, that it belonged aforetime to the Breoſes, Lords of Brechnoc, and to have taken the name from Maude of Saint Valeric, a very ſhrewd, ſtout, and malapert ſtomackfull woman, wife to William Breos, who diſcovered a rebellious minde againſt King John. Which Caſtle being caſt downe by the Welſh, King Henry the Third, in the yeere 1231. reedified ſtrongly with ſtone, and called it in deſpight of Lhewellin Prince of Wales Maugre Lhewellin. But of eſpeciall name is Radnor the principall Towne of the whole Shire, in Britiſh Maiſeveth, faire built, as the maner of that Country is, with thatched houſes. In times paſt it was firmely fenſed with a Wall and Caſtle: but after that Owen Glendower dwy that notable Rebell had burnt it, it began by little and little to decreaſe, and grow to decay, taſting of the ſame fortune that the mother thereof did before, I meane Old Radnor, called in Britiſh Maiſeveth hean, and for the high ſituation Pencrag; which in the reigne of King John, Rheſe Ap Gruffin had ſet on fire. If I ſhould ſay, that this Maiſeveth or Radnor was that ancient Citie MAGI, which Antonine the Emperour ſeemeth to call MAGNOS, where, as we finde in the booke of Notices, the Commander of the Pacenſian Regiment lay in garriſon, under the Lieutenant, or Lord Generall of Britaine, in the reigne of Theodoſius the younger; in mine owne opinion ſurely, and perhaps in other mens conceit alſo, I ſhould not vary from the truth. For we reade in Writers of the middle age, of inhabitants of this coaſt called MAGESETÆ; alſo of Earles Maſegetenſes and Mageſetenſes: and the diſtance, if it be counted both from Gobannium or Abergevenny, and alſo from Brangonium or Worceſter, differeth ſcarce an haire bredth from Antonines computation. Scarce three miles Eaſtward from hence, you ſee Preſtaine, in Britiſh Lhan Andre, that is, Saint Andrews Church; which of a very little village within the memorie of our Grandfathers, is by the meanes of Richard Martin Biſhop of Saint Davids, growne now to be ſo great a mercate Towne and faire withall, that at this day it dammereth and dimmeth the light in ſome ſort of Radnor. From whence alſo ſcarce foure miles off, ſtands Knighton, a Towne able to match with Preſtaine, called in Britiſh, as I have heard ſay Trebuclo, in ſteed of Trefyclaudh, of a famous ditch lying under it, which Offa King of the Mercians with admirable worke and labour, cauſed to be caſt from Dee-Mouth unto Wy-Mouth, by this Towne, for the ſpace of foureſkore and ten miles, to ſeparate the Britans from his Engliſhmen: whereupon, in Britiſh it is called Claudh Offa, that is, Offaes ditch. Concerning which, John of Salisbury in his Policraticon writeth thus. Harald ordained a law, that what Welſhmen ſoever ſhould be found with a weapon, on this ſide the limit which he had ſet them, that is to ſay, Offaes Dike, he ſhould have his right hand cut off by the Kings Officers.

When yee are paſt this place, all the ground that lieth toward the Weſt and South

South limits, being for the moſt part barren, leane, and hungry, is of the inhabitants called Melienith, for that the Mountaines be of a yellowiſh colour. Yet remaine there many footings as it were of Caſtles to be ſeene heere and there, but eſpecially Kevenles and Timbod which ſtanding upon a ſharpe poynted hill, Lhewellin Prince of Wales overthrew in the yeere 1260.

This Melienith reacheth as farre as to the River Wy, which cutteth overthwart the Weſt corner of this ſhire, and being hindered in his ſtreame with ſtones lying in his way, upon a ſuddaine for want of ground to glide on, hath a mighty and violent downefall: whereupon the place is tearmed, Raihader Gowy, that is, The fall or Fludgates of Wy: And I cannot tell, whether thereupon that Britiſh word Raihader, the Engliſh men forged this name firſt for the whole ſhire, and afterwards for the chiefe Towne. By this Floudgate or fall of the water there was a Caſtle which Rheſe Prince of Southwales (as we reade) repaired under King Richard the Firſt. Hard by, there is in ſome ſort a vaſt and wide wilderneſſe, hideous after a ſort to behold, by reaſon of the turning and crooked by-waies and craggie Mountaines, into which as the ſafeſt place of refuge, Vortigern that peſtilent wretch and bane of his native Country, odious both to God and man, and (whoſe memory the Britains may wiſh damned) withdrew himſelfe, when after he had called the Saxons into this Iland, and in horrible inceſt married his owne daughter. And heere he fell at length too too late into ſerious conſideration of the greatneſſe of his vile and wicked acts. But by revenging fire from Heaven, the flying dart of God above, he was burnt with his Citie Caer Guortigern, which he had heere built for his refuge. And not farre from hence, as if the place had been fatall, not onely this Vortigern the laſt Monarch of Britiſh bloud, but alſo Lhewellin the laſt Prince of Wales of the Britiſh race being forelaid, was ſlaine by Adam Franckon in the yeere of our Redemption 1282. Of the ſaid Vortigern, Ninnius nameth a little Country heere Guortiger-maur; neither is that name as yet altogether loſt: but of the Citie, there remaineth no memory at all, but out of writers. Some are of opinion, that Guthremion Caſtle aroſe out of the ruins and rubbiſh thereof, which in the yeere 1201. the Welſh for malice they bare to Roger Lord Mortimer and in ſpight of him laid even with the ground. Moreover, this part of the Country was in old time called Guarthenion, as Ninnius teſtifieth, who wrote, that the ſaid wicked Vortigern, when he was plainely and ſharply reprooved by that godly Saint German, did not onely not turne from his lewd and licentious life to the worſhip and ſervice of God, but alſo let flie ſlanderous ſpeeches againſt that moſt holy man: Wherefore, Vortimer the ſonne of Vortigern, as Ninnius ſaith, for the ſlander which his Father had raiſed of Saint German, decreed, that he ſhould have the land as his owne for ever, wherein he had ſuffered ſo reprochfull an abuſe: whereupon, and to the end that Saint German might be had in memory, it was called Guarthenion, which ſignifieth in Engliſh, A ſlander juſtly retorted.

The Mortimers, deſcended from the Niece of Gonora Wife of Richard the Firſt, Duke of Normandie, were the firſt Normans that having diſcomfited the Engliſh Saxon Edricke Sylvaticus, that is, The wild, wonne a great part of this little Country to themſelves: And after they had a long time been eminent above all others in theſe parts, at length King Edward the Third, about the yeere of Salvation 1328. Created Roger Mortimer Lord of Wigmore, Earle of this Welſh limit, or, according to the common ſpeech, Earle of March, who ſoone after was ſentenced to death, becauſe he had inſulted upon the Common-wealth, favoured the Scots to the prejudice of England, converſed over familiarly with the Kings mother, and contrived the deſtruction and death of King Edward the Second, the Kings Father. He by his Wife Joan Jenevell, (who brought him rich revenewes, as well in Ireland as in England) had Edmund his Sonne, who felt the ſmart of his Fathers wickedneſſe, and loſt both patrimonie and title of Earle. Howbeit, his Sonne Roger was fully reſtored, recovered the title of Earle of March and was choſen a fellow of the order of the Garter, at the firſt inſtitution thereof. This Roger begat of Philip Montacute, Edmund Earle of March: and he tooke to Wife Philip the only daughter of Leonell Duke of Clarence the third ſonne of King Edward the Third, whereby came unto him the Earldome of Ulſter in Ireland and

A and the Lordſhip of Clare. After he had ended his life in Ireland where he governed with great commendation; his ſonne Roger ſucceeded, being both Earle of March and Ulſter, whom King Richard the Second declared heire apparent, and his ſucceſſour to the Crowne, as being in right of his Mother the next and undoubted heire. But he dying before king Richard, left iſſue, Edmund and Anne. Edmund, in regard of his Royall bloud and right to the Crowne ſtood greatly ſuſpected to Henrie the Fourth, who had uſurped the kingdome; and by him was firſt expoſed unto dangers, in ſo much as he was taken by Owen Glendour a Rebell, and afterward whereas the Percies purpoſed to advance his right, he was conveyed into Ireland, kept almoſt twenty yeeres priſoner in the Caſtle of Trim ſuffering all miſeries incident to Prin-
B ces of the bloud while they lie open to every ſuſpition; and there through extreame griefe ended his daies; leaving his ſiſter Anne his heire.

She was married to Richard Earle of Cambridge, in whoſe right, his heires and poſterity were Earles of March, and made claime to the kingdome, which in the end alſo they obtained, as wee will ſhew in another place. In which reſpect King Edward the Fourth created his eldeſt Sonne being Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwall, &c. Earle of March alſo, for a further augmentation of his Honour. As for the title of Rad-nor, no man ever bare it to my knowledge.

BRECHNOCK-SHIRE.

BEneath Radnor-ſhire Southward lyeth BRECHNOCK-SHIRE, in the Britiſh Brechineau ſo named, as the Welſhmen relate, of a Prince named Brechanius, whom they report to have had a great, and an holy Offspring, to wit, twenty foure Daughters all Saints. Farre greater this is than Radnor-ſhire, but thicker ſet with high Hilles; yet are the valleies fruitfull every where. On the Eaſt ſide it is bounded with Hereford-ſhire. On the South with Monmouth, and Glamorgan-ſhires: ond on the Weſt with Caermarden-ſhire. But ſeeing there is nothing memorable or materiall to the deſcription of this ſmall Province, which is not ſet downe by the curious diligence of Giraldus Cambrenſis who was an Archdeacon heereof above foure hundred yeeres ſince. I thinke I may doe well for my ſelfe to hold my peace a while, and to admit him with his ſtile into the fellowſhip of this labour.

Brecknocke, ſaith hee, in his Booke called Itinerarium Cambriæ, is a Country having ſufficient ſtore of Corne; and if there bee any defect thereof, it is plentifully ſupplied out of the fruitefulneſſe of England bordering ſo neere upon it; a Country likewiſe well ſtored with paſtures and Woods, with wilde Deere and heards of Cattaile, having abundance beſide of freſh water fiſh, wherewith Vske on the one ſide and Wy on the other ſerveth it: For, both theſe Rivers are full of Salmons and Trouts, but Wy of the twaine is the better, affording the beſt kinde of them which they call Vmbras. Encloſed it is on every ſide with high hilles, unleſſe it be on the North part. In the Weſt it hath the mountaines of Canterbochan: On the South-ſide likewiſe the Southern mountaines, the chiefe whereof is called Cadier Arthur, that is, Arthurs chaire, of the two toppes of the ſame (for it is διδυμος, that is, ſhaped with two copes) reſembling the forme of a Chaire. And for that the Chaire ſtandeth very high and upon a ſteepe downefall, by a common tearme it was aſſigned to Arthur the greateſt and mightieſt King of the Britans. In the very pitch and top of this hill, there walmeth forth a ſpring of water: And this fountaine in manner of a Well is deepe, but foure ſquare, having no brooke or Riveret iſſuing from it, yet are there Trouts found therein. And therefore having theſe barres on the South ſide, the aire is the colder, defendeth the Country from the exceſſive heat of the Sunne, and by a certaine naturall wholſomneſſe of the aire, maketh it moſt temperate. But on the Eaſt ſide the mountaines of Talgar and Ewias doe as it were forefenſe it.

On the North ſide, as he ſaid, it is more open and plaine, namely where the River Wy ſevereth it from Radnor-ſhire, by which ſtand two Townes well knowne for their antiquity, Buelth and Hay. Buelth is pleaſantly ſituate with Woods about it, fortified alſo with a Caſtle, but of a later building, by the Breoſes and Mortimers, when as Rheſe ap Gruffin had raſed the ancient Caſtle. Now, the Mercate much reſorted unto maketh it more famous thereabout, but in times paſt it ſeemeth to have beene for the owne worth of great name, becauſe Ptolomee obſerved the poſition therof according to the Longitude and Latitude: who called it BULLEUM Silurum. Of this towne the country lying round about it, being rough and full of hils, is named Buelth: wherein, when as the Saxons were now ſpoiling and harrying the whole Iſland, and Vortigern had withdrawne himſelfe into theſe parts, Paſcentius his ſonne ruled all as Lord, by the permiſſion of Aurelius Ambroſe, as Ninnius writeth, who in his Chapter of Mervails, reporteth I wot not what wondrous thing heere, of a heape of ſtones, wherein, forſooth, was plainly to be ſeene the footing of King Arthurs hound. And as for Hay, which in Britiſh is called Trekethle, that is, The Towne in a grove of Haſell trees, in the very utmoſt skirt of this Shire next unto Hereford-ſhire, it ſtandeth hard by the river Wye: well knowne, as it ſeemeth to the Romans, whoſe coines is often digged up there, and it ſheweth alſo by the ruines, that in old time it was walled. But being being now as it were decaied it complaineth of that moſt lewde Rebell Owen Glendowerdwy for his furious outrages, who in waſting and ſpoiling all thoſe Countries, moſt villanouſly did depopulate it and ſet it on fire.

As this River Wy waſheth the North ſide of this Shire, ſo doth Vske a notable River likewiſe runne through the middeſt thereof, which Vske ſpringing out of the Blacke-Mountaine, paſſeth along with a ſhallow ſtreame, beſide Brechnock the Shire Towne, ſtanding in the very heart in manner of the Country, which the Britans call Aber-Hodney, becauſe the two Rivers Hodney and Uske doe meet in that place. That this Towne was inhabited in the Romans time, appeareth by the Coines of Roman Emperours now and then digged up heere. Bernard Newmarch, who conquered this little Shire, built heere a goodly great Caſtle, which the Breoſes and Bohuns repaired: and in our fathers remembrance King Henry the Eighth in the Friery of the Dominicans appointed a Collegiat Church of foureteene Prebendaries, which hee tranſlated hither from Aberguilly in Caer-Marden-ſhire.

Brecknock.

Two miles hence Eaſtward, there ſpreads it ſelfe abroad a large Poole, which the Britans call Linſavethan and Linſavathen, that is, A Lake of ſtanding water, Giraldus tearmeth it Clamoſum, that is, Clamorous, or Crying loud, becauſe it maketh a ſtrange noiſe like thunder, as often as the Yce thereon doth thaw. In Engliſh we name it Brecknock-Meere. Two miles it is in length and as much in bredth: breeding in times paſt many Otters, now full of Pearches, Tenches, and Eeles, which the Fiſhers rowing in ſmall pliant botes doe take.

Linſavethen Mere.

Brecknock Mere.

Leveney a little River, after it is runne into this Poole keepeth his owne hew and color ſtill by himſelfe; as diſdaining to be mingled therewith, (which the very color ſheweth) is thought to carry out his owne water entertained a while there by the way, and no more than hee brought in with him. It hath beene a currant ſpeech of long continuance among the neighbours thereabout, that where now the Mere is, there was in times paſt a City, which being ſwallowed up in an earthquake, reſigned up the place unto the waters. And beſide other reaſons, they alleage this for one, that all the high waies of this ſhire come directly hither on every ſide. Which if it be true, what other City ſhould a man thinke ſtood by the River Leveney, than LOVENTIUM, which Ptolomee placeth in this tract: and in no place hitherto could I finde it (albeit I ſearched diligently for it) either by the name, or ſituation, or ruines remaining. Marianus Scotus (which I had almoſt forgotten) ſeemeth to call this Lake Bricenau Meere, who recordeth that Edelfled the Mercian Lady, in the yeere 913. entred into the land of the Britans to win by aſſault a Caſtle at Bricenau Meere; and that ſhe tooke there the King of the Britans wife priſoner. Whether this Caſtle were Brechnock it ſelfe or Caſtle Dinas, which ſtandeth over it upon a rockey hill, and which the higher it riſeth the ſlenderer and ſmaller it becommeth, it is not certainely knowne. But that Blean Laveney Caſtle hard by, was the chiefe place of the Barony, that Petre Fitz Herbert the ſonne of Herbert Lord of Dean-foreſt by Lucy the daughter of Miles Earle of Hereford held, appeareth evidently upon Record.

In the Raigne of King William Ruſus, Bernard Newmarch the Norman, a man both hardy and politique withall, having levied a great Army of Engliſhmen and Normans together, was the firſt that entred into this territory by force and armes, won it and wreſted it out of the Welſhmens hands by bloudy encounters, raiſed fortreſſes heere for his fellow ſouldiers (among which the chiefe were the Aubreeis, Gunters, Haverds, Waldbeofes and Prichards) allotted lands and lordſhips, and that hee might ſet ſure footing, and eſtabliſh his ſeat among the Welſh, who repined maliciouſly at him, he tooke to wife Neſta the daughter of Gruffin: who being a woman of a ſhameleſſe and revengefull ſpirit, both bereft her ſelfe of her owne good name, and alſo defeated her ſonne of his inheritance. For, when Mabel the ſaid Bernards onely ſonne, did ſhake up in ſom hard and ſharpe termes a young Gentleman, with whom ſhe uſed more familiarly than was beſeeming: ſhee, as the Poet ſaith, iram atque animos à crimine ſumens, growing angry and ſtomackfull upon this imputation, tooke her corporall oath before King Henry the Second, and proteſted that her ſonne Mabel was

A begotten in adultery, and not by Bernard her Husband: whereupon Mabel being disinherited, Sibyl his sister entred upon that faire Inheritance, and with the same enriched her Husband Miles, Earle of Hereford. But after that five sonnes of Miles died without issue, this Brechnock-shire in the partition of the inheritance fell to Bertha his daughter: who by Philip de Breos had a sonne William de Breos Lord of Brechnock, upon whom the seditious spirit and shrewd tongue of his wife drew a world of calamities. For when shee had with her intemperate and unbridled language contumeliously abused King John, the King thereupon (because her Husband William was very deepely indebted unto him) fell to bee quicke and rigorous in demanding the debt: But he, not able to make payment, after he had shifted it off many times, and B by breaking day, still made default, in the end mortgaged unto the King three of his Castles; namely Hay, Brecknock and Radnor, and put them into his hands. But soone after, levying certaine forces, such as he could muster up in haste, upon a suddaine, surprised them, slew the Garison Souldiers and wrested the said peeces perforce from them, burnt the Towne of Lemster, and thus killing, slaying and driving away booties, he made foule worke and havocke every way, with all such outrages as Rebels doe commonly commit. But when the King pursued him, hee conveyed himselfe and all that he had into Ireland, complotted and combined with the Kings enemies there: yet under a colour, as if hee would make submission, hee came unto the King upon protection and assurance given of safety when he was upon his returne C into Ireland. And notwithstanding many goodly promises of the contrary, he raised new stirres and troubles eftsoones in Wales: But forced in the end to leave his native Country, he died a banished man in France. As for his wife being taken prisoner, and famished in prison (the extremest misery that can befall unto man or woman) she paied most deerely for her wicked and malapert tongue. His sonne Giles, Bishop of Hereford, by the favour and consent of King John, having recovered his fathers inheritance neglecting his nephew the right heire, left it unto his brother Reginald, whose sonne William, Lhelin Prince of Wales having taken him in bed with his wife, hanged. But by the daughters of that William, the Mortimers, Cantelows, and Bohuns Earles of Hereford entred upon a great and goodly inheritance. And this Brech- D nock fell in partition unto the Bohuns, and in the end by them unto the Staffords: and when Edward Stafford Duke of Buckingham was attainted, many very goodly revenewes fell unto the King in this Shire, and elsewhere.

MONMOUTH-SHIRE.

BEneath Brechnock and Hereford-ſhire Southward, lyeth the County of Monmouth, commonly called in Engliſh MONMOUTH-SHIRE, in times paſt Went-ſet and Wents-land, in Britiſh Guent, of an ancient City ſo called. It is incloſed on the North ſide with the River Munow that ſeparateth it from Hereford-ſhire: on the Eaſt ſide with Wye running betweene it and Glocester-ſhire: on the Weſt with the River Remney, which ſevereth it from Glamorgan-ſhire, and on the South with the Severn ſea, whereinto the ſaid Rivers together with Uske, that cutteth through the middeſt of the Country, are diſcharged. As for commodities neceſſary to mans life, it hath not onely ſufficient for it ſelfe, but alſo affoordeth them in plentifull manner to the neighbours adjoyning. The Eaſt part is full of graſſe and woods: the Weſt is ſomewhat hilly and ſtony, yet not unthankefull to the Husbandman. The people, as ſaith Giraldus writing of his owne age, moſt inured to martiall conflicts, is in feates of ſtrength and valour right commendable, and for ſkill of archery and ſhooting farre ſurpaſſing any Country in Wales.

In the utmoſt angle called Ewias toward the North-Weſt, not farre from the River Munow, among Hatterell hills which becauſe they riſe up in heigth like a chaire, they call Munith Cader, there ſtood Lanthony a little ancient Abbay, which Walter Lacy founded; unto whom William Earle of Hereford gave faire lands heere, and from whom are deſcended thoſe renowned Lacies, worthily reputed among the moſt noble Conquerours of Ireland. The ſituation of which Abbay Giraldus Cambrenſis, who knew it better than I, ſhall penſile it out unto you for mee. In the moſt deepe Valley of Ewias, ſaith hee, which is about an arrow-ſhoote over, ſtandeth a Church of Saint Iohn Baptiſt, encloſed on every ſide in a round compaſſe, with hilles mounting up into the aire, covered with lead, and built ſightly, as the nature of the place would permit, with an arched roofe of ſtone, in a place where had ſtood aforetime a poore Chappell of Saint David the Archbiſhop, adorned onely with wilde moſſe, and wreathes of claſping ivie. A fit place for true Religion, and of all the Monaſteries in the Iſland of Britaine moſt convenient for Canonicall Diſcipline, being founded firſt by two Eremits in the honour of an Eremite, farre remooved from all ſtirres and noiſe of people, in a certaine deſert and ſolitary nouke, ſeated upon the River Hodney running along the botome of the Vale, whereof and of Hodney together, it is called Lanhodeny: For, Lhan ſignifieth, a Church or Eccleſiaſticall place. But if we will ſpeake more exquiſitely, it may be ſaid, that the proper name of that place is in Welſh Nanthodeny: For even to this day, they that dwell thereabout call it Lhan Devi Nanthodeny. That is, Davids Church upon the River Hodeney. Now, the raine, which mountaines breed, falleth heere very often, the windes blow ſtrong, and all Winter time almoſt it is continually cloudy and miſty weather. And yet notwithſtanding (ſuch is the healthfull temperature of the aire, which the groſſer it is, the gentler and milder it is) very ſeldome there are any diſeaſes heere. The Cloiſterers ſitting heere in their Cloiſtures, when to refreſh and breathe themſelves they chance to looke up, they ſee on every ſide of them, over the high roofes and ridges of their houſes, the tops of the hils touching as it were the skie, and the very wilde Deere for the moſt part, whereof there is heere great ſtore, feeding aloft (as one would ſay) in the farthest Horizon or kenning of their ſight. And it is betweene one and three of the clocke, or thereabout in a faire cleere day, ere they can ſee heere the body of the Sunne, ſo much adoe he hath to get above the hill tops by that time. And a little after. The fame that went of this place drew Roger Biſhop of Salisbury hither, being then the chiefe Governour of the Realme under the King, who when hee had a good while conſidered with admiration, the nature of the place, the deſert ſolitarineſſe, the Eremeticall ſtate and condition of the religious men there ſerving God without complaining, together with their converſation in every reſpect without murmuring and grudging, returned home to the King, and making re-

By the River Munow are to bee ſeene Groſſemont and Skinffrith Caſtles belonging in times paſt by the grant of King John to the Breoſes, afterwards to Hubert de Burgh, Earle of Kent, who, that he might calme the Court-tempeſts of diſpleaſure and for the renewing of peace and recovering former favour, reſigned both theſe and with- B all Blanc caſtle and Hanfield into the hands of King Henry the Third.

In the other corner North-Eaſtward, Munow and Wye at their confluence doe compaſſe almoſt round about the chiefe Towne of the Shire, and give it the name. For in the Britiſh tongue it is called Mongwy, and in ours Monmouth. On the North-ſide, where it is not defended with the Rivers, it was fortified with a wall and ditch. In the middeſt of the Towne hard by the Mercate place ſtandeth a Caſtle, which, as it is thought, John Baron of Monmouth built, from whom it came to the houſe of Lancaſter, after that King Henry the Third had taken from him all his inheritance; for that he had ſided with the Barons and ſtood rebelliouſly againſt him, or rather, as wee reade in the Kings Prerogative, becauſe his heires had given their faith and C allegeance to the Earle of Britaine in France. And ever ſince that time, the Towne hath flouriſhed and beene of name in regard of their priviledges and immunities granted unto them by the Family of Lancaſter. But for no one thing it is ſo much renowned, as for this, that it was the birth place of King Henry the Fifth that Triumpher over France, and the ſecond ornament of Engliſh Nation. That Henry I ſay, who by force of armes and military proweſſe maugre the French, conquered France and brought Charles the Sixth King of France to that extremity, that after a ſort he ſurrendred up his Crowne unto him. In regard of whoſe ſucceſſe and fortunate exploits in Warre, Iohn Seward a Poet in thoſe dayes not of the loweſt ranke, in a joily lofty verſe thus ſpeaketh to the Engliſh: D

Geffrey Ap-Arthur, or of Monmouth.

Monmouth glorieth alſo that Geffrey Ap Arthur or Arthurius Biſhop of Aſaph the compiler of the Britiſh Hiſtory was borne and bred there: a man to ſay truth well skilled in

A in antiquities, but, as it ſeemeth, not of antique credite, ſo many toies and tales hee every where enterlaceth out of his owne braine as he was charged while hee lived, in ſo much as now hee is ranged among thoſe Writers, whom the Roman Church hath cenſured to be forbidden.

From hence Wy with many windings and turnings runneth downe Southward, yeelding very great plenty of delicate Salmons from September to April. And is at this day the bound betweene Gloteſter-ſhire and Monmouth-ſhire, in times paſt betweene the Welſh and Engliſhmen, according to this Verſe of Nechams making.

Inde vagos vaga Cambrenſes, hinc reſpicit Anglos.

By Wales on this ſide runneth Wy,
And of the other England he doth eye.

B Who when he is come almoſt unto his mouth, runneth by Chepſtow, that is, if one interprete it after the Saxons tongue, a Mercat: The Britans call it Caſtle-went. A famous Towne this is and of good reſort, ſituate upon the ſide of an Hill, riſing from the very River, fortified round about with a Wall of a large circuite, which includes within it both fields and orchyards. It hath a very ſpacious Caſtle ſituate over the River: and juſt againſt it ſtood a Priory: the better part whereof being pulled downe, the reſt is conuerted into a Pariſh Church. As for the Bridge that ſtandeth over Wy, it is of timber and very high built, becauſe the River at every tide riſeth to a great heigth. Chepſtow.

C The Lords hereof were the Earles of Pembroch out of the Family of Clare, who of Strighull Caſtle their ſeat a little way off, were commonly called Earles of Strighull and of Pembrock. The laſt of whom named Richard, a man of an invincible courage, and having wonderfull ſtrong armes and long withall, ſirnamed Strongbow, becauſe hee ſhot in a bow of exceeding great bent, and did nothing but with ſtrong arme, was the firſt that by his valour made way for the Engliſh into Ireland. By a daughter of his it came to the Bigots, &c. but now it belongeth to the Earles of Worceſter. This Towne is not very ancient to ſpeake of. For, many there bee that conſtantly affirme, and not without good reaſon, that not many ages agoe it had his beginning from VENTA a very ancient City, that in the daies of Antonine the Em- Earles of Strighull or Pembrock.

D peror flouriſhed about foure miles hence Weſtward and was named VENTA SILURUM, (as one would ſay) the principall City of the Silures: Which name neither hoſtile fury nor length of time hath as yet diſcontinued: for it is called even at this day Caer went, that is, The City Went. But, as for the City it ſelfe, either time or hoſtility hath ſo carryed it away, that now were it not onely for the ruinate walles, the checker worke, pauements and peeces of Roman money, it would not appeare there was ſuch a City. It tooke up in compaſſe above a mile: on the South ſide a great part of the Wall ſtandeth, and there remaine little better than the rubbiſh of three Bulwarks. And yet of how great account it was in ancient times, wee may gather, if it were but by this, that before the name of Monmouth once heard of, all this Venta. Caer-went.

E whole Country was of it, called Guent, Went-ſet and Wents-land. Moreover, as wee reade in the life of Tathaius a Britiſh Saint, it was an Academy, that is to ſay, a place dedicated to the ſtudy of good letters, which the ſaid Tathaie whom King Caradock the ſonne of Iutrius procured to come thither out of the deſert wilderneſſe, governed with great commendation, and there founded a Church. The Booke of Landaffe Church.

Five miles from hence Weſtward, is ſeated Strighull Caſtle, at the foote of the mountaines, we call it at this day Struggle, the Normans named it Eſtrighill: which as wee reade in King William the Firſt his Domeſday booke, William Fitz Osbern Earle of Hereford built: and afterwards it became the ſeat of the Earles of Pembrock out of the houſe of Clare. Whereupon they were uſually called Earles of Strighull, as I- Strighull Caſtle.

F ven now intimated.

Beneath theſe places upon the Severn ſea, nere unto Wy-mouth, ſtandeth Portskeweth, which Marianus nameth Poteſcith: who hath recorded, that Harald in the yeere 1065. erected a Fort there againſt the Welſhmen, which they ſtreightwaies under the conduct of Caradock, overthrew. And adjoyning to it is Sudbrok, the Church wherof called Portskeweth. * Sudbroke.

Trinity Chappell ſtandeth ſo neere the ſea, that the vicinity of ſo tyrannous a neighbour, hath ſpoiled it of halfe the Church-yarde, as it hath done alſo of an old Fortification, lying thereby, which was compaſſed with a triple Ditch and three Rampiers as high as an ordinary houſe, caſt in forme of a bowe, the ſtring whereof is the ſea-cliffe. That this was a Romane worke the Britaine brickes, and Romane coines there found are moſt certaine arguments, among which, the Reverend Father in God Francis Biſhop of Landaffe (by whoſe information I write this) imparted unto me of his kindneſſe one of the greateſt peeces that ever I ſaw coined of Corinthian copper by the City of Elaia in the leſſer Aſia to the honour of the Emperour Severus with this Greeke Inſcription, ΑΥΤ. ΚΑΙ. Α. CΕΠΤΙ. CΕΒΗΡΟ C. ΠΕΡ. that is, THE EMPEROUR CÆSAR. LUCIUS SEPTIMIUS SEVERUS PERTINAX. And in the Reverſe, an Horſeman with a Trophæe erected before him, but the letters not legible, ſave under him ΕΛΑΙΤΩΝ, that is, Of the Elaians, which kinde of great peeces the Italians call Medaglionj, and were extraordinary coines, not for common uſe, but coined by the Emperours either to bee diſtributed by the way of Largeſſe in triumphes, or to bee ſent for tokens to men well deſerving, or elſe by free Cities to the glory and memory of good Princes. What name this place anciently had, is hard to be found, but it ſeemeth to have beene the Port and landing place for Venta Silurum, when as it is but two miles from it.

Then Throgoy, a little River neere unto Caldecot entereth into the Severn Sea, where we ſaw the wall of a Caſtle that belonged to the High Conſtables of England: and was holden by the ſervice of Conſtableſhip of England. Hard by, are ſeene Wondy and Penhow, the ſeates in times paſt of the noble Family of Saint Maur, now corruptly named Seimor. For, G. Mareſhall Earle of Pembrock about the yeere of our Lord 1240. was bound for the winning of Wondy out of the Welſh mens hands, to aide William Seimor. From him deſcended Roger de Saint Maur Knight, who married one of the heires of I. Beauchamp of Hach, a very noble Baron, who derived his Pedegree from Sibyl Heire unto William Mareſhall, that moſt puiſſant Earle of Pembrock, from William Ferrars Earle of Darby, from Hugh de Viven, and William Mallet, men in times paſt moſt highly renowned.

The Nobility of all theſe and of others beſides, as may be evidently ſhewed, hath met together in that right honourable perſonage Edward Saint Maur or Seimor, now Earle of Hartford, a ſingular favourer of vertue and good learning, worthy in that behalfe to be honoured and commended to poſterity.

The Family of Saint Maur or Seimor.

Beneath this, lyeth ſpred for many miles together a Merſh, they call it the Moore, which, when I lately reviſed this worke, ſuffered a lamentable loſſe: For when the Severn Sea at a ſpring Tide in the change of the Moone what being driven backe for three dayes together with a South-Weſt Winde, and what with a very ſtrong pirry from the ſea troubling it, ſwelled and raged ſo high, that with ſurging billowes it came rolling and in-ruſhing amaine upon this Tract lying ſo low, as alſo upon the like flats in Somerſet-ſhire over againſt it, that it overflowed all, ſubverted houſes and drowned a number of beaſts, and ſome people withall. Where this Merſh Coaſt bearing out by little and little runneth forth into the ſea, in the very point thereof ſtandeth Goldclyffe aloft, that is, as Giraldus ſaith, A Golden Cliffe, ſo called, becauſe the ſtones there, of a golden colour, by reverberation of the Sunne ſhining full upon them, glitter with a wonderfull brightneſſe: neither can I bee eaſily perſwaded (ſaith hee) that Nature hath given this brightneſſe in vaine unto the ſtones, and that there ſhould bee a flower heere without fruite, were there any man that would ſearch into the Veines there, and uſing the direction of Art enter in the inmoſt and ſecreteſt bowels of the Earth.

Neere to this place there remaine the Reliques of a Priory, that acknowledge thoſe of Chandos for their founders and Patron. Paſſing thence by the Meriſh Country, we came to the mouth of the River Iſca, which the Britans name Uſk and Wijk, and ſome Writers terme it Oſca. This River as it runneth through the middeſt, as I ſaid before, of this County, floweth hard by three Townes of eſpeciall antiquity.

River Uske.

The

A The first, in the limite of the Shire North-West, Antonine the Emperour calleth GOBANIUM, at the very meeting of Uske and Geveny, whereof it had the name: and even at this day, keeping the ancient name, as it were, safe and sound is tearmed Aber-Gevenny, and short Aber-genny, which signifieth the confluents of Gevenny or Gobanny. Fortified it is with Wals and a Castle, which as saith Giraldus of all the Castles in Wales hath beene most defamed and stained with the foule note of treason. First, by William, Earle Miles his sonne, afterwards by William Breos: for both of them after they had trained thither, under a pretense of friendship, certain of the Nobles and chiefe Gentlemen of Wales, with promise of safe conduct, villanously slew them. But they escaped not the just judgement and vengeance of God. For, William Breos, after he had beene stripped of all his goods, and lost his wife and some of his children, who were famished to death, died in banishment: the other William, being brained with a stone, whiles Breulais Castle was on fire, suffered in the end due punishment for his wicked deserts. The first Lord to my knowledge of Aber Gevenny was one Sir Hameline Balun who made Brien of Wallingford or Brient de L'isle called also the Fitz-Count his heire. He having built heere a Lazarhouse for his two sonnes that were Lepres, ordained Walter the sonne of Miles Earle of Hereford, heire of the greatest part of his inheritance. After him succeeded his brother Henry, slaine by the Welshmen, who seized upon his lands, which the Kings Lieutenants and Captaines could not defend without great perill and danger. By a sister of this Henry it descended to the Breoses, and from them in right of marriage, by the Cantelowes to the Hastings, which Hastings being Earles of Pembrock enjoyed it for divers descents, and John Hastings having then no childe borne devised both it, and the Earledome of Pembrock as much as in him lay to his cosin Sir William Beauchamp, conditionally that he should beare his Armes. And when the last Hastings ended his life issueless, Reginald Lord Grey of Ruthin being found his Heire, passed over the Barony of Aber-geveny to the said William Beauchamp who was summoned afterward to Parliament by the name of W. Beauchamp de Abergevenny. Hee entailed the said Barony, reserving an estate to himselfe and his wife, and to the lawfull issue male of their bodies; and for default of such issue, to his brother Thomas Beauchamp Earle of Warwick and his heires males. This William Beauchamp Lord of Abergevenny, had a sonne named Richard, who for his martiall valour was created Earle of Worcester, and slaine in the French warres, leaving one onely daughter, whom Sir Edward Nevill, tooke to wife. Since which time the Nevils have enjoyed the honorable title of the Barons of Abergevenny (howbeit the Castle was by vertue of the entaile aforesaid detained from them a long time.) The fourth Baron of this house dying in our remembrance, left one onely daughter Mary, married to Sir Thomas Fane Knight, betwixt whom being the heire generall, and Edward Nevill the next heire male (unto whom by a will and the same ratified by authority of the Parliament, the Castle of Abergevenny and the greatest part of the lands was fallen) there was great competition, for the title of Abergevenny argued in the High Court of Parliament in the second yeere of King James; and their severall claimes debated seven severall daies by the learned Counsell of both parts, before the Lords of the Parliament. Yet when as the question of precise right in law was not sufficiently cleered, but both of them in regard of the nobility and honor of their family were thought of every one right worthy of honorable title; and whereas it appeared evidently by most certaine proofes, that the title as well of the Barony of Abergevenny, as of Le Despenser appertained hereditarily to this Family. The Lords humbly and earnestly besought the King, that both parties might be ennobled by way of restitution, who graciously assented thereunto. Hereupon the Lord Chancellour proposed unto the Lords, first whether the heire male should have the title of Abergevenny or the heire female: and the most voices carried it, that the title of the Barony of Abergevenny should bee restored unto the heire male. And when he propounded secondly, whether the title of the Barony Le Despenser should bee restored unto the female, they all with one accord gave their full consent. Which being declared unto the King, he confirmed their determination with his gracious approbation and royall aſſent. Then was Edward Nevill by the Kings Writ called unto the Parliament by the name of Baron Abergavenney, and in his Parliament Robes betweene two Barons, as the manner is, brought into the houſe, and placed in his ſeat above the Baron Audley. And at the very ſame time, were the letters Patents read, whereby the King reſtored, erected, preferred, &c. Mary Fane, to the ſtate, degree, title, ſtile, name, honour, and dignity of Baroneſſe Le-Deſpenſer, To have and to hold the foreſaid ſtate and unto the above named Mary and her heires, and that her heires, ſucceſſively ſhould bee Barons Le-Deſpenſer, &c. And upon a new queſtion mooved, unto whether the Barony of Abergavenney, or the Barony Le-Deſpenſer, the priority of place was due. The Lords referred this point to the Commiſſioners for the Office of the Earle Mareſchall of England, who after mature deliberation and weighing of the matter, gave definitive ſentence for the Barony Le-Deſpenſer, ſet downe under their hands and ſigned with their ſeales, which was read before the Lords of the Parliament, and by order from them entered into the Journall Booke, out of which I have ſummarily thus much exemplified: John Haſtings (for I have no reaſon to paſſe it over in ſilence) held this Caſtle by homage, Wardſhip, and marriage when it hapned (as wee reade in the Inquiſition) and if there ſhould chance any warre betweene the King of England and the Prince of Wales, hee was to keepe the Country of Over-went at his owne charges in the beſt manner he can, for his owne commodity, the Kings behoofe, and the Realme of Englands defence.

Burrium. The ſecond little City which Antonine named BURRIUM, and ſetteth downe twelve miles from Gobannium, ſtandeth where the River Birthin and Uske meete in one ſtreame. The Britans at this day, by tranſpoſing of the letters, call it Brunebegy for Burenbegy, and Caer Uske: Giraldus tearmeth it Caſtrum Oſcæ, that is, The Caſtle of Uske, and we Engliſhmen, Uske. At this day it can ſhew nothing but the ruines of a large and ſtrong Caſtle, ſituate moſt pleaſantly betweene the River Uske, and Olny a Riveret, which beneath it runneth from the Eaſt by Ragland, a faire houſe of the Earle of Worceſters, built Caſtle-like.

Iſca Legionis. Caer Lheon ar Uske. The third City which Antonine nameth ISCA, and LEGIO SECUNDA, is on the other ſide of Uske twelve Italian miles juſt diſtant from BURRIUM, as hee hath put it downe. The Britans call it Caer Leon, and Caer LEON ar Uske, that is, The City of the Legion upon Uske, of the ſecond Legion Auguſta, which alſo is called Britannica Secunda. This Legion being ordained by the Emperour Auguſtus, and tranſlated by Claudius out of Germany into Britaine, under the conduct of Veſpaſian, being ready at his command, when he aſpired to bee Emperour, and which procured the Legions in Britaine to take his part, was heere at laſt placed in Gariſon by Julius Frontinus (as it ſeemeth) againſt the Silures. How great this ISCA was in thoſe dayes liſten unto our Giral out of his Booke called Itinerarium Cambriæ, who thus deſcribeth it out of the ruines. It was an ancient and Authenticke City excellently well built in old time by the Romanes with bricke Walles. Heere may a man ſee many footings of the antique nobility and dignity it had, mighty and huge Palaces with golden pinacles in times paſt, reſembling the proud ſtatelineſſe of the Romanes, for that it had beene found firſt by Romane Princes, and beautified with goodly buildings. There may you behold a giant-like Towre, notable and brave baines, the remaines of Temples, and Theatres, all compaſſed in with faire walles, which are partly yet ſtanding. There may one finde in every place, as well within the circuit of the Wall, as without, houſes under ground, water pipes and Vaults within the earth, and (that which you will count among all the reſt worth obſervation) you may ſee every where hote houſes made wondrous artificially, breathing forth heate very cloſely at certaine narrow Tunnels in the ſides. Heere lye enterred two noble Protomartyrs of greater Britaine, and next after Alban and Amphibalus the very principall heere crowned with Martyrdome, namely Julius and Aaron: and both of them had in this City a goodly Church dedicated unto them. For, in antient times there had beene three paſſing faire Churches in this City: One of Julius the Martyr, beautified with a chaire of Nunnes devoted to the ſervice of God: A ſecond founded in the name of bleſſed Aaron his companion, and ennobled with an excellent Order of Chanons. Amphibalus alſo, the Teacher of Saint Alban and a faithfull informer of him unto faith was borne heere. The ſite of the City is excellent, upon the River Oske, able to beare a prety Veſſell at an high water from the Sea, and the City is fairely furniſhed with woods and medowes: heere it was that the Romane Embaſſadours repaired unto the famous Court of that great King Arthur. Where Dubritius alſo reſigned the Archiepiſcopall honour unto David of Menevia, when the Metropolitane See was tranſlated from hence to Menevia.

Thus much out of Giraldus. But for the avouching and confirming of the Antiquity of this place, I thinke it not impertinent to adjoyne heere thoſe antique Inſcriptions lately digged forth of the ground, which the right reverend Father in God Francis Godwin Biſhop of Landaffe, a paſſing great lover of venerable Antiquity and of all good Literature, hath of his courteſie imparted unto me. In the yeere 1602. in a medow adjoyning, there was found by ditchers a certaine image of a perſonage girt and ſhort truſſed, bearing a quiver (but head, hands and feet were broken off) upon a pavement of ſquare tile in checker worke: alſo a fragment of an Altar with this Inſcription engraven in great capitall letters three inches long, erected by Haterianus the Lieutenant Generall of Auguſtus and Propretour of the Province Cilicia.

The next yeere following, hard by, was this Table alſo gotten out of the ground, which prooveth that the foreſaid Image was the perſonage of Diana: and that her Temple was repaired by Titus Flavius Poſthumius Varus, an old ſouldier haply of a Band of the ſecond Legion.

These Inſcriptions are to be ſeene at Mathern in the Biſhop of Landaffes houſe.

Moreover a little before the comming in of the Engliſh Saxons, There was a Schoole heere of 200. Philoſophers, who being skilfull in Aſtronomy and all other Arts, diligently C obſerved the courſe and motion of the Starres, as wrote Alexander Elſebienſis, a rare Author and hard to be found; out of whom Thomas James of Oxford (a learned man and a true lover of Bookes, who wholly addicted to learning, and now laboriouſly ſearching the Libraries of England, to the publique good purpoſeth that (God bleſſe his labour, which will be to the great benefit of all Students) hath copied out very many notes for me. In the Raigne of Henry the Second (what time Giraldus wrote) it ſeemeth that this City was of good ſtrength. For Yrwith of Caer Leon a courageous and hardy Britan, defended it a great while againſt the Engliſh, untill he was vanquiſhed by the King, and ſo diſſeized of the poſſeſſion thereof. But now, that it may ſerve for an enſample, that as well Cities have fatall periods of their flouriſhing D ſtate, as men of their lives; it is decaied, and become a very ſmall Towne, which in times paſt was of that greatneſſe and reaching out ſo farre in length on both ſides of the River, that Saint Julians, an houſe of the late Sir William Herbert Knight, was, by report, ſometime within the very City, where Saint Julius the Martyrs Church ſtood, which now is much about a mile out of the Towne. Alſo, out of the ruines thereof a little beneath, at the mouth of Vske, grew up Newport, which Giraldus nameth in Latine Novus Burgus, a Towne of later time built, and not unknowne, by reaſon of the Caſtle and commodiouſneſſe of the Harbour: in which place there was in times paſt ſome one of theſe Roman High wayes or Streets, whereof Necham hath made mention in theſe Verſes,

This Julia Strata, was no doubt ſome Port-high way, and (if we may be allowed to make a conjecture) what great abſurdity were it to ſay, that it was caſt up and made by Julius Frontinus the vanquiſher of the Silures? There creepeth, ſaith Giraldus, in F the bounds of this New-burgh or Newport a little River named Nant Pencarn, which cannot bee waded and paſſed over but at certaine Fourds, not ſo much for any depth that the water is of, as for the hollowneſſe of the Chanell, and the eaſie mudde in the bottome: and it had of old a Fourd named Rydpencarn, that is, The Fourd under the top of a Rocke. Which when Henry the Second King of England chanced at a venture to paſſe over, even then then when it was almoſt growne out of remembrance, the Welſhmen, who were A over credulous in beleeving of Propheſies, as if now all had beene ſure on the Kings ſide, and themſelves hopeleſſe of all helpe, were quite out of heart and hope of good ſucceſſe, becauſe Merlin Silveſter, the Britiſh Apollo, had prophefied, that then the Welſhmens power ſhould bee brought under, when a ſtout Prince with a freckled

This Shire containeth Pariſh Churches 127.

GLAMORGAN-SHIRE.

THE laſt Country of the Silures was that, I thinke, which wee at this day call GLAMORGAN-SHIRE, the Britans Morganuc, Glath-Morgan, and Glad Vorganuc, that is, The Region of Morganuc: ſo named, as moſt ſuppoſe, of one Morgan a Prince, as others thinke of Morgan an Abbay. But if I derived it from Mor, which in the Britiſh tongue ſignifieth The Sea; I know not verily whether I ſhould dally with the trueth or no? Howbeit, I have obſerved that a Towne in little Britaine ſtanding upon the Sea-coaſt, now called Morlais, was of Ptolomee and the ancient Gaules tearmed Vorganium or Morganium (for M. and V. conſonant are often changed one for another in this tongue) and whence I pray you but from the ſea? And this our Morganuc alſo lieth upon the ſea: for, ſtretching out directly more in length, than it ſpreadeth in bredth, on the South ſide it is accoaſted with the Severn ſea. But where it looketh toward the Land, it hath on the Eaſt ſide Monmouth-ſhire, on the North Brechnock-ſhire, and on the Weſt Caermarden-ſhire bordering upon it. Whence came the name of Glamorgan.

The North part by reaſon of the Mountaines is rough and unpleaſant, which as they bend downe Southward by little and little become more milde and of better ſoile; and at the foote of them there ſtretcheth forth a Plaine open to the South-Sunne, in that poſition of ſituation which Cato judged to bee the beſt, and for the which, Plinie ſo highly commendeth Italie. For, this part of the Country is moſt pleaſant and fruitfull, beautified alſo on every ſide with a number of Townes.

Jeſtine a great Lord in the Raigne of William Rufus, after he had rebelled againſt Rheſe his Prince, and not able to make his part good with him, very raſhly, and inconſiderately (which hee afterward repented too late) ſent Enion a Nobleman to whom he had affianced his daughter; to procure Robert Fitz Haimon ſonne to Haimon Dentatus Lord of Corboil in Normandy, to come out of England and aide him againſt Rheſe: who forthwith having muſtered certaine forces, and taking for to aſſociate him in his journey twelve Knights, firſt gave Rheſe Battaile and ſlew him, and afterwards being allured with the fertility of the Country, whereof before hand he made full account to be Lord, turning his power upon Jeſtine himſelfe, becauſe hee had not kept touch with Enion nor performed his promiſe, eaſily thruſt him out of his ancient Inheritance, and ſhared the Country among his Companions. The hard and barraine hill Country he granted to the ſaid Enion, the more fertile parts he divided betweene him and thoſe twelve Knights whom he tearmed Peres, on this condition, that they ſhould hold them in Fee, and vaſſallage of him as their chiefe Lord, to maintaine one another in common with their aides and auxiliary forces; to defend every one his owne Ward in his Caſtle of Caerdiffe, and to bee preſent and aſſiſt him in his Courts in the adminiſtration of Juſtice. It ſhall not be amiſſe to put downe their names out of a little Pamphlet, which Sir Edward Stradling or Sir Edward Mounſel both Knights men of ancient deſcent and moſt skilfull in Antiquity, I wot not whether (for it goeth abroad under both their names) wrote concerning this matter. And theſe be their names, The ſubduing of Glamorgan-ſhire. Robert Fitz-Haimon. 12. Knights. Caerdiffe.

William of London, or de Londres, Richard Granvil.
Pain Turbervill.
Oliver Saint John.
Robert de Saint Quintin.
Roger Bekeroul.
William Eaſterling, for that he was borne in Germanie, whoſe heires are now called Stradlings.
Gilbert Humfranvill.

Richard Siward.
John Fleming.
Peter Soore.
Reinald Sully.

The River Remnie falling from the Mountaines, is the limite on the East ſide, whereby this Country is divided from Monmouth-ſhire; and Remnie in the Britiſh tongue ſignifieth to Divide.

Not farre from it where the River holdeth on his courſe through places hardly paſſable, among the hilles, in a Mariſh ground are to bee ſeene the tottering walles of Caer-philli Caſtle, which hath beene of ſo huge a bigneſſe, and ſuch a wonderfull peece of worke beſide, that all men well neere ſay, it was a gariſon fort of the Romans. Neither will I deny it, although I cannot as yet perceive by what name they called it: and yet it may ſeeme to have beene re-edified anew, conſidering it hath a Chappell built after the Chriſtians manner (as I was enformed by John Sanford a man ſingular well learned, and of exact judgement) who diligently tooke view of it. In later ages it was the poſſeſſion of the Clares Earles of Gloceſter deſcended from Fitz-Haimon aforeſaid; neither doe any of our Chronicles make mention thereof before king Edward the Seconde time. For then, after that the Spenſers by underhand practiſes had ſet the King, Queene, and Barons at debate, the Barons beſieged a long time Hugh Spenſer the yonger whom they called Hugolin herein, and could not prevaile. By this river alſo (but the place is not certainely knowne) Fauſtus a very good ſonne, as Ninnius writeth, of Vortigern ſo bad a father, built a great Place; where, with other holy men hee prayed daily unto God, that himſelfe, whom his father, committing moſt abominable inceſt had begotten of his owne daughter might not be puniſhed grievouſly for his fathers faults, alſo that his father might at length repent heartily, and his native Country be eaſed from the bloudy warres of the Saxons. A little beneath, hath Ptolomee placed the mouth of RATOSTABIUS or RATOSTABIUS, uſing a maimed word in ſtead of Traith Taff, that is, The ſandy Trith of the River Taff. For, there the ſaid River Taff, ſliding downe from the Hilles, runneth toward the Sea, by Landaff, that is, The Church by Taff, a ſmall City and of ſmall reputation, ſituate ſomewhat low, yet a Biſhops See, having within the Diœceſſe 154. Pariſhes, and adorned with a Cathedrall Church conſecrated to Saint Telean Biſhop of the ſame: which Church German and Lupus, French Biſhops, then erected, when as they had ſuppreſſed the Hereſie of Pelagius that was dangerouſly ſpread all Britaine over, and preferred Dubricius a moſt holy man to bee the firſt Biſhop there, unto whom Meuricke a Britiſh Lord freely gave all the land that lyeth betweene the Rivers Taff and Elei. From hence goeth Taff, to Caer diff, called of the Britans Caerdid a proper fine Towne (as Townes goe in this Country) and a very commodious Haven: which the foreſaid, Fitz Haimon, fortified with a Wall and Caſtle, that it might bee both a ſeat for warre and a Court of Juſtice: wherein, beſide a Band of choiſe ſoldiers thoſe twelve Knights were bound to keepe Caſtle-guard. Howbeit a few yeeres after, Yuor Bach a Britiſh Mountainer, a little man of perſon but of great and reſolute courage, marching with a Band of men by night, without any ſtirre ſuddenly ſurpriſed, tooke Priſoner William Earle of Gloceſter, Fitz Haimons daughters ſonne, together with his wife and young ſonne, and detained them in hold with him, untill he had made him full ſatisfaction for all wrongs and loſſes. But how, Robert Curthoſe, William the Conquerours eldeſt ſonne, a man over venterous and foole hardy in warlique exploits, quite put by his hope of the Crowne of England by his younger brethren and bereft of both his eyes, lived untill he was an old man in this Caſtle, you may ſee if you pleaſe in our Hiſtorians, and underſtand withall, that royall Parentage is never aſſured either of ends, or ſafe ſecurity.

Scarce three miles from the mouth of Taff, in the very bending in of the ſhore, there lye aflote as it were two ſmall, but pleaſant Iſlands, ſeparated one from another and from the maine Land with narrow in-lets of the Sea. The hithermore is called Sullie, of the Towne right over againſt it, which tooke the name, as it is thought, of Sully, haply ſo called of the Silures.

A of Robert Sully (for it fell to his part in the diuision) if you would not rather have him to take his name of it. The farther more is named Barry, of Barruch an holy man buried there, who as he gave name to the place, so the place gave the sirname afterwards to the Lords thereof. For that noble Family of Vicounts Barries in Ireland had their originall from hence. In a Rocke, or cliffe heereof by the sea side, saith Giraldus, there appeareth a very little chincke into which if you lay your eare you shall heare a noise as it were of Smithes at worke, one while the blowing of bellowes, another while the striking of sledge and hammer, sometime the sound of the Grindstone and iron tooles rubbing against it, the hissing sparkes also of steele-gads within holes, as they are beaten, yea and the puffing noise of fire burning in the furnace. Now, I should easily bee perswaded that such a B sound may come of the sea-water closely getting into the Rocke, were it not the same continued as well when the sea ebbeth at a low water when the shore is bare, as it doth at an high water when it is full sea. Not unlike to this was the place which Clemens Alexandrinus maketh mention of in the seventh Booke of his Strowata in these words. They that have written Histories doe say, that in the Isle of Britaine, there is a certaine hole or Cave under the bottome of an hill, and on the toppe thereof a gaping chaune or chinck: And whensoever the winde is gathered into that hole, and tossed to and fro in the wombe or concavity thereof, there is heard above a sound of Cymbals. For, the winde driven backe gives the stronger sound. Barry. A wonderfull Cave or hole.

Beyond these Islands, the Shire runneth directly Westward, and giveth en-
C trance and passage to one River, upon which more within the Land, standeth Cowbridge (the Britans, of the Stone-bridge call it Pont-vaen) a Mercate Towne, and the second of those three which Fitz Haiman the Conquerour kept for himselfe. Now, whereas Antonine the Emperour in this very Coast, at the same distance from Isca, placed Bovium, which also is corruptly read Bomium, my conjecture liked me so well, that I have beene of opinion, this Towne was the said Bovium: but seeing that three miles from hence there standeth Boverton, which fitly accordeth in sound with Bovium, so love mee trueth, I dare not seeke for Bovium elsewhere. And that it is no strange and new thing that places should bee fitted with names from Kine and Oxen, I report me to Bosphorus in Thracia, Bovianum in Samnium, and Bauli in Italie, as it were, Boalia, if we may beleeve Symmachus.
D But let this one argument serve for all; fifteene miles from Bovium, hath Antonine placed, even with a Latine name the Towne Nidum, which although our Antiquaries have beene this great while a hunting after in vaine: yet, at the very same distance there sheweth it selfe Neath, a Towne very well knowne, retaining still the old name, in manner whole and sound: and heere at Lantwit, that is, The Church of Iltut, that joyneth close thereto, are seene the foundations of many houses, for it had divers Streets in old time. A little from hence in the very bout well neere of the shore standeth Saint Donats Castle, a faire Habitation of the ancient and notable Family of the Stradlings: neere unto which, were very lately dig-
E ged up, antique peeces of Romane money, but those especially of the thirty Tyrants, yea and some of Æmilianus and Mariu, which are seldome found. The River Ogmor somewhat higher, maketh himselfe way into the Sea, falling downe from the mountaines by Coitie, which belonged sometimes to the Turbevills, afterwards to the Gamages, and now to Sir Robert Sidney Vicount Lisle, in right of his wife: also by Ogmor Castle, which came from the Family of London to the Dutchy of Lancaster. Some few miles from hence there is a Well at Newton (as Sir John Stradling a very learned Knight hath signified unto me) a little Towne, on the banke of the River Ogmor Westward, an hundred paces well neere from Severn side, in a sandy plaine. The F water thereof is none of the cleerest, yet pure enough and good for use: It never springeth and walmeth up to the brinke, but by certaine staires folke goe downe into the Well. At any flowing of the Sea (in Summer time) you shall hardly get up a dish full of water: Whereas if you come anon when it ebbeth, you may well lade up water with a good bigge bucket or paile. The like instability remaineth also in Winter time, saving that it is nothing so evident, by Cowbridge. Bovium. Neath. Saint Donats. Stradling. Antique peeces of coine. Ogmor river. reaſon of the Veines of water comming in from above by ſhowres, and otherwiſe. Many of the Inhabitants thereabout men of good credite conſtantly avouched thus much unto me. But I, diſtruſting Fame, that oftentime doth but prate, went my ſelfe of late once or twice to the ſaid Well. For even then had I great deſire to write thus much unto you. When I was firſt come unto the place, and had ſtayed the third part of an houre viewing and conſidering every thing (while Severn ſurged and roſe high, and no body came thither to draw) the water was fallen about three inches. I goe my waies. And not long after when I was returned againe, I finde it to be riſen a foote higher. The compaſſe of this Well beneath within the walles is almoſt ſixe foote. Concerning which my Muſe alſo enditeth this Ditti.

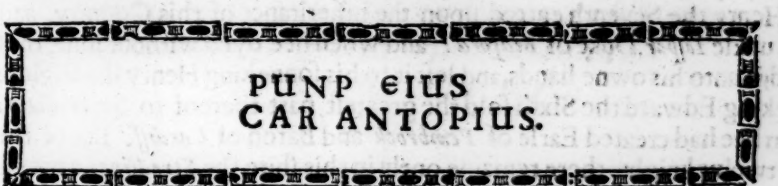
A fountaine at Calez or Cadiz.

The like Fountaine Polybius reporteth to bee at Cadyz, and this reaſon hee giveth thereof, namely that the winde or aire, when it is deprived of his wonted iſſues, returneth within forth, and ſo by ſhutting and ſtopping up the paſſages and veines of the Spring, keepeth in the waters, and contrariwiſe when the ſurface thereof is voide and empty of water the veines of the ſource or Spring are unſtopped and ſet free, and ſo the water then boileth up in great abundance. From hence coaſting along the ſhore, you come within the ſight of Kineſeage, the Caſtle in old time of Fitz-Haimon himſelfe; alſo of Margan, hard by the ſea ſide, ſometime an Abbay founded by William Earle of Glocester, but now the Habitation of the worſhipfull Family of the Maunſells, Knights. Neere unto this Margan, in the very toppe of an Hill called Mynyd Margan, there is erected of exceeding hard grit, a Monument or grave-ſtone, foure foote long, and one foote broad with an Inſcription, which whoſoever ſhall happen to reade, the ignorant common people dwelling thereabout, give it out upon a credulous errour, that hee ſhall bee ſure to dye within a little while after. Let the Reader therefore looke to himſelfe, if any dare reade it; for, let him aſſure himſelfe that hee ſhall for certaine dye after it.

Thoſe

Thoſe latter words I reade thus Æternali in domo, that is, In an eternall houſe: For, Sepulchres in that age, were tearmed ÆTERNALES DOMUS, that is, Eternall habitations. Moreover, betweene Margan and Kingſeage by the high way ſide, there lyeth a ſtone foure foote long with this Inſcription. Eternall habitations.



Which the Welſh Britans by adding and changing letters, thus reade and make this interpretation, as the right reverend Biſhop of Landaff did write to mee, who gave order that the draught of this Inſcription ſhould be taken likewiſe for my ſake. PIM BIS AN CAR ANTOPIUS, that is, The five fingers of freinds or neighbours killed us. It is verily thought bee the Sepulchre of Prince Margan, from whom the Country tooke name, who was ſlaine, as they would have it, eight hundred yeeres before Chriſts Nativity. But Antiquaries know full well, that theſe Characters and formes of letters be of a farre later date.

After you are paſt Margan, the ſhore ſhooteth forth into the North-Eaſt, by Aber-Avon, a ſmall Mercate Towne upon the River Avons mouth (whereof it tooke the name) to the River Nid or Neath infamous for a quick-ſand, upon which ſtands an ancient Towne of the ſame name, which Antonine the Emperour in his Itinerary called NIDUM. Which, when Fitz-Haimon made himſelfe Lord of this Country, fell in the partition to Richard Granvills ſhare, who having founded an Abbay under the very Townes ſide, and conſecrated his owne portion to God and to the Monkes, returned Nidus flu. i. the river Neath. Nidum the towne Neath.

returned againe to his owne ancient and faire inheritance, which he had in England.

Loghor: Gower.

Beyond this River Neath, whatsoever lieth betweene it and the River Loghor, which boundeth this shire in the West, wee call Gower: the Britans and Ninnius, Guhir: wherein, as he saith, the sonnes of Keian the Scot planted themselves, and tooke up a large roome, untill that by Cuneda a British Lord they were driven out. In the Raigne of Henry the First, Henry Earle of Warwicke wonne it from the Welsh, but by a conveyance and composition, passed betweene William Earle of Warwicke and King Henry the Second, it came to the Crowne. Afterward King Iohn gave it unto William Breos who had taken Arthur Earle of Britaine prisoner, to bee held by service of one Knight for all service: and his heires successively held it not without troubles unto King Edward the Seconds daies: for then, William Breos, when he had alienated and sold this inheritance to many, and in the end by mocking and disappointing all others, set Hugh Spenser in possession thereof, to curry favour with the King. And this was one cause, among other things, that the Nobles hated the Spensers so deadly, and rashly shooke off their Allegeance to the King. Howbeit this Gower came to the Mowbraies by an heire of Breos. This is now divided into the East part and the West. In the East part Swineſey, is of great account, a Towne so called by the Englishmen, of Sea-Swine, but the Britans Aber-Taw of the River Taw running by it; which, the foresaid Henry, Earle of Warwicke fortified. But there is a Towne farre more ancient than this by the River Loghor, which Antonine the Emperour called LEUCARUM, and wee, by the whole name, Loghor. Where, a little after the death of King Henry the First, Howel Ap Meredit invading the Englishmen on a sudden, with a power of the mountainers slew divers men of quality and good account. Beneath this, lyeth West-Gower, and by reason of two armes of the Sea winding in, on either side one, it becommeth a Biland, more memorable for the fruitfulnesse, than the Townes in it, and in times past of great name, in regard of Kined canonized a Saint, who lived heere a solitary life: of whom if you desire to know more, reade our Countryman Capgrave, who hath set out his miracle with great commendation.

Leucarum Loghor.

Since this Country was first conquered by the English. The Lords thereof were those that lineally descended from Fitz-Haimon, as Earle of Gloceſter, Clares, Spenſers, Beauchamps, and one or two Nevils: and by a daughter of Nevill, who came likewise of the Spensers bloud, Richard the Third King of England: But when he was slaine, king Henry the Seventh entred upon the inheritance of this Country, and gave it to his unkle Iaſpar Duke of Bedford: and when hee dyed without issue, the king resumed it unto his owne hands, and left it to his sonne king Henry the Eighth: whose sonne king Edward the Sixth sold the greatest part thereof to Sir William Herbert, whom hee had created Earle of Pembrock and Baron of Cardiff. But of the race of those twelve knights there remaine onely in this shire the Stradlings, a notable house and of long continuance, the Turbervills, and some of the Flemings: the greatest man of which house dwelleth at Flemingſton, now corruptly called Flemſton, as one would say, Flemingſtone which tooke the name of them. And in England, there are remaining yet the Lord Saint Iohn of Bletſo, the Granvills in Devonſhire, and the Siwards, as I am enformed, in Somerſet-ſhire. The issue male of all the rest is long since extinct and worne out, and their lands by daughters passed over to divers houses with sundry alterations.

DIMETAE.

PLinie was of opinion that the SILURES inhabited also the other part beside of this Country, which bearing out farther Westward, is called in English by some, West-Wales, and containeth Caermarden-shire, Pembrock-shire, and Cardigan-shire: But Ptolomee, who knew Britaine farre better, placed heere another people, whom he called DIMETAE, and DEMETAE. Gildas likewise and Ninnius both, have used the name of DEMETIA for this Tract. Whereupon, the Britans that inhabite it, changing M. into F. according to the propriety of their tongue commonly call it at this day Dised. West-Wales.

If it would not be thought strained curiosity, I would derive this denomination of the Demetæ, from Deheu Meath, that is, A plaine champion toward the South: like as the Britans themselves have named all this South-Wales, Deheubarth, that is, The South part: yea and those verily who inhabited another champion Country in Britaine were called in old time, Meatæ. Neither, I assure you, is the site of this Region disagreeing from this signification: For, when you are come hither once, by reason that the high hils gently settle downeward, and grow still lower and lower, it spreadeth by little and little into a plaine and even champion Country.

CAERMARDEN-SHIRE.

CAERMARDEN-SHIRE, is plenteous enough in Corne, ſtored abundantly with Cattaile and in ſome places yeeldeth pit cole for fewell. On the Eaſt ſide it is limited with Glamorgan, and Brechnock-ſhires, on the Weſt with Pembrock-ſhire, on the North with Cardigan-ſhire ſevered from it by the River Tivie running betweene, and on the South with the Ocean, which with ſo great a Bay or Creeke getteth within the Land, that this Countrey ſeemeth as it were for very feare to have ſhrunke backe, and withdrawne it ſelfe more inwardly. Caer Marden-ſhire.

Upon this Bay, Kidwelly firſt offereth it ſelfe to our ſight, the Territory whereof, Keiani the Scot his ſonnes held for a time, untill they were driven out by Cuneda the Britan. But now it is counted part of the inheritance of the Dutchy of Lancaſter by the heires of Maurice of London or De Londres: who making an outroad hither out of Glamorgan-ſhire, after a dangerous war made himſelfe Lord heereof, and fortified old Kidwelly with a wall and Caſtle to it, which now for very age is growne to decay and ſtandeth, as it were, forlet and forlorne. For, the Inhabitants having paſſed over the little River Vendraeth Vehan, built a new Kidwelly, entiſed thither by the commodity of the haven; which notwithſtanding at this day being choked with ſhelves and barres, is at this preſent of no great uſe. Whiles Maurice of London invaded theſe parts, Guenliana the wife of Prince Gruffin, a ſtout and reſolute woman in the higheſt degree, to recover the loſſes and declining ſtate of her husband, came with diſplaied banner into the field and fiercely aſſailed him, but the ſucceſſe not anſwerable to her courage, ſhee with her ſonne Morgan, and other men of eſpeciall note (as Girald recordeth) was ſlaine in battaile. By Hawis or Avis the daughter and heire of Sir Thomas of London: this paſſing faire and large patrimony, together with the Title of Lord of Ogmor and Kidwelly came unto Patricke Chaworth, and by his ſonne Patrickes daughter, unto Henry Earle of Lancaſter. Now the heires of the ſaid Maurice of London (as we learne out of an old Inquiſition) for this inheritance, were bound to this ſervice, that if their Soveraigne Lord the King, or his chiefe Juſtice came into the parts about Kidwelly with an Army, they ſhould conduct the foreſaid Army with their banners and their people through the middeſt of Nethland as farre as to Loghar. A few miles beneath Kidwelly, the River Tovie, which Ptolomee calleth TOBIUS falleth into the the Sea, after he hath paſſed through this Region from North-Eaſt to South, firſt by Lanandiffry, ſo called, as men thinke, of Rivers meeting together; which Hoel the ſonne of Rheſe overthrew for malice that hee bare unto the Engliſh: then by Dinevor, a princely Caſtle, ſtanding aloft upon the top of an hill, and belonging unto the Princes of South Wales whiles they flouriſhed: and laſt of all, by Caer Marden, which the Britans themſelves call Caer-Firdhin, Ptolomee, MARIDUNUM, Antonine, MURIDUNUM, who endeth his Journeies there, and through negligence of the tranſcribers is in this place not well uſed. For they have confounded the Journeies from Galena to Iſca, and from Maridunum to Viriconium. This is the chiefe City of the country, for medowes and woods pleaſant, and in regard of antiquity to be reſpected; Compaſſed about very properly, as Giraldus ſaith, with bricke walles, which are partly yet ſtanding upon the famous river Tovie, able to beare ſmall ſhips, although there be now a barre of ſand caſt up againſt the very mouth thereof. In this City was borne the * Tages of the Britans, I meane Merlin: For like as Tages being the ſonne of an evill Angell taught his Countrimen the Tuſcans the art of Sooth ſaying, ſo this Merlin the ſonne of an Incubus Spirit, deviſed for our Britans propheſies, nay rather meere phantaſticall dreames. Whereby, in this Iſland he hath been accounted among the credulous and unskilfull people a moſt renowned Prophet. Straight after the Normans entring into into Wales, this City was reduced (but I wot not by whoſe conduct) under their A ſubjection, and for a long time ſore afflicted with many calamities and diſtreſſes, being oftentimes aſſaulted, once or twice ſet on fire, firſt by Gruffin ap Riſe, then by Riſe the ſaid Gruffins brother: at which time, Henry Turbervill an Engliſhman ſuccoured the Caſtle, and hewed downe the Bridge. But afterwards by the meanes of Gil- bert de Clare, who fortified both the walles thereof, and the Caſtles adjoyning, it was freed from theſe miſeries: and being once eaſed of all grievances, and in ſecurity, endured afterwards more eaſily from time to time the tempeſts of warre and all aſfaults: And the Princes of Wales of the Engliſh bloud, I meane the firſt begotten warre: there is alſo heere a Fountaine, that as Giraldus writeth, Twice in foure and Cantredmaur. But on the North-Eaſt ſide, there ſtretcheth it ſelfe a great way out, Cantredmaur, Antiquaries are of greateſt price and eſtimation, as being moſt rare of all others. E

Now it remaineth that I ſhould relate, how upon the river Tivy, that ſeparateth this New Caſtle. County from Cardigan-ſhire, there ſtandeth New-Caſtle (for ſo they call it at this day) which Sir Rhiſe ap Thomas that warlike Knight who aſſiſted Henry the Seventh when he gat the Crowne, and was by him right worthily admitted unto the Society of the Knights of the Garter, renewed: whereas before time it was named Elme-

Loventium. not to bee rejected, who will have it to bee that LOVENTIUM of the DIME-TÆ, whereof Ptolomee maketh mention: For, the Britans call Elmes Llwiſſen.
But ſeeing I can finde by no record in Hiſtories, which if the Normans firſt wreſted this Country out of the hands of the Princes of Wales, I am to proceed now or- F

PENBROKE-SHIRE.

THE Sea now retyring Southward, and with a mighty compaſſe and ſundry Bayes incurving the ſhores, preſſeth on every ſide upon the County of PENBROKE, commonly called PENBROKE-SHIRE, which in the old Bookes is named * The lawfull County of Pembroch, and of ſome, Weſt-Wales; unleſſe it be in the Eaſt ſide, where Caermarden-ſhire, and on the North, where a part of Cardigan-ſhire boundeth upon it. A Country plentifull in Corne, ſtored with Cattaile, and full of marle, and ſuch kinde of fatty earth to make the ground fertile, and not deſtitute of pit cole. This Land, as ſaith Giraldus, is apt to beare Wheat, plentifully ſerved with ſea-fiſh and ſaleable wine, and (that which is farre above the reſt, by reaſon that Ireland confineth ſo neere upon it) of a very temperate and wholſome aire.

* Legalis Comitatus.

First and formoſt upon the ſhore deſcending Southward, Tenby a proper fine Towne well governed by a Major, and ſtrongly walled toward the Land, looketh downe into the ſea from a dry cliffe, very famous becauſe it is a commodious road for ſhips, and for abundance alſo of fiſh there taken; whereupon in the Britiſh tongue it is called Tenby-y-Piſcoid, and hath for Magiſtrates a Major and a Bailiffe. From thence the ſhore giving backe Weſtward, ſheweth the Reliques of Manober Caſtle, which Giraldus calleth, The Manſion of Pyrhus, in whoſe time as himſelfe writeth, It was notably fortified with Towres and Bulwarkes, having on the Weſt ſide a large Haven, and on the North-Weſt and North under the very walles, an excellent fiſh-poole, goodly to behold, as well for the beauty thereof, as the depth of the water.

Tenby.

Manober Caſtle.

From hence runneth the ſhore along not many miles continuate, but at length the land ſhrinketh backe on both ſides giving place unto the ſea, which encroching upon it a great way, maketh the Haven which the Engliſhmen call Milford Haven, than which there is not another in all Europe more noble or ſafer, ſuch variety it hath of nouked Bayes, and ſo many coves and creekes, for harbour of ſhips, wherewith the bankes are on every ſide indented, and that I may uſe the Poets words:

Milford Haven.

Hic exarmatum terris cingentibus æquor,
Clauditur, & placidam diſcit ſervare quietem.
The Sea diſarmed heere of windes, within high banke and hill,
Encloſed is, and learnes thereby to be both calme and ſtill.

For to make uſe of the Mariners words and their diſtinct termes, there are reckoned within it 16. Creekes, 5. Baies, and 13. Rodes, knowne every one by their ſeverall names. Neither is this Haven famous for the ſecure ſafeneſſe thereof more, than for the arrivall therein of King Henry the Seuenth a Prince of moſt happy memory, who from hence gave forth unto England then hopeleſſe the firſt ſignall to hope well, and raiſe it ſelfe up, when as now it had long languiſhed in civill miſeries and domeſticall calamities within it ſelfe. Upon the innermore and Eaſt Creeke of this Haven, in the moſt pleaſant Country of all Wales, ſtandeth Penbroke the Shire-towne, one direct ſtreet upon a long narrow point all rocke, and a forked arme of Milford Haven ebbing and flowing cloſe to the Towne walles on both ſides. It hath a Caſtle but now ruinate, and two Pariſh Churches within the wals, and is incorporate of a Major, Bailiffes and Burgeſſes. But heare Giraldus who thus deſcribeth it, A tongue of the ſea ſhooting forth of Milford Haven, in the forked end, encloſeth the principall towne of the whole Country and chiefe place of Dimetia ſeated upon the ridge of a certaine craggy and long ſhaped Rocke: And therefore, the Britans called it Penbro, which ſignifieth much as a head of the Sea, and wee in our tongue Penbroke. Arnulph of Montgomery brother to Robert Earle of Shrewsbury, firſt in the time of King Henry the Firſt fortified this

Pembroke.

this place with a Caſtle, a very weake and ſlender thing, God wote, of ſtakes and turfes, which afterwards he returning into England delivered unto Girald of Windſor, his Conſtable and Captaine, to bee kept with a Gariſon of few Souldiers: and immediately, the Welſhmen of all South Wales laid ſiege unto the ſaid Caſtle. But ſuch reſiſtance made Girald and his company, more upon a reſolute courage than with any forcible ſtrength, that they miſſed of their purpoſe and diſlodged. Afterwards, the ſaid Girald fortified both Towne and Caſtle; from whence hee invaded the Country, round about it, farre and neere: and at length, that as well his owne eſtate, as theirs that were his followers and dependants, might the better grow to greatneſſe in theſe parts he tooke to wife Neſta ſiſter to Gruffin the Prince, of whom he begat a goodly faire Progeny, by the which (as ſaith that Giraldus who deſcended from him) The Engliſhmen both kept ſtill the Sea Coaſts of South Wales, and wonne alſo the walles of Ireland. For, all thoſe noble families of Giralds or Giraldines in Ireland, whom they call Fitz Girald, fetch their deſcent from the ſaid Girald. In regard of the tenure of this Caſtle and Towne, of the Caſtle and Towne likewiſe of Tinbigh, of the Grange of Kings Wood, of the Commot of Croytarath, and of the Manors of Caſtle Martin and Tregoire, Reinold Grey at the Coronation of King Henry the Fourth made ſuite to carry the ſecond ſword: but in vaine: For, anſwere was made, that thoſe Caſtles and Poſſeſſions were in the Kings hands, as Pembroke Towne ſtill is.

The beginning of the Giralds family in Ireland.

The Roll of Services.

Upon another Creeke alſo of this haven, Carew Caſtle ſheweth it ſelfe, which gave both name and originall to the notable Family de Carew, who avouch themſelves to have beene called aforetime, de Montgomery; and have beene perſwaded, that they are deſcended from that Arnulph de Montgomery, of whom I ſpake erewhile.

Carew Caſtle.

Into this Haven there diſcharge themſelves with their out-lets joyned almoſt in one, two rivers, which the Britans tearme Gledawh, that is, if you interpret it, Swords: whereupon themſelves uſe to tearme it Aber du gledhaw, that is, The out-lets of two ſwords. Hard by the more Eaſterly of them ſtandeth Slebach, a Commandery in times paſt of Saint Johns Knights of Jeruſalem, which with other lands, Wizo and Walter his ſonne, gave in old time unto that holy Order of Knighthood, that they might ſerve as Gods Knights to recover the Holy Land. That part of this Country which lyeth beyond the Haven, and hath onely theſe two Rivers to water it, the Britans doe call Ros, making the name anſwerable to the thing, for that it lyeth for the moſt part all low on a flat, and greene plaine.

Gledawgh.

This Tract was inhabited by Flemings out of the Low Countries, who by the permiſſion of King Henry the Firſt were planted heere, when the Ocean by making breaches in the bankes had overwhelmed a great part of the ſaid Low Countries. Theſe are diſtinctly knowne ſtill from the Welſh, both by their ſpeech and manners, and ſo neere joyned they are in ſociety of the ſame language with Engliſhmen, who come nigheſt of any Nation to the low Dutch Tongue, that this their little Country is tearmed by the Britans Little England beyond Wales. A Nation this is, as ſaith Giraldus, ſtrong and ſtout, and continually enured in warres with the Welſh: a Nation moſt accuſtomed to ſeeke gaine by clothing; by traffique alſo and merchandiſe by ſea and land, undertaking any paines and perills whatſoever. A Nation of very great power, and as time and place requireth, ready by turnes to take plough in hand and till the ground, as ready alſo to goe into the field and fight it out: And that I may adde thus much moreover; a Nation moſt loyally devoted to the Kings of England, and as faithfull to Engliſhmen: and which in the time of Giraldus, was wonderfull skilfull in Sooth-ſaying by the Inſpection of Beaſts inwards: whoſe worke alſo is heere ſeene (as they are a people paſſing induſtrious) namely, The Flemiſh High way reaching out a great length. The Welſhmen have many a time banded all their Forces in one, and to recover this country belonging ſometimes unto their anceſtors, have violently ſet upon theſe Flemings and overrunne their lands, ſpoiling and waſting where ever they went: yet they moſt courageouſly have alwayes from time to time defended their eſta their name, and life. Whereupon concerning them, and King William Rufus, the Hiſtorian Malmeſbury writeth thus. Many a time and often King William Rufus had but ſmall

Flemings in Wales.

Little England beyond Wales.

A ſmall ſucceſſe againſt the Welſh men: which any man may well mervaile at, conſidering that alwaies otherwiſe, he ſpread moſt fortunately in all adventures of Warre. But I take it; that as the unevenneſſe of the ground, and ſharpneſſe of the ayre maintained their Rebellion, ſo the ſame empeached his valour: But King Henry who now Reigneth, a man of an excellent wit, found meanes to fruſtrate all their devices, by placing Flemings in their Country, who might be alwaies ready to repreſſe and keepe them in. And in the fifth booke, King Henry with many a warlike expedition went about to force the Welſh men, who ever and anon roſe up in Rebellion, for to yeeld and ſubmit themſelves: and reſting in the end upon this good and holſome policie, for to take downe and abate their ſwelling pride, he brought over thither all the Flemings that dwelt in England. For, a number of them who in thoſe daies, in regard of his Mothers kinred by her Fathers ſide flocked thither, were cloſely ſhrowded in England, in ſo much as they

B for their multitude ſeemed burdenſome unto the Realme. Wherefore, he ſent them altogether with their ſubſtance, goods, Wives, and Children unto Ros a Country in Wales, as it were into a common avoidance, thereby both to purge and cleanſe his owne Kingdome, and alſo to quaile and repreſſe the raſh boldneſſe of his enemies there. By the more weſtward of theſe two Rivers, is Harford Weſt, called by the Engliſh men in times paſt Haverford, and by the Britans Hulphord, a faire Towne and of great reſort, ſituate upon an hill ſide, having ſcarce one even ſtreete, but is ſteepe one way or other, which being a Countie by it ſelfe, hath for Magiſtrates, a Major, a Sheriffe, and two Bailiffs. The report goeth, that the Earles of Clare fortified it with Rampier and Wall on the C North ſide, and we read that Richard Earle of Clare made R. Fitz-Tancred, Caſtellan of this Caſtle. Harford weſt. Filium Tancredi.

Beyond Ros, there ſhooteth out with a mighty front farre into the Weſt Ocean, a great Promontory, which Ptolomee called OCTOPITARUM, the Britans Pebidiauc, and Cantred Devi; we Saint Davids land. A ſtony, barren, and unfruitfull ground, as Giraldus ſaith, Neither clad with Woods, nor garniſhed heere and there with Rivers, ne yet adorned with Medows, lying alwaies open to windes onely and ſtormes. Yet a retyring place for moſt holy men, and a nurſerie of them. For, Calphurnius a Britaine Prieſt, as ſome (I know not how truly) have written, heere in the vale of Ros begat of his Wife Concha Siſter to Saint Martin of Tours, Patricke the Apoſtle of Ireland and Devi

D a moſt religious Biſhop tranſlated the Archiepiſcopall See from Iſca Legionum into the moſt remote and fartheſt angle heereof, even to Menew, or Menevia: which afterwards the Britans, of his name called Ty Dewy, that is, Devi his houſe, the Saxons Dauy's-Mynyw, the Engliſh men at this day Saint Davids; and was for a long time an Archbiſhops See. But by occaſion of a peſtilence that contagiouſly raged in this Country, whereby the Pall was tranſlated into little Britaine in France, to Dole, this Archiepiſcopall dignity had an end. Yet in the foregoing ages the Welſh men commenſed an action heere about againſt the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, Metropolitane of England and Wales, but they were caſt in the Law. What this Saint Davids was, and what maner of thing in times paſt, a man can hardly tell, conſide-

E ring it hath beene ſo often by Pirates raſed: but now it is a very ſmall and poore Citie, and hath nothing at all to make ſhew of but a faire Church dedicated to Saint Andrew, and David: which, having been many times overthrowne, Petre the Biſhop, in the reigne of King John, and his ſucceſſors, erected in that forme which now it ſheweth, in the vale (as they tearme it of Ros) under the Towne: and hard by it ſtandeth the Biſhops Pallace, and faire houſes of the Chaunter (who is next unto the Biſhop, for there is no Deane heere) of the Chauncellor, Treaſurer, and foure Archdeacons who be of the number of the XXII. Canons, all encloſed round within a ſtrong and ſeemely wall, whereupon they call it the Cloſe.

This Promontorie thruſteth it ſelfe ſo farre Weſtward, that in a cleere Sunſhine

F day a man may from thence ſee Ireland, and from hence is the ſhorteſt cut to Ireland: and by Plinies meaſure, which he tooke falſe, was from the Silures (for, he thought that the Silures reached thus farre) thirty miles. But that this land ran out farther, and that the forme of the Promontory hath been changed, it may be gathered out of theſe words of Giraldus. What time (ſaith he) as King Henry the Second made his abode in Ireland, by reaſon of an extraordinary violence of ſtormes, the ſandy ſhores of this coaſt were laide bare as farre as to the very hard ground, and the face of the earth which had lien covered many ages before was diſcovered. Alſo the trunkes of trees ſtanding in the very Sea, that had aforetime been lopped on every ſide, yea and the ſtrokes of axes, as if they had been given but yeſterday were ſeene apparantly. Yea and the earth ſhewed moſt blacke, and the wood withall of the ſaid trunkes like in all the points to Hebeny: ſo as it ſeemed now no ſhore but a lopped grove: as well empaired through the wonderfull changes of things; either haply from the time of Noahs floud, or long after; but, doubtleſſe, long agoe, as worne by little and little, and ſo ſwallowed up with the rage of the Sea getting alwaies more ground and waſhing the earth away. Neither were theſe two lands ſevered here with any great Sea betweene, as may appeare by a word that King William Rufus caſt out: who when he kenned Ireland from the rocks and cliffes of this Promontory, ſaid (as we read in Giraldus) that he could eaſily make a bridge with Engliſh Sips; on which he might paſſe over the Sea on foote into Ireland.

Falcons.

A noble kinde of Falcons have their Airies here and breed in the Rocks, which King Henry the Second, as the ſame Giraldus writeth, was wont to preferre before all others. For, of that kinde are thoſe, if the inhabitants thereby doe not deceive me, which the skilfull Faulconers call Peregrines: for, they have (that I may uſe no other words than the verſes of Auguſtus Thuanus Eſmerius that moſt excellent Poet of our age in that golden booke entituled HIERACOSOPHILOY.

But from this Promontory, as the land draweth backward, the Sea with great violence and aſſault of waters inruſheth upon a little Region called Keimes, which is reputed a Barony. firſt wreſted out of the Welſh mens hands by force and armes, from whoſe heires ſucceſſively called Martins, it came by marriage to the Barons of Audley, who held it a long time, untill that in the reigne of Henry the eighth, William Owen that derived his pedigree from a daughter of Sir Nicholas Martin Knight, after long ſuit in law for his right, in the end obtained it, and left it to his ſonne George: who being a ſingular lover of venerable antiquity hath informed me, that in this Barony over and above three Borroughs, Newport, Fiſhgard, and Saint Dogmaels, there are twenty Knights fees, and twenty ſixe Pariſhes.

Kilgarran.

More inward, upon the River Tivy aforeſaid is Kilgarran, which ſheweth the reliques of a Caſtle built by Girald: but being at this day reduced unto one onely ſtreet, it is famous for nothing elſe but the moſt plentifull fiſhing of Salmon. For there, have you that notable Salmon Leap, where the River from on high falleth downright, and the Salmons from out of the Ocean coveting to come up further into the River,

From mids of ſtreame and chanell deepe therein

There have beene divers Earles of Pembroke out of ſundry houſes. As for Arnulph of Montgomery, who firſt wonne it, and was afterwards outlawed, and his Caſtellan Girald, whom King Henry the Firſt made afterward Preſident over the whole Country, I dare ſcarcely affirme that they were Earles. The firſt that was ſtiled Earle of Penbroke was Gilbert, ſirnamed Strongbow ſonne of Giſlebert de Clare, Earles of Penbroke.
C in the time of King Stephen. And hee left it unto his ſonne Richard Strongbow, the renowned Conquerour of Ireland, who as Giraldus ſaith, was deſcended ex clarâ Clarentium familiâ, that is, out of the noble Family of Clare or Clarence. His onely daughter Iſabell brought the ſame honour to her Husband William named Mareſchall (for that his Anceſtours had beene by inheritance Mareſchals of the Kings Palace) a man, moſt glorious both in warre and peace, and Protector of the Kingdome in the minority of King Henry the Third. Concerning whom this pithie Epitaph is extant in Rodburns Annales.

Sum quem Saturnum ſibi ſenſit Hibernia, Solem D Anglia, Mercurium Normannia, Gallia Martem.

Whom Ireland once a Saturne found, England a Sunne to be, Whom Normandy a Mercurie, and France Mars, I am he.

After him his five ſonnes were ſucceſſively one after another Earles of Penbroke, viz. William called The younger; Richard, who after hee had rebelled againſt King Henry the Third went into Ireland, where hee was ſlaine in battaile; Gilbert, who See Pag. 407.
in a Tournament at Ware was unhorſed and ſo killed; Walter, and Anſelme, who enjoyed the honour but a few dayes, who every one dying in a ſhort ſpace without

After William of Valence, ſucceeded his ſonne Aimar, who under King Edward the Firſt was Regent of Scotland: whoſe eldeſt ſiſter Elizabeth, and one of his heires wedded unto John Lord Haſtings, brought this Dignity unto a new Family: For, Laurence Haſtings his grandſonne, Lord of Weiſhford and Abergevenny was made Earle of Penbroke by vertue of King Edward the Third his Bricffe. The Copie whereof I thinke good to ſet downe heere, that wee may ſee what was the right by heires generall in theſe honorary Titles. Rex omnibus ad
F quos, &c. ſalutem. The King, to all unto whom, &c. Greeting. Know yee, that the good preſage of circumſpection and vertue, which wee have conceived by the towardly youth and happy beginnings of our moſt welbeloved cozin Laurence Haſtings, induce us worthily to countenance him, with our eſpeciall grace and favour, in thoſe things which concerne the due preſervation and maintenance of his honour. Whereas therefore, the inheritance of Aimar of Valence ſometime Earle of Penbroke (as hee was ſtiled) deceaſed long ſince without beire begotten of his body, hath beene devolved unto his ſiſters, proportionably to be divided among them and their heires: becauſe we know for certaine, that the foreſaid Laurence who ſucceedeth the ſaid Aimar in part of the inheritance, is deſcended from the elder ſiſter of Aimar aforeſaid, and ſo by the avouching of the learned with whom wee conſulted about this matter, the prerogative both of name and honour is due unto him. We deeme it juſt and due, that the ſame Laurence claiming his Title from the elder ſiſter, aſſume and have the name of Earle of Penbroke, which the ſaid Aimar had whiles he lived. Which verily we, as much as lyeth in us, confirme, ratifie, and alſo approve unto him: willing and granting, that the ſaid Laurence, have and hold the prerogative and honour of Earle Palatine in thoſe lands which hee holdeth of the ſaid Aimars inheritance, ſo fully and after the ſame manner, as the ſame Aimar had and held them, at the time of his death. In witneſſe the King, at Mont-Martin, the thirteenth day of October, and in the thirteenth of our Raigne.

After Laurence ſucceeded his ſonne John, who being taken priſoner by the Spaniards in a battaile at ſea, and in the end ranſomed, died in France in the yeere 1375. After him followed his ſonne John, who in a running at Tilt at Woodſtocke was ſlaine by Sir Iohn Saint Iohn caſually in the yeere 1391. And it was obſerved that for five generations together in this Family (I know not by what deſtiny) the father never ſaw his ſonne. Now, for default of his iſſue, there fell very many poſſeſſions and faire revenewes into the Kings hands, as our Lawyers uſe to ſpeake: and the Caſtle of Penbroke was granted unto Francis At-Court, a Courtier in eſpeciall great favour, who thereupon was commonly called Lord of Pembroke. Not long after, Humfrey ſonne to King Henry the Fourth before he was Duke of Glocester, received this title of his brother King Henry the Fifth, and before his death King Henry the Sixth granted the ſame in reverſion (a thing not before heard of) to William de la Pole Earle of Suffolke, after whoſe downefall, the ſaid King, when hee had enabled Edmund of Hadham, and Iaſper of Hatfield, the ſonnes of Queene Katharin his mother to bee his lawfull halfe brethren; created Iaſper, Earle of Penbroke, and Edmund, Earle of Richmond with preheminence to take place above all Earles. For Kings have abſolute authority in diſpenſing honours. But King Edward the Fourth depriving Iaſper of all his honours by attaindour and forfeiture, gave the Title of Pembroke to Sir William Herbert for his good ſervice againſt Iaſper in Wales, but hee ſhortly after loſt his life at the battaile of Banbury. Then ſucceeded his ſonne, bearing the ſame name, whom King Edward the Fourth when hee had recovered the Kingdome, inveſted in the Earledome of Huntingdon, and beſtowed the Title of Penbroke, being ſurrendred, upon his eldeſt ſonne and heire Edward Prince of Wales.

Some write that John Duke of Bedford was firſt for a ſhort time Earle of Penbroke.

A long time after King Henry the Eighth inveſted Anne Bollen (to whom he was affianced) Marchioneſſe of Pembroke with a mantle and Coronet in regard both of her Nobility, and alſo her vertues (for ſo runne the words of the Patent). At length king Edward the Sixth adorned Sir William Herbert Lord of Caerdiffe with the Title of Earle of Penbroke: after whom ſucceeded his ſonne Henry who was Lord Preſident of Wales under Queene Elizabeth. And now his ſonne William richly accompliſhed with all laudable endowments of body and minde enjoyeth the ſame Title. This Family of the Herberts in theſe parts of Wales is honourable, and of great antiquity. As lineally propagated from Henry Fitz Herbert Chamberlaine to king Henry the Firſt, who married the ſaid kings Paramor, the mother of Reginald Earle of Cornwall, as I was firſt enformed by Robert Glover a man paſſing skilfull in the ſtudy of Genealogies, by whoſe untimely death that knowledge hath ſuſtained a great loſſe.

CARDIGAN-SHIRE.

FRom Saint Davids Promontory the ſhore being driven backe aſlope Eaſtward, letteth in the Sea within a vaſt and crooked Bay, upon which lyeth the third Region of the Dimetæ, in Engliſh called CARDIGAN-SHIRE, in Britiſh Sire Aber-Tivi, by old Latine Writers Ceretica (if any man thinke) of King Caratacus, this may ſeeme a conjecture proceeding out of his owne braine, and not grounded upon any certaine authority; and yet wee reade that the worthy Caratacus, ſo worthily renowned, was the Soveraigne Ruler in theſe parts. A plaine and champion Country it is Weſtward, where it lyeth to the Sea, as alſo on the South ſide, where the River Tivie ſeparateth it from Caermarden-ſhire: But in the East and North ſides, which bound upon Brechnock and Montgomery-ſhires: there is a continued range, or ridge of hils that ſhoot along, yeelding goodly paſture ground, under which there be ſpread ſundry large Pooles. That in ancient times this Shire, as the reſt alſo of Wales, was not planted and garniſhed with Cities but with little cottages, it may bee gathered by that ſpeech of their Prince Caratacus, who being taken Priſoner, when he had throughly viewed the glorious magnificence of Rome, What meane you (ſaith he) when yee have theſe and ſuch like ſtately buildings of your owne, to covet our ſmall cottages? Howbeit the places heere of moſt Antiquity let us breifly view over.

The River Tivie, which Ptolomee calleth TUEROBIUS, but corruptly, in ſtead of Dwr-Tivius, that is, The River Tivie, iſſueth out of the Poole Lin-Tivy, beneath the hils: whereof I ſpake before: firſt cumbred, as it were, with ſtones in the way, and rumbling with a great noiſe without any chanell, and ſo paſſeth through a very ſtony tract (neere unto which at Roſſe, the Mountainers keepe the greateſt Faire for cattaile in all thoſe parts) untill it come to Strat-fleur, a Monaſtery long ſince of the Cluniack Monkes, compaſſed about with hilles. From thence, being received within a chanell, it runneth downe by Tregaron, and Lhan-Devi-brevi, built and ſo named in memoriall of David Biſhop of Menevia, where he in a frequent Synode refuted the Pelagian Hereſie ſpringing up againe in Britaine, both by the holy Scriptures and alſo by a miracle, while the earth whereon he ſtood as he preached, aroſe up under his feete, by report, to an hillocke. Thus farre and ſomewhat farther alſo Tivie holdeth on his courſe Southward to Lan-Beder a little Mercate Towne. From hence Tivie turning his ſtreame Weſtward carryeth a broader chanell, and neere unto Kilgarran falleth downe right headlong (as it were) from aloft, and maketh that Salmons Leape, whereof I ſpake ere while. For, exceeding great ſtore of Salmons it yeeldeth, and was in times paſt the onely Britiſh River, as Giraldus Cambrenſis was of opinion, that had Bevers in it. This Beaver is a creature living both on land and water, footed before like a Dog and behinde like a Gooſe, with an aſh-coloured skin ſomewhat blackiſh, having a long taile, broad and griſtly, which in his floting he uſeth in lieu of a ſterne. Concerning the ſubtile wilineſſe of which creatures, the ſaid Giraldus hath obſerved many things, but at this day none of them are heere to be ſeene.

Scarce two miles from hence ſtandeth upon a ſteepe banke Cardigan, which the Britans name Aber-Tivy, that is, Tivy-mouth, the Shire-towne, ſtrongly fortified by Gilbert the ſonne of Richard De Clare, which afterwards being by treaſon yeelded up, Rhiſe Ap Gruffin raſed; when hee had taken priſoner Robert Fitz-Stephen, whom ſome call Stephanides: who (after hee had ſtood a long time at the devotion of the Welſhmen, his heavie friends for his life, being at length delivered on this condition, that hee ſhould reſigne up into their hands all his poſſeſſions in Wales) was the firſt of the Norman race that with a ſmall power of men, fortunately ſet foote in Ireland, and by his valour made way for the Engliſh to follow, and ſecond him for ſubduing Ireland under the Crowne of England.

The River Stuccia.

From Tivie mouth, the ſhore gently giveth backe, and openeth for it ſelfe the paſ- A ſage of many Riverets; among which in the upper part of the Shire, STUCCIA, whereof Ptolomee maketh mention, is moſt memorable, when as the name of it continueth after a ſort, whole at this day, being called in common ſpeech, Yſtwith: at the head whereof are veines of Lead, and at the mouth the Towne Aber-y-ſtwith, the moſt populous and plenteous place of the whole Shire, which that noble Gilbert de Clare alſo fenſed with walles, and Walter Bec an Engliſhman defended a great while againſt the Welſh right manfully. Hard hereunto lyeth Lhan Badern vaur, that is, The Church of Patern the great, who being borne in little Britaine, as wee reade in his life, both governed the Church by feeding, and fed it by governing. Unto whoſe memory the poſterity conſecrated heere as well a Church, as alſo an Epiſcopall See. But the Bi- B ſhopricke, as Roger Hoveden writeth, quite decayed many yeeres ſince, when the people had wickedly ſlaine their Paſtour.

The river Ridol.

At the ſame mouth alſo the River Ridol diſchargeth it ſelfe into the Iriſh ſea. This River, deſcending out of Plinlimon, an exceeding ſteepe and high hill, that encloſeth the North part of the Shire, and powreth out of his lap thoſe moſt noble Rivers Severn and Wy, whereof I have already often ſpoken. And not much above Y-ſtwith mouth, the River Devi that ſerveth in ſtead of a limite betweene this and Merionith-ſhire, is lodged alſo within the Sea.

Scarce had the Normans ſetled their Kingdome in Britaine, when they aſſailed this Coaſt with a Fleet by Sea, and that verily with good ſucceſſe. For, by little, C and little, in the Raigne of King William Rufus, they wreſted the maritime Coaſts out of the Welſhmens hands: but the greateſt part thereof they granted unto Cadugan Ap Blethin, a right wiſe and prudent Britain: who was highly eſteemed, and of great power throughout all Wales, and evermore ſhewed much favour and friendſhip to the Engliſh. But when his ſonne Oën, a furious and heady young man, who could at no hand away with peace, infeſted the Engliſhmen and Flemings newly come thither with continuall invaſions, the unhappy father was fined with the loſſe of his lands, and puniſhed for the offenſes of his ſonne, who was himſelfe alſo conſtreined to relinquiſh his native Country and to flie into Ireland. Then this Cardigan-ſhire was given by King Henry the Firſt unto Gilbert de Clare, who placed Gariſons and D fortified Caſtles there. But Cadugan with his ſonne Oën, received into favour againe by the Engliſh, recovered alſo his owne lands and inheritance. But Oën returning to his old bias and rebelling afreſh, was ſlaine by Girald the Caſtellan of Penbroke, whoſe wife Nesta he had carryed away and raviſhed. And his father being had away into England, long expected for a change of better fortune, and at length in his old age being reſtored to his owne home and friends, was upon the ſodaine by Madoc his Nephew ſtabbed through the body. After this, Roger de Clare through the liberality of King Henry the Second had Cardigan-ſhire beſtowed upon him: but when Richard of Clare, his Nephew, if I be not deceived, whiles he came hither by land was ſlaine by the Welſh, Rhiſe Prince of South-Wales, having made a great E maſſacre of Engliſh and driven them out, at length with his victorious Army became Lord thereof: nevertheleſſe it fell againe by little and little into the hands of the Engliſh without any bloudſhed.

ORDEVICES.

THeſe Countries of the Silures and Dimetæ, which wee have hitherto travailed over, the Poſterity, when Wales was ſubject to three Princes, called in their tongue Deheu-barth, that is, The part lying on the right hand: and Engliſhmen, South-Wales, as hath beene ſaid before. The other two Principalities, which they tearme Guineth and Powis, wee North-Wales and Powiſland, were inhabited in ancient times by the ORDOVICES, who alſo bee named ORDEVICES, ORDOVICAE, and in ſome places although moſt corruptly, Ordolucæ. A puiſſant and courageous Nation, by reaſon they keepe wholly in a mountainous Country, and take heart even of the Sotle; and which continued the longeſt free from the yoake both of Romanes and alſo of Engliſh dominion: neither was it ſubdued by the Romanes, before the daies of the Emperour Domitiane: (For, then Iulius Agricola conquered almoſt the whole Nation) nor brought under the Engliſh before the dayes of King Edward the First. For a long time they lived in a lawleſſe kinde of liberty, as bearing themſelves bold both upon their owne valour, and the ſtrength of the Country, hard to be wonne: and which may ſeeme after a ſort naturally accommodated for ambuſhments, and to prolong warres. Ordovices.

To lay out and limite the bounds of the ORDEVICES in a generality, is not ſo hard a matter; but to ſet downe the true etymologie and reaſon of their name, I thinke it very difficult. Yet have I conceived this coniecture, that ſeeing they were ſeated over the two Rivers Devi, that ariſing from two ſprings neere together, take their courſe divers waies; and conſidering that Oar-Devi in their Britiſh tongue ſignifieth Vpon, or, above Devi, they were thence named Ordevices: like as the Aruerni had that name, becauſe they dwelt upon the river Garumna, the Armorici their name, for that they inhabited upon the Sea-ſide, and the Horeſci theirs, becauſe their inhabitation was upon the river Eske: Neither is the very name of Ordevices quite vaniſhed without any remaines thereof, in this Tract: For, a great part of it which lyeth to the Sea-ſide, is yet by the inhabitants uſually called Ardudwy, whereof it may ſeeme the Romanes have made theſe tearmes Ordovic and Ordevices carrying a ſofter and gentler ſound. But, the whole Country (excepting (excepting one ſmall Shire) is called of the Latine Writers by one name of a later ſtampe, Guinethia, and Venedotia, and of the Britans Guineth, and the ſame, from the * Veneti of Armorica as ſome thinke, who, as Cæſar writeth, Were wont very oft to ſaile unto Britaine. But if I might bee allowed to change one onely letter, I would ſuppoſe, that this name was knowne to the Greekes, and to Pauſanias, who in his Arcadica recordeth, that Antoninus Pius the Emperour grievouſly puniſhed the Brigantes, for that they had made inrodes into GENOUNIA a Province of the Romans in Britaine. Certes, if it might bee lawfull to reade Genouthia, for Genounia, ſo neere in ſound cōmeth that word to Guinethia, and this Guinethia bordereth ſo neer to the Brigantes, that unleſſe Pauſanias ment this region, let Sibylla her ſelfe declare where it was, and what it ſhould be. But theſe Countries belonged to the old ORDOVICES which are now called in Engliſh by new names, Montgomery-ſhire, Merioneth-ſhire, Caernarvon-ſhire, Denbigh-ſhire, and Flint-ſhire.

MONTGOMERY-SHIRE.

MONTGOMERY-SHIRE, in Britiſh Sire Tre-Faldwin, ſo called of the principall Towne therein, bounded on the South-ſide with Cardigan and Radnor-ſhires, on the Eaſt with Shropp-ſhire, on the North with Denbigh-ſhire, and on the Weſt with Merionith: although it hath many an high Hill in it, yet by reaſon of plentifull Valleies, it is a good Country as well for Corne as Paſture: and in old time a fruiteſull breeder of the beſt kinde of Horſes, which, as Giraldus ſaith, by natures workemanſhip pourtraying, as it were, in a picture their noble ſhapes, were very commendable as well for the * Majeſty of their making and bigge limmes, as for their incomparable ſwiftneſſe. In the utmoſt corner of this Shire Weſtward, where it endeth pointwiſe in manner of a Cone or Pine apple, ſtandeth Machleneth, haply that which the Romanes called MAGLONA: where under the Generall of Britaine in the time of the Emperour Theodoſius the younger, lay in Gariſon the Captaine of the Regiment of the Solenſes, for to repreſſe and keepe under the Mountainers: and two miles from hence neere unto Penall, there is a place to bee ſeene, named Keven Caer, that is, The backe or ridge of a Citie, where peeces of Romane Coine are other whiles digged up, and a circular forme of Walles of no ſmall circuit, are apparently ſeene by the remaines.

* Membroſa ſua majeſtate.

Five miles hence, the Hill Plinlimon whereof I ſpake, raiſeth it ſelfe up to a wonderfull height, and on that part where it boundeth one ſide of this ſhire, it powreth forth SABRINA, the greateſt River in Britaine next to Thamis, which the Britans tearme Haffren, and Engliſhmen Severn. Whence the name was derived I could never reade. For, that ſeemeth to ſmell of a fable, which Geffrey hath deviſed of the Virgin Sabrina therein drowned, and which a late Poet following his ſteps hath delivered thus in Verſe.

The head of Severn.

Severn.

——In flumen præcipitatur Abren,
Nomen Abren fluvio de virgine, nomen eidem
Nomine corrupto, deinde Sabrina datur.

Into the ſtreame was Abren headlong caſt;
The River then taking that Virgins name,
Hight Abren, and thereof Sabrin at laſt,
Which tearme in ſpeech corrupt implies the ſame.

This River immediately from his ſpring head maketh ſuch a number of windings in and out in his courſe, that a man would thinke many times hee returnes againe to his fountaine: yet for all that hee runneth forward, or rather ſlowly wandereth through this ſhire, Shropp-ſhire, Worceſter-ſhire, and laſt of all Gloceſter-ſhire, infuſing a certaine vitall moiſture into the ſoile every where as he paſſeth, untill at length hee mildely diſchargeth himſelfe into the Severn Sea. But in this ſhire it being overſhadowed with Woods, after much ſtrugling hee getteth out Northward by Lanidlos, Trenewith, or Newtowne, and Caer-fuſe, which, as they ſay, is both ancient, and enjoyeth alſo ancient priviledges; and not farre from his Eaſt banke, leaveth behinde him the Caſtle, and Towne of Montgomery upon the riſing of a Rocke, having a pleaſant Plaine under it. The Engliſhmen named the Caſtle Montgomery, and the Latines Mons Gomericus, of Roger de Montgomery Earle of Shrewesbury; who winning much land heereabout from the Welſh, built it, as wee finde in Domeſday booke. But when his ſonne Robert was attainted for Rebellion, King Henry the Firſt gave this Caſtle, and the honour of Montgomery to Baldwin Bollers in marriage with with Sybill of Falais his Niece. According to whose name the Welshmen call the Towne standing a little from the Castle, Tre-Faldwin, that is, Baldwins Towne. From this Baldwin descended Vital Engain who claimed this Honour as right Heire in the time of king Henry the Third. About which time, the said king Henry the Third raised it up againe out of the very ashes: For, the Welsh had slaine the Garison Souldiers and overthrowne it; and so it lay desolate for many yeeres, and Florilegus fableth, That hee, of the situation of the place then first named it Montgomery. Certaine it is, that the said king then granted by his Patent, That the Burrough of Montgomery should be a free Burrough, with other Liberties. Now the Herberts are heere seated, branched out from a brother of Sir William Herbert the first Earle of Penbroke of that name.

Montgomery. it signifyeth Hilly wale. quasi montosa Cambria.

Anno xj.

Corndon hill. Hard by this, Corndon Hill mounteth up to a very great height, in the top whereof are placed certaine stones in a round circle like a Coronet, whence it taketh that name, in memoriall as it should seeme of some victory. A little higher, Severn glideth downe by Trellin, that is, The Towne by a Poole, whereupon it is called Welch Poole in English. It hath a Castle joyning unto it on the South side, called Castle Coch of a kinde of reddish stone wherewith it is built, which within the compasse of one wall, containeth two Castles: the one belonged to the Lord of Powis, the other to the Baron Dudley. Cadugane the sonne of Blethin, that renowned Britan, of whom I spake, whiles he was busie about the building of this Castle, was, as we finde in the Epitome of Lancarbanensis, slaine by his nephew Madock. Right over against this Castle on the other side of the River, standeth Buttington, well knowne by reason of the Danes wintering there; out of which, Adhered Earle of the Mercians expelled them in the yeere of Christ 894. as Marianus writeth. Severn being past these places, turneth by little and little Eastward, that he may the sooner entertaine the small River Tanet, which being once received into his society, hee goeth on forward to Shropp-shire.

Welch Poole.

Red Castle.

That MEDIOLANUM a Towne of the Ordovices, which both Antonine the Emperour, and Ptolomee speake of, stood in this Shire, I am in a manner perswaded, upon probability. The footings whereof, I have sought after with all diligence, but little or nothing have I found of it; For time consumeth the very carcasses even of Cities. Yet if we may ground any conjecture upon the situation, seeing the Townes which Antonine placeth on either side, be so well knowne, to wit, BONIUM, now Bangor by Dee on the one side, and RUTUNIUM, now Rowton Castle on the other side (for he setteth it twelve Italian miles distant from this, and from the other twenty) The lines of Position, if I may so tearme them, or of the distance rather, doe cut one another crosse betweene Matrafall and Lan-vethlin, which are scarce three miles asunder, and shew as it were demonstratively the site of our Mediolanum. For, this cannot chuse but bee an infallible way to finde out the situation of a third place, by two others that are knowne, when as there are neither hils interposed, nor any troublous turnings of the wayes. As for this Matrafall, which standeth five miles Westward from Severn, although it bee now but a bare name, was sometime the regall seat of the Princes of Powis (which may bee an argument of the antiquity thereof) and the same much spoken of by Writers, who record, that after the Princes had once forsaken it, Robert Vipont* an Englishman built a Castle. But Lan-vethlin, that is, Vethlins Church, being a little Mercate Towne, although it be somewhat farther off from the crosse-meeting of the said lines, yet commeth it farre neerer in resemblance of name to Mediolanum. For, of Methlin, by the propriety of the British tongue, is made Vethlin, like as of Caer-Merden, is come Caer Verden, and of Ar-mon, Arvon. Neither doth Methlin, more jarre and disagree in sound from Mediolanum, than either Millano in Italie, Le Million in Xantoigne, or Methlen in the Lowcountries, which Cities no man doubteth were all in times past knowne by the name of Mediolanum. Which of these conjectures commeth neerer to the truth, judge you: for me it is enough to give my guesse. If I should say, that either Duke Medus, or Prince Olanus built this Mediolanum of ours, and those Cities of the same name in Gaule, or that whiles they were Matrafall.

* De veteri Ponte.

Lan-vethlin.

A were a building Sus mediatim Lanata, that is, That a Sow halfe fleeced with wooll, was digged up, might I not be thought (thinke you) to catch at Clouds, and fish for Nifles? Yet notwithstanding the Italians write as much of their Mediolanum. But seeing that most true it is, that these Cities were built by nations of the same language (and that the Gaules and Britans spake all one language I have prooved already) it is probable enough, that for one, and the same cause they had also one and the same denomination. Howbeit, this our Mediolanum, in nothing so farre as I know, agreeth with that of Italie, unlesse it be, that both of them are seated upon a plaine betweene two riverets: and a learned Italian derived the name of their Mediolanum hence, because it is a Citie standing in the middest betweene Lanas, that is, little rivers, accor-B ding to his owne interpretation. But this may seeme overmuch of MEDIOLANUM, which I have sought heere, and about Alcester not farre off.

This Countie hath adorned no Earle with the name, title, and Honour thereof untill of late, our Soveraigne King James created Philip Herbert, second Sonne of Henry Earle of Penbroke by Mary Sidney, for the singular love and affectionate favour toward him, and for the great hope that he conceived of his vertues, both Baron Herbert of Shurland, and also Earle of Montgomery, upon one and the same day at Greenwich, in the yeere 1605. But, the Princes of Powis, descended from the third Sonne of Rotherike the great, held this shire with others in a perpetuall line of succession (although Roger and Hugh of Montgomery, had encroched upon some part C thereof) untill the daies of King Edward the Second. For then Oen ap Gruffin, ap Guenwinwyn, the last Lord of Powis of the British bloud (for the name of Prince had long before been worne out of use) left one onely daughter named Hawise, whom Sir Iohn Charleton an English man, the Kings * Valect married, and in right of his wife, was by King Edward the Second made Lord of Powise; who (as I have seene in very many places) gaue for his Armes, a Lion Geules Rampant, in a shield, Or, which he received from his wifes Progenitours. Of his posterity there were foure males that bare this Honorable title, untill that in Edward, the succession of males had an end: for he, the said Edward, begat of Æleonor the daughter and one of the heires of Thomas Holland Earle of Kent, Iane, Wife to Sir Iohn Grey Knight, and Joice married unto D Iohn Lord Tiptoft, from whom the Barons of Dudley and others derive their descent. The said Sir Iohn Grey, for his marciall prowesse, and by the bountifull favour of King Henry the Fifth, received the Earledome of Tanquervill in Normandie, to have unto him and his heires males, by delivering one Bassivet at the Castle of Roan every yeere on Saint Georges day. This John had a sonne named Henrie, Lord of Powis, in whose race the title of Powis with the Honour thereof continued untill Edward Grey died well neere in our time, leaving no issue lawfully begotten.

MERIONETH-SHIRE.

FRom the backeſide of Montgomery-ſhire, MERIONETH-SHIRE, in Britiſh Sire-Verioneth, in Latine Mervinia, and as Giraldus calleth it, Terra filiorum Canani, that is, Canans ſonnes Land, reacheth to that crooked Bay, I ſpake of, and to the maine Sea, which on the Weſt ſide beateth ſo ſore upon it, that it is verily thought to have carryed away by violence ſome part thereof. Southward, for certaine miles together it is ſevered from Cardigan-ſhire, by the river Dovy; on the North it boundeth upon Caer-narvon, and Denbigh-ſhires. As for the in-land part, it ſo riſeth with mountaines ſtanding one by another in plumps, that as Giraldus ſaith, it is the roughest and moſt unpleaſant Country to ſee to, in all Wales. For, it hath in it mountaines of a wonderfull height, yet narrow and paſſing ſharpe at the top in manner of a needle, and thoſe verily not ſcattering, heere and there one, but ſtanding very thicke together, and ſo even in height that Shepheards talking together, or railing one at another on the tops of them if haply they appoint the field to encounter and meet together, they can hardly doe it from morning till night. But let the Reader heerein relie upon Giraldus credit. Great flockes of Sheepe graze all over theſe mountaines, neither are they in danger of Wolves, who were thought then to have beene ridde quite out of all England and Wales, when King Eadgar impoſed upon Ludwall Prince of theſe Countries to preſent three hundred Wolves yeerely unto him by way of Tribute. For, when, as William of Malmesbury writeth, he had for three yeeres performed this, at the fourth yeere, he gave over, upon his proteſtation, that hee could finde no more. Yet long time after this, there remained ſome ſtill, as appeareth for certaine, by irreproveable teſtimonies of Record.

Mountaines exceeding high.

Wolves in England deſtroied.

See Derby-ſhire and Yorke ſhire.

The inhabitants, who for the moſt part wholly betake themſelves to breeding and feeding of cattaile, and live upon white meates, as butter, cheeſe, &c. (how ever Strabo mocked our Britans in times paſt, as unskilfull in making of cheeſe) are for ſtature, cleere complexion, goodly feature, and lineaments of body, inferiour to no Nation in Britain: but they have an ill name among their neighbours, for being too forward in the wanton love of women, and that proceeding from their idleneſſe. They have but few townes: Eaſtward where Dovy runneth, ſtandeth Mouthwy a Commot very well knowne, which fell for a childes part of inheritance to William, alias, Wilcock of Mouthwy, a younger ſonne of Gruffeth Ap Gwenwynwin Lord of Powis: and by his ſons daughter it came unto Sir Hugh Burgh, and by his ſonnes daughters likewiſe unto the Families of Newport, Leighton, Lingein, and Mitton, of eſpeciall reſpect in theſe parts. Where the river Avon runneth downe more Weſtward, there is Dolegethle a little mercat towne, ſo called of the Vale wherein it is built. Hard by the ſea in the little territory named Ardudwy, the Caſtle Arlech, in times paſt, named Caer Colun ſtandeth advanced upon a very ſteepe rocke, and looketh downe into the ſea from aloft, which being built, as the Inhabitants report, by King Edward the Firſt, tooke name of the ſituation. For, Arlech in the Britiſh tongue ſignifieth as much, as upon a Stony rocke. Whiles England was disjointed, and lay torne with civill broiles, David Ap Ienkin Ap Enion a noble Gentleman of Wales, who tooke part with the houſe of Lancaſter, defended it ſtoutly againſt King Edward the Fourth: untill that Sir William Herbert Earle of Pembrock making his way with much adoe through the midſt of theſe mountaines of Wales, no leſſe paſſable than the Alpes, aſſaulted this Caſtle in ſuch furious thundering manner, that it was yeelded up into his hands. Incredible it is almoſt what a cumberſome journey hee had of it, and with what difficulty, hee gat through, whiles he was conſtrained in ſome places to climbe up the hilles creeping; in others, to come downe tumbling, both he and his company together. Whereupon, the dwellers thereabout call that way at this day Le Herbert.

A little higher, in the very confines of the Shires, two notable armes of the Sea enbosome themselves within the Land, Traith Maur, and Traith Bachan, that is, The greater Wash, and the lesse. A Fastineog. And not farre from hence, neere unto a little Village called Fastineog, there is a street or Port-way paved with stone, that passeth through these cumbersome and in manner, unpassable Mountaines. Which considering that the Britans name it Sarn Helen, that is, Helens Street, it is not to be thought, but that Helena mother to Constantine the Great, who did many such like famous workes throughout the Romane Empire, laied the same with stone. Neither standeth farre from it Caer-Gai, that is, The Castle of Caius, built by one Caius a Roman, touching whom the common people dwelling thereby report great wonders.

Helens street.

The Sources of Dee. In the East side of the Shire, the River Dee springeth out of two Fountaines, whence some thinke it tooke the name, for, they call it Dwy, which word importeth also among them the number of two (although others would needs have it so tearmed of some Divinity, other of the blacke colour) and forthwith passeth entire and whole through Lhintegid, in English Pimble-Meare, and Plenlin-Meare; a Lake spreading farre in length and breadth: and so runneth out of it with as great a streame as it entred in. For, neither shall a man see in Dee the fishes called Guiniad, which are peculiar to the Meare, nor yet Salmons in the Meare, which nevertheless are commonly taken in the River. But see if you please the description of this Lake or Meare, in verse by the Antiquarian Poet. B C

Pimble-meare.

Guiniad fishes.

Hispida quà tellus Mervinia respicit Eurum,
Est locus antiquo Penlinum nomine dictus,
Hic lacus illimeis in valle Tegeius alta
Latè expandit aquas, & vastum conficit orbem, Excipiens gremio latices, qui fonte perenni
Vicinis recidunt de montibus, atque sonoris
Illecebris captas demulcent suaviter aures:
Illud habet certè lacus admirabile dictu,
Quantumvis magna pluvia non æstuat: atqui D
Aëre turbato, si ventus murmura tollat,
Excrescit subitò rapidis violentior undis,
Et tumido superat contemptas flumine ripas.

On th' East side of Merioneth, a Country rough that is,
A place there lies by ancient name cleped Penlin, ywis,
Whereas, within a Valley deepe, there spreadeth farre a Lake
With waters cleere without all mud, which compasse huge doth take,
Receiving sundry pirles to it and many a running rill,
That spring and fall continually from every neighbour hill.
And with shrill noise and pleasant sounds allured eares doe fill. E
And verily a wonder 't is, of this Lake strange to tell,
Although the raine powre downe amaine, the waters never swell.
But if the aire much troubled be, and windes aloft doe blow,
It swelles at once, no streame so much, and bankes doth overflow.

Bala. On the browe, or edge heereof standeth Bala a little Towne, endowed with many immunities, but peopled with few inhabitants, and as rudely and unhandsomely built, nevertheless it is the chiefe Mercate Towne for these Mountainers.

Hugh Earle of Chester was the first of the Normans that tooke this Country, and held it with planting Garisons, what time as he kept Gruffin Ap Conan, that is, the sonne of Conan prisoner: But Gruffin afterwards recovered it with the rest of his Principality, and left it unto his heires, untill it came unto the fatall Periode, and so ended in Lhewellin. CAERNARVON-SHIRE.

ABove Merionith-ſhire, lieth that Country which the Britans call Sire Caer-ar-von, and Engliſh men CAER-NARVON-SHIRE, of the principall Towne therein; and before that Wales was laied out into Shires, they tearmed it, by the name of Snowden-Forest, and the Latine Hiſtorians Snaudonia, of that Forest, and Ar-vonia, out of the Britiſh name becauſe it hath Mona, that is, Angleſey juſt over againſt it. The North B ſide and the Weſt butteth upon the Iriſh Sea: the South-ſide is encloſed with Merioneth-ſhire, and the Eaſt with Denbigh-ſhire, from which it is ſevered by the River Conwy. On that part which looketh toward the Sea, eſpecially where it ſhooteth forth a great way South-weſt with a Promontorie and ſtretcheth out the ſhores with crooked turning full againſt OCTOPITARUM, or Saint Davids Land, it is of a very fruitfull ſoile and garniſhed all a long with prety Townes. Conway River.

As for the more in-land part of the Shire, Nature hath loftily areared it up farre and neere with Mountaines ſtanding thicke one by another, as if ſhe would here have compacted the joynts of this Iſland within the bowels of the earth: and made C this part thereof a moſt ſure place of refuge for the Britans in time of adverſitie. For there are ſo many roughes and Rocks, ſo many vales full of Woods, with Pooles heere and there croſſing over them, lying in the way betweene, that no Armie, nay not ſo much as thoſe that are lighely appoynted, can finde paſſage. A man may truely, if he pleaſe, terme theſe Mountaines, the Britiſh Alpes: for beſides that they are the greateſt of the whole Iſland, they are no leſſe ſteepe alſo with cragged and rent Rockes on every ſide than the Alpes of Italie, yea and all of them compaſſe one Mountaine round about, which over-topping the reſt ſo towreth up with his head aloft in the aire, as he may ſeeme not to threaten the Skie, but to thruſt his D head up into Heaven. And yet harbour they the Snow, for, all the yeere long, they be hory with Snow, or rather with an hardened cruſt of many Snowes felted together. The Alpes of Britany.

Whence it is, that all theſe hilles are in Britiſh by one name termed Craig Eriry, in Engliſh Snow-don, which in both languages, ſound as much as Snowie Mountaines: like as Niphates in Armenia, and Imaus in Scythia, tooke their names, as Plinie witneſſeth of Snow. Neverthelesſe, ſo ranke are they with graſſe, that it is a very common ſpeech among the Welſh, That the Mountaines Eriry will yeeld ſufficient paſture for all the Cattaile in Wales, if they were put upon them together. Concerning the two Meares on the toppe of theſe, in the one of which floteth a wandring Iſland, E and in the other is found great ſtore of Fiſhes, but having all of them but one eye a peece, I will ſay nothing leſt I might ſeeme to foſter fables: although ſome confident upon the authoritie of Giraldus, have beleeved it for a veritie. Yet certaine it is, that there be in the very toppe of theſe Mountaines Pooles in deed and ſtanding Waters: whereupon Gervaſe of Tilbury in his Booke entituled Otia Imperialia, writeth thus. Snow-don hilles.

In the Land of Wales within the bounds of great Britain, there be high Hilles that have laied their foundations upon moſt hard Rockes, and in the toppe thereof the earth is cruſted over with ſuch a coate of wateriſh moiſture, that whereſoever a man doe but lightly ſet his foote, he ſhall perceive the ground to ſtirre the length of a ſtones caſt from him: whereupon when F the enemies came, the Welſh with their agility and nimbleneſſe lightly leaping over the boggy ground, either avoide the enemies aſſaults, or to their loſſe reſolutely expect their forces. Theſe Mountainers John Salisbury in his Polycraticon, by a new forged Latine name termed Nivicollinos, that is, Snow-down inhabitants, of whom in King Henry the Second his daies he wrote thus. Nivicollini.

The Snow-downe Britans make inrodes, and being now come out of their Caves and lurking holes of the Woods, enlarge their borders, poſſeſſe the plaines of the Noble men: and whiles themſelves looke on, they aſſault, they winne, and overthrow them, or elſe keepe the ſame to their owne behoofe; becauſe our youth, which is ſo daintily brought up, and loves to be houſe-birds and to live lazie in the ſhade, being borne onely to devoure the fruits of the earth and to fill the belly, ſleepes untill it be broad day light, &c.

But come wee downe now from the Mountaines into the Champion Plaines, which becauſe we finde no where elſe but by the Sea ſide, it may ſuffice to coaſt only along the ſhore. The Promontory which I ſaid before ſhooteth out toward the South-weſt, is in Ptolomee called according to the diverſitie of copies, CANGANUM, JANGANUM, and LANGANUM. Which is the trueſt name I know not, but LANGANUM it may ſeeme; conſidering that the inhabitants name it at this day Lhein, which runneth forth with a narrow and even by-land, having larger and more open fields than the reſt of the Country, and the ſame yeelding Barley moſt plenteouſly. Two little Townes it ſheweth and no more, that are memorable. Farther within upon the Creeke, is Pulhely, that is, that Salt Meare or Poole: more outward, by the Iriſh Sea (that beateth upon the other ſide of the Bi-land) is Nevin, a Village having a Merket kept in it: wherein the Nobility of England, in the yeere of our Lord 1284. in a Triumph over the Welſh did celebrate the memory of Arthur the great, as Florilegus writeth, with Juſtes, Turnaments and feſtivall pompe. If any other Townes flouriſhed here, then were they deſtroied, when Hugh Earle of Cheſter, Robert of Rudland, and Guarin of Salop, entring into this Country firſt of all the Normans, ſo waſted this Promontory, that for the ſpace of ſeven whole yeeres, it lay diſpeopled and deſolate.

Canganum. Lhein. Pulhely. Nevin. The life of Gruffin.

From Nevin, the ſhore pointed and endented with one or two elbowes lying out into the ſea tendeth Northward, and then turning afront North-eaſt, by a narrow ſea or Frith (they call it Menai) it ſerveth the Iſle Angleſey from the firme land. Upon this ſtraight or narrow ſea ſtood SEGONTIUM, a City which Antonine the Emperour maketh mention of: ſome reliques of the walles I ſaw neere unto a little Church built in honour of Saint Publicius. It tooke the name of a River running by the ſide of it, which yet at this day is called Seiont, and iſſueth out of the Poole Lin-Peris. In which, there is a kinde of fiſh peculiar to that water, and ſeene no where elſe, called by the dwellers there Tor-coch; of the belly that is ſomewhat red. Now, ſeeing that in an ancient copie of Ptolomee, SETANTIORUM PORTUS is here placed, which according to other copies is ſet farther off, if I ſhould reade in ſtead of it, SEGONTIORUM PORTUS, that is, the Haven of the Segontians, and ſay it ſtood upon the mouth of this River, I ſhould perhaps aime at the truth: if not, yet ſhould I obtaine pardon for my conjecture of a courteous Reader.

Menai. Segontium. Lhan Beblin. Tor-coch fiſhes.

This Citie Ninnius called Caer Cuſtenith; and hee that wrote the life of Gruffin the Sonne of Conan, recordeth, that Hugh Earle of Cheſter built a Caſtle in Hean Caer Cuſtenith, that is, as the Latine Interpreter tranſlateth it, in the auncient Citie of Conſtantine the Emperour. And Matthew of Weſtminſter writeth (but let him make it good if he can) that the bodie of Conſtantius, Father to Conſtantine the Great was here found in the yeere of our Lord 1283. and honourably beſtowed in the Church of the new Citie by the commandement of King Edward the Firſt. Who out of the ruines of this Towne, at the ſame time raiſed the Citie Caer-narvon ſomewhat higher, upon the Rivers mouth, ſo, as that on the Weſt and North-ſides it is watered therewith. Which, as it was called Caer-narvon becauſe it ſtandeth right ouer againſt the Iſland Mona (for ſo much doth the word import) ſo, it hath communicated that name unto the whole Country; for, heereupon the Engliſh men call it Caer-narvon-ſhire. This is encompaſſed with a very ſmall circuit of walles about it and in manner round, but the ſame exceeding ſtrong, and to ſet it the better out, ſheweth a paſſing faire Caſtle which taketh up the whole Weſt ſide of it. The private buildings (for the manner of that Countrey) are ſightly enough, and the inhabitants for their courteſie much commended, who thinke it a point of their glorie, that Caer-narvon.

King

A King Edward the Firſt, founded their Citie; that his Sonne King Edward the Second was heere borne and ſurnamed of Caer-narvon; who alſo was of the Engliſh line the firſt Prince of Wales; and alſo the Princes of Wales had heere their Chauncerie, their Exchequer, and their Iuſtice for North-Wales. About ſeven miles hence by the ſame narrow Sea ſtandeth Bangor or Banchor low ſeated, encloſed on the South ſide with a Mountaine of great heighth, on the North with a little hill: ſo called A choro pulchro, that is, of a faire quire, or as ſome would have it, quaſi Locus Chori, that is, as if it were the place of a quire. Which being a Biſhops See, hath within the Dioceſe thereof 96. Pariſhes. The Church, was conſecrated unto Daniel ſometime Biſhop thereof: but that which now ſtandeth is of no eſpeciall faire building: for, Owen Glendwerdwy that moſt notorious Rebell, who had purpoſed utterly to deſtroy all the Cities of Wales, ſet it on fire, for that they ſtood for the King of England, and defaced the ancient Church, which albeit Henry Deney Biſhop of the ſame repaired about the time of King Henry the Seventh, yet it ſcarcely recovered the former dignity. Now the Towne is ſmall, but in times paſt ſo large, that for the greatneſſe thereof it was called Banchor Vaur, that is, Great Banchor, and Hugh Earle of Cheſter fortified it with a Caſtle, whereof I could finde no footings at all, though I ſought them with all diligent inquiry: But that Caſtle was ſituate upon the very entry of the ſaid narrow Sea. Over the Menay, or ſtreight hereby, King Edward the Firſt, that he might tranſport his Army into Mona, or Angleſey (whereof I muſt treat anon in due order) went about with great labour to make a bridge, but all in vaine. Albeit Suetonius Paulinus conveyed over his Romane Souldiers long before into Mona, his Horſemen at a Fourd, and the Footemen in little flat botomed boates, as we reade in Tacitus. From hence the ſhore raiſing it ſelfe with a bending aſcent, runneth on by Penmaen-maur, that is, The great ſtony head, a very exceeding high and ſteepe Rocke, which hanging over the Sea when it is floud, affourdeth a very narrow path way for paſſengers, having on the one ſide huge ſtones over their heads, as if they were ready to fall upon them, on the other ſide the raging Ocean lying of a wonderfull ſteepe depth under it. But after a man hath paſſed over this, together with Pen-maen bychan, that is, the leſſer ſtony head, he ſhall come to an open broad plaine, that reacheth as farre as to the River Conwey, which limiteth this Shire on the Eaſt ſide. This River in Ptolomee after a corrupt manner of writing Greeke, is called TOISOVIUS, for CONOVIUS. It iſſueth out of a Poole of the ſame name in the South border of the Shire, and being pent in, and, as it were, ſtrangled runneth apace within a very narrow chanell, as farre almoſt as to the mouth thereof, breeding certaine Shell-fiſhes, which being conceived of an Heavenly deaw, bring forth Pearles; and there, giveth he name unto the Towne CONOVIUM which Antonine mentioneth. And although it now lie all along, and that name there be utterly extinct, yet by a new name it doth covertly implie the antiquity. For a very ſmall and poore village ſtanding among the rubbiſh thereof is called Caer hean, that is, the ancient City. Out of the ſpoile and ruines whereof, King Edward the Firſt built a new Towne at the very mouth of the River, which thereupon they call Aber-Conwey, that is, the mouth of Conwey; which place Hugh of Cheſter had before-time fortified. But this New Conovium, or Aber-Conwey, being ſtrongly ſituated and fenſed both with walls, and alſo with a very proper Caſtle by the Rivers ſide, deſerveth the name rather of a prety Citie than of a Towne, but that it is not repleniſhed with Inhabitants.

Banchor as one would ſay Penchor, that is, a principal Quire as others think.

Oppoſite unto this Towne, and yet on this ſide of the River which is paſſed by ferry, and not by bridge, reacheth out a huge Promontory with a bending elbow (as if nature purpoſed to make there a road and harbour for Ships) which is alſo counted part of this Shire, and is named Gogarth: wherein ſtood Diganwy, an ancient City juſt over the River Conwey, where it iſſueth into the Sea: which was burnt many yeeres agoe with lightning. And I am of opinion, that it was the City DICTUM; where, under the later Emperours the Captaine over the band of the Nervians Dictenſes kept their guard. And for that, afterwards it was called Diganwy, who ſeeth not that the ſaid Canwey came of Conwey, and from thence the Engliſh name Ganoc?

ned this Country, who being not able to repreſſe the Engliſh troupes who ſwarmed into Wales, yeelded otherwhiles unto the tempeſt: and at length when with his integrity and uprightneſſe he had regained the favour of King Henry the Firſt, he eaſily alſo recovered his owne lands of the Engliſh, and left them to his heires ſucceſſively, untill the time of Lhewelyn ap Gruffith, who when he had provoked his owne Brethren with wrongs, and the Engliſh men with inrodes, was brought to this paſſe, that hee held this hilly Country together with the Iſle Angleſey of King Edward the Firſt as Tenant in Fee, and paid for it yeerely a thouſand Markes. Which con- B ditions afterward when hee would not ſtand unto, and following rather his owne and his Brothers ſtubborne wilfulneſſe, than any good hope to prevaile, would needes put all once againe to the hazard of warre, he was ſlaine, and ſo both ended his owne life and withall the Britiſh government in Wales.

THE ISLE MONA, or of ANGLESEY.

THE County of Caer-Nar-von, which I laſt ranne through, tooke name as I ſaid erewhile, of the chiefe Towne therein: and the ſaid Towne, of the Iſle Mona which lieth over againſt it: and requireth, as it were of right, that I ſhould treat of it in his due place, which unwillingly heeretofore (I confeſſe) I referred to the out Iſlands: whereas by right, it is to be placed among the Shires. This Iſle called of the Romans MONA, of the Britans Mon, and Tir-Mon, that is, the land of Mon and Ynis Dowil, that is, A ſhadowy or darke Iſland, of the ancient Anglo-Saxons Monez, and at laſt, after that the Engliſh men became Lords of it Englep-ea, and Anglepey, as one would ſay, The Engliſh mens Iſland, being ſevered from the Continent of Britaine with the ſmall narrow ſtreight of Menai, and on all parts beſides beaten upon with that ſurging and troublous Iriſh Sea, lieth in forme unequall; in length from Eaſt to Weſt reaching out twenty miles, in breadth ſcarce ſeventeene. And albeit, as Giraldus ſaith, the ground may ſeeme dry and ſtonie, nothing ſightly and unpleaſant, and for the outward qualitie reſembleth wholy the land Pebidiauc, that lieth hard unto Saint Davids: yet for the inward gift of nature, it is farre unlike. For, above all the Coaſts of Wales it is without compariſon moſt plentifull of Wheat, in ſo much as by way of a Proverbe they are wont to ſay of it in the Welſh language, Mon Mam Cymbry, which is as much in Engliſh, As Mon is the mother of Wales: becauſe when all other Countries round about doe faile, this alone with the exceeding fat ſoile, and plentifull encreaſe of Corne was wont to ſuſtaine all Wales. In Cattaile alſo it is paſſing rich, and ſendeth out great multitudes. It yeeldeth alſo Grind-ſtones, and in ſome place an earth ſtanding upon Alum; out of which ſome not long ſince beganne to make Alum and Coperoſe. But when they ſaw it not anſwerable to their expectation at firſt, without any farther hope they gave over their enterpriſe. Mona. Angleſey.

This is that moſt notable Iſle MONA, the ancient ſeat of the Druides, attempted firſt by Paulinus Suetonius, and brought under the Romane Empire by Iulius Agricola. This Suetonius Paulinus under the reigne of Nero, as Tacitus writeth, made all preparation to invade the Iſle Mona inhabited by a ſtrong and ſtout Nation, and then the receptacle of Fugitives. He built Flat-bothom veſſels, becauſe the Sea is ſhalow, the landing-ſhore uncertaine. Thus their footmen paſſed over, and after them the Horſemen following by the ſhallow fourd, or ſwimming where the waters were deepe with their Horſes. Againſt them ſtood the Enemies armies on the ſhore thicke ſet in aray, well appoynted with Men and weapons, and Women alſo running in, to and fro among them, like furies of Hell, in mourning attyre, their hayre about their eares, and with firebrands in their hands. Round about them alſo were the Druidæ, who liſting up their hands to Heaven, and powring out deadly curſes, with the ſtrangeneſſe of the ſight, ſo daunted the Souldiers, as they ſtood ſtock-ſtill, and not able to ſtirre their joynts preſented their bodies unto wounds. At length, what with the exhortation of their Captaine, and what with encouraging and animating one another not to feare a flocke of Franticke Women, and fanaticall perſons, they diſplaied and advaunced forward their Enſignes: Downe they goe with all in their way, and thruſt them within their owne fires. Which done, Gariſons were placed in their Townes, and the Groves conſecrated to their cruell Superſtitions cut downe: For they accounted it lawfull to Sacrifice with the blond of Captives, and by inſpection of Mens fibres and bowels to know the will of their gods. But as Paulinus was buſie in theſe exploits, newes came unto him of a ſudden revolt through the whole Province, which Druidæ.

ſtayed his enterpriſe. Afterwards, as the ſame Tacitus writeth, Iulius Agricola, purpoſed with himſelfe to ſubdue the Iſland Mona, from the poſſeſſion whereof, as I ſaid before Paulinus was revoked by a generall rebellion of all Britaine: But (as in a purpoſe not prepenſed before) veſſels being wanting, the policie and reſoluteneſſe of the Captaine deviſed a paſſage over, cauſing the moſt choiſe of the Auxiliaries, to whom all the ſhallowes were knowne, and who after the uſe of their Country were able in Swimming to governe themſelves with their Armour and Horſes; laying aſide their carriage, to put over at once and ſuddenly to invade them. Which thing ſo amazed the Enemies who ſuppoſed they would paſſe over by Shipping and therefore attended for a Fleet, and the tide, that they beleeved verily nothing could be hard or invincible to men that came ſo reſolute to Warre. Whereupon they humbly intreated for Peace and yeelded the Iſland. Thus by this ſervice Agricola became famous indeed, and of great reputation.

Many ages after, it was Conquered by the Engliſh men, and tooke their name, as being called in old time in the Saxons language Englej-ea, now commonly Angleſey, as one would ſay, The Engliſh mens Iſland. But ſeeing that Humfrey Lhuid in a very learned Epiſtle to that learned Ortelius, hath reſtored this Iſland to the due name and dignitie, there is no reaſon that any man heere ſhould require my diligence. Yet thus much will I adde unto the reſt. When the Empire of the Romanes in Britaine now was in declining and going downward, ſome out of Ireland, entred in by ſtealth into this Iſle alſo and neſtled there. For, beſides certaine Mounts of earth entrenched about, which they call The Iriſh mens cotages, there is a place alſo, named Yn Hericy Gwidil of the Iriſh men, who as we finde it recorded in the booke of Triades, under the leading of Sirigus, put the Britans to flight in that place.

Neither was it grievouſly infeſted onely by the Engliſh men, but alſo by the Norvegians. Likewiſe in the yeere of our redemption 1000. King Æthelreds fleete having skoured the Seas round about the ſaid Iſle, waſted it in all hoſtile maner. After this, the two Norman Hughes, the one Earle of Cheſter, and the other Earle of Shrewsburie greatly afflicted it, and built Caſtle Aber-Llieniog for to reſtraine and keepe under the Inhabitants. But Magnus the Norwegian arriving heere at the very ſame time, ſhot the ſaid Hugh Earle of Shrewsbury through with an Arrow, and after he had ranſacked the Iſland, departed. The Engliſh men moreover afterward from time to time invaded it, untill that King Edward the Firſt brought it wholly under his ſubjection. There were in ancient time reckoned in it 363. Villages, and even at this day it is well peopled. The principall Towne therein at this time is Beaumariſh, which King Edward the Firſt built in the Eaſt-ſide of the Iſle vpon a mariſh ground, and for the ſituation thereof gave it this goodly faire name, whereas before time it was called Bonover, who alſo fortified it with a Caſtle, which notwithſtanding may ſeeme never to have been finiſhed: the Governour whereof is the right Worſhipfull Sir Richard Bulkley Knight, whoſe courteſie toward me when I came to viſite theſe places, I cannot chuſe but evermore acknowledge with moſt hearty thankfulneſſe.

Lhan-vays. Hard unto Beau-Mariſh, lieth Lhan-vays, a famous religious houſe in times paſt of the Friers Minors, unto whom the Kings of England ſhewed themſelves very bountifull Patrons, as well in regard of the Friers holineſſe, who there converſed, as alſo becauſe there (that I may ſpeake out of the publike records of the Kingdome) were buried a daughter of King Iohn, a ſonne of the King of the Danes, the bodies alſo of the Lord Clifford, and of other Lords, Knights, and Squires, who in the time of the noble and renowned Kings of England, were ſlaine in the Warres againſt the Welſh.

2. Pars Pat. anno 2. H. 5.

Newburg. The next Towne in name to Beau-Mariſh, is Newburg called in Britiſh Roſſur ſtanding ten miles off Weſtward, which having been a long time greatly annoyed with heaps of ſand driven in by the Sea, complaineth that it hath loſt much of the former ſtate that it had. Aber-fraw is not farre from hence, which is now but an obſcure and meane Towne, yet in times paſt it excelled all the reſt farre in worth and dignity, as having been Aber-fraw.

A been the Royall ſeat of the Kings of Guineth, or North-Wales. And in the utmoſt Promontorie Weſtward, which wee call Holy-head, there ſtandeth a little poore Towne, in Britiſh Caer-Guby ſo named of Kibie a right holy man, and a diſciple of Saint Hilarie of Poitiers, who therein devoted himſelfe to the ſervice of God, and from whence there is an uſuall paſſage over into Ireland. All the reſt of this Iſland is well beſpred with Villages, which becauſe they have in them nothing materially memorable, I will croſſe over into the Continent, and view Denbigh-ſhire.

Holy head.

DENBIGH-SHIRE.

ON this ſide of the River Conwey, DENBIGH-SHIRE, in Welſh Sire Denbigh, retyreth more within the Country from the Sea, and ſhooteth Eaſtward in one place as farre as to the River Dee. On the North North-Weſt, firſt the Sea for a ſmall ſpace, and then Flint-ſhire, on the Weſt Merionith and Montgomery-ſhires, on the Eaſt Cheſhire, and Shropp-ſhire encompaſſe it. The Weſt part is barraine, the middle where it lyeth flat in a Valley, moſt fruitfull. The Eaſt ſide when it is once paſt the Valley, hath not Nature ſo favourable unto it, but next unto Dee, it findeth her farre more kinde.

The Weſt part, but that it is ſomewhat more plentifull and pleaſant toward the ſea ſide, is but heere and there inhabited, and mounteth up more with bare and hungry hils: but yet the painfull diligence and witty induſtry of the husbandmen hath begunne a good while ſince to overcome this leanneſſe of the ſoile, where the hilles ſettle any thing flattiſh, as in other parts of Wales likewiſe. For, after they have with a broad kinde of ſpade pared away the upper coat, as it were, or ſord of the earth, into certaine turfes, they pile them up artificially on heapes, put fire to them and burne them to aſhes, which being throwne upon the ground ſo pared, and flayed, cauſeth the hungry barrainneſſe thereof ſo to fructifie, that the fields bring forth a kinde of Rhie or Amel corne in ſuch abundance as it is incredible. Neither is this a new deviſe thus to burne the ground, but very ancient, as we may ſee in Virgil and Horace. Among theſe Hilles there is a place commonly called Cerigy Drudion, that is, The ſtones of the Druidæ, and certaine little columnes or pillars are ſeene at Yvoellas, with inſcriptions in them of ſtrange Characters, which ſome imagine to have beene erected by the Druides: and not farre from Clocainog, this inſcription is read in a ſtone.

AMILLIN TOVISATOC.

By the Vale ſide where theſe mountaines beginne now to wax thinner, upon the hanging of a rocke ſtandeth Denbigh, called of our Britans by a more ancient name, Cled Fryn-yn Roſſ, that is, A rough hill in Roſſ, for ſo they call that part of the Shire: which King Edward the Firſt gave with other faire lands and poſſeſſions to David the brother of Lhewellin. But when he ſoone after being found guilty of high treaſon was beheaded, Henry Lacy Earle of Lincolne obtained it by the grant of the ſaid King Edward: and he fortified it with a wall about, not large in circuit, but ſtrong, and on the South ſide with a proper Caſtle, ſtrengthned with high Towres. In the well whereof, after that his onely ſonne fortuned to be drowned, the moſt ſorrowfull father conceived ſuch griefe, that he gave over the worke and left it unfiniſhed. And after his death, the Towne with the reſt of the poſſeſſions deſcended unto the houſe of Lancaſter by his daughter Alice, who ſurvived: From whom notwithſtanding it came firſt through the liberality of King Edward the Second (when the ſaid houſe was dejected) unto Hugh Spenſer Earle of Wincheſter; then, to Roger Mortimer by covenant and compoſition with King Edward the Third: and the ſaid Mortimers Armes are to be ſeene upon the chiefe gate. But after that he was executed, it with the Cantreds of Roſſ, and Riewinoc, &c. were granted to William Montacute after Earle of Saliſbury, for ſuppriſing of Mortimer, and ſhortly after it was reſtored unto the Mortimers, and by them at length deſcended to the Family of Yorke. At which time, they of the Houſe of Lancaſter for the malice they bare unto Edward the Fourth, who was of the family of Yorke, did much hurt unto it. And then, either Denbigh.

becauſe the inhabitants like not the ſteepe ſituation thereof (for the carriage up and downe was very incommodious) or by reaſon that it wanted water, they remooved downe from thence by little and little, ſo as that this ancient Towne hath now few or none dwelling in it: But a new one farre bigger than it ſprung up at the very foote of the hill: which is ſo well peopled and inhabited, that by reaſon, that the Church is not able to receive the multitude, they beganne to build a new one in the place where the old Towne ſtood, partly at the charges of their Lord Robert Earle of Leiceſter, and partly with the money which they have gathered of many well diſpoſed throughout England: For, the ſaid Robert, in the yeere 1564. was created by Queene Elizabeth Baron of Denbigh, to him and the heires of his body lawfully begotten. Neither is there any one Barony in all England that hath more Gentlemen holding thereof in fee, and by ſervice.

Diffrin Cluid. Now are we come into the very heart of the ſhire, where Nature having removed the hils out of the way on both ſides, to ſhew what ſhe could doe in a rough country, hath ſpred beneath them a moſt beautifull pleaſant vale reaching 17. miles in length from South to North, and five miles or thereabout in bredth, which lyeth open only toward the ſea and the cleering North winde: otherwiſe environed it is on every ſide with high hilles, and thoſe from the Eaſt ſide, as it were embatled. For ſuch is the wonderfull workmanſhip of nature, that the tops of theſe mountaines reſemble in faſhion the battlement of walles. Among which the higheſt is Moilenlly, on the top whereof I ſaw a warlike fenſe with trench and rampire; alſo a little fountaine of cleere water. This vale for wholſomeneſſe, fruitfulneſſe and pleaſantneſſe excelleth. The colour and complexion of the Inhabitants is healthy, their heads are ſound and of a firme conſtitution, their eye-ſight continuing, and never dimme, and their age long laſting and very cheerefull. The Vale it ſelfe, with his greene meddowes, yellow Corne-fields, Villages, and faire houſes ſtanding thicke, and many beautifull Churches, giveth wonderfull great contentment to ſuch as behold it from above. The river Cluid, encreaſed with beckes and brookes reſorting unto it from the hils on each ſide, doth from the very ſpring-head part it in twaine running through the midſt of it, whence in ancient time it was named Strat Cluid; For, Marianus maketh mention of a King of the Strat-Clud of the Weiſh; and at this day it is commonly called Diffryn Cluid, that is, The Vale of Cluid: wherein, as ſome have recorded, certaine Britans which came out of Scotland, after they had driven forth the Engliſh, erected a petty Kingdome. On the Eaſt banke of Cluid, in the South part of the vale, ſtandeth Ruthin, in Latin writers Ruthunia, in Britiſh Ruthun, the greateſt mercat towne in all the Vale, full of Inhabitants, and well repleniſhed with buildings; famous alſo not long ſince by reaſon of a large and very faire Caſtle able to receive and entertaine a great houſhold. Which with the Towne, Reginald Grey to whom King Edward the Firſt granted it, and Roger Grey built, having obtained licence of the King, the Biſhop of Saint Aſaph, and the Parſon of the Church of Lhan-Ruth, in whoſe Pariſh the place is ſited. Unto him in recompenſe for his part of the good ſervice performed againſt the Welſh, King Edward the Firſt had given in manner the whole Vale: and it was the ſeat of his heires, men of great honour; and at length ſtiled with the Title of Earle of Kent, untill that Richard Grey Earle of Kent and Lord of Ruthin having no iſſue nor care of his brother Henry, paſſed away for a ſumme of money this his ancient inheritance unto King Henry the Seventh: But of late daies the bounteous magnificence of Queene Elizabeth beſtowed it upon Ambroſe Dudley Earle of Warwicke, together with rich revenewes in the Vale.

Cluid River.

When you aſcend out of the vale Eaſtward, you come to Yale, a little hilly country, and in compariſon of the Regions beneath and round about it paſſing high, ſo that no river from elſewhere commeth into it, and it ſendeth forth ſome from it. By reaſon of this high ſituation it is bleake, as expoſed to the windes on all ſides. Whether it tooke that name of the riveret Alen, which riſing firſt in it, undermineth the ground and once or twice hideth himſelfe, I know not. The Mountaines are full of Neat, ſheepe, and Goates: the vallies in ſome places plenteous enough of Corne, eſpecially

Eaſtward

A East, on this side of Alen. But the more Westerly part is not so fruitfull, and in some places is a very heath, and altogether barraine. Neither hath it any thing memorable, save onely a little Abbay, now wholly decaied, but standing most richly and pleasantly in a Vale, which among the woody hilles cutteth it selfe overthwart in manner of a crosse, whereupon it was called in Latine Vallis Crucis, that is, The Vale of the Crosse, and in British Lhane-Gwest. Valle Crucis. Vale of the Crosse.

From hence more Eastward, the Territory called in Welsh Mailor Gymraig, that is, Welsh Mailor, in English Bromfield, reacheth as farre as to the river Dee. A small Territory, but very rich and pleasant, plentifull withall of Lead, especially neere unto Moinglath, a little Towne which tooke the name of Mines. Heere is Wrex- Lead. Wrexham.

B ham to be seene, in the Saxons tongue Wpixxlej-ham, much spoken of for a passing faire towre Steeple that the Church hath, and the musicall Organs that bee therein. And neere unto it is Leonis Castrum, happily so called of the twenty Legion denominated Victrix, which a little higher on the other banke of Dee lay garrisoned: now it goeth commonly under the name of Holt: and is thought to have beene re-edified of late by Sir William Stanley, and long since by John Earle of Warren, who being a Guardian of trust unto Madock a Welsh Lord, conveighed falsly from his Ward, this Lordship together with Yale unto himselfe. But from the Earles of Warren, it came unto the Fitz-Alans Earles of Arundell, and from them to Sir William Beauchamp Baron of Abergevenney, and afterward to Sir William Stanley Chamberlaine to King Holt.

C Henry the Seventh, who contesting with his Soveraigne about his good services (when hee was honourably recompensed) lost his head, forgetting that Soveraignes must not bee beholding to Subjects, howsoever Subjects fancy their owne good services.

Beneath Bromfield, Southward lyeth Chirke, in Welsh Gwain, being also very hilly, but well knowne in elder ages for two Castles, Chirke which gave it the name, built Chirke.

by Roger Mortimer, and Castle Dinas Bran, situate in the hanging of a mighty high Castle Dinas Bran.

hill pointed in the top: where of note there remaineth nothing but the very ruines. The common sort affirme, that Brennius the Generall of the Galles both built and so named it: others interpret the name to this sense, The Castle of the Kings Palace. For, and Britans both, was by way of excellency called Brennus: But others againe draw Brennus.

this name from the high situation upon an hill, which the Britans tearme Bren, and in mine opinion this their conjecture carryeth with it more probability. In the time of King Henry the Third, it was the mansion place of Gruffith Ap Madoc, who when he tooke part with the English against the Welsh, was wont heere to make his abode: but after his death, Roger Mortimer who had the charge and tuition of his sonne Lhewellin, like as Iohn Earle of Warren, of whom I spake seized Bromfield; so hee seized also this Chirck, into his possession.

When the State of the Welsh by reason of their owne civill dissensions, and the E invasions of English, now ready to ruine, could not well subsist, the Earles of Chester and of Warren, the Mortimers, Lacy, and the Greies, that I spake of, first of all the Normans brought this little Country of Denbigh by little and little into their owne hands and left possession thereof to their heires. Neither was it made a Shire before King Henry the Eighth his daies: at which time Radnor, Brechnock, and Montgomery, by authority of the Parliament were ordained to be Shires.

F In this Shire there be Parishes 57.

FLINT-SHIRE.

RIGHT over against Denbigh-ſhire North-East-ward lyeth FLINT-SHIRE, a ſmall Territory, more in length than in breadth: hemmed in on the North ſide with the Iriſh Sea, or rather with an Arme of the ſame: on the Eaſt with Cheſhire, on other parts with Denbigh-ſhire. It is no mountaine Country to ſpeake of, yet riſing ſomewhat with the bearing up of Hilles, and gently falleth and ſloopeth it ſelfe downe with fruitfull fields, which towards Dee an Arme of the Sea, eſpecially every firſt Yeere that they bee new broken uppe and ſowne, beare in ſome places Barley, in others Whear, but generally throughout Rye with twenty fold encreaſe and better, and afterwards foure or five Crops together of Otes.

In the Confines of this Shire and Denbigh-ſhire where the hilles grow more flat and plaine with a ſofter fall, and an eaſier deſcent downe into the Vale, in the very gullet and entry thereof, the Romanes placed a little City named VARIS, which Antonine the Emperour placeth nineteene miles from CONOVIUM. This without any maime of the name is called at this day Bod-Vari, that is, Manſion Vari, and the next little hill hard by which the inhabitants thereabout commonly call Moyly Caer, that is, The Mountaine of the City, ſheweth the footings of a City indeed, that hath beene deſtroyed. But what the name ſhould ſignifie it appeareth not. I for my part have beene of opinion elſewhere, that Varia in the old Britiſh language ſignified a Paſſage, and accordingly have interpreted theſe words Durnovaria and Iſannævaria, The paſſage of a water, and the paſſage of Iſanna. And for this opinion of mine maketh well the ſituation of VARIS in that place where onely there lyeth open an eaſie paſſage betwixt the hilles. And not three miles from hence ſtandeth Caer-wisk, the name whereof although it maketh ſome ſhew of Antiquity, yet found I nothing ancient there, nor worth the obſervation.

Varis. Bod-vari. Caer-wisk.

Beneath this VARIS, or Bodvari, in the vale glideth Cluid, and ſtreightwayes Elwy a little Riveret conjoyneth it ſelfe with it, where there is a Biſhops See. This place the Britans call, according to the River Llan-Elwy, the Engliſhmen of Aſaph the Patron thereof Saint Aſaph. And the Hiſtoriographers, Aſaphenſis. Neither is the Towne for any beauty it hath, nor the Church for building or bravery memorable: yet ſomething would be ſaid of it, in regard of Antiquity.

Saint Aſaph.

For, about the yeere of our Redemption 560. Kentigern Biſhop of Glaſco, being fled hither out of Scotland placed heere a Biſhops See, and erected a Monaſtery, having gathered together ſixe hundred threeſcore and three in a religious brotherhood. Whereof three hundred being unlearned did give themſelves to husbandry, and as many moe to worke and labour within the Monaſtery, the reſt to Divine Service. Whom hee divided ſo by Covents, that ſome of them ſhould continually give attendance in the Church to the ſeervie of God. But when he returned into Scotland, he ordain'd Aſaph a moſt godly and upright man Governor over this Monaſtery, of whom it tooke the name which now it hath. The Biſhop of this See hath under his Juriſdiction about 128. Pariſhes, the Eccleſiaſticall Benefices whereof, were wont to bee beſtowed, when the See was voide by the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, without interruption untill the time of King Henry the Eighth, and that by his Archiepiſcopall right, which now is counted a Regality. For ſo we reade in the Hiſtory of Canterbury.

Capgrave.

Above this, Ruthlan, taking the name of the ruddy and red banke of Cluid, on which it ſtands, maketh a good ſhew with a Caſtle, but now almoſt conſumed by Ruthlan.

very age. Lhewellin Ap Sisil Prince of Wales, first built it; and Robert firnamed de Ruthland, Nephew of Hugh Earle of Chester, was the first that by force wonne it from the Welsh, as being Captaine Lieutenant to the said Hugh, who fortified it with new workes, and bulwarkes: Afterward (as Rob. Abbat de Monte hath written) King Henry the Second, when hee had repaired this Castle gave it unto Hugh Beauchamp. A

Beneath this, Cluid streightwayes emptieth it selfe into the Sea; And albeit the Valley at the very mouth seemeth to carry a lower levell and to lye under the Sea, yet the water never overfloweth into the Vale; but as it were, by a naturall obstacle, staieth within the very brinkes of the shore, not without the exceeding great admiration of Gods Providence. From hence the shore tending by little and little Eastward, shooteth forward first by Disart Castle, so called because it was situate on the rising of a cliffe, or as some would have it, as it were Desert: then by Basing werke, which also King Henry the Second granted unto Hugh Beauchamp. B

Basing werke.

Haly-well. Beneath this wee saw the little Towne Haly-well, as one would say, holy well, where there is that fountaine frequented by Pilgrimes for the memoriall of the Christian Virgin Winefride, ravished there perforce and beheaded by a Tyranne, as also for the mosse there growing of a most sweet and pleasant smell. Out of which Well there gusheth forth a Brooke among stones, which represent bloudy spottes upon them; and it carryeth so violent a streame that presently it is able to drive a mill. Over the very Well there standeth a Chappell built of stone right curiously wrought, whereunto adjoyneth a little Church, in a window whereof is portrayed and set out the History of the said Winefride, how her head was cut off, and set on againe by Saint Benno. Neere unto this place in the time of Giraldus, who yet knew not this Well, There was, as himselfe writeth, a rich Veine and gainefull Mine of silver, where men in seeking after silver pierced and pried into the very bowels of the Earth.

Saint Winefrid.

C

This part of the Country, because it smileth so pleasantly upon the beholders with a beautifull shew, and was long since subject unto Englishmen, the Welsh named Teg-Engle, that is, Faire England. But whereas one hath tearmed it Tegenia, and thought that the Igeni there planted themselves, take heede I advise you, that you be not overhasty to beleeve him. Certes, the name of the Iceni wrong put downe here deceived the good man. Then upon the shore, you may see Flint Castle, which King Henry the Second beganne, and King Edward the First finished: and it gave the name unto this Shire: where King Richard the Second circumvented by them who should have beene most trusty, was cunningly induced to renounce the Crowne as unable for certaine defects to rule; and was delivered into the hands of Henry of Lancaster Duke of Hereford, who soone after claimed the Kingdome and Crowne being then voide by his cession, as his inheritance descended from King Henry the Third, and to this his devised claime the Parliament assented, and hee was established in the Kingdome. After Flint by the East border of the Shire, neere to Chesshire, standeth Hawarden commonly called Harden-Castle, not farre from the shore; out of which when David Lhewellins brother had led away prisoner Roger Clifford, Iustice of Wales, hee raised thereby a most bloudy Warre against himselfe and his people, wherein the Princedome of the Welsh Nation was utterly overthrowne. But this Castle anciently holden by the Seneschalship of the Earles of Chester, was the seat of the Barons de Mount-hault, who grew up to a most honourable family, and gave for their Armes in A Shield Azure a Lion rampant Argent: and bettered their dignity and estate by marriage with Cecily one of the coheires of Hugh D'Albeney Earle of Arundell. But in the end, for default of male issue Robert the last Baron of this race, made it over as I have said already, to Isabell Queene of England wife to King Edward the Second. Howbeit the possession of the Castle was transferred afterward to the Stanleys, now Earles of Darby.

D E F

Through the South part of this Shire lying beneath these places above named, wandereth Alen a little River: neere unto which in an hill hard by Kilken, a small village,

A village, there is a Well. The water whereof at certaine ſet times riſeth and falleth, after the manner of the Sea-tides. Upon this Alen, ſtandeth Hope Caſtle in Welſh Caer-Gurle, in which King Edward the Firſt retired himſelfe when the Welſhmen had upon the ſudden ſet upon his ſouldiers being out of array: and where good milſtones are wrought out of the rocke: alſo, Mold, in Welſh Guid Cruc a Caſtle, belonging in ancient time to the Barons of Monthaulr: both which places ſhew many tokens of Antiquity. Hope Caſtle. Milſtones, Mold.

Neere unto Hope, a certaine Gardiner, when I was firſt writing this worke, digging ſomewhat deepe into the ground, happened upon a very ancient peece of worke, concerning which there grew many divers opinions of ſundry men: But
B hee that will with any diligence reade M. Vitruvius Pollio, ſhall very well perceive, it was nothing elſe but a Stouph or hote houſe begunne by the Romanes, who as their riotous exceſſe grew together with their wealth, uſed Bathes exceeding much. In length it was five elns, in breadth foure, and about halfe an eln deepe, encloſed with Walles of hard ſtone, the paving layed with bricke pargetted with lime morter: the arched roofe over it ſupported with ſmall pillars made of bricke, which roofe was of tiles pargetted over likewiſe very ſmoothe, having holes heere and there through it, wherein were placed certaine earthen pipes of Potters worke, by which the heate was conveyed, and ſo as hee ſaith, Volvebant hypocauſta vaporem, that is, the Stuples did ſend away a wauling hote vapour. And who would not
C thinke this was one of theſe kindes of worke which Giraldus wondered at eſpecially in Iſca? writing thus as he did of the Romanes workes. That (ſaith hee) which a man would judge among other things notable, there may you ſee on every ſide Stouphs made with marveilous great skill, breathing out heate cloſely at certaine holes in the ſides, and narrow tunnels. Whoſe worke this was the tiles there did declare being imprinted with theſe words LEGIO XX. that is, The twentieth Legion, which, as I have ſhewed already before, abode at Cheſter ſcarce ſixe miles a ſide from hence. Bathes or hote waters.

Neere unto this River Alen, in a certaine ſtreight ſet about with woods ſtandeth Coles-hull, Giraldus tearmeth it Carbonarium collem, that is, Coles Hill, where when D King Henry the Second had made preparation with as great care as ever any did, to give Battaile unto the Welſh, the Engliſh by reaſon of their diſordered multitude drawing out their Battalions in their rankes, and not ranged cloſe in good array, loſt the Field and were defeited: yea and the very Kings ſtanderd was forſaken by Henry of Eſſex, who in right of inheritance was Standerd-bearer to the Kings of England. For which cauſe he being afterwards charged with treaſon, and by his challenger overcome in combate, had his goods confiſcate and ſeized into the Kings hands, and he diſpleaſed with himſelfe for his cowardiſe, put on a coule, and became a Monke. Coles-hul.

Another little parcell there is of this Shire on this ſide the River Dee, diſmem-
E bred as it were from this, which the Engliſh call Engliſh Mailor. Of this I treated in the County of Cheſter, whiles I ſpake of Bangor: and there is no reaſon to iterate the ſame heere which hath beene already ſpoken of before. Neither doth it afford any thing in it worth the reporting, unleſſe it be Han-meere, by ae Meres ſide, whereof a right ancient and worſhipfull Family there dwelling, tooke their ſirname. Engliſh Mailor. Ha-meere.

The Earles of Cheſter as they skirmiſhed by occaſions, and advantage of opportunity with the Welſh, were the firſt Normans that brought this Country under their ſubjection, whereupon wee reade in ancient Records. The County of Flint
F appertaineth to the Dignity of the ſword of Cheſter: and the eldeſt ſonnes of the K.K. of England were in old time ſtiled by the Title of Earles of Cheſter and of Flint. But notwithſtanding King Edward the Firſt, ſuppoſing it would bee very commodious both for the maintenance of his owne power and alſo to keepe under the Welſh, held in his owne hands both this and all the ſea Coaſt of Wales. As for the Earles of Cheſter.

The prudent policie of Edward the First.

in-land Countries, he gave them to his Nobles as he thought good: following herein the policie of the Emperour Augustus, who undertooke himselfe to governe the Provinces that were strongest and lay outmost, but permitted Proconsuls by lot to rule the rest. Which he did in shew to defend the Empire, but in very deed to have all the armes and martiall men under his owne command.

In this County of Flint there be Parishes in all. 28.

PRINCES

PRINCES OF WALES.

AS concerning the Princes of Wales of Britiſh bloud in ancient times, you may reade in the Hiſtorie of Wales publiſhed in print: For my part I thinke it requiſite and pertinent to my intended purpoſe to ſet downe ſummarily thoſe of latter daies, deſcended from the Roiall line of England.

King Edward the Firſt, unto whom his Father King Henry the Third had graunted the Principalitie of Wales, when hee had obtained the Crowne, and Lhewellin Ap. Gryffith the laſt Prince of the Britiſh race was ſlaine, and thereby the ſinnewes as it were of the Principalitie were cut: in the twelfth yeere of his Reigne, united the ſame unto the Kingdome of England: And the whole Province ſware fealty and allegeance unto Edward of Caernarvon his Sonne whom he made Prince of Wales. But King Edward the Second conferred not upon his Sonne Edward, the title of Prince of Wales, but onely the name of Earle of Cheſter and of Flint, ſo farre as I ever could learne out of the Records, and by that title ſummoned him to Parliament being then nine yeeres old. King Edward the Third firſt Created his eldeſt Sonne Edward ſurnamed the Blacke Prince the Mirour of Chivalry (being then Duke of Cornwall and Earle of Cheſter) Prince of Wales by ſolemne inveſture, with a cap of eſtate, and Coronet ſet on his head, a gold ring put upon his finger, and a ſilver vierge delivered into his hand, with the aſſent of the Parliament: who in the very floure of his martiall glory was taken away by untimely death too too ſoone, to the univerſall griefe of all England. Afterwards King Edward the Third inveſted with the ſaid honour Richard of Burdeaux the ſaid Princes Sonne, as heire apparent to the Crowne, who was depoſed from his Kingdome by King Henry the Fourth, and having no iſſue was cruelly diſpatched by violent death. The ſaid King Henry the Fourth at the formall requeſt of the Lords and Commons beſtowed this Principalitie with the title of Cheſter and Flint, with ſolemne inveſture, and a kiſſe in full Parliament upon his eldeſt Sonne, who gloriouſly bare the name of King Henry the Fifth. His Sonne King Henry the Sixth who at his Fathers death was an Infant in the cradle, conferred likewiſe this honour which he never had himſelfe, upon his young Sonne Edward, whoſe unhappie fortune it was to have his braines daſhed out cruelly by the faction of Yorke, being taken priſoner at Tewkeſbury field. Not long after King Edward the Fourth having obtained the Crowne created Edward his young Sonne Prince of Wales, who was afterwards in the lineall ſucceſsion of Kings, Edward the Fifth of that name. And within a while after his Unkle King Richard the Third

who made him away, ordained in his roome, Edward his owne Sonne, whom King Edward the Fourth had before made Earle of Salisburie, but he died quickly after. Then King Henrie the Seventh created his eldeſt ſonne Arthur, Prince of Wales, and when he was dead, Henrie, his other Sonne well knowne in the world by the name of King Henrie the Eighth. Every one of theſe had the Principality of Wales given unto them by the foreſaid ſolemne inveſture, and delivery of a Patent, To hold to themſelves and their Heires, Kings of England. For Kings would not bereave themſelves of ſo excellent an occaſion to doe well by their Eldeſt Sonnes, but thought it very good policie by ſo great a benefit to oblige them when they pleaſed. Queene Mary, Queene Elizabeth and King Edward, the Children of King Henrie the Eighth, although they never had inveſture, nor Patent, yet were commonly named in their order Princes of Wales. For, at that time, Wales was by authoritie of 27.H.8. Parliament ſo annexed and united to the Kingdome of England, that both of them were governed vnder the ſame Law: or, that you may reade it abridged out of the Act of Parliament. The Kings Country
"or dominion of Wales ſhall ſtand and continue for ever incorporated,
"united, and annexed, to and with the Realme of England and all and ſingular perſon and perſons borne and to be borne in the ſaid Principalitie, Country, or Dominion of Wales, ſhall have, enioy, and inherit all
"and ſingular freedomes, liberties, rights, priviledges, and Lawes, within "this Realme, and other the Kings Dominions, as other the Kings Subiects naturally borne within the ſame, have, enioy, and inherit: and the "Lawes, Ordinances, and Statutes of the Realme of England for ever,
"and none other ſhall he had, uſed, practiſed, and executed in the ſaid
"Country, or Dominion of Wales, and every part thereof, in like manner, forme, and order, as they be and ſhall be in this Realme, and in ſuch
"like manner and forme, as heereafter ſhall be further eſtabliſhed and ordained. This Act, and the calme command of King Henrie the Seventh preparing way for it, effected that in a ſhort time, which the violent power of other Kings armes, and eſpecially of Henrie the Fourth with extreame rigour alſo of Lawes, could not draw on in many yeeres. For ever ſithence the Britiſh Nation hath continued as faithfully and dutifully in their Loyall Allegiance to the Crowne of England, as any other part of the Realme whatſoever. Now am I to returne out of Wales into England, and muſt goe unto the Brigantes.

BRIGANTES.

BRITAINE, which hitherto hath, as it were, launched out with huge Promontories, looking on the one side toward Germanie, on the other side toward Ireland, now as if it were afraid of the Sea violently inrushing upon it withdraweth it selfe farther in, and by making larger separations of lands retireth backe, gathered into a farre narrower breadth. For, it is not past one hundred miles broad from coast to coast, which on both sides passe on in a maner with straight and direct shores Northward, as farre as to Scotland. All this part well neere of the Island, while the Romane Empire stood upright and flourished in Britaine, was inhabited by the BRIGANTES. For, Plinie writeth, that they dwelt from the East Sea to the West. A nation this was right valiant, populous withall, and of especiall note among ancient Authors, who all doe name them, BRIGANTES, unlesse it be Stephanus onely, in his booke Of Cities; who called them BRIGAE: in which place, that which he wrote of them is defective at this day in the bookes, by reason that the sentence is imperfect. If I should thinke that these were called Brigantes, of Briga, which in the ancient Spanish tongue signified A Citie, I should not satisfie my selfe; seeing it appeareth for certaine out of Strabo, that it is a meere Spanish word. If I were of opinion with Goropius that out of the Low Dutch tongue, they were termed Brigantes, as one would say Free-hands, should I not obtrude upon you his dreames for dainties? Howsoever the case standeth, our Britanes, or Welsh-men, if they see any of a bad disposition, and audaciously playing lawlesse and lewde parts, use to say of them by way of a common merry quippe, Wharret Brigans, that is, They play the Brigants. And the French-men at this day, alluding as it seemeth to the ancient language of the Gaules, usually terme such lewde fellowes Brigans like as Pirats Ships, Brigantins. But whether the force of the word was such in old time in the Gaules or Britanes language, or whether our Brigantes were such like men, I dare not determine. Yet, if my memory faile me not, Strabo calleth the Brigantes (a people about Alpes) Grassatores, that is, Robbers, and Julius a Belgian a young man of desperate boldnesse, who counted power, authority, honestie, and vertue to be nothing but naked names, is in Tacitus surnamed Briganticus. With which kinde of vice, our old Brigantes may seeme to have been tainted, when they so robbed and spoiled the neighbour inhabitants, that the Emperour Antoninus Pius for this cause tooke away a great part of their Country from them,

Brigantes whereof they tooke name.

See Pasquier in Les Recherches de France. lib. 6. cap. 40.

them, as Pausanias witnesseth, who writeth thus of them: Ἀντωνῖνος δὲ Ἀντωνεῖνος ὁ Εὐσεβὴς τῶν ἐν Βρεττανίᾳ Βρεττάνων τῷ στόλῳ, ὅτι ἐπεβούλευσαν ἐς τὴν σφῶν τοῖς Ἕλλησιν ἐξεῖναι καὶ Γερμανίαν μέρη ὑπήκοα ἀφελέσθαι· that is, Antoninus Pius cut the Brigantes in Britaine short, of a great part of their Country, because they began to take armes and in hostile maner to invade Genunia, a Region subject to the Romanes. Neither will any, I hope, take this as a reproach: Surely I should seeme farre unlike my selfe, if I fell now to taxe ignominiously any private person, much lesse a Nation. Neither was this counted a reproachfull imputation in that warlike age, when all Nations reckoned that their right, which they could winne, or hold by might and dint of sword. Roberies, saith Cæsar, among the Germans are not noted with infamie, such I meane as are committed without the borders of every State, and they allow the practise thereof to exercise their youth withall, and to keepe them from idlenesse. And for a reason not unlike, the Pæones, among the Greekes are so called, quia Percussores, that is, because they were cutters: The Quadi among the Germans, and the Chaldæi likewise, are reported to have gotten those names, because they used to robbe and kill.

Reinerus Reineccius.

Now, in that Florianus Del-Campe, a Spaniard, hath with too much affectation derived our Brigantes from Spaine into Ireland, and from thence into Britaine, grounding upon no other conjecture, but that he found the Citie Brigantia in his owne country Spaine; he hath I feare me, swarved from the truth. For in case our Brigantes and those in Ireland had not the same name both for one cause, I had rather with my friend, the right learned Thomas Savil judge, that as well diuers of our Brigantes, as also other nations of Britaine, from the first comming of the Romanes hither, departed into Ireland, some for desire of quietnesse and ease; others, that the Lordly dominion of the Romanes might not be an eye-sore unto them: and others againe, because they would not by their good will loose that libertie in their old age, which by nature they were endowed with in their childhood. But that Claudius the Emperour was the first of all the Romanes who set upon these our Brigantes, and brought them under the Romane dominion, Seneca in his Play sheweth by these verses:

Yet are they in Ireland called Brigantes in some Copies.

Ille Britannos
Ultra noti littora Ponti & cærueleos
Scuta Brigantes, dare Romulæis colla catenis Jussit, & ipsum nova Romanæ jura securis Tremere Oceanum.

The Brigants such as seated are beyond the knowne Sea-coast,
And Brigants with blew painted shields, he forced with his boast,
To yeeld their necks in Romane chaines, as captive to be led;
And even the Ocean this new power of Romane-ax to dred.

And yet I have been of this minde, that they were not then conquered, but committed themselves rather into the tuition and protection of the Romanes. For, that which he Poetically endited, the Historiographers doe not mention.

And

A And Tacitus recordeth how by occasion at that time of certaine discords risen among the Brigantes, Ostorius who now made preparation for new warres, was hindered and pulled backe, which he with the execution of a few, easily appeased. At which time, the Brigantes had Cartismandua, a right noble and puissant Lady for their Queene, who intercepted Caratacus, and delivered him into the Romanes hands. Hereupon ensued wealth of wealth and prosperitie, riotous and incontinent life: in so much, as forsaking her Husband Venutius his bed, she joyned her selfe in marriage with Vellocatus his Esquire, and made
B him King. Which foule fact was the overthrow shortly after of her house, and thereby a bloudy and mortall warre was enkindled. The love and affection of the Country went generally with the lawfull Husband, but the Queenes untemperate lust and cruelty were peremptory, in maintaining the adulterer. She, by craftie plots and mischievous meanes intercepteth the Brother and kinsfolke of Venutius. Venutius againe for his part pricked forward with shamefull disgrace, by the helpe of friends whom he procured, and the rebellion withall of the Brigantes themselves, brought Cartismandua into great extremities. Then, Cartismandua. Tacitus.
C upon her instant unto the Romanes for aide, Garisons were set, Cohorts and wings of foot and horse were sent, which after sundry skirmishes with variable event delivered her person out of perill: yet so, as that the Kingdome remained to Venutius, and the warre with the Romanes: who were not able to subdue the Brigantes before the time of Vespasian. For, then Petilius Cerealis having invaded this Country, fought many battailes, and some of them very bloudy: and either conquered, or else wasted a great part of the Brigantes: Whereas Tacitus writeth, that this Queene of the Brigantes delivered Caratacus
D prisoner unto Claudius the Emperor, there is in that excellent author a manifest ἀνηκεστιαμὸς, and the same noted a good while since by Iustus Lipsius deepely insighted in understanding old authors. For, neither was this Caratacus Prince of the Silures and Ordevices led in pompe at that triumph of Claudius, nor yet Caratacus the Sonne of Cunobelinus (for so is he called in the Romane Fasti, whom Dio nameth Catacratus.) Of whom Aulus Plautius, if not in the very same yeere, yet in the next following triumphed by way of E Ovation. But let others sift out these matters, and thereof I have already said somewhat. In the Emperour Hadrians time, when, as Ælius Spartianus saith, The Britaines could not be contained under the Romanes dominion, it may seeme that these our Brigantes revolted from the Romanes and made a turbulent insurrection. For, had it not been so, there was no cause why Juvenall who then lived should thus write.

* The putting of one time for another.

Neither

Neither afterward in the time of Antoninus Pius, was their courage, as it may seeme, very much abated, when he tooke away part of their territories from them, because they had made rodes, as I have said before, into Genunia, or Guinethia, a Province confederate with the Romanes. A

If I durst by our Critickes good leave (who in these daies presuming so much of their great wits are supercriticall) me thinks, I could heere cleare Tacitus of a fault or two, which sitteth close to him, as concerning the Brigantes. The one is in the twelfth Booke of his Annales, where I would reade, (for Venutius out of the State of the Iugantes) out of the State of the Brigantes: B which Tacitus himselfe seemeth to insinuate in the third Booke of his Histories. The other, in the life of Agricola. The Brigantes, saith he, under the leading of a Woman, burnt the Colonie, &c. Where truth would have you reade, The Trinobantes. For he speaketh of Queene Boadicia, who had nothing to doe with the Brigantes. But, the Trinobantes, *she stirred indeede to rebellion, and burnt the Colonie Camalodunum.

A place in Tacitus corrected.

*Malden.

But, this Country of theirs so exceeding large, which the further it goeth the narrower it waxeth, riseth on high in the mids with continued ridges and edges of hils, (as Italie is raised up with Apenninus) which make a partition betweene those Counties into which it is now divided. For, beneath those hilles toward the East and the German Sea, lieth Yorke-shire, and the Bishopricke of Duresme; and on the West side, Lancashire, Westmorland, and Cumberland, all which Countries in the first infancy of the English-Saxons Empire, were contained within the Kingdome of the Deiri. For, they call these Countries, the Kingdome of the Nordanhumbers, and divided them in two parts; Deira, called in that age Deirlanð, which is neerer unto us and on this side Tine; and Bernicia, which lying beyond Tine, reached as farre as Edenborrough Frith in Scotland: which parts although they had their severall Kings for a long time, yet at length grew all to bee one Kingdome. And, that I may note this one thing by the way, whereas in the life of Charles the Great it is read thus, Eardulph King of the Nordanhumbers, that is, De-Irland, being driven out of his Country unto Charles the Great, &c. Wee must reade ioyntly, Dierland, and understand the place of this Country, and not of Ireland, as some have misconceived. C D

YORKE-SHIRE.

THE County of YORKE, in the Saxon Tongue Eueppic-ſcýne, Eſſpoc-ſcýne, and Eboꝛa-ſcýne, commonly YORKE-SHIRE, the greateſt Shire by farre, of all England, is thought to bee in a temperate meaſure fruitfull. If in one place there bee ſtony and ſandy barraine ground, in another place there are for it Corne-fields as rich and fruitfull: if it bee voide and deſtitute of Woods heere, you ſhall finde it ſhadowed there with moſt thicke Foreſts: ſo providently uſeth Nature ſuch a temperature, that the whole Countrey may ſeeme by reaſon alſo of that variety more gracefull and delectable. Where it bendeth Weſtward, it is bounded with the Hilles, I ſpake of, from Lancaſhire and Weſtmorland.

On the North ſide it hath the Biſhopricke of Durham, which the River Tees with a continued courſe ſeparateth from it. On the Eaſt ſide the Germaine Sea lieth ſore upon it: and the South ſide is encloſed firſt with Cheſhire and Darby-ſhire, then with Nottingham-ſhire, and after, with Lincoln-ſhire, where that famous arme of the Sea Humber floweth betweene, into which all the Rivers well neere that water this ſhire empty themſelves, as it were, into their common receptacle. Humber.

This whole Shire is divided into three parts: which according to three Quarters of the world are called The Weſt-Riding, The Eaſt-Riding, and The North-Riding. Weſt-Riding, for a good while is compaſſed in with the River * Ouſe, with the bound of Lancaſhire, and with the South limits of the ſhire, and beareth toward the Weſt and South. Eaſt-Riding, looketh to the Sunne-riſing and the Ocean, which together with the River Derwent encloſeth it. North-Riding reacheth Northward, hemmed in, as it were, with the River Tees with Derwent and a long race of the River Ouſe. In that Weſt part, out of the Weſterne Mountaines or Hilles in the Confines, iſſue many Rivers which Ouſe alone entertaineth every one, and carryeth them all with him unto Humber. Neither can I ſee any fitter way to deſcribe this part, than to follow the ſtreames of Done, Calder, Are, Wherſe, Nid and Ouſe, which ſpringing out of theſe Hilles, are the Rivers of moſt account, and runne by places likewiſe of greateſt importance. * Firſt called Ure and Your. Weſt Riding.

The River Danus, commonly called Don, and Dune, ſo termed, as it ſhould ſeeme for that it is carried in a chanell ſomewhat flat, ſhallow and low by the ground (for ſo much ſignifieth Dan in the Britiſh language) after it hath ſaluted Wortley, which gave ſirname to a worſhipfull Family, as alſo Wentworth hard by, whence beſide other Gentlemen as well in this Country, as elſewhere, the Barons of Wentworth have derived both their originall and name; runneth firſt by Sheafield a Towne of great name (like as other ſmall Townes adjoyning) for the Smithes therein (conſidering there bee many iron Mines thereabout) fortified alſo with a ſtrong and ancient Caſtle, which in right line deſcended from the Lovetoſts, the Lords Furnivall, and Thomas Lord Nevill of Furnivall, unto the Talbots, Earles of Shrewesbury. From thence Don clad with alders, and other trees goeth to Rotheram, which glorieth in Thomas Rotheram ſometime Archbiſhop of Yorke, a wiſe man, bearing the name of the Towne, being borne therein, and a ſingular benefactor thereunto, who founded and endowed there a College with three Schooles in it to teach children writing, Grammar, and Muſicke, which the greedy iniquity of theſe our times hath already ſwallowed. The river Don. Wortley. Wentworth. Sheafield. Furnivall. Rotheram.

Then looketh it up to Connisborrow or Conines-borrough an ancient Caſtle, in the Britiſh tongue Caer Conan, ſeated upon a Rocke, into which, what time as Aurelius Ambroſius had ſo diſcomfited and ſcattered the Engliſh Saxons at Maisbelly, that Connis-borrow. Florilegus. 487.

they tooke them to their heeles, and fled every man the next way hee could finde, Hengeſt their Captaine retired himſelfe for ſafety: and few daies after brought his men forth to battaile before the Captaine againſt the Britans that purſued him, where hee fought a bloudy field to him and his: For, a great number of men were there cut in peeces: and the Britans having intercepted him, chopt off his head, if wee may beleeve the Britiſh Hiſtory rather than the Engliſh-Saxon Chronicles, which report that he being outworne with travell and labour, died in peace. But this Coningsborough in latter ages was the poſſeſſion of the Earles of Warren. Afterwards, hee runneth under Sprotburg the ancient ſeat of that ancient family of the Fitz-Williams Knights, who are moſt honourably allied and of kin to the nobleſt houſes of England, and from whom deſcended Sir William Fitz-Williams Earle of Southampton, in our fathers remembrance, and Sir William Fitz-Williams late Lord Deputy of Ireland. But in proceſſe of time this is fallen to the Copleys, like as Elmeſly with other poſſeſſions of theirs in this Tract, are come by right of inheritance to the Savils.

The Family of Fitz-Williams.

From hence Done running with a divided ſtreame hard to an old towne, giveth it his owne name, which we at this day call Dan-caſtre, the Scots Don-Caſtle, the Saxons Dona-ceaſtep, Ninius, Caer Daun, but Antonine the Emperour DANUM, like as the booke of Notices: which hath recorded that the Captaine of the Criſpinian Horſemen, lay there in Gariſon under the Generall of Britaine. This about the yeere of our Lord 759. was ſo burnt with fire from heaven, and lay ſo buried under the owne ruines, that it could ſcarce breath againe. A large plot it ſheweth yet, where a Citadell ſtood, which men thinke was then conſumed with fire: in which place I ſaw the Church of S. Georges, a faire Church, and the onely Church they have in the Towne.

Dan-caſtre.

Beneath this Towne Southward ſcarce five miles off is Tickhill, which I am not willing to omit, an old towne, fenſed with as old a Caſtle, large enough, but having onely a ſingle Wall about it, and with an high Mount whereon ſtandeth a round Keepe. It carryed in old time ſuch a Dignity with it, that the Manours and Lords belonging thereto were called The Honour of Tickhill. In the Raigne of Henry the Firſt Roger Buſly held the poſſeſſion thereof: Afterwards the Earles of Ewe in Normandy were long ſince Lords of it by the gift of King Stephen. Then King Richard the Firſt gave it unto John his brother. In the Barons Warre Robert de Vipont detei-ned it for himſelfe, which that hee ſhould deliver unto the Earle of Ewe, King Henry the Third put into his hands, the Caſtle of Carleol, and the County. But when the King of France would not reſtore unto the Engliſh againe their poſſeſſions in France, the King of England retained it unto himſelfe, when as John Earle of Ewe in the right of Alice his great Grandmother claimed of King Edward the Firſt reſtitution thereof. At length Richard the Second King of England liberally gave it unto John of Gaunt Duke of Lancaſter.

Plac. anno. 3. Joan. Reg. Pl. M. 4. H. 3.

But now by this time Done that often riſeth heere and overfloweth the fields, gathering his divided waters into one ſtreame againe, when he hath for a while runne in one Chanell through Hatfeld Chace (where there is great game and hunting of red Deere) being divided eſt-ſoone, ſpeedeth himſelfe on the one hand to Idel a River in Nottingham-ſhire, on the other to Are, that hee and they together may fall into Humber. In which very place there are environed with theſe rivers Diche-march and Marſhland, little Merſh Countries or River-Iſlands rather, taking up in circuit much about fifteene miles, moſt plentifull of greene graſſe, paſſing good for feeding of Cattaile, and on every ſide garniſhed, as it were, with prety Townes. Yet ſome of the Inhabitants are of opinion, that the land there, is hollow and hanging, yea and that, as the waters riſe, the ſame alſo is heaved up: a thing that Pomponius Mela hath written concerning Antrum an Iſle in France.

Calder afterward among the very Hilles leaveth on the left hand Halifax a moſt famous Towne, lying from Weſt to Eaſt upon the ſteepe deſcent of an Hill. And F not many ages ſince, tooke it this name; whereas before time it was called Horton, as ſome of the Inhabitants doe report, who tell this prety ſtory alſo, touching the alteration of the name. Halifax. Some would have it to be called aforetime, the Chappell in the Grove.

A certaine Clerke, as they call him, was farre in love with a maiden who when hee might not have his purpoſe of her, for all the faire meanes and enticements hee could uſe, his love being turned unto rage (vilanous Wretch that hee was) cut off the Maides head; which being hung afterwards upon an Eugh tree, the common people counted as an hallowed Relique, untill it was rotten, yea and they came devoutly to viſit it, and every one gathered and carryed away with him a branch or ſprig of the ſaid tree. But after the tree was bare and nothing left but the very ſtocke (ſuch was the credulity of that time) it maintained the opinion of reverence and Religion ſtill. For, the people were perſwaded, that the little veines that are ſtretched out and ſpred betweene the barke and body of the Eugh tree in manner of haires or fine threads, were the very haires indeed of the Virgins head. Hereupon they that dwelt thereabout repaired on Pilgrimage hither, and ſuch reſort there was unto it, that Horton being but a little Village before, grew up to a great Towne, and was called by a new name Halig-Fax, or Hali-fex, that is, Holy haire. For, the Engliſhmen dwelling beyond Trent, called the haire of the head Fax. Whence alſo there is a Family in this Country, of Gentlemen, named Faire-fax, of the faire buſh of their haire. They therefore, which by reſemblance of the name gather this to bee Ptolomees Olicana, bee farre deceived. Now this place is become famous as well among the multitude by reaſon of a Law there, whereby they behead ſtreightwaies whoſoever are taken ſtealing: as alſo amongſt the learned: for they report that Joannes de Sacro Boſco the Author of the Sphære, was here borne: yet more famous it is, for the greatneſſe of the Pariſh, which reckoneth in it eleven Chappels; whereof two, be Pariſh-Chappels, and to the number of twelve thouſand people therein. So that the Inhabitants are wont to give out, that this Pariſh of theirs maintaineth more men and women, than other living creatures of what kinde ſoever. Whereas you ſhall ſee elſewhere in England, in the moſt fruitfull and fertile places, many thouſands of Sheepe, and very few men, as if folke had given place to flockes of Sheepe, and heards of Neat, or elſe were devoured of them. Moreover, the induſtry of the Inhabitants heere is admirable, who in a barraine Soile, wherein there is no commodious, nay ſcarce any dwelling and living at all, have ſo come up and flouriſhed by Clothing (a trade which they tooke to not above threeſcore and tenne yeeres agoe at the fartheſt) that they greatly enrich their owne eſtates, and winne the praiſe from all their neighbours: yea, and have proved the ſaying to be true, That barraine places give a good edge to induſtrie: and that hence it is, that Norinberg in Germanie, Venice and Genua in Italie, and Limoges in France, ſituate all in barraine places are become right flouriſhing Cities. Six miles from hence and not farre from the right ſide of the River Calder, neere unto Almond-bury a little Towne, ſtanding upon an high and ſteepe Hill which hath no eaſie paſſage on even ground unto it but of one ſide, are ſeene the manifeſt tokens of a Rampire, ſome ruines of walles and of a Caſtle, which was guarded about with a triple ſtrength of Forts and Bulwarkes. Some will have this alſo to have beene OLICANA: But the trueth ſaith otherwiſe, and namely that it is CAMBODUNUM, which Ptolomee calleth amiſſe CAMULODUNUM, and Beda by a word divided CAMPO-DUNUM.

Almond-bury.

Cambodunum.

This is prooved by the diſtance thereof, on the one ſide from MANCUNIUM, on the other from CALCARIA, according to which Antonine placeth it. Moreover, it ſeemeth to have flouriſhed in very great honour, when the Engliſh Saxons firſt beganne to rule. For, the Kings Towne it was, and had in it a Cathedrall Church built by Paulinus the Apoſtle of theſe parts, and the ſame dedicated to Saint Alban: whence in ſtead of Albon-bury, it is now called Almon-bury. But when Ceadwall the Britan and Penda the Mercian made ſharpe warre upon Edwin the Prince of theſe Countries, it was ſet on fire by the enemy, as Beda writeth, which the very aduſt and burnt colour as yet remaining upon the ſtones doth teſtifie. Yet afterwards there was a Caſtle built in the ſame place, which King Stephen, as I have read, confirmed unto Henry Lacy.

Calder now leaving theſe places behinde him, and having paſſed by Kirkley an houſe in times paſt of religious Nunnes; and the Tombe of Robin Hood that right good and honeſt Robber (in which regard he is ſo much ſpoken of) goeth to Dewſborrough ſeated under an high Hill. Whether it had the name of DVI that tutelar God of the place, of whom I wrote a little before, I am not able to ſay: Surely the name is not unlike, for it ſoundeth as much as Duis Burgh, and flouriſhed at the B very firſt infancy, as it were, of the Church ſpringing up amongſt the Engliſhmen in this Province: for, I have heard, that there ſtood a Croſſe heere with this Inſcription. D And that this Paulinus was the firſt Archbiſhop of Yorke, about the yeere of our Redemption 626. all Chronicles doe accord. From hence Calder running by Thornhill (which from Knights of that ſirname is deſcended to the Savills) paſſeth hard by Wakefield a Towne famous for clothing, for greatneſſe, for faire building, a well frequented Mercate, and a Bridge: upon which King Edward the Fourth erected a beautifull Chappell, in memoriall of thoſe that loſt their lives there in battaile. The Poſſeſſion ſometime this was of the Earles of Warren and of Surry, as alſo Sandall Caſtle adjoyning, which John Earle of Warren (who was alwaies fleſhly luſtfull) built, when he had uſed the wife of Thomas Earle of Lancaſter more familiarly than honeſty would require, to the end he might deteine and keepe her in it ſecurely, from her Husband. By this Townes ſide, when the civill warre was hote heere, 1460. E in England and ſetled in the very bowels thereof, Richard Duke of Yorke, father to King Edward the Fourth (who choſe rather to hazard his fortune: than to ſtay the good time thereof) was ſlaine in the field by thoſe that tooke part with the Houſe of Lancaſter. The Tract lying heere round about for a great way together, is called The Seigniory or Lordſhip of Wakefield, and hath alwaies for the Seneſchall or Steward one of the better ſort of Gentlemen dwelling thereby. Which Office the Savills have oftentimes borne, who are heere a very great and numerous Family, and at this day Sir John Savill Knight beareth it, who hath a very ſightly faire houſe not farre off at Howley, which maketh a goodly ſhew. Calder is gone ſcarce five miles farther, when he betaketh both his water and his name alſo to the River Are. Where, at their F very meeting together ſtandeth betweene them Medley, in times paſt Mede-ley, ſo called for the ſituation, as it were, in the middeſt betweene two Rivers. The ſeat it was in the age aforegoing, of Sir Robert Waterton Maſter of the Horſe to King Henry the Fourth, but now of Sir John Savill a right worſhipfull Knight, and a moſt worthy Baron of the Kings Exchequer, whom I acknowledge full gladly in Wakefield. It is ſo calme, and milde, and carryeth ſo gentle and ſlow a ſtreame, that it ſeemeth not to runne at all but to ſtand ſtill, whence I ſuppoſe it tooke the name. For, as I have ſaid before, Ara in the Britiſh tongue betokeneth Milde, Still, and Slow; whereupon that ſlow Ri-

Craven. River, is called in our tongue Craven, perchance of the Britiſh word Crage, that is, B a Stone. For, the whole Tract there, is rough all over and unpleaſant to ſee to, with craggy ſtones, hanging rockes, and rugged waies: in the middeſt whereof, as Skipton. it were in a lurking hole, not farre from Are, ſtandeth Skipton: and lyeth hidden and Latium. encloſed among ſteepe Hilles, in like manner as Latium in Italie, which Varro ſuppoſeth to have beene ſo called, becauſe it lyeth cloſe under Apennine and the Alpes. The Towne (for the manner of their building among theſe Hilles) is faire enough, and hath a very proper and a ſtrong Caſtle, which Robert de Rumeley built, by whoſe poſterity it came by inheritance to the Earles of Aumarle. And when their inheritance for default of heires fell by eſcheat into the Kings hands, Robert de Clifford, whoſe heires are now Earles of Cumberland, by way of exchange obtained of C
King Edward the Second both this Caſtle, and alſo faire lands round about it every way, delivering into the Kings hands in lieu of the ſame, the poſſeſſions that he had in the Marches of Wales.

favour, and I note it once for all, that we may ſee, what Free Warren was. But the male iſſue of this Family in the right line ended in Henry Kigheley of Inskip. Howbeit, the daughters and heires were wedded to William Cavendiſh, now Baron Cavendiſh of Hardwick, and to Thomas Worſeley of Boothes. From hence Are paſſeth beſide Kirkſtall, an Abbay in times paſt of no ſmall reckoning, founded by Henry Lacy, in the Leeder. yeere 1147. and at length viſiteth Leedes, in the Saxon tongue Loyder, which became a houſe of the Kings, when CAMBODUNUM was by the enemy burnt to the ground: now a rich Towne by reaſon of clothing, where Oſwy king of Northumberland put to flight Penda the Mercian: And, as Bede ſaith, this was to the great profit of both Nations: for he both delivered his owne people from the hoſtile ſpoiling of the miſ- E

Winwidfield. place wherein they joyned battaile, the writers call Winwidfield, which name I ſuppoſe was given it of the Victory: like as a place in Weſtphalia, where Quintilius Varus with his legions was ſlaine, is in the Dutch tongue called Winfield, that is, The fields of victory, as that moſt learned man and my very good friend Abraham Ortelius hath obſerved. The little Region or Territory about it, was in times paſt by an old

Calx viva. Herein is digged limeſtone every where, which is burnt at Brotherton, and Knottingley, and at certaine ſet times, as it were, at Faires, a mighty quantity thereof is conveied to Wakefield, Sandall, and Stanbridge: and ſo is ſold unto this Weſterne Country F which is hilly and ſomewhat cold, for to manure and enrich their Corne fields. But let us leave theſe things to Husbandmen: as for my ſelfe I profeſſe my ignorance therein, and will goe forward as I beganne.

A At length Are entertaineth Calder aforeſaid with his water as his Gueſt, where neere unto the meeting of both Rivers, ſtandeth Caſtleford a little Village, Marianus nameth it Caſterford: who reporteth, that the Citizens of Yorke ſlew many of king Ethelreds Army there, whom in their purſuite they ſet upon and charged heere and there at advantages; what time as hee invaded and overranne this Country for breaking the allegeance they had ſworne unto him. But in Antonine, this place is called by a more ancient name LEGEOLIUM and LAGETIUM: Wherein beſide expreſſe and notable tokens of Antiquity, a mighty number of Roman pee-
B ces of money (the common people there tearme them, Saraſins head) were found at Beanfield (a place ſo called now of Beanes) hard by the Church: The diſtance alſo from DAN and YORKE, betweene which he placed it, doth moſt cleerely confirme as much: to ſay nothing of the ſituation thereof hard by the Romanes High Street, and laſt of all for that Roger Hoveden in plaine tearmes calleth it A City.

Caſtleford.

Legeolium.

From hence Are being now bigger, after it hath received Calder unto it, leaveth on the left hand Brotherton a little Towne; in which Queene Margaret, turning thither out of the way as ſhe road on hunting, was delivered of childe, and brought forth unto her Husband king Edward the Firſt, Thomas de Brotherton, ſo named of the place, who was afterward Earle of Norfolke, and Mareſhall of England. And not farre beneath, Are after it hath received into it Dan, looſeth himſelfe in Ouſe. On the right hand, where a yellower kinde of marke is found, which being caſt and ſpred up-
C on the fields maketh them beare Corne for many yeeres together, he paſſeth by Pontfract, commonly called Pontfret, ſituate not farre from the river banke, which Towne gat life, as it were, by the death of old Legeolium. In the Saxons time it was called Kirkby, but the Normans of a broken Bridge named it in French Pontfract. Upon this occaſion, it is commonly thought, that the wooden Bridge over Are hard by, was broken, when a mighty multitude of people accompanied William Archbiſhop of Yorke (King Stephens ſiſters ſonne) newly returned from Rome. Whereby a great number fell into the River, and yet by reaſon that the Archbiſhop ſhed many a teare at this accident, and called upon God for helpe: there was not one of them that periſhed. Seated it is in a very pleaſant place, that bringeth forth Liquirice and D skirworts in great plenty, adorned alſo with faire buildings, and hath to ſhew a ſtately Caſtle as a man ſhall ſee, ſituate upon a rocke no leſſe goodly to the eye, than ſafe for the defence, well fortified with ditches and bulwarkes. Hildebert Lacy a Norman, unto whom king William the Firſt, after that Alricke the Saxon was thruſt out, had given this Towne with the land about it, firſt built this Caſtle. But Henry Lacy his nephew, came into the field at the battaile of Trenchbrey (I ſpeake out of the Pleas againſt King Henry the Firſt: wherefore hee was diſſeiſed of the Barony of Pontfract, and the King gave the Honour to Wido de Laval, who held it untill King Stephens dayes: at which time, the ſaid Henry made an entry into the Barony, and by mediation of the King compounded with Wido, for an hundred and fifty pounds. This Henry had a ſonne na-
E med Robert; who having no iſſue, left Albreda Lizours his ſiſter by the mothers ſide, and not by the father, to bee his heire, becauſe hee had none other ſo neere in bloud unto him: whereby ſhee, after Roberts death, kept both inheritances in her hand, namely of her brother Lacies, and her father Lizours. And theſe be the very words of the booke of the Monaſtery of Stanlow. This Albreda, was marryed to Richard Fitz Euſtach, Conſtable of Cheſter, whoſe Heires aſſumed unto them the name of Lacies, and flouriſhed under the title of Earles of Lincolne. By a daughter of the laſt of theſe Lacies, this goodly inheritance by a deede of conveyance was devolved in the end to the Earles of Lancaſter, who enlarged the Caſtle very much, and Queene Elizabeth likewiſe beſtowed great coſt in repairing it, and beganne to build a faire Chappell.

F This place hath beene infamous for the murder and bloudſhed of Princes: For, Thomas Earle of Lancaſter, the firſt of Lancaſtrian Houſe that in right of his wife poſſeſſed it, ſtained and embrewed the ſame with his owne bloud. For, King Edward the Second to free himſelfe from rebellion and contempt ſhewed upon him a good example of wholſome ſeverity, and beheaded him heere. Whom notwithſtanding ſtanding the common people enrolled in the Beadroll of Saints. Heere alſo was that Richard the Second King of England; whom King Henry the Fourth depoſed from his Kingdome with hunger, cold, and ſtrange kindes of torments, moſt wickedly made away. And heere King Richard the Third cauſed Antonie Earle Rivers, King Edward the Fifth his Unkle by the mothers ſide, and Sir Richard Grey knight, halfe brother to the ſame King by the mothers ſide, both innocent perſons, to looſe their heads. For the Uſurper feared, leaſt thoſe courageous and reſolute men would ſtop his paſſage, aſpiring as he did by wicked meanes to the Crowne; As for the Abbay, which the Lacies heere founded for religious perſons, and the Hoſpitall which Sir Robert Knolles erected for poore people, I let paſſe wittingly, ſeeing there is ſcarce any rubbiſh now remaining of thoſe good workes.

From LEGEOLIUM or Caſtleford aboveſaid, leaving behinde us Shirburne, a little Towne but well inhabited, which tooke name of the cleere bourne or Riveret, and which King Athelſtane graunted unto the Archbiſhops of Yorke, by the high ridge or Port way raiſed up of a great heigth, we came to Aberford, a little Village ſituate upon the ſaid way, famous onely for making of pinnes, which by womens judgement are eſpecially commended as the beſt. Under this the little River Coc (in bookes, named Cokarus) runneth, and in the deſcent downe thereunto, the foundations of an old Caſtle, which they call Caſtle Cary, are to be ſeene. Scarce two miles from hence, at the ſpring head of Coc, ſtandeth Barwic in Elmet the royall houſe or ſeat, by report, in times paſt of the kings of Northumberland, which was environed about with walles, as the very ruines and ruble thereof ſeeme to teſtifie. On the other ſide is placed Heſſelwood the principall ſeat of that worthy and right ancient family of the Vavaſours, who by their Office (for the kings Valvaſors in times paſt they were) tooke to them this name: and in the latter daies of King Edward the Firſt Sir William Vavaſor was called among other Barons of the Realme unto the high Court of Parliament, as appeareth in the very Writs, as they call them, of Summons. Under this place lieth that moſt famous delfe or quarry of ſtone, called Peters poſt, for that with the ſtones hewed out of it, by the liberall grant of the Vavaſors, that ſtately and ſumptuous Church of Sant Peters at Yorke was reedified.

From Aberford the ſaid Riveret Coc ſpeedeth immediately to the River Wherf, as it were, ſad, ſorrowfull, and with heavie cheere, in deteſtation of all civill warres, ſince time that he ranne all died with Engliſh bloud. For, upon his banke neere unto Towton a little country Village, was (as I may truely ſay) that our Engliſh Pharſalia. In no place ever ſaw our England ſuch puiſſant forces, ſo much Gentry and Nobility together: an hundred thouſand fighting men, and no fewer, of the one ſide and the other: Never were there leaders and Captaines on both parts more fierce, hardy, and reſolute, never more cheerefull and forward to fight; who upon Palme Sunday, in the yeere 1461. in battaile array with banner diſplaied, entred the field and encountred. And when they had continued a doubtfull and variable fight a great part of the day, at length the Lancaſtrians not able to abide any longer the violence of their enemies (the chiefe cauſe of whoſe overthrow was the diſordered unwealdineſſe of their owne Army) turned backe and fled amaine: And thoſe that tooke part with Yorke, being eager upon execution, followed them in chaſe ſo hotely, that they had the killing of a number of Noblemen and Gentlemen, and thirty thouſand Engliſhmen were that day left dead in the field. But I leave this to the Hiſtorians. Somewhat lower, neere unto Shirburne, at Huddleſton a little Village, is a famous ſtone quarry, out of which the ſtones when they are newly hewen be very ſoft, but after they bee ſeaſoned with winde and weather, they become of themſelves exceeding ſolid and hard. But (to returne) Coc making no long courſe ſheadeth himſelfe into Wherf.

The River Wherf.

This Wherf or Wharf, in the Engliſh Saxons language Guerp, commeth downe out of Craven, and for a great while runneth in a parallell diſtance even with Are. If a man ſhould thinke the name to bee wreſted from the word Guer, which in Britiſh ſignifieth Swift and violent, verily, the nature of that River concurreth with his opinion;

A nion; For, he runneth with a ſwift and ſpeedy ſtreame, making a great noiſe as hee goeth, as if he were froward, ſtubborne and angry; and is made more fell and teaſty with a number of ſtones lying in his chanell, which he rolleth and tumbleth before him in ſuch ſort that it is a wonder to ſee the manner of it, but eſpecially when hee ſwelleth high in Winter. And verily it is a troubleſome River and dangerous even in Summer time alſo, which I my ſelfe had experience of, not without ſome perill of mine owne, when I firſt travailed over this Country. For, it hath ſuch ſlippery ſtones in it, that an horſe can have no ſure footing on them, or elſe the violence of the water carryeth them away from under his feete. In all his long courſe which from the ſpring head unto Ouſe is almoſt fifty miles, he paſſeth onely by little Townes
B of no eſpeciall account: running downe by Kilneſey Crugge, the higheſt and ſteepeſt rocke that ever I ſaw in a midland Country by Burnſall, where Sir William Craven Knight and Alderman of London there borne, is now building of a Stone bridge: who alſo hard by, of a pious minde and beneficiall to his Country hath of late founded a Grammar Schoole; alſo by Barden-Towre, a little turret belonging to the Earle of Cumberland, where there is round about good ſtore of game and hunting of fat Deere: by Bolton, where ſometime ſtood a little Abbay: by Bethneſley, the ſeat of the notable Family of Claphams, out of which came John Clapham a worthy Warriour, in the civill broiles betweene Lancaſter and Yorke. From thence commeth he to Ilekeley, which conſidering the ſite in reſpect of Yorke out of Ptolomee,
C and the affinity of the name together, I would judge to be OLICANA. Surely that it is an old Towne (beſide the Columnes engraven with Roman worke lying in the Churchyard and elſewhere) and was in Severus time reedified by the meanes of * Virius Lupus, Lieutenant Generall and Proprætor then of Britaine, this inſcription lately digged up hard by the Church doth plainly ſhew.

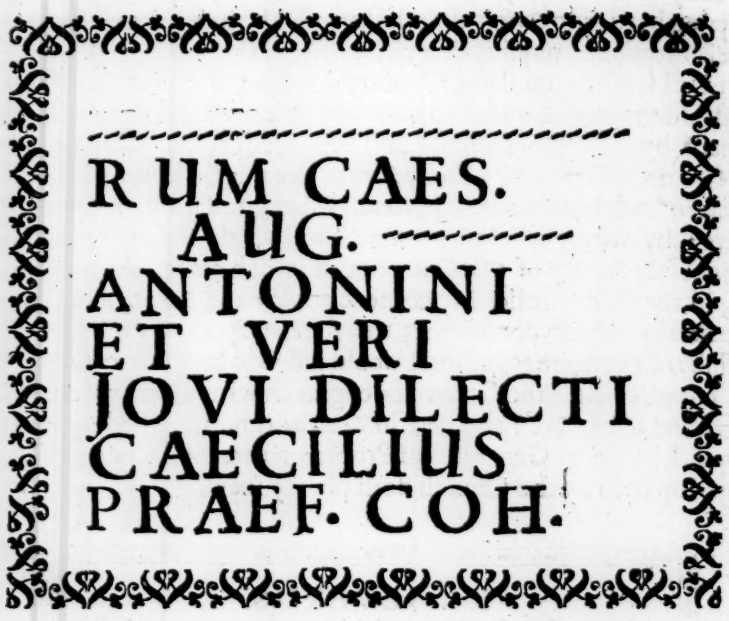
For, Rivers, as Gildas writeth, in that age, had by the blinde and ignorant people of Britaine, divine honours heaped upon them. And Seneca sheweth, that in times past, Altars were erected unto them: We worship, saith he, The heads of great Rivers, and the sudden breaking forth of an huge River out of an hidden and secret place hath Altars consecrated unto it. Againe, All waters, as Servius Honoratus saith, had their severall Nymphs, to take the rule and protection of them. Moreover in a Wall of the Church is fastened this broken and unperfect Inscription.

Epist. 41.



But in the very Church it selfe, whiles I sought diligently for monuments of Romane Antiquity, I found nothing but the Image in stone all armed, of Sir Adam Midleton: who seemeth to have flourished under King Edward the First, and whose posterity remaineth yet in the Country heereby, at Stubbam.

Otley.

More beneath standeth Otley a Towne of the Archbishops of Yorke: but it hath nothing memorable, unlesse it bee one high and hard craggy cliffe, called Chevin under which it is situate. For, the ridge of an hill, the Britans terme Chevin: whence I may conjecture that that continued ridge of mountaines in France, where in old time they spake the same language that Britans did, was called Gevenna and Gebenna. After this, Wherf runneth hard by, with his bankes on both sides reared up, and consisting of that Limestone which maketh grounds fat and fertile: where I saw Harewood Castle of good strength, which by the alteration of times, hath often changed his Lords.

Long since it belonged to the Curcies, but by Alice an inheritrice it came to Warin Fitz-Gerold, who had taken her to wife; whose daughter Margerie and one of his heires, being endowed with a very great estate of living, was first married unto Baldwin de Ripariis*, the Earles sonne of Devon-shire, who dyed before his father: afterwards to Folque de Brent, by the beneficiall favour of King John, for his approved service in pilling, polling, and spoiling most cruelly. But when at length Isabell de Riparius* Countesse of Devon-shire departed this life without issue: This Castle fell unto Robert de L'isle the sonne of Warin, as unto her cozin in bloud and one of her heires: in the end by those of Aldborrough, it descended to the Rithers, as I am enformed by Francis Thinn, who very diligently and judiciously hath a long time hunted after Pedigree antiquities. Neither is Gawthorp adjoyning hereby to be concealed in silence, when as the ancient Family of Gascoignes descended out of Gascoigne

A coigne in France as it ſeemeth, hath made it famous both with their vertue and Antiquity. Gaſcoignes.

From hence runneth Wherf hard by Wetherby, a Mercate Towne of good note, which hath no antiquity at all to ſhew, but a place only, beneath it (they call it uſually now, Saint Helens Fourd) where the high Roman ſtreet croſſed over the river. From thence he paſſeth downe by Tadcaſter, a very little towne, yet I cannot but thinke as well by the diſtance from other places, as by the nature of the ſoile, and by the name, that it was CALCARIA. For, it is about nine Italian miles from Yorke, according as Antonine hath ſet CALCARIA. Alſo the limeſtone which is the very ſoader and binder of all morter, and hardly elſewhere in this tract to be found, heere is digged B up in great plenty and vented as farre as to Yorke and the whole Country bordering round about, for uſe in building. Conſidering then that the ſaid Lime, was by the Britans and Saxons in old time, and is by the Northren Engliſhmen called after the Roman name Calc (For, that imperious City Rome, impoſed not their yoke onely, but their language alſo upon the ſubdued Nations) ſeeing alſo that in the Code of Theodoſius, thoſe bee tearmed Calcarienſes who are the burners of limeſtone: it may not ſeeme abſurd, if the Etymology of the name be fetched from Calx, that is, Chalke or Lime: even as Chalcis, of χαλκὸς, that is, braſſe, Ammon of Ἄμμος, that is, Sand, Pteleon, of πτελεὰ, that is, Elmes, and Calcaria a City of Cliveland, haply of Calx, that is, Lime, tooke their names: eſpecially ſeeing that Bede calleth it alſo Calca-ceſter. Where he C reporteth, that Heina the firſt woman in this Country that put on the Vaile and religious habite of a Nunne, retyred her ſelfe apart to this City, and therein made her abode. Moreover, an Hill neere to the Towne is called Kelc-bar, in which there lieth couched ſomewhat of the ancient name. Neither are there other arguments wanting to prove the antiquity thereof: For, to ſay nothing how it is ſituate upon a port high way, there be peeces of the Roman Emperours money oftentimes digged up, and the tokens of the Trenches and Bankes that compaſſed it about, the plot alſo where an old Caſtle ſtood, yet remaining, out of the reliques whereof, not many yeeres agoe was a Bridge built, which when Wherf is once paſſed under, he becommeth more ſtill, and ſo gently intermingleth his water with Ouſe. And verily a thing D it is in my judgement to be wondered at, That Wherf being encreaſed with ſo many waters, in Summer time runneth ſo ſhallow under this Bridge, that one comming hither about Midſommer, when he ſaw it, pretily and merrily verſified thus:

But had he come in Winter time, he ſhould have ſeene the Bridge (ſo great as it E was) ſcarce able to receive ſo much water. But naturall Philoſophers know full well, that both Welles and rivers according to the ſeaſons, and the heat or cold, without or within do decreaſe or encreaſe accordingly. Whereupon in his returne he finding here durt for duſt, and full currant water under the Bridge, recanted with theſe verſes.

Somewhat higher Nid a muddy river runneth downe, well beſet with woods on either ſide, out of the bottome of Craven hils, firſt by Niderdale, a vale unto which it F giveth name: and from thence carrieth his ſtreame by Rippley a Mercate Towne, where the Inglebeys a Family of great antiquity, flouriſhed in good reputation. Afterwards, with his deepe chanell hee fenſeth Gnaresburg commonly called Knarsborow Caſtle, ſituate upon a moſt ragged and rough Rocke, whence alſo it hath the name: which, Serle de Burgh, Unkle by the fathers ſide to Euſtace Veſcy built, as the tradition tradition holdeth: Afterward it became the ſeate of the Eſtoteviles, and now is counted part of the lands, belonging to the Dutchy of Lancaſter. Under it there is a well, in which the waters ſpring not up out of the veines of the earth, but diſtill and trickle downe dropping from the rockes hanging over it, whence they call it Dropping well: into which what wood ſoever is put, will in ſhort ſpace be covered over with a ſtony barke and turne into ſtone, as it hath beene often obſerved. In the Territory there by Liquirice groweth in great abundance, and a yellower and ſofter kinde of marle is there found, paſſing good to make the ground fertile. The Keeper or chiefe Ranger of the Foreſt adjoyning, was in times paſt one Gamell: whoſe poſterity, of their habitation at Screven aſſumed the name of Screven: and from them deſcended the Slingſbey, who received this Foreſterſhip of king Edward the Firſt, and to this day live here in great and good regard. Nid having paſſed by theſe places not farre from Allerton, the ſeat of a very ancient and famous family of the Malliveries, who in old Deeds and Records are called Mali Leporarij, goeth on a little way, and then meeting Ouſe, augmenteth the ſtreame of Ouſe by his confluence.

As for Ure, he alſo ſpringing out of theſe Weſterne hilles, but on the other ſide of the Country, in North-Riding, when by this name he hath watered the North part of the Shire, a little before he commeth to Rippon, ſerveth for the limite dividing the North and Weſt Ridings one from another. This Rippon, in the Saxon tongue Hrippun, being placed betweene Ure and Skell a rill, is beholden to religious Houſes for all the dignity it had, and eſpecially to a Monaſtery built in the primitive Church of the Engliſh-Saxons by Wilfride Archbiſhop of Yorke, and that with ſuch arched and embowed Vaults, with ſuch floorings and ſtories of ſtone worke, with ſuch turnings and windings in and out of Galleries (ſo ſaith William of Malmesbury) that it was wonderfull: Which, the Danes afterward, being ſo violent and outrageous that they ſpared neither God nor man, raced, together with the Towne. Yet flouriſhed it againe, repaired by meanes of Odo Archbiſhop of Canterbury: who being a very great maſter of ceremoniall myſteries, tranſlated from hence to Canterbury the Reliques of Wilfride. But ſince the Normans arrivall, it proſpered moſt, when the Caſtles as one ſaith, of Monkes beganne to bee built in greater number: For then both the Towne grew famous partly under the chiefe Magiſtrate, whom they call by an old Saxon word, Wakeman as one would ſay, Watchman, and partly by their induſtry in clothing which at this day is much diminiſhed: and the Monaſtery likewiſe under the tuition and protection of the Archbiſhops of Yorke beganne marveilouſly to reflouriſh. Beſides, a very faire Church was there alſo built, at the charitable charges of the Noblemen and Gentry dwelling thereabout, and of their owne Treaſurer: which with three high Spire-ſteeples doth welcome thoſe that come to the towne, and did as it were emulate in workemanſhip, the wealthy Abbay of Fountaines, built within the ſight of it by Thurſtin Archbiſhop of Yorke. On the one ſide of this Church wee ſaw a little College of ſinging men, which Henry Bath Archbiſhop of Yorke erected: on the other ſide a very great mount of earth called Hilſhow, caſt up, as they report, by the Danes. Within the Church, Saint Wilfrides Needle, was in our Grandfathers remembrance, very famous: A narrow hole this was, in the Crowdes or cloſe vaulted roome under the ground, whereby womens honeſty was tried: For, ſuch as were chaſt did eaſily paſſe through, but as many as had plaied falſe, were miraculouſly, I know not how, held faſt and could not creepe through. The Abbay Fountaines aforeſaid, moſt pleaſantly ſeated in a right plentifull Country, and having Lead mines neere it, had the originall from twelve preciſe Monkes of Yorke, who fervently, zealous, to ſerve God in a more ſtrict kinde of life, forſooke their cloiſtures and addicted themſelves to the ordinances of Saint Bernard. For whom, after they had reaped many Harveſts of troubles, Thurſtine Archbiſhop of Yorke built this Abbay, which was acknowledged an immediate daughter of Clarevalle, and in a few yeeres became a mother to many others, as Kirkſtall, Salley, Meaux, &c. I have made more willingly mention of theſe, becauſe Saint Bernard in his Epiſtles ſo highly approved their life, and diſcipline.

Not

A Not farre beneath, there ſtandeth by Vre a little Towne called Burrow bridge, of the bridge that is made over the River: which now is built very high and faire of ſtone worke, but in King Edward the Second his time, it ſeemeth to have beene of wood. For, wee reade, that when the Nobles of England diſquieted the King and troubled the State, Humfrey Bohun Earle of Hereford in his going over it; was at a chinke thereof thruſt through the body about his groine, by a ſouldier lying cloſe under the Bridge. Neere unto this Bridge Weſtward, we ſaw in three divers little fields, foure huge ſtones, of Pyramidall forme, but very rudely wrought, ſet as it were in a ſtreight and direct line. The two Pyramides in the middeſt whereof the Pyramides.
one was lately pulled downe by ſome that hoped, though in vaine, to finde treaſure,
B did almoſt touch one another: the uttermore ſtand not farre off, yet almoſt in equall diſtance from theſe on both ſides. Of theſe I have nothing elſe to ſay, but that I am of opinion with ſome, that they were Monuments of victory erected by the Romanes, hard by the High Street that went this way. For I willingly overpaſſe the fables of the common people, who call them the Devils Bolts which they ſhot at Divels bolts.
ancient Cities and therewith overthrew them. Yet will not I paſſe over this, that very many and thoſe learned men thinke they are not made of naturall ſtone indeed, but compounded of pure ſand, lime, vitriol (whereof alſo they ſay there be certaine ſmall graines within) and ſome unctuous matter. Of ſuch a kinde there were in Rome ciſternes, ſo firmely compact of very ſtrong lime and ſand, as Plinie writeth, that C they ſeemed to be naturall ſtones.

A little Eaſtward from this Bridge, Is-URIUM BRIGANTUM an ancient City, Is-Urium.
ſo called of the River Vre running by it, flouriſhed in ancient times, but was raſed to the very ground many ages paſt. Nevertheleſſe the Village riſen up neere the place, giveth teſtimony of the Antiquity thereof, for it is called Ealdburgh and Aldborrow. But, in that very plot of ground where the ſaid City ſtood, are now ara- Aldborrow. i. Old Borrow.
ble grounds and paſtures, ſo that ſcarce any footing thereof doth appeare. Surely, the very credite of Writers ſhould have had much adoe to make us beleeve, that this had beene IS-URIUM, but that URE the Rivers name, the Romane Coine daily digged up, and the diſtance according to Antonines account betwixt this and D Yorke, warranted it. For, by that Vre (which the Saxons afterward named Ouſe becauſe it hath entertained Ousburne a little River) is gone ſixteene Italian miles from hence, hee runneth through the City EBORACUM or EBURACUM, which Eboracum, Yorke.
Ptolomee in the ſecond booke of his Great Conſtruction calleth BRIGANTIUM (if the ſaid booke bee not corrupted) becauſe it was the chiefe City of the Brigantes. Ninnius calleth it Caer Ebrauc, the Britans Caer Effroc, the Saxons Ꞓuop-pic and Ꞓoꝛop-pic, and we at this day, Yorke.

The Britiſh Hiſtory reporteth, that it tooke name of King Ebrauc the Founder: yet give mee leave to deeme conjecturally, without the prejudice to others that the name EB-URACUM is derived from nothing elſe but from the River Vre, E ſo that it ſoundeth as much as by Vre, or along the ſide of Vre: for, even ſo the EBUROVICES in France, were ſeated by the River Eure, neere unto Eureux in Normandy: Semblably the EB-URONES in the Netherlands, neere unto the river Oure in the Diœceſe of Lhuick: and EB-LANA in Ireland ſtandeth hard by the river Leſny. This is the ſecond City of England, the faireſt in all this Country, and a ſingular ſafeguard and ornament both, to all the North parts. A pleaſant place, large, and ſtately, well fortified, beautifully adorned as well with private as pulique buildings, rich, populous, and to the greater dignity thereto it hath an Archiepiſcopall See. Ure, which now is called Ouſe, flowing with a gentle ſtreame from the North part Southward cutteth it as I ſaid in twaine, and divideth it, as it were, into two
F Cities, which are conjoyned with a ſtone Bridge, having the mightieſt Arch one of them, that ever I ſaw.

The Weſt part, nothing ſo populous, is compaſſed in with a very faire Wall and the River together, foureſquarewiſe, and giveth entrance to thoſe that come thither at one onely Gate, named Mikel Barre, as one would ſay, The great Gate. From which a long ſtreet and a broade, reacheth to the very Bridge, and the ſame ſtreete beſet with proper houſes having gardens and orchards planted on the backeſide on either hand, and behinde them fields even hard to the Walles, for exerciſe and diſports. In the South angle whereof which they and the River make betweene them, I ſaw a Mount, raiſed, as it ſeemeth, for ſome Caſtle to be built upon it, called The old Bale; which, William Melton Archbiſhop, as wee reade in the Archbiſhops lives, ſtrongly encloſed, firſt, with thicke planckes, eighteene foote long; afterward with a ſtone wall: yet there is nothing of all that now to be ſeene. A

The Eaſt ſide wherein the houſes ſtand very thicke and the ſtreetes be narrower, in forme reſembleth as it were a lentill, and is fortified alſo with very ſtrong walles and on the South-Eaſt, defended with the deepe chanell of Foſſe a muddy River, which entring into the heart of the City by a blinde way, hath a Bridge over it, with houſes ſtanding upon it ſo cloſe ranged one by another, that any man would judge it, to bee not a Bridge, but a continued ſtreete; and ſo a little lower runneth into Ouſe: where at their confluence, and meeting together, right over againſt the Mount that I ſpake of, King William the Conquerour in a very convenient place raiſed a moſt ſtrong Caſtle to awe the Citizens. Upon which, time hath now a great while without impeachment wrought his will; ever ſince that Engliſhmen fell to neglect ſtrong Holds, as receptacles for thoſe whoſe hearts would not ſerve to fight in open field.

Foſſe-river. B

On this ſide alſo toward the North-Eaſt, ſtandeth the Cathedrall Church dedicated to Saint Peter, an excellent faire Fabrique and a ſtately; neere unto which, without the Walles of the City, but yet encloſed within walles and by the River, flouriſhed a renowned Abbay called Saint Maries, which Alan the Third, Earle of Little Britaine in Armorica and of Richmund, built and endowed with rich livings: but now it is converted into the Princes houſe, and is commonly called The Manour. C

The Manour.

Whence I ſhould fetch the originall of Yorke but from the Romanes I cannot tell, ſeeing the Britans before the Romanes comming had no other Townes, than woods fenſed with trenches and rampire, as Caeſar and Strabo unreprovable Authors doe teſtifie. To ſay nothing therefore of King Ebrank, whom ſome men both curious and credulous, as it ſhould ſeeme, have imagined out of the name of Eboracum (for ſo is Yorke in Latine termed) to have beene the Founder thereof: moſt certaine it is, that the Sixth Legion Victrix, which Hadrian there Emperour brought out of Germany over into Britaine was placed heere in Gariſon. And that it was a Colony of the Romanes, it appeareth both by the authority of Ptolomee, and Antonine, and alſo by an ancient Inſcription, which I ſaw in a certaine Aldermans houſe there in theſe words. But

A But how it is, that Victor in his Hiſtory of the Cæſars, hath called Yorke Municipium or free towne of Britaine, being, as it was a Colony, I require farther time to deliberate thereupon, unleſſe it were, that the inhabitants of Yorke, like as ſometime the Præneſtines did chooſe rather from a Colony to bee brought unto the ſtate of a free-Burgh. For, Colonies having, as Agellius writeth, lawes, cuſtomes and rights at the will of the people of Rome and not at their owne pleaſure, ſeemed more obnoxious, and their condition not ſo free: whereas free Cities, ſuch as in Latin are named Municipia, uſed rights, Lawes and orders of their owne, and the Citizens or Burgeſſes thereof were partakers with the people of Rome in their honourable Offices onely, and bound of neceſſity to nothing elſe. No mervaile therefore, if Colonies B were changed into Free Burroughs. But to what end ſtand I upon this point? This difference of the name is not in the ſtory of the Emperours ſo exactly obſerved, but that one and the ſelfe ſame place is called both a Colony, and a Municipium, or Free City. Howbeit out of that peece of money I dare not conſtantly affirme, that Severus firſt conducted and planted this Colony, ſeeing that Ptolomee and Antonine himſelfe writeth it was the ſeat of the ſixth Legion in the Antonines time. But we reade that Severus had his Palace in this City, and heere at the houre of death gave up his laſt breath with theſe words: I entred upon a ſtate every where troubleſome, and I leave it peaceable even to the Britans. His body was carried forth here to the funerall fire by the ſouldiers, after the military faſhion, and committed to the flames, honoured with C Juſts and Turneaments of his ſouldiers and his owne ſonnes, in a place beneath this City Weſtward neere to Ackham, where is to be ſeene a great Mount of earth raiſed up, which as Raulph Niger hath recorded, was in his time, of Severus, called Sivers. His aſhes being beſtowed in a little golden pot, or veſſell of the Porphyrite ſtone, were carried to Rome, and ſhrined there in the Monument of the Antonines. At which time there was in this City the Temple of Goddeſſe Bellona. For, Spartianus ſpeaking of Severus and this very City, ſaith thus, When Severus returned and came into the City, purpoſing to offer ſacrifice, he was led firſt of all to the Temple of Bellona, by the errour of a ruſticall Augur or Soothſaying Prieſt. At which time the Tribunal or Juſtice Haul of this City was in this reſpect moſt happy, becauſe therein ſat to miniſter juD ſtice that Oracle of the law, Æmilius Paulus Papinianus, as Forcatulus witneſſeth. And from this place it was, for certaine, that Severus and Antoninus Emperours being conſulted in a caſe or queſtion of Right, gave forth their Imperiall conſtitution De rei Vindicatione. An hundred yeeres or thereabout after the death of Severus, Fl. Valerius Conſtantius firnamed Chlorus, an Emperour ſurpaſſing in all vertue and Chriſtian piety, who came hether When the Gods, as the Panegyriſt ſaith, called him now to the inmoſt entry and doore of the earth, ended his life alſo in this City and was deified, as we may ſee by ancient Coines. And albeit Florilegus recordeth, that his Tombe was found in Wales, as I have ſaid; yet men of credite have enformed me, that in our fathers remembrance, when Abbaies were ſuppreſſed and pulled downe, E in a certaine Vault or crowdes or a little Chappell under the ground wherein Conſtantius was ſuppoſed to have beene buried, there was found a Lampe burning: for, Lazius writeth, that in ancient time they preſerved light in Sepulchres, by reſolving gold artificially into a liquid and fatty ſubſtance, which ſhould continue burning a long time and for many ages together.

L. I. C. Conſtantius.

This Emperor begat of his former wife Helena CONSTANTINE THE GREAT, THE DELIVERER OF ROME CITY, as ancient Inſcriptions give teſtimony, F THE FOUNDER OF PEACE, AND THE REPAIRER OF THE COMMON VVEALTH: Who was preſent in Yorke at his fathers laſt gaſpe, and forthwith proclaimed Emperour, The ſouldiers, as the Panegyricall Oratour ſaith, regarding rather the good of the State, than private affections, caſt the purple robe upon him, whiles hee wept and put ſpurs to his horſe, to avoid the importunity of the Army attempting and requiring ſo inſtantly to make him Emperour: But the happineſſe of the State overcame his modeſtie. Whence it is that the Author of the Panegyricall oration crieth out in theſe words, O fortunate Britaine and now bleſſed above all lands, which firſt ſaweſt Conſtantine Emperor.

Conſtantine the Great.

Hence it may be gathered, in what, and how great eſtimation Yorke was in thoſe daies, ſeeing the Romane Emperours Court was there held. For, our owne Country Writers record, that this City was by Conſtantius adorned and graced with an Epiſcopall See: But yet, that Taurinus the Martyr Biſhop of Eurenx ſat heere and governed, I will not ſay as others doe. For, Vincentius out of whom they ſucked this errour, would by his owne words convince me of untruth. But when the Romanes were departed and had left Britaine for a prey to barbarous Nations, this City ſore afflicted with many calamities, ſuffered her part alſo of miſeries, and was little or nothing better about the end of the Scottiſh or Saxons Warres, than a poore ſmall ſhadow of a great name. For, when Paulinus preached Chriſtian Religion to the Engliſh Saxons in this Country, it lay ſo deſolate, that there remained not ſo much as a Chappell in it, for King Edwin to bee baptized in. Who in the yeere after Chriſts Birth 627. built a little Oratory of wood: and when as afterward he went in hand with building a greater Church of ſtone, ſcarce had he laid the foundation thereof, when he was prevented by death and left it to be finiſhed by his Succeſſour Oſwald. Ever ſince that time, the Eccleſiaſticall Dignity in this Church encreaſed, and by a Pall ſent unto it from Honorius the Pope, became a Metropolitane City; which beſide twelve Biſhoprickes in England, exerciſed the power of a Primate over all the Biſhops of Scotland. But many yeeres ſince, Scotland withdrew it ſelfe from this her Metropolitane: and the Metropolitane City it ſelfe hath ſo devoured other Biſhoprickes adjoyning, being but little to ſay truth and of ſmall account, that it hath now but foure within the owne Diœceſe, namely, the Biſhoprickes of Durham, of Cheſter, of Carlile, and of Man, or Sodorenſis in the Iſle of Man. And the Archbiſhop Egbert, who flouriſhed about the yeere of our Salvation 740. erected at Yorke, A moſt famous Library, the Cabinet as I may ſo terme it (theſe be the words of William of Malmesbury) and Cloſet of all liberall Arts. Touching which Library, Alcwin of Yorke Schoolemaſter to Charles the Great, firſt Founder of the Univerſity of Paris, and the onely Honour of this City, in an Epiſtle to the ſaid Charles wrote thus. Give mee the bookes of deeper and more exquiſite ſcholaſticall learning, ſuch as I had in mine owne Country by the good and moſt devout induſtry of the Archbiſhop Egbert. And if it pleaſe your wiſedome, I will ſend backe ſome of your owne ſervants, who may exemplifie out of them all thoſe things that be neceſſary, and bring the floures of Britaine into France, that there may not be a Garden of learning encloſed onely within Yorke walles; but that ſtreames of Paradiſe may be alſo at Towres.

Flaccus Alcwinus or Albinus flouriſhed, anno. 780.

Then alſo it was that Princes beſtowed many and great livings and lands upon the Church of Yorke, eſpecially Ulphus the ſonne of Toral (I note ſo much out of an old booke, that there may plainly appeare a cuſtome of our anceſtours in endowing Churches with livings). This Ulphus aforeſaid ruled in the Weſt part of Deira, and by reaſon of the debate that was like to ariſe betweene his ſonnes the elder and the younger, about their Lordſhips and Signiories after his death, forthwith hee made them all alike. For, without delay hee went to Yorke, tooke the horne with him out of which hee was wont to drinke, filled it with wine, and before the Altar of God and bleſſed Saint Peter Prince of the Apoſtles, kneeling upon his knees he dranke, and thereby enfeoffed them in all his lands and revenewes. Which horne was there kept as a monument (as I have heard) untill our fathers daies.

I might ſeeme to ſpeake in derogation of the Clergy, if I ſhould report what ſecret heart-burnings, or rather open enmities flaſhed out betweene the Archbiſhops of Yorke and of Canterbury upon worldly ambition; whiles with great waſt of their wealth, but more loſſe of their credite and reputation, they bickered moſt eagerly about the Primacy. For, the Church of Yorke, as he writeth, (inferiour though it were unto that of Canterbury in riches) yet being equall in dignity, albeit of later time founded: and advanced on high with the ſame power that Canterbury hath, confirmed alſo with the like authority of Apoſtolicall Privileges, tooke it ill to bee ſubject unto that of Canterbury by vertue of a Decree of Alexander of Rome, who ordained, That the Church of Yorke ought to be ſubject unto Canterbury, and in all things to obey the conſtitutions of the Arch-

A Archbiſhop thereof, as Primate of all Britaine, in ſuch matters as appertaine to Chriſtian Religion. Concerning the Archbiſhops of Yorke, it is no part verily of my purpoſe to write any thing heere, although there bee very many of them who deſerve for their vertue and piety to bee renowned. Let it ſuffice to note in a word, that from Paulinus the firſt Archbiſhop, conſecrated in the yeere of our Redemption 625. there have ſitten in that See threeſcore and five Archbiſhops, unto the yeere 1606. in which D. Tobie Matthew a moſt reverend Prelate, for the ornaments of vertue and piety, for learned eloquence, and continuall exerciſe of teaching, was tranſlated hither from the Biſhopricke of Durrham. The ſixty ſixth Archbiſhop.

This City for a time flouriſhed very notably under the Engliſh Saxons domini-
B on, untill the Danes like a mighty ſtorme thundring from out of the North-Eaſt, deſaced it againe with merveilous great ruines, and by killing and ſlaying diſteined it with bloud, which, that Alcuine aforeſaid in his Epiſtle to Egelred King of Northumberland may ſeeme to have preſaged before, What ſignifieth (ſaith he) that raining of bloud which in Lent we ſaw at Yorke the head City of the whole Kingdome, in Saint Peters Church, to fall downe violently in threatning wiſe from the top of the rouſe, in the North part of the houſe, and that in a faire day. May it not bee thought, that bloud is comming upon the Land from the North parts? Verily ſoone after it was embrued with bloud, and did pine away with moſt miſerable calamities, when the Danes ſpoiled, waſted, and murthered all where ever they came. And verily in the yeere 867. the C wals were ſo battered and ſhaken by reaſon of continuall Warres, that Osbright and Ella Kings of Northumberland, whiles they purſewed the Danes eaſily brake into the City: who being both of them ſlaine in a moſt bloudy battaile in the very middeſt of the City, left the victory unto the Danes. Whereupon William of Malmesbury writeth in this manner, Yorke, alwaies expoſed firſt to the rage of the Northren Nations, ſuſtained the barbarous aſſaults of the Danes, and groaned being pitteouſly ſhaken with manifold ruines. But as the very ſame Authour witneſſeth, King Athelſtone wonne it perforce out of the Danes hands, and overthrew the Caſtle quite, which they had heere fortified. Neither for all this, was it altogether free from warres in the times next enſuing whiles that age ranne fatall for the deſtruction of Cities.

D But the Normans as they ended theſe miſeries, ſo they made almoſt a finall hand of Yorke alſo. For, when the ſonnes of Sueno the Dane had landed in theſe parts with a Daniſh Fleete of 240. Saile, the Normans lying in Gariſon, who kept two Forts within the City, fearing leaſt the houſes in the Suburbes might ſtand the enemy in ſtead to fill up the Ditches withall, ſet them on fire: but by reaſon the winde roſe highly, the fire was ſo carried and ſpred throughout that City, that now it was ſet a burning, when the Danes breaking in upon them made pitifull ſlaughter in every place, having put the Normans to the ſword, and keeping alive William Mallet and Gilbert Gant two principall perſons, that they might be tithed with the ſouldiers. For, every tenth man of the Normans they choſe out by lot, to be executed. Where-
E upon King William the Conquerour was ſo incenſed with deſire of revenge, that he ſhewed his cruelty upon the Citizens by putting them all to death, as if they had taken part with the Danes: and upon the City it ſelfe by ſetting it on fire afreſh; and as William of Malmesbury ſaith, Hee ſo depopulated and defaced the Villages adjoyning, and the ſinewes of that fertile Region were ſo cut by the ſpoiles there committed and booties raiſed, and the ground for the ſpace of threeſcore miles lay ſo untilled, that if a ſtranger had then ſeene the Cities that in times were of high account, the Towres which with their lofty toppes threatned the skie, and the fields that were rich in paſtures, hee could not but ſigh and lament, yea and if an ancient inhabitant had beheld the ſame, hee could not have knowne them. How great Yorke had beene aforetime, Domeſday booke ſhall tell you in theſe words.
F In King Edward the Confeſſours time, there were in Yorke City ſixe Diviſions or Shires, beſides that of the Archbiſhops. One was laid waſte, for the Caſtles or Forts. In the five Diviſions were 1428. dwelling Manſions to give entertainement: And, in the Archbiſhops Shire or Diviſion 200. dwelling Manſions likewiſe. After theſe woefull overthrowes our countryman Necham thus verſified of it. Alfred of Beverley, in the Library of the Lord Burghley Treaſurer of England. Decimation, i. Execution of every tenth man.

Viſito quam fælix Ebraucus condidit urbem,
Petro ſe debet pontificalis apex.
Civibus hæc toties vidnata, novíſque repleta,
Diruta proſpexit mœnia ſæpe ſua.
Quid manus hoſtilis queat, eſt experta frequenter,
Sed quid? nunc pacis otia longa fovent.

The City that Great Ebrauk built, I come now for to view, Whereof the See pontificall, is to Saint Peter due.
This, many times laid deſolate, and peopled new hath beene,
Her wals caſt downe and ruinate full often hath it ſeene.
What miſchiefe hoſtile hands could worke, not once nor twice it found,
What then? ſince now, long time of peace, doth keepe it ſafe and ſound.

For, in his time, when after theſe troubleſome ſtormes a moſt pleaſant calme of peace preſently enſued, it roſe of it ſelfe againe and flouriſhed afreſh, although the Scots and Rebels both, did oftentimes make full account to deſtroy it. But under the Raigne of King Stephen, it caught exceeding great harme by caſualty of fire, wherein were conſumed the Cathedrall Church, the Abbay of Saint Mary and other religious houſes: yea and that noble and moſt furniſhed Library (as it is thought) which Alcuin hath recorded to have been founded by Archbiſhop Egeldred his Præceptour. As for the Abbay of Saint Mary it quickly recovered the former dignity by new buildings: but the Cathedrall Church lay longer ere it held up head againe, and not before King Edward the Firſt his time: For then, John Roman Treaſurer of the Church laid the foundation of a new worke, which his ſonne John, William Melton, and John Thoreſby, all of them Archbiſhops, brought by little and little to that perfection and beauty which now it ſheweth, yet not without the helping hand of the Nobility and Gentry thereabout, eſpecially of the Percies and the Vavaſours, which the armes of their houſes ſtanding in the very Church, and their images at the Weſt gate of the Church doe ſhew, Percies pourtraied with a peece of timber, and Vavaſours with a ſtone in their hands, for that the one ſupplied the ſtone, the other the timber for this new building. This Church as he reporteth who wrote the life of Æneas Sylvius, who was Pope Pius the ſecond, and that upon the Popes owne relation, For workmanſhip and greatneſſe, is memorable over all the world, and the Chappell moſt lightſome, the glaſſe-windowes whereof are faſt bound betweene pillars that bee moſt ſlender in the mids. This Chappell is that moſt dainty and beautifull Chapter-houſe, in which this verſe ſtands painted in golden letters.

Commentar. of Pope Pius. Lib. prim.

Ut Roſa flos florum, ſic eſt Domus iſta Domorum.
The floure of floures, a Roſe men call:
So is this houſe of houſen all.

About the ſame time alſo, the Citizens fenſed the City round about with new walles and many towres and bulwarkes ſet orderly in divers places, yea and ordained very good and holſome lawes for the governement thereof. King Richard the Second granted it to bee a County incorporate by it ſelfe, and King Richard the Third beganne to repaire the Caſtle. And that nothing might be wanting, King Henry the Eighth within the memory of our fathers, appointed heere a Councell not unlike to the Parliaments in France, for to decide and determine the cauſes and controverſies of theſe North parts according to equity and conſcience, which conſiſteth of a Lord Preſident, certaine Counſellers at the Princes pleaſure, a Secretary and under Officers. As touching the Longitude of Yorke our Mathematicians have deſcribed it to be two and twenty Degrees and twenty five Scruples: the Latitude 54. degrees and 10. ſcruples. Hitherto have we treated of the Weſt part of this ſhire and of Yorke City, which is reckoned neither in the one part, nor the other, but enjoyeth

The Councell eſtabliſhed in the North.

A enjoyeth peculiar liberties, and hath jurisdiction over the Territory adjoyning on the West side. Which they call the Liberty of Ansty, others the Ancienty of the Antiquity, but other have derived it very probably from the Dutch word Anstossen, which betokeneth limits. And now for a conclusion have heere what Master John Jonston of Aberden hath but a while since written in verse, of Yorke.

Præsidet extremis Arctoa finibus ora Urbs vetus, in veterî facta subinde nova.
Romanis Aquilis quondam Ducibúsque superba.
Quam post barbaricæ diripuere manus.
B Pictus atrox, Scotus, Danus, Normannus, & Anglus
Fulmina in hanc Martis detonuere sui.
Post diras rerum clades, tótque aspera fata,
Blandiùs aspirans aura serena subit.
LONDINUM caput est, & regni urbs prima Britanni:
EBORACUM à primâ jure secunda venit.

In parts remote of Northren tract, there stands as soveraine,
A City old, but yet of old eftsoones made new againe.
Whilom of Romane Legions and Captaines proud it was:
C But since by forces barbarous sacked and spoil'd, alasse.
The Picts so fierce, the Scots and Danes, Normans and Englishmen, 'Gainst it their bolts of dreadfull war have thundred now and then.
Yet after sundry bitter blasts, and many a cursed clap,
A milder gale of peacefull daies, hath brought it better hap.
Of British Kingdome LONDON is chiefe seat and principall,
And unto it there goes by right Yorke City next of all.

Ouse now leaving Yorke, being otherwhiles disquieted and troubled with that whirling encounter of contrary waters, and forceable eddies which some call Higra,
D runneth downe through Bishops Thorpe, called Saint Andrewes Thorpe, before that Walter Grey Archbishop of Yorke purchased it with ready money, and to prevent the Kings Officers who are wont rigorously to seize upon Bishops Temporalties when the See is vacant, gave it to the Deane and Chapter of Yorke, with this condition, that they should alwayes yeeld it to his Successours. Of whom, Richard Le Sicrope Archbishop of Yorke, a man of a firy spirit, and ready to entertaine rebellion, was condemned in this very place, of high Treason by King Henry the Fourth, against whom he had raised an insurrection. Afterward Cawood a Castle of the Archbishops standeth upon the same River, which King Athelstan, as I have read, gave unto the Church: Just against which on the other side of the River lyeth Ricall, E where Harald Haardread arrived with a great Fleet of Danes. Then Ouse passeth hard by Selby a little Towne, well peopled and of good resort; where King Henry the First was borne, and where his father King William the First built a faire Abbay in memory of Saint German, who happily confuted that venemous Pelagian Heresie, which oftentimes (as the Serpent Hydra) grew to an head againe in Britaine. The Abbats of this Church, as also of Saint Maries in Yorke, were the onely Abbats in the North parts that had place in the Parliament house. And so Ouse at length speedeth away to Humber, leaving first Escricke a seat of the Lascelles sometimes to be remembred for that King James advanced Sir Thomas Knivet the owner thereof Lord Knivet to the honour of Baron Knivet of Escricke, in the yeere 1607. And
F afterward passing by Drax, a little Village famous long since for a Monastery founded there by Sir William Painell, and whereas William of Newburgh writeth, Philip of Tollevilla had a Castle most strongly fensed, with Rivers, Woods, and Marishes about it, which he, confident upon the courage of his followers, and his provision of victuals and armour, defended against King Stephen; untill it was wonne by assault.

EAST-RIDING.

EAST-RIDING the ſecond part of this Region, wherein Ptolomee placed the PARISI, lyeth Eaſtward from Yorke. On the North ſide and the Weſt, it is bounded with the River * Darwent, that runneth downe with a winding courſe: on the South with the Salt water of Humber, and on the Eaſt with the German Ocean. Upon the Sea ſide and along Darwent the Soile is meetly good and fertile: But in the mids it is nothing elſe but an heape of Hilles riſing up on high, which they call Yorkes wold. Darwent ſpringing not farre from the ſhore, firſt taketh his way Weſtward: then, hee windeth into the South by Aiton and Malton; whereof, becauſe they belong to the North part of the Shire, I will ſpeake in due place. No ſooner is hee entred into this Quarter, but downe hee runneth not farre from the ruines of the old Caſtle Montferrant. The Lords whereof were in times paſt the Foſſards, men of noble parentage and wealthy withall: But when William Foſſard Ward to the King, being committed unto William le Groſſe Earle of Aumarle as to his Guardian, and now come to his yeeres, abuſed his ſiſter, the Earle in wreckfull diſpleaſure for this fact of his, laid this Caſtle even with the ground, and forced the young Gentleman to forſake his Country. Howbeit, after the Earles death, he recovered his inheritance againe, and left one onely daughter behinde him: who being marryed unto R. de Torneham, bare a daughter marryed to Peter de * Mauley: whoſe heires and ſucceſſours being bettered in their eſtate by this inheritance of the Foſſards, became great and honourable Barons. Not farre from hence is ſituate upon the River ſide, Kirkham, as one would ſay of Church-place: For, a Priory of Chanons was there founded by Walter Eſpec a man of high place and calling, by whoſe daughter a great eſtate accrewed to the family of the Lord Roſſes. Then, but ſomewhat lower, Darwent had a City of his owne name, which Antonine the Emperour calleth DERVENTIO, and placeth it ſeven miles from YORKE. The booke of Notices maketh mention of a Captaine over the Company Derventienſis under the Generall of Britaine, that reſided in it; and in the Saxons Empire it ſeemeth to have beene that Towne, where the King uſed to lye, which Bede ſaith, was ſituate neere unto the River Doroventio. In which, as hee alſo writeth, Eumer, that murderous Villaine thruſt at Edwin King of Northumberland with a ſword and had runne him through, but that one of his men ſtepped betweene, and ſaved the Kings life with the loſſe of his owne. Yet could I never have ſaid preciſely which was the very place, had not that moſt judicious Robert Marſhall given me a light thereof. For, he gave me to underſtand, that juſt at the very ſame diſtance from Yorke which I ſpake of, there ſtands hard upon the River Darwent, a little Towne named Auldby, that is, if you interprete the Saxon word, The old Habitation: where, are extant yet in ſight ſome tokens of Antiquity, and upon a very high Hill neere unto the River, the rubbiſh of an ancient Fortification, ſo that it cannot chuſe, but to have beene the ſaid City Derventio. From hence glideth the River hard under Stanford-Bridge, which alſo of the battaile there fought is called Battlebridge. For, at that Bridge, Harald King of England, after a great execution done upon the Danes ſlew in a pight field Harald Hardread King of Norway, who with a Fleet of 200. ſaile grievouſly annoyed the Iſle of Britaine, and was now landed at Richall, ſpoiling and waſting all in his way. The King of England who having the honour of the field, found among the ſpoiles ſuch a maſſe of Gold, as that twelve luſty young men, had much adoe to carry it on their backes, as Adam Bremenſis recordeth. This field was foughten ſcarce nine dayes before the arrivall of William Conquerour, what time the diſſolute and roiotous life of the Engliſhmen, ſeemed to foretell their their imminent overthrow and deſtruction. But of this I have ſpoken before.

Derwent, which when it is encreaſed with raine, and as it were provoked to anger doth oftentimes contemne his bankes and ſurround the medowes lying about it, paſſing from hence by Wreſhil a proper and a ſtrong Caſtle, which Sir Thomas Percy Earle of Worceſter built, runneth amaine under Babthorpe, which yeeldeth both name and habitation to a worſhipfull Family of Knights degree: and ſo at length diſchargeth himſelfe into Ouſe. Out of this ſtocke it was (for let us not thinke much to tell of thoſe who perfo:med faithfull ſervice to their Prince and Country) that both father and ſonne fighting together under the banner of King Henry the Sixth loſt their lives in the Battaile of Saint Albans, and were there buryed together with this Epitaph:

Cum patre Radulpho Babthorp jacet ecce Radulphus
Filius, hoc duro marmore preſſus humo, Henrici Sexti dapifer, pater Armiger ejus,
Mors ſatis id docuit, fidus uterque fuit. &c.

Behold where two Raulph Babthorps, both the ſonne and father lye,
Under a ſtone of marble hard, interr'd in this mould dry:
To Henry the Sixth the father Squire, the Sonne he Sewer was,
Both true to Prince, and for his ſake they both their life did paſſe.

Howden. And now Ouſe by this time carrying a fuller ſtreame, runneth neere Howden a Mercate Towne, famous not ſo much for any beauty in it, or great reſort thereto, as becauſe it hath given name to a little Territory adjoyning, called of it Howdenſhire, and had therein not long ſince a prety Collegiat Church of five Prebendaries: unto which joyneth the Biſhops houſe of Durrham who have great lands thereabout. One of which, namely Walter Skirlaw, who flouriſhed about the yeere of our Lord 1390. as we reade in the booke of Durrham, built a very great and large ſteeple to this Church, that if there happened by chance any inundation, it might ſerve the inhabitants for a place of refuge to ſave themſelves in. And not farre from hence ſtands Metham, which gave both ſirname and habitation alſo to the ancient houſe of the Methams.

Metham.

Now the River Ouſe being very broad, ſwift and roring beſides, out powreth his ſtreame into the Frith or ſalt water ABUS: For ſo calleth Ptolomee that arme of the Sea, which the Engliſh Saxons and we tearme Humber, whereof alſo the Country beyond it, by a generall name was called Northumberland. Both theſe names may ſeeme to have beene drawne with ſome little change, from the Britiſh word Aber, which among them ſignifieth the mouth of a River: and I would thinke it was impoſed upon this River by way of excellency: becauſe Ure or Ouſe having entertained and lodged many Rivers, carryeth them all with him along into this, yea and other Rivers of right great name are emptied into it. And verily it is one of the broadeſt armes of the ſea and beſt ſtored with fiſh in all Britaine. It riſeth high as the Ocean, at every tide floweth, and when the ſame ebbeth and returneth backe, it carryeth his owne ſtreame and the currant of the Sea together moſt forcibly and with a mighty noiſe, not without great danger of ſuch as ſaile therein, whence Necham writeth thus of it.

Abus. Humbert.

Fluctibus æquoreis nautis ſuſpectior Humber, Dedignans Urbes viſere rura colit.
More fear'd of ſhipmen Humber ſtreame, than waves of ſea ſo deepe;
Diſdaining cities great to ſee, neere country townes doth keepe.

And following the Britiſh Hiſtory, as if it had beene ſo called of a King of the Hunnes, he addeth this moreover.

Hunnorum

Hunnorum princeps oſtendens terga Locrino Submerſus, nomen contulit Humbriæ aquæ.

A Prince of Hunnes, whiles that he ſhew'd his backe to Locrine brave, Was drowned heere, and ſo the name, to Humber water gave.

Touching whom, another Poet alſo:

Dum fugit, obſtat ei flumen, ſubmergitur illic;
Dèque ſuo tribuit nomine nomen aquæ.

Whiles he turn'd backe, and tooke his flight, the River ſtopt the ſame;
There drown'd was he, and then of him the water tooke the name.

Neither were there indeed any Cities ſeene to ſtand by this Arme of the Sea in Nechams daies: but before and after, there flouriſhed one or two Cities in theſe places. Under the Roman Empire, not farre from the banke, by Foulneſſe a River of ſmall account, where Wighton a little Towne of Husbandry well inhabited is now ſeene, ſtood, as we may well thinke, in old time DELGOVITIA: and that I may not take hold of the diſtance from DERVENTIO for a proofe, both the reſemblance, and the ſignification alſo of the name, doe concurre. For, Delgue in the Britiſh tongue ſignifieth The Statues or Images of the Heathen Gods, and in a ſmall Village C adjoyning to this little Towne, there was a Temple of Idols even in the Saxons time, of exceeding great name, and requeſt: which, of thoſe Heathen gods was then termed Godmundingham, and now is called in the ſame ſenſe * Godmanham. Neither doubt I, but that even when the Britans flouriſhed, it was ſome famous Oracle much frequented when ſuperſtition ſpread, and ſwaying among all Nations had wholly poſſeſſed the weake mindes of ignorant people. But when Paulinus preached Chriſt, unto Northumberland men, Coy-ſi, who had beene a Pontife or Biſhop of the heathen rites and ceremonies, after he had once embraced Chriſtian Religion, Firſt of all profaned this Temple, the very habitation of impiety, by launcing a ſpeare againſt it, yea he deſtroyed it, and as Bede writeth, Set it on fire, with all the encloſures and D Iſles belonging unto it. From hence, ſomething more Eaſtward, the River Hull bendeth his courſe to Humber, which River hath his ſpring head neere unto Driffeild, a Village well knowne, by reaſon of the Tombe of Alfred that moſt learned King of Northumberland; and the mounts that be raiſed heere and there about it. The ſaid River haſteneth thither ward, not farre from Leckenfielde, an houſe of the Percies Earles of Northumberland: neere unto which, ſtandeth the dwelling place of a very famous and ancient Progeny of the Hothams at Scherburg; together with the rubbiſh of an old Caſtle of Peter Mauley at Garthum. And now approcheth the River Hull neerer unto Beverley, in the Engliſh Saxon tongue called Beuen-leȝa, which Bede ſeemeth to name, the Monaſtery in Deirwuud, that is, In the word of the Deiri, E a great Towne, very populous and full of trade. A man would gueſſe it by the name and ſituation to be PETUARIA PARISIORUM, although it affordeth nothing of greater antiquity, than that John ſirnamed de Beverley, Archbiſhop of Yorke, a man as Bede witneſſeth, both godly and learned, after he had given over his Biſhopricke, as weary of this world, came hither, and ended his life in contemplation, about the yeere of our Redemption 721. The Kings held the memoriall of this John ſo ſacred and reverend, eſpecially King Athelſtan who honoured him as his tutelar Saint, after he had put the Danes to flight, that they endowed this place with many and thoſe very great priviledges, and Athelſtane granted them liberties in theſe generall words, All's free make I thee, as heart may thinke, or eye may ſee. Yea and there F was granted unto it the priviledges of a Sanctuary, ſo that bankrupts and men ſuſpected of any capitall crime worthy of death, might bee free and ſafe there from danger of the Law. In which there was erected a Chaire of ſtone with this Inſcription.

HÆC SEDES LAPIDEA Freedſtoll DICITUR. i. PACIS CATHEDRA, AD QUAM REUS FUGIENDO PERVENIENS OMNIMODAM HABET SECURITATEM.

That is,

This ſeat of Stone is called Freedſtoll, that is, The chaire of Peace, unto which what Offender ſoever flieth and commeth, hath all manner of ſecurity.

Heereby, the Towne grew great, and daily there flocked hither a number to dwell as inmates; and the Townesmen for conveyance of commodities by ſea made a chanell for a water courſe out of the River Hull ſufficient to carry boats and barges. For the chiefe Magiſtracy there, it had twelve Wardens; afterwards Governours and Wardens. And now, by the gracious grant of Queene Elizabeth, a Major and Governours. More Eaſtward, there flouriſhed Meaux Abbay, ſo called of one Gamel borne at Meaux in France, who obtained it at William the Conquerours hands for a place to dwell in: and heere was founded an Abbay for the Monkes of the Cluniacke order by William Le Groſſe Earle of Aulbemarle, to bee releaſed of his vow that hee had made to viſite Jeruſalem. A little lower runneth out in a great length Cottingham, a country Towne of husbandry, where by licence granted from King John, Robert Eſtotevill the Lord thereof built a Caſtle now utterly fallen to ruine. Which Robert, was deſcended from Robert Grondebeoſe, or Grandebeoſe a Baron of Normandy, and a man of great name and reputation: whoſe inheritance fell by marriage to the Lord de Wake, and by a daughter of John de Wake it came to Edmund Earle of Kent, who had a daughter named Joane wife unto that moſt warlique Knight Edward Prince of Wales, who ſo often victoriouſly vanquiſhed the French in divers places. The River Hull aforeſaid, after it hath paſſed ſixe miles from hence ſheddeth himſelfe into Humber, and neere unto his mouth hath a Towne of his owne name called Kingſton upon Hull, but commonly Hull. This Towne fetcheth the beginning from no great antiquity: For, King Edward the Firſt, who in regard of his Princely vertues deſerveth to bee ranged among the principall and beſt Kings that ever were, having well viewed and conſidered the opportunity of the place which before time was called Wike, had it by right of exchange from the Abbat of Meaux, and in lieu of the * Beaſts ſtals and ſheepe paſtures, as I conceive it, which there he found, built a Towne that he named Kingſton, as one would ſay, The Kings Towne; and there, as wee reade in the Records of the Kingdome, hee made an haven and free Burgh, the Inhabitants thereof alſo, free Burgeſſes, and he granted divers liberties unto them. And by little and little it roſe to that dignity, that for ſtately and ſumptuous buildings, for ſtrong block-houſes, for well furniſhed ſhips, for ſtore of Merchants and abundance of all things it is become now the moſt famous towne of merchandiſe in theſe parts. All which the inhabitants aſcribe partly to Michael de la-Pole, who obtained their priviledges for them, after that King Richard the Second had promoted him to the honour of Earle of Suffolke, and partly their gainfull trade by Iſland fiſh dried and hardened which they tearme Stockfiſh: whereby they gathered a maine maſſe of riches. Hence it came to paſſe, that within a little while, they fenſed their City with a bricke wall, ſtrengthened it with many Towres and Bulwarkes, where it is not defended with the river: and brought ſuch a deale of cobleſtones for ballais to their ſhips, that therewith they have paved all the quarters and ſtreets of the towne moſt

A most beautifully. For the chiefe Magistrate it had (as I have beene enformed) first a Warden or Custos: then Bailives, afterward a Major and Bailives: and in the end they obtained of K. Henry the Sixth that they might have a Major and a Sheriffe, and that the very towne should be a County, as our lawyers use to say incorporate by it selfe. Neither will I thinke it much to note, although in Barbarous tearmes, out of the booke of r Meaux Abbay, as touching the Major of this City. William De la Pole knight, was before time a merchant at Ravens-rod, skilfull in merchandise and inferiour to no English merchant whatsoever. He making his aboade afterwards at Kingston upon Hull, was the first Major that ever the said towne had: he began also and founded the monastery of Saint Michael hard by the said King-ston, which now is an house of the Carthusian or Charter-house B monkes. And he had for his eldest sonne Sir Michael De la Pole Earle of Suffolke, who caused the said Monasterie to bee inhabited by Carthusian Monkes. And verily William De la Pole aforesaid, lent many thousand pounds of gold unto King Edward, whiles hee made his aboade at Antwerp in Brabant, wherefore the King in recompence of the said gold, made him Lord chiefe Baron of his Exchequer, conferred upon him the whole Seignorie or Lordship of Holdernes, together with other lands belonging unto the Crown; and that by the Kings Charter, yea and ordained that he should be reputed a Baronet. Yet if any man make doubt hereof, the Recordes I hope may satisfie him fully, in which William De la Pole is in plaine tearmes called Dilectus Valectus, et Mercator noster, that is, Our wellbeloved Valect and our Merchant: now, Valect, to tell you once for all, was in those daies an honorable ti- C tle as well in France as in England: but afterward applied unto servants and gromes: whereupon when the Gentry rejected it, by changing the name they began to bee called Gentlemen of the Bedchamber.

Valectus or Valectus, L. Tilius.

From Hull, a Promontorie runneth on forward and shooteth out a farre into the sea, which Ptolomee calleth OCELLVM, wee Holderneſſe, and a certaine monke, Cavam Deiram, as it were, the hollow Country of the Deirians, in the same signification that Cœlosyria is so tearmed, as one would say Holow Syria. In this Promontory, the first towne wee meet with in the winding shore is Headon, in times past (if wee list to beleeve fame that useth to amplifie the truth, and which for my part I will not discredit) risen to exceeding great account by the industry of merchants and D sea-faring men: from which (so uncertaine is the condition as well of places as of people) it is so much fallen by the vicinity of Hull, and the choaking up of the haven which hath empoverished it, that it can shew scarce any whit of the ancient state it had. Although King Iohn granted unto Baldwin Earle of Aulbemarle and of Holderneſſe, and to his wife Hawis, free Burgage heere, so that the Burgers might hold in free Burgage, with those customes that Yorke and Nichol, that is, Lincolne. Yet now it beginneth by little and little to revive againe, in hope to recover the former dignity.

Headon.

There standeth hard by the Pomontorie, an ancient towne, which Antonine the Emperour called PRAETORIVM, but we in our age Patrington, like as the Italians E have changed the name of a towne sometime called Prætorium, into Petrovina. That I doe not mistake herein, both the distance from DELGOVITIA, and the very name yet remaining doth prove: which also in some sort implieth, that this is the very same that in Ptolomees copies is written PETVARIA corruptly, for Prætorium. But whether this name were given it, either from Prætorium, that is, the hall of Justice, or from some large and stately house, such as the Romans tearmed Prætoria, it doth not appeare for certaine. The inhabitants glorie much yet as touching their Antiquity and the commodiousnesse of the haven in ancient times: and they may as well glorie for the pleasantnesse thereof. For, it hath a most delectable prospect: on the one side lieth the maine sea brimme upon it, on the other Humber F a famous arme of the sea; and over against it the fresh and greene skirtes of Lincoln-shire. The high way of the Romans from the Picts wall which Antonine the Emperor followed, here endeth. For, Ulpian hath written, that such high waies commonly end at the sea, at rivers, or at Cities.

Prætorium. Patrington.

Somewhat lower standeth Winsted, the habitation of the Hildeards knights of ancient descent: and higher into the Country, Rosse: from whence the honorable family of the Barons Rosse tooke their name, like as they were seated there in times past: and hard by the sea-side, Grimstons-garth: where the Grimstons for a long time have lived in good reputation: and a little from hence standeth Rise, the mansion house in old time of certaine noble men bearing the name of Falconberg. And then, in the very necke of the promontorie, where it draweth in most narrow into a sharpe point, and is called Spurnhead, is KELNSEY a little village: which plainely sheweth that this is the very OCELLVM mentioned by Ptolomee: for, as from OCELLVM Kelnsey is derived: so Ocellum doubtlesse, was made of Y-kill, which as I have said before signifieth in the British tongue a Promontory or narrow necke of land.

Winsted. Barons de Rosse.

Ravenspur and Ravens-burg. Kelnsey.

From Spurn-head, the shore withdraweth it selfe backe by little and little, and gently bending inward shooteth Northward by Overborne and Witherensey two little Churches, called of the sisters that built them Sisters kirks: and not farre from Constable-Burton, so called of the Lords thereof, who being by marriages linked to right honorable houses, flourish at this day in great worship: and out of which familie Robert (as wee read in the booke of the Abbay of Meaux) was one of the Earle of Aulbemarls knights, who being aged and full of daies took upon him the Crosse and went with King Richard in his voiage toward the holy land. Then, by Skipsey, which Dru the first Lord of Holderneſſe fortified with a Castle. When the shore beginneth to spread againe and beare out into the sea, it maketh roome for a bay or creeke, that Ptolomee calleth EYAIMENON GABRANTOVICORUM, which the Latin Interpreters have translated, some PORTUOSVM SINVM, that is, the harborous Creeke; others, SALVTAREM, that is, the safe Creeke. But neither of them both better expresseth the nature of the Greeke word, than the very name of a little village in the nouke thereof, which wee call Sureby. For, that which is safe and sure from danger, the Britans and French men both, terme Seur, as wee Englishmen (sure) who peradventure did borrow this word from the Britans. There is no cause therefore, why we should doubt, but that this creeke was that very EYAIMENON of the GABRANTOVICI, who dwelt there abouts. Hard by, standeth Bridlington a towne very well knowne by reason of Iohn of Bridlington a poeticall monkish prophet whose ridiculous propheſies in Rhime I have read albeit they were not worth the reading. And not farre from hence, for a great length toward Driffield, was there a ditch cast up and brought on by the Earles of Holderneſſe, to confine and bound their lands, which they called Earles Dyke. But whence this little nation here inhabiting were named GABRANTOVICI, I dare not search, unlesse happily it were of goates which the Britans tearme Gaffran, and whereof there is not greater store in al Britain than hereabout. Neither ought this derivation of the name to seeme absurd, seeing that Aegira in Achaia borroweth the name of goats, Nebrodes in Sicily of fallow Deere, and Bœotia in Greece, of Kine and Oxen. That little Promontory which with his bent made this creeke, is commonly called Flamborough head, and in the Saxon tongue Fleam-burg by Authors, who write that Ida the Saxon, who first subdued these Countries, arrived here. Some think it took the name from a watchtowre which did by night put forth a flame or burning light for to direct sailers into the haven. For, the Britans retaine yet out of the provinciall language this word, Flam: and Mariners paint this creeke in their sea-cards with a blazing flame on the head. Yet others are of opinion, that this name arrived in this Island with the English out of Angloen in Denmarke, the ancient seat of the English nation; for, there is a towne called Flemsburg, and that the Englishmen from hence called it so: like as the Gaules, as Livie witnesseth, tearmed Mediolanum, that is, Millan, in Italie, after the name of Mediolanum in Gaule, which they had left behinde them. For, there is a little village in this Promontory named Flamborrough, where an other notable house of the Constables had anciently their seat, which some doe derive from the Lacies Constables of Chester. Beeing in these parts I could learne nothing for all the enquirie that I made, as touching the bournes commonly called

Vipses

A Vipſeys, which (as Walter of Heminburgh hath recorded) flow every other yeere out of blinde ſprings and runne with a forcible and violent ſtreame toward the ſea nere unto this Promontory. Yet take here with you, that which William Newbrigenſis who was borne neare that place writeth of them. Thoſe famous waters which commonly are called Vipſeys, riſe out of the earth from many ſources not continually, but every ſecond yeere, and being growne unto a great bourn runne downe by the lower grounds into the ſea. Which when they are dry, it is a good ſigne: for, their breaking out and flowing is ſaid to bee an infallible token portending ſome dearth to enſue. Vipſeys waters.

From thence the ſhore is drawne in, whereby there runneth forth into the ſea a certaine ſhelfe or ſlang, like unto an out-thruſt tongue, ſuch as Engliſhmen in old
B time termed a File, whereupon the little village there Filey tooke name: and more within the land you ſee Flixton, where, in King Athelſtanes time was built an Hoſpitall, for the defence (thus word for word it is recorded) of way-faring people paſſing that way from Wolves, leaſt they ſhould be devoured. Whereby it appeareth for certaine, that in thoſe daies Wolves made foule worke in this Tract, which now are no where to be ſeene in England, no not in the very marches toward Scotland; and yet within Scotland there be numbers of them in moſt places. Wolves.

This little territory or Seigniory of Holderneſſe, King William the Firſt gave to Drugh Buerer a Fleming, upon whom alſo he had beſtowed his Niece in marriage; whom when hee had made away by poiſon and thereupon fled to ſave himſelfe,
C hee had to ſucceed him Stephen the ſonne of Odo, Lord of Aulbemarle in Normandy who was deſcended from the Earles of Champaigne: whom King William the Firſt becauſe hee was his Nephew by the halfe ſiſter of the mothers ſide, as they write, made Earle of Aulbemarle: whoſe poſterity in England retained the Title, although Aulbemarle be a place in Normandy. His ſucceſſour was William ſirnamed Le Groſſe: whoſe onely daughter Avis was marryed to three husbands one after another, namely to William Magnavill Earle of Eſſex, to Baldwine De Beton, and William Forts, or de Fortibus, by this laſt husband onely ſhee had iſſue William, who alſo had a ſonne named William. His onely daughter Avelin, being the wedded wife of Edmund Crouchbacke, Earle of Lancaſter, dyed without children. And ſo,
D as wee reade in the booke of Meaux Abbay, for default of heires, the Earldome of Aulbemarle and honour of Holderneſſe, were ſeized into the Kings hands. Howbeit in the ages enſuing King Richard the Second created Thomas of Woodſtocke his Unkle, and afterwards Edward Plantagenet Earle of Rutland, the Duke of Yorkes ſonne, Duke of Aulbemarle, in his fathers life time: likewiſe King Henry the Fourth made his owne ſonne Thomas, Duke of Clarence and Earle of Aulbemarle: which Title King Henry the Sixth afterward added unto the ſtile of Richard Beauchamp Earle of Warwicke, for the greater augmentation of his honour. NORTH-RIDING.

SCarce two miles above Flamborrough-head, beginneth the NORTH-RIDING or the North part of this Country, North Riding. which affronting the other parts, and beginning at the Sea, is ſtretched out Weſtward, and carrieth a very long Tract with it (though not ſo broad) for threeſcore miles together, even as farre as to Weſtmorland: limited on the one ſide with Derwent, and for a while with the River Ure, on the other ſide B with Tees running all along it, which on the North Coaſt ſeparateth it from the Biſhopricke of Durrham. And very fitly may this part bee divided into, Blackamore, Cliveland, Northallverton-ſhire, and Richmond-ſhire.

That which lyeth Eaſt, and bendeth toward the Sea is called Blackamore, that is, The blacke mooriſh land: For it is mountanous and craggy. The Sea coaſt thereof, hath Scarborrough Caſtle, for the greateſt ornament a very goodly and famous Scarborrough Caſtle. thing, in old time called Sceap-burg, that is, A Burgh upon the Scar, or ſteepe Rocke. The deſcription whereof have heere out of William of Newburgh his Hiſtory. A Rocke of a wonderfull height and bigneſſe, which by reaſon of ſteepe cragges and cliffes, almoſt C on every ſide is unacceſſible, beareth into the Sea; wherewith it is all compaſſed about, ſave onely a certaine ſtreight in manner of a gullet, which yeeldeth acceſſe, and openeth into the Weſt: having in the toppe a very faire, greene, and large Plaine containing about threeſcore acres of ground or rather more; a little Well alſo of freſh water ſpringing out of a ſtony Rocke. In the foreſaid gullet or paſſage, which a man ſhall have much adoe to aſcend up unto, ſtandeth a ſtately and Princelike Towre: and beneath the ſaid paſſage beginneth the City or Towre, ſpreading two ſides South and North, but having the fore part Weſtward: and verily it is fenſed afront with a wall of the owne: but on the Eaſt fortified with the rocke of the Caſtle: and both the ſides thereof are watered with the Sea. This place William Le Groſſe, Earle of Aulbemarle and Holderneſſe viewing well, and ſeeing it to bee a con- D venient plot for to build a Caſtle upon, helping Nature forward with a very coſtly worke cloſed the whole plaine of the Rocke with a Wall, and built a Towre in the very ſtreight of the paſſage: which being in proceſſe of time fallen downe, King Henry the Second cauſed to be built in the ſame place a great and goodly Caſtle; after hee had now brought under the Nobles of England, who during the looſe government of King Stephen had conſumed the lands of the Crowne: but eſpecially amongſt others, that William aboveſaid of Aulbemarle, who had in this Tract ruled and reigned like a King, and poſſeſſed himſelfe of this place as his owne.

Touching the moſt project boldneſſe of Thomas Stafford, who to the end hee might overthrow himſelfe with great attempts, with a few Frenchmen ſurpriſed E this Caſtle of a ſudden in Queene Maries Raigne and held it for two daies together, I neede not to ſpeake: ne yet of Sherleis, a Gentleman of France, who having accom- See Dier 144. panied him, was judicially endited and convict of high treaſon, albeit he was a forrainer, becauſe hee had done againſt the duty of his Alleageance, the peace then betweene the Kingdome of England and of France being in force. Theſe are matters better knowne than that the World can take notice of them by any writings of mine. Yet may this ſeeme a thing worth my labour and expedient, to note, how the Hol- The gainfull landers and Zelanders uſe to take marveilous plenty of herrings (call them in Latin fiſhing for Herrings. Haleces, Leucomenida, or Chalcides, which of them you pleaſe) upon this coaſt, and make a very gainfull trade thereof, having anciently firſt obtained licence by an an- F cient cuſtome, out of this Caſtle. For the Engliſhmen granted licence to fiſh, reſerving the honour to themſelves, but reſigning for lazineſſe, as it were, the profit unto ſtrangers. For, it is almoſt incredible, what infinite ſummes of money the Hollanders raiſe unto themſelves by this their fiſhing in our ſhore.

These Herrings (pardon me I pray you if briefly by way of digression I doe make mention of Gods goodnesse towards us) which in our great grandfathers dayes kept as it were their station onely about Norway: now in our time not without the divine Providence, swimme yeerely round about this Isle of Britaine by skulles in wonderfull great numbers. About Midsommer they shoole out of the deepe and vast Northren-sea to the coasts of Scotland, at which time becanse they are then at the fattest, they bee streightwaies sold: Thence come they to the English East coast, and from the middest of August unto November, is the best and most plenteous taking of them betweene Scarborrough, and Tamis mouth. A

Afterwards by force of some great storme, they are carryed into the British sea, and there untill Christmas offer themselves to the fishers nettes; from hence dividing themselves and swimming along both sides of Ireland, after they have coasted round about Britaine, they take their course into the Northren Ocean, as their home, and there settle themselves as it were and rest untill June: where after they have cast their spawne and brought forth a yong fry, they returne againe in mighty great skulles and so march about these Isles. Whiles I am writing hereof, that comes into my minde which sometimes I read in Saint Ambrose. Fishes (saith hee) by infinite numbers, meeting, as one would say, by common consent out of many places from sundry creekes of the Sea, with a joint flote, as it were, make toward the blastes of the North winde, and by a certaine direction and instinct of Nature haste into that Sea of the Northren parts. B

Hexameron. lib. 5. cap. 10.

A man that saw the manner of them would say a certaine tide were comming downe from the current, they rush so forward and cut the waves as they passe, with a violent power, through Propontis into Pontus Euxinus. But to my matter againe. C

From thence, the shore indented and interlaced with rockes, bendeth in, as farre as to the River Teise, and by a compasse that the said shore fetcheth, there is made a Bay about a mile broad, which of that Outlaw Robert Hood, so much talked of, wee call Robin Hoods Bay. For hee (as John Major the Scotishman writeth) flourished in the Raigne of Richard the First; and the said Authour setteth him out with this commendation, that Hee was indeed an Arch-Robber but the gentelleſt Theefe that ever was. Then DUNUS SINUS, a creeke mentioned by Ptolomee streightwaies by giving backe of the shore on both sides sheweth it selfe; neere unto which standeth Dunesley a little village, and hard by it, Whitby, in the English Saxon tongue Sυneaneſ-heale; which Beda expoundeth to bee, The Bay of a Watch-Towre. Neither will I call that interpretation into question, although in our language it doth resemble Sinum Salutis, that is, The Bay of health; so, that I would say this very same was Salutaris Sinus, that is, The Bay of safety, but that the situation in the Geographer did perswade me otherwise. Heere are found certaine stones fashioned like Serpents folded and wrapped round as in a wreathe even the very pastimes of Nature disporting her selfe: who, as one saith, when shee is wearied as it were with serious workes, forgeth and shapeth some things by way of game and recreation. A man would thinke verily they had beene sometime Serpents, which, a coat or crust of stone had now covered all over. But people too credulous ascribe this to the Praiers of Saint Hilda, as if shee had thus transformed and changed them: who in our Primitive Church withstood to her power the shoring and shaving of Priests, and the celebration of Easter according to the order of Rome, when a Synode was held touching these matters in the yeere of our Lord 664. in the Abbay which shee had built in this place, and whereof herselfe was first Governesse. Unto whose holinesse also they ascribe, that those wilde Geese, which in Winter time flye by flockes unto Pooles and Rivers that are not frozen over, in the South parts; whiles they flye over certaine fields heere adjoyning, suddenly fall downe to the ground, to the exceeding great admiration of all men: a thing that I would not have related, had I not heard it from very many persons of right good credit. But such as are not given to superstitious credulity, attribute this unto a secret propriety of this ground, and to an hidden dissent between this soile and those geese, such such as is betweene wolves and Squilla rootes. For provident Nature hath infused such like secret mutuall combinations, and contrarieties, which the learned tearme Sympathies and Antipathies, as all men acknowledge, for their preservation. Afterwards Edelfleda King Oswins daughter enriched this Abbay with most large revenewes, where also shee solemnized her fathers funerall obsequies. But at length the Danes robbing and spoiling where ever they came, utterly overthrew it: and although Serle Percie reedified it, being immediately upon the comming in of the Normans head-ruler of the same, yet now it scarce affordeth any footing at all of the ancient dignity. Hard by, upon a steepe hill, howbeit betweene two others higher than it, toward the Sea, stood by report, the Castle of Wada a Saxon Duke, who in that confused Anarchy of the Northumbers, and massacre of Princes and Nobles, having combined with those that murdred King Ethered, gave battaile unto King Ardulph at Whalley in Lancashire: but with so disasterous successe, that after his owne power was discomfited and put to flight, himselfe was faine to flie: and afterwards by a languishing sickneſſe ended his life; and heere within the hill betweene two entire and solid stones about seven foote high lieth entombed: which stones because they stand eleven foote asunder, the people doubt not to affirme, that hee was a mighty Giant. Neere unto this place, long time after, Peter * de Maloulacy built a Castle, which being full as it were of grace and beauty he named in French Moult-Grace, as wee reade in the History of Meaulx, but because it became a most grievous yoke unto the neighbour Inhabitants, the people masters alwaies of our usuall speech, by change of one letter termed it Moult-grave, by which name although the reason thereof be not so well knowne, the world takes knowledge of it. This Peter de Mololacu, commonly called Mauley (that I may in this point satisfie the curious) borne in Poictou in France, marryed the onely daughter of Robert de Turnham, in the Raigne of King Richard the First: in whose right he entred upon a very great inheritance heere: after whom succeeded in order seven Peters called Lords Mauley: who give for their Armes A Bend Sables in an Eschocheon Or. But when the seventh dyed issueleſſe, this the Manours of Doncaster, Bainton, Brideſalle, &c. were parted by the sisters, betweene the families of the Salvains and Bigots.

Neere unto this place, as elsewhere in this shore, is found blacke Amber or Geate: Some take it to be Gagates, which in old time they held to be one of the rare gems and precious stones. It groweth among the cliffes and rockes, where they chinke and gape asunder. Before it be polished, it is of a reddish and rusty colour: but after it bee once polished, it becommeth, as saith Solinus, as a * Gemme of a bright radiant blacke colour. Touching which, Rhemnius Palæmon out of Dionysius Afer thus verſifieth:

Geat. Jet

Gagates.

* Others are of opinion that our pit cole or stone cole was the old Gagates.

Præfulget nigro ſplendore Gagates.
Hic lapis ardeſcens auſtro perfuſus aquarum,
Aſt oleo perdens flammas, mirabile viſu
Attritus rapit his teneras ſeu ſuccina frondes.

The Geat is blacke and shineth passing bright,
Which Stone in water dipt and drencht, takes fire and burneth light,
In oile, a wonder for to see, the flame is quickly done,
And like to Amber rub it hard, small stickes it catcheth soone.

And Marbodæus in his little booke of precious stones,

Naſcitur in Lycia lapis, & prope gemma Gagates,
Sed genus eximium fœcunda Britannia mittit,
Lucidus & niger eſt, levis & leviſſimus idem:
Vicinas paleas trahit attritu calefactus,
Ardet aqua lotus, reſtinguitur unctus olivo.

Geat

Geat is a Stone, and Gemme well nere, that men in Lycia finde,
But fruitfull Britan yeelds the beſt ſimply of all that kinde.
Of colour blacke, yet bright it is, moſt ſmoothe and light withall;
Well rubbed and enchauf'd thereby, thin ſtrawes and reſcues ſmall
That are neere hand it drawes thereto: it burnes in water drencht, Annoint the ſame with fatty oile, the flame ſtreigthwaies is quencht.

Heare alſo what Solinus ſaith; In Britaine there is great ſtore of Gagates, or Geat, and an excellent ſtone it is: If you demand the colour, it is a bright radiant blacke: if the quality, it is in manner nothing weighty: If the nature, it burneth in water, and is quenched with oile: if the vertue, being made hote with rubbing, it holdeth ſuch things as are applied thereto. From Whitby the ſhore gives backe Weſtward: by which lyeth Cliveland, taking that name as it ſeemeth of ſteepe bankes, which in our language wee call Cliffes; for, there runne all along the ſide thereof cliffie hilles; at the foote of which, the country ſpreadeth into a Plaine full of fertile fields.

Cliveland.

Upon the ſhore, Sken grave a little Village is much benefited by taking great ſtore of fiſh: where alſo, by report, was caught a Sea-man about 70. yeeres ſince, that for certaine daies together fed of raw fiſhes: but eſpying his opportunity eſcaped away unto his proper element againe. Whenſoever the windes are laied, and that upon ſtill weather the ſea is moſt calme, and the water lieth as one would ſay levell and plaine without any noiſe: there is heard heere many times on a ſudden a great way off, as it were, an horrible and a fearefull groning: at which time the fiſhermen dare not launch out farre into the deepe, as beleeving according to their ſhallow reach, that the Ocean is a fell and cruell beaſt, and being then very hungry deſireth greedily in that ſort to devoure mens bodies. Beneath Sken-grave, is ſituate Kilton Caſtle within a Parke, which belonged ſometime to the habitation of the Thwengs, whoſe patrimony deſcended to the Barons of Lumley, Hilton, and Daubeneie: And there joyneth almoſt cloſe unto it Skelton Caſtle, appertaining to the ancient family of the Barons Brus, who derive their deſcent from Robert Brus the Norman. The ſaid Robert had two ſonnes, Adam Lord of Skelton, and Robert of Anan-dale in Scotland: from whom is deſcended the royall ſtem of Scotland. But Peter Brus the fifth Lord of Skelton died without iſſue, and left his ſiſters to inherite: namely Agnes, wife to Walter Falconberg: Lucie, wedded to Marmaduke Thweng, of whom is come the Baron Lumley: Margaret, married to Robert Ros; and Laderina to John Belle-eau, men in that age of honourable reputation. The heires ſucceſſively of Walter Falconberg flouriſhed a long time; but in the end by a female, the poſſeſſions came to Sir William Nevill, who was a redoubted Knight for martiall proweſſe, and by King Edward the Fourth advanced to the title of Earle of Kent. And his daughters were beſtowed in marriage upon Sir John Cogniers, N. Bedhowing, and R. Strangwaies.

Neere unto Hunt-cliffe, and not farre from the ſhore there appeare aloft at a vale water certaine Rockes, about which the fiſhes that wee call Seales, ſhort (as ſome thinke) for Sea-veales, meete together in droves to ſleepe and ſunne themſelves: and upon that rocke which is next unto the ſhore, there lieth one, as it were to keepe the Centinell: and as any man approcheth neere, he either by throwing downe a big ſtone, or by tumbling himſelfe into the water with a great noiſe, giveth a ſignall to the reſt to looke unto themſelves and get into the water. Moſt affraid they bee of men: againſt whom when they chaſe them, they being deſtitute of water fling backeward with their hinder feete a cloud, as it were, of ſand and gravell ſtones, yea and often times drive them away: For women they care not ſo much: and therefore whoſoever would take them, uſe to bee clad in womens apparell. In the ſame coaſt are found ſtones, ſome of yellowiſh, others of a reddiſh colour, and ſome againe with a rough caſt cruſt over them of a certaine ſalt matter, which by their ſmell and taſte make ſhew of Coperoſe, Nitre, and Brimſtone: and alſo great ſtore of Marqueſites in colour reſembling braſſe.

In which, if you breake them, are found ſtony ſerpents enwrapped round like a wreath, but moſt of them are headles. Then ſee you from thence Wilton Caſtle, ſometime the Bulmers: and above it at Dobham the river Tees voideth into the Sea after it hath lodged ſundry rivers, and at the laſt one that is nameleſſe, beſide Yare a mercate towne well knowne, which river watereth Stokeſley, a little mercate towne, likewiſe that hath a long time appertained to the Noble family of Eure. Foure miles from this Tees mouth, ſtandeth Gisburgh on high; now a ſmall towne, but whiles it ſtood in flouriſhing eſtate, it was right glorious for a very faire and rich Abbay, built by Robert de Brus, Lord of the place, about the yeere of our Salvation 1119, and for the common buriall place of all the gentry and nobility in this tract; which alſo brought forth Walter de Hemingford no unlearned Hiſtorio-

This verily is a paſſing good place, and may well for pleaſantneſſe, delightſome variety, and rare gifts of Nature, contend with Puteoli in Italy, which in regard of healthy ſituation it alſo farre excelleth. The aire is mollified and made more mild by the mountaines ſeated betweene it, and what way the ſea yeeldeth a cold and winterly diſpoſition: the ſoile fruitfull and plenteous in graſſe affordeth delectable floures a great part of the yeere, and richly aboundeth with vaines of metall and Alum-earth of ſundry colours, but eſpecially of ocher and murray, likewiſe of iron, out of which they have now begunne to try very good Alum, and Coperoſe. Not farre off, Onusbery or Roſebery Topping mounteth up a mighty height, and maketh a goodly ſhew a farre off, ſerving unto ſailers for a marke of direction, and to the neighbour inhabitants for a prognoſtication: For, ſo often as the head thereof hath his cloudy cap on, lightly there followeth raine: whereupon they

Farther within the country among the mountaines of Blacamore, there offereth it ſelfe (beſides wandering beakes and violent ſwift brookes, which challenge the vallies every where, as their owne to paſſe through) no memorable thing, unleſſe it be Pickering; a good bigge towne belonging to the Dutchy of Lancaſter, ſituate upon an hill and fortified with an old Caſtle, unto which a number of ſmall villages lying there round about doe appertaine: whereupon the country adjoyning is commonly called Pickering Lith, The Libertie of Pickering, and Foreſt of Pickering, the which King Henry the Third gave unto his younger ſonne Edmund, Earle of Lancaſter. Wherein, neere unto the river Derwent ſtandeth Atton, that gave name unto the right noble family of the Attons Knights, deſcended from the Lords Veſcy: the inheritance of which family, was by the daughters parted betweene Edward Saint Iohn, the Evers, and the Coigniers. Now from Edward Saint Iohn a great portion thereof came by a daughter to Henrie Bromflet. Which Henrie verily was ſummoned to the High court of Parliament by theſe expreſſe termes, elſewhere not to be found in Summons. Our Will is, that both yee and your heires males, of your body lawfully iſſuing, be Barons of Veſcy. Afterwards, that title paſſed away by a daughter to the Cliffords. On the otherſide, foure miles from Pickering, neere unto Dow, a ſwift running riveret, lieth Kirkby-Morſide hard unto the hilles, whereof it had that name, a Market towne not of the meaneſt reckoning, and the poſſeſſion ſometime of the Eſtotevilles.

27. Hen. 6. Bromfleet Lord Veſcy.

Behind theſe, Weſtward, Rhidal lieth low, a goodly, pleaſant and plentifull vale adorned with three and twenty Pariſh-churches, through the mids wherof runneth the river Rhie: A place (as ſaith William of Newburrough) waſt, deſolate, and full of horrour, before that Walter Eſpec had granted it to the Monkes of the Cluniak order, and founded there an Abbay. In this vale is Elmeſly ſeated, which, if I deceive not my ſelfe, Bede called Vlmetum; where, that Robert called de Roſſe, ſurnamed Furſan built a Caſtle; nere unto which the river Recall hideth it ſelfe under the ground. More beneath, hard by the river ſide ſtandeth Riton, an ancient poſſeſſion of the ancient familie of the Percibaies, commonly named Percies. From thence Rhie carrieth with him the ſtreames of many a brooke into Derwent, which watereth in this vale Malton a Market towne well knowne and frequented, for corne, horſes, fiſh, and implements of husbandry: where are to be ſeene the foundations of an old Caſtle, belonging, as I have heard ſay, in old time to the Veſcies, Barons in theſe parts of great eſtate and honor. Their pedigree as appeareth evidently by the Kings records, is derived from William Tyſon, who being Lord of Malton and of Alnewicke in Northumberland, was ſlain in the battaile at Haſtings againſt the Normans. Whoſe onely daughter was given in marriage to Ivo de Veſcy a Norman, and hee left behind him his only daughter likewiſe named Beatrice, with whō Euſtach the ſon of Fitz Iohn * with one eie contracted marriage, who in the raigne of Stephen founded the religious houſes at Malton, and Watton. For, his ſecond wife daughter to William, Conſtable of Cheſter, was Ladie of Watton. William the ſonne of Euſtach by Beatrice, being ripped out of his mothers wombe, aſſumed unto him the name of Veſcy, and the Armes, a Croſſ-floury Argent, in a ſhield Gueles. This William begat of Beatrice daughter to Robert Eſtotevill of Knaresburg, two ſonnes, Euſtach de Veſcy, who tooke to wife Margaret daughter to William King of the Scots, and Sir Warin de Veſcy Lord

A Lord of Knapton. As for Euſtach, father hee was of William, who begat John, that died without iſſue, and William, ſo renowned for his exploits in Ireland; and theſe changed the Armes of their houſe, into a ſhield Or with a croſſe Sables. But William, after that his legitimate ſonne John, died in the warre of Wales, granted unto King Edward certaine lands in Ireland, that his illegitimate ſonne William ſurnamed of Kildare, might inherit his fathers eſtate. And hee ordained Anthony Bek Biſhop of Durrham his feofie in truſt to the uſe of his ſonne: but he was ſcarce truſty as touching Alnewic, Eltham in Kent, and other lands; which he is reported to have conveied indirectly to his owne uſe. This illegitimate ſonne young Veſcy was ſlaine in the Battaile of Sterling in Scotland. And at length the title fell backe unto the B line of the Attons, conſidering that Margaret the only daughter of Sir Gwarin Veſcy was wedded unto Gilbert de Atton. But, heereof enough if not too much, and of it I have ſpoken before. Neere unto this vale there flouriſhed two famous Abbaies, Newborrough (unto which we are indebted for William of Newborrough, a learned and diligent writer of the Engliſh Hiſtorie) now, the habitation of the worſhipfull family of Bellaſiſe, deſcended out of the Biſhopricke of Durrham: and Bellelanda commonly Biland, both founded and endowed by Robert Mowbray. This family of the Mowbraies was for power, nobility, and wealth comparable to any other, and poſſeſſed very faire lands with the Caſtles of Slingesby, Threske, and others in this Tract. The originall of this race if you deſire to underſtand, I will compendiouſly C ſet it downe. When Roger de Mowbray Earle of Northumberland, and R.* de Grunde-beoſe for their diſloialtie were diſſeſed of all their poſſeſſions, King Henry the Firſt beſtowed a great part thereof upon Nigell, or Niele de Albenie of the ſame family that the Albeneis Earles of Arundell were deſcended; a man of very high birth in Normandie, who had bin Bowbearer to King William Ruſus: and ſo enriched him thereby, that he held in England 140. Knights fees, and in Normandie 120. He commanded alſo that Roger his ſonne ſhould aſſume the name of Mowbray: from whom flowred out the Mowbraies Earles of Nottingham, and Dukes of Norfolke. To theſe Mowbraies alſo belonged in times paſt Gilling Caſtle ſtanding hard by: but now unto that ancient and worſhipfull family, which of their faire buſh of haire got D their name Fairfax. For Fax in the old Engliſh tongue ſignifieth haires, or the haire of the head: whereupon our progenitours called a Comet or blaſing ſtarre, A Faxed ſtarre, like as a place, whereof I have ſpoken before, Haly-fax, of holy haires.

Then beneath theſe, Southward, lieth Calaterium Nemus, commonly called, The Foreſt of Galtres, ſhaded in ſome places with trees, in other ſome a wet flat, full of moiſt and mooriſh quavemires: very notorious in theſe daies by reaſon of a ſolemne horſe running, wherein the horſe that outrunneth the reſt hath for his priſe a little golden bell. It is almoſt incredible what a multitude of people conflow hither from all parts to theſe games, and what great wagers are laid on the horſes heads for their ſwift running. In this Foreſt ſtandeth Creac, which Egfrid King E of Northumberland in the yeer 684, gave with three miles round about unto Saint Cuthbert: by whom it came to the Church of Durrham. Scarce foure miles hence is ſituate moſt pleaſantly among little woods and groves Sherry-Hutton, a very proper Caſtle built by Sir Bertrand Bulmer, and reedified by Raulph Nevil, the firſt Earle of Weſtmorland. Neere unto which ſtandeth Hinderskell a little Caſtle, built by the Barons of Greyſtocke, which others call Hunderd-skell, of a number of fountaines that ſpring up and riſe there.

A ſolemne Horſe-running.

Behind the hilles Weſtward, where the country ſpreadeth it ſelfe out againe into a more freſh and plaine champion, lieth Alverton-ſhire, commonly called Northallerton-ſhire, a little countrie watered with the riveret Wiske, and taking the name of F Northalverton a towne, ſometime called Ealpertun, which is nothing elſe but a long broad ſtreet; howbeit, having in it on S. Bartholomewes day the greateſt Faire of Kine and Oxen, and of moſt reſort, that ever I ſaw in all my life. King William Ruſus gave this with the territory adjoining unto the Church of Durrham, to the Biſhops of which See it is very much beholden. For, William Comin who by force held the

Biſhopricke

Biſhopricke of Durrham, built the Caſtle there, and granted it unto his nephew, which now is in manner quite decaied and gone. The Biſhops likewiſe his ſucceſſors granted unto it certaine liberties and immunities. For, in the Booke of Durrham we read that Hugh Pudſey Biſhop of Durrham fortified the towne, having obtained licence of the King, that among thoſe unlawfull caſtles, which by Commandement were then deſtroyed in many places of England, this onely ſhould have the priviledge to ſtand ſtill: which notwithſtanding, the King commanded afterward to be layd even with the ground. Hard by this, was that field foughten, which they commonly call the Battaile of the Standard: in which, David King of Scots, who with his unexampled cruelty had made this country almoſt a wilderneſſe, was after ſo great a ſlaughter of his people put to flight; that then and never before our countrimen thought they were fully revenged. For, that indeed came to paſſe in this battaile, which Raulfe the Biſhop ſaid, when before the battaile in an oration he encouraged the Engliſh to fight: A confuſed multitude untrained, is an impediment to it ſelfe, in proſperous ſucceſſe to hurt others; and in adverſe fortune, to eſcape it ſelfe. This was called The battaile of the Standard, becauſe the Engliſh keeping themſelves cloſe together about the ſtandard received the firſt onſet and ſhock of the Scotiſh, endured it, and at length put them to flight. And this Standard as I have ſeene it pictured in ancient bookes, was a mighty huge chariot ſupported with wheeles, wherein was ſet a pole of a great height in manner of a maſt, and upon the very top thereof ſtood a croſſe to bee ſeene, and under the croſſe hung a banner. This when it was advanced was a token, that every one ſhould prepare himſelfe to fight, and it was reputed as an holy and ſacred altar that each man was to defend with all power poſſible, reſembling the ſame for al the world that Carrocium of the Italians, which might never be brought abroad but in the greateſt extremitie and danger of the whole ſtate.

Within this litle ſhire alſo, Threske, commonly called Thruske is worth to bee mentioned: which had ſometime a moſt ſtrong Caſtle out of which Roger Mowbray diſplaied his banner of rebellion, and called in the king of Scots to the overthrow of his owne native Country: what time as King Henry the Second had raſhly and inconſiderately digged, as it were, his owne grave, by inveſting his ſonne King, in equall authority with himſelfe. But this rebellion was in the end quenched with blood, and this Caſtle quite diſmantled: ſo that beſide a ditch and rampire, I could ſee nothing there of a Caſtle. Another firebrand alſo of rebellion flamed out heere in the Raigne of Henry the Seventh. For when the unruly Commons tooke it moſt grievouſly that a light ſubſidie granted by the States of the Kingdome in Parliament, was exacted of them, and had driven away the Collectors thereof, forthwith (as it is commonly ſeene that Raſhneſſe ſpeeding once well can never keepe a meane nor make an end) they violently ſet upon Henry Percie, Earle of Northumberland, who was Lieutenant of theſe parts, and ſlew him in this place: and having John Egremond to be their leader, tooke armes againſt their Country and their Prince: but a few daies after they felt the ſmart of their lawleſſe inſolency grievouſly and juſtly as they had deſerved. Heere hard by are Soureby and Brakenbake, belonging to a very ancient and right worſhipfull family of the Laſcelles: alſo more Southward Sezay, ſometime of the Darels (from whence a great family branched) and afterwards the Dannies who for a long time flouriſhed heere maintaining the degree and dignity of Knights right worthily.

Earle of Northumberland ſlaine by Rebells.

The firſt and onely Earle of Yorke (after William Mallet, and one or two Eſtoteuils of the Norman bloud, who they ſay were Sheriffes by inheritance) was Otho ſonne to Henry Leo Duke of Bavar and Saxony, by Maude the daughter of Henry the Second, King of England, who was afterwards proclaimed Emperour and ſtiled by the name of Otho the fourth. From whoſe brother William, another ſonne of Maud, are deſcended the Dukes of Brunſwicke and Luneburgh in Germanie, who for a token of this their kinred with the Kings of England give the ſame Armes that the firſt Kings of England of Norman bloud bare, to wit two Leopards or Lions Or, in a ſhield Gueles. Long after, King Richard the Second created Edmund of Langley, fifth ſonne Earles and Dukes of Yorke.

A ſonne of King Edward the Third, Duke of Yorke: who by a ſecond daughter of Peter King of Caſtile and of Leon had two ſonnes. Edward the eldeſt, in his fathers life time, was firſt Earle of Cambridge, afterwards Duke of Aumarle, and in the end Duke of Yorke; who manfully fighting in the battaile at Agincourt in France loſt his life, leaving no children: and Richard his ſecond ſonne Earle of Cambridge, who having marryed Anne ſiſter of Edmund Mortimer, whoſe grandmother likewiſe was the onely daughter of Leonell Duke of Clarence, and practiſing to advance Edmund his wives brother to the royall dignity, was ſtreightwaies intercepted and beheaded, as if hee had beene corrupted by the French to deſtroy King Henry the Fifth. Earle of March.

B Sixteene yeeres after, his ſonne Richard, was reſtored in bloud through the exceeding, but unadviſed favour of King Henry the Sixth: as being ſonne to Richard Earle of Cambridge brother to Edward Duke of Yorke, and cozin alſo to Edmund Earle of March. And now being Duke of Yorke, Earle of March and of Ulſter, Lord of Wigmore, Clare, Trim, and Conaght, hee bare himſelfe ſo lofty, that ſhortly hee made claime openly in Parliament, againſt King Henry the Sixth, as in his owne right, for the Crowne: which he had cloſely affected by indirect courſes before in making complaints of the miſgovernment of the State, ſpreading ſeditious rumours, ſcattering Libels abroad, complotting ſecret Conſpiracies, and ſtirring up tumults, yea and open Warres: laying downe his Title thus, as being the ſonne of Anne Mortimer, who came of Philip the daughter and ſole heire of Leonel Duke of Clarence, third ſonne of King Edward the Third, and therefore to be preferred by very good right, in ſucceſſion of the Kingdome, before the children of John of Gaunt the fourth ſonne of the ſaid Edward the Third. And when anſwere was made unto him, that the Nobles of the Realme and the Duke himſelfe had ſworne Alleageance unto the King, that the Kingdome by authority of Parliament had beene conferred and entailed upon Henry the Fourth and his heires; that the Duke claiming his Title, from the Duke of Clarence never tooke upon him the Armes of the Duke of Clarence, that Henry the Fourth held the Crowne in right from King Henry the Third; hee eaſily avoyded all theſe allegations: namely, that the ſaid oath unto the King D taken by mans law was in no wiſe to bee performed, when as it tended to the ſuppreſſion of the truth and right, which ſtand by the Law of God: That, there was no need of Parliamentary authority to entaile the Crowne and Kingdome unto the Lancaſtrians, neither would they themſelves ſeeke for it ſo, if they had ſtood upon any right thereunto. As for the Armes of the Duke of Clarence which were his by right hee forbare of purpoſe to give them untill then, like as hee did, to claime his right to the Imperiall Crowne: And as for the right or Title derived from king Henry the Third, it was a meere ridiculous deviſe and manifeſt untruth to cloake the violent uſurpation of Henry the Fourth, and therefore condemned of all men. Albeit theſe plees in the behalfe of the Duke of Yorke ſtood directly with law: E yet, for remedy of imminent dangers the matter was ordered thus by the wiſdome of the Parliament: That Henry the Sixth ſhould enjoy the right of the Kingdome for tearme of life onely and that Richard Duke of Yorke ſhould be proclaimed heire apparant of the Kingdome, he and his heires to ſucceed after him: provided alwaies, that neither of them ſhould plot or practiſe ought to the deſtruction of the other. Howbeit the Duke immediately was tranſported ſo headlong with ambition, that hee went about to preoccupate and foreſtall his owne hopes, and ſo hee raiſed that deadly Warre betweene the Houſes of Yorke and Lancaſter, diſtinguiſhed by the white and red Roſe, wherein himſelfe ſoone after loſt his life at Wakefield, King Henry F the Sixth was foure times taken Priſoner, and in the end deſpoiled both of his Kingdome and life. Edward Earle of March ſonne to the ſaid Richard, obtained the Crowne, and being depoſed from the ſame, recovered it againe (thus inconſtant fortune diſported herſelfe, lifting up and throwing downe Princes at her pleaſure) many Princes of the royall bloud, and a number of the Nobility loſt their lives: thoſe here-

RICH-

RICHMOND-SHIRE.

THE reſt of this Country which lyeth toward the North-Weſt and carryeth a great compaſſe, is called Richmond-ſhire, or Richmoun-ſhire, taking the name from a Caſtle, which Alan Earle of little Britaine had built: unto whom William the Conquerour gave this Shire (which before time belonged to Eadwin an Engliſhman) by theſe ſhort letters Patents as it is ſet downe in the booke of Richmond Fees. I William ſirnamed Baſtard, King of England, doe give and grant unto thee my Nephew Alane Earle of Britaine, and to thine heires for ever, all and every the Manour houſes and lands which late belonged to Earle Eadwin in Yorke-ſhire, with the Knights fees and other liberties and cuſtomes, as freely and in as honourable wiſe, as the ſaid Eadwin held the ſame: Given at our Leaguer before the City of Yorke. He was his ſonne in law.

This Shire moſt of it lieth very high, with ragged rockes and ſwelling mountaines, whoſe ſloping ſides in ſome places beare good graſſe, the bottomes and vallies are not altogether unfruitfull. The hilles themſelves within, are ſtored with lead, pit-coale, and Coper. For, in a Charter of king Edward the Fourth, there is mention made of a Mine or Delfe of Copper, neere unto the very towne of Richmond. But coveteouſneſſe, which driveth men even as farre as to hell hath not yet pierced into theſe hilles, affrighted perchance with the difficulty of carriage: whereas there have beene found in the tops of theſe mountaines, as alſo in other places ſtones like unto ſea winkles or cockles and other ſea fiſh, if they be not the wonders of nature, I will with Oroſius a Chriſtian Hiſtoriographer deeme them to be undoubted tokens of the generall deluge that ſurrounded the face of the whole earth in Noahs time. When the Sea (ſaith he) in Noahs daies overflowed all the earth, and brought a generall flood, ſo that the whole Globe thereof, being therewith ſurrounded and covered, there was one face, as of the Firmament, ſo alſo of the Sea. The ſoundeſt Writers moſt evidently teach, That all mankinde periſhed, a few perſons excepted, who by vertue of their faith were reſerved alive for offſpring and propagation. Howbeit even they alſo have witneſſed that ſome there had beene, who although they were ignorant of the times paſt, and knew not the Authour himſelfe of times, yet gathered conjecturally as much by giving a gueſſe by thoſe rough ſtones, which wee are wont to finde on hilles remote from the Sea, reſembling Cocles and Oiſters, yea and oftentimes eaten in hollow, with the waters. Copper, lead, and ſtone-cole, or pit-cole. Stone cocles and winkles.

Where this Country bordereth upon Lancaſhire; amongſt the mountaines it is in moſt places ſo waſte, ſolitary, unpleaſant, and unſightly, ſo mute and ſtill alſo, that the borderers dwelling thereby have called certaine Riverets creeping this way, Hell-beckes. But eſpecially that, about the head of the River Ure, which having a Bridge over it of one entire ſtone falleth downe ſuch a depth, that it ſtriketh in a certaine horror to as many as looke downe. And in this Tract there be ſafe harbors for Goates and Deere, as well red as fallow, which for their huge bigneſſe with their ragged and branching hornes are moſt ſightly. Hell-beckes.

The River Ure, which wee have often ſpoken of before, hath his fall heere out of the Weſterne Mountaines; and firſt of all cutting through the middeſt of the Vale called Wenſedale, whiles it is yet but ſmall as being neere unto his Spring-head, where great flockes of Sheepe doe paſture, and which in ſome places beareth Lead ſtones plentifully, is encreaſed by a little River comming out of the South called Baint, which with a great noiſe ſtreameth out of the Poole Semer. At the very place where theſe Rivers meete, and where there ſtand a few ſmall Cotages which of the firſt Bridge made over Ure, they call Baintbrig, there lay in old time a Gariſon of the Romanes: whereof the very Reliques are at this day remaining. For, on the toppe of an hill, which of a Fort, or Burge they now call Burgh, appeare the groundworkes of an ancient Hold, containing about five acres Wenſedale.

of ground in compaſſe; and beneath it Eaſtward, many tokens of ſome old habitation and dwelling places. Where, amongſt many other ſignes of Roman Antiquity, I have ſeene of late this fragment of an antique Inſcription in a very faire letter, with Winged Victory ſupporting the ſame.

By this we may gueſſe, that the ſaid hold at Burgh, was in times paſt named BRACCHIUM, which before time had been made of turfe, but now built with ſtone and the ſame layed with good morter. Alſo, that the ſixth Cohort of the Nervians lay there in Gariſon who may ſeeme to have had alſo their place of Summeraboade in that high hill hard by fenſed with a banke and trench about it, which now they tearme Ethelbury. And not long ſince, there was digged up the Statue of Aurelius Commodus the Emperour: who, as Lampridius writeth, was ſirnamed by his flattering clawbackes, BRITANNICUS, even when the Britans would have elected an Emperour againſt him. And then it may ſeeme, was this Statue of his ſet up, when he prizing himſelfe more than a man, proceeded to that folly, that he gave commandement he ſhould be called, The Romane Hercules, Iupiters ſonne. For, hee was portraied in the habite of Hercules, and his right hand armed with a club: under which there lay, as I have heard, ſuch a mangled Inſcription as this, broken heere and there with voide places betweene: the draught whereof was badly taken out, and before I came hither was utterly ſpoiled.

A This was to be ſeene in Nappa, an houſe built with turrets, and the chiefe ſeat of the Medcalfs, thought to be at this day the greateſt family for multitude of the ſame name, in all England: for, I have heard that Sir Chriſtopher Medcalfe knight, and the top of this kinred beeing of late high-Sheriffe of the ſhire, accompanied with three hundred men of the ſame houſe all on horsback and in a livery, met and received the Juſtices of Aſſizes, and ſo brought them to Yorke. From hence runneth Ure downe a maine, full of Creiſiſhes, ever ſince Sir Chriſtopher Medcalfe in our remembrance brought that kinde of fiſh hither out of the South part of England: and betweene two rockes, whereof the place is named Ait-ſcarre, it runneth head long downe, not far from Bolton, a ſtately Caſtle, the ancient ſeat of the Barons Scrops, and
B which Richard Lord le Scrope, and Chancellour of England under king Richard the Second built with exceeding great coſte: and now bending his courſe Eaſtward, commeth to Midelham, the honour, whereof (as wee reade in the Genealogie or Pedegree of the Nevils) Alan Earle of Richmond beſtowed upon his younger brother Rinebald, with all the lands, which before their comming belonged to Gilpatrick the Dane. His nephew by his ſonne Raulph, named Robert Fitz-Raulph, had all Wenſidale alſo by gift of Conen Earle of Britaine and of Richmond: and at Midleham raiſed a moſt ſtrong Caſtle. His ſonne Ranulph erected a little Abbay for Chanons at Coverham (called now ſhort, Corham) in Coverdale: whoſe ſonne Raulph
C had a daughter named Mary, who being wedded to Robert Lord Nevill with this marriage, tranſlated this very faire and large inheritance as her portion into the family of Nevils. Which Robert Nevill having had many children by his wife, was taken in adultery unknowne; and by the husband of the adultereſſe: being for revenge bereft of his genitours, ſhortly after dyed with extremity of paine.

Then Ure after it hath paſſed a few miles forward watereth Iervis or Iorvalle Abbay of Ciſtertians founded firſt at Fors, and after tranſlated hither by Stephen Earle of Britaine and Richmond, but now wholly ruinated; and after that, Maſham, which was the poſſeſſion of the Scropes of Maſham; who as they ſprung from the ſtocke of the Scropes of Bolton, ſo they were by marriages ingraffed againe into the ſame. On the other ſide of this River but more inward ſtandeth Snath, the principall houſe of D the Barons Latimer, who derived their noble deſcent from George Nevill, younger ſonne of Raulph Nevill the firſt Earle of Weſtmorland, and he received this Title of honour from king Henry the Sixth; when as the ancienter houſe of the Latimers expired in a female, and ſo by a continued ſucceſſion they have flouriſhed unto theſe our daies: when for default of male iſſue of the laſt Baron Latimer, that goodly and rich inheritance was divided among his daughters, marryed into the families of the Percies, Cecils, D'anvers and Cornwallis. Neither are there any other places in this part of the ſhire worth the naming that Ure runneth by, unleſſe it bee Tanfeld, the habitation in times paſt of the Gernegans knights: from whom it deſcended to the E Marmions: the laſt of whom left for his heire Amice ſecond wife to John Lord Grey of Rotherfeld: by whom he had two ſonnes; John that aſſumed the ſirname of Marmion and died iſſueleſſe: and Robert who left behinde him one onely daughter and ſole heire Elizabeth, wife to Sir Henry Fitz-Hugh, a noble Baron.

After this, Ure entertaineth the River Swale, ſo called (as Th. Spot writeth) of his ſwiftneſſe, unlading it ſelfe, into it with a maine and violent ſtreame: which Swale runneth downe Eaſtward out of the Weſt Mountaines alſo, ſcarce five miles above the head of Ure: a River reputed very ſacred amongſt the ancient Engliſh, for that in it, when the Engliſh Saxons firſt embraced Chriſtianity, there were in one day baptized with feſtivall joy by Paulinus the Archbiſhop of Yorke, above
F tenne thouſand men, beſides women and little children. This Swale paſſeth downe along an open Vale of good largeneſſe, which of it is called Swal-dale; having good plenty of graſſe, but as great want of wood: firſt, by Marrick, where there ſtood an Abbay, built by the Askes men in old time of great name: alſo by Mask, a place full of lead ore.

Then runneth it through Richmond, the chiefe towne of the Country, having but a ſmall a ſmall circuit of walles, but yet by reaſon of the Suburbs lying out in length at three Gates well peopled and frequented. Which, Alan the firſt Earle thereof built, repoſing ſmall truſt in Gilling (a place or Manour houſe of his hard by) to withſtand the violence of the Danes and Engliſh, whom the Normans had deſpoiled of their inheritance, and hee adorned it with this name, as one would ſay, The rich Mount: he fenſed it with a wall and a moſt ſtrong Caſtle, which being ſet upon a rocke, from an high looketh downe to Swale, that with a mighty rumbling noiſe ruſheth rather than runneth among the ſtones. For, the ſaid houſe or Manour place of Gilling was more holy in regard of devout religion, than ſure and ſtrong for any fortification it had, ever ſince that therein (Beda calleth it Getbling) Oſwy King of Northumberland being entertained gueſt-wiſe, was by his hoſte forelaid and murthered: for the expiation whereof, the ſaid Monaſtery was built, highly accounted of among our anceſtours. Ravenſwath.

More Northward, Ravenſwath Caſtle ſheweth it ſelfe compaſſed with a good large wall, but now fallen, which was the ſeat of the Barons named Fitz-Hugh, extracted from the ancient line of the Engliſh Nation: who were Lords of the place before the Normans Conqueſt, and lived in great name unto King Henry the Seventh his daies, enriched with faire poſſeſſions by marriage with the heires of the noble houſes of Furneaux, and Marmion: which came at laſt by the females unto the Fienes Lords Dacres in the South, and to the Parrs. Three miles beneath Richmond, Swale runneth by that ancient City which Ptolomee and Antonine call CATURACTONIUM and CATARRACTON, but Bede Catarractan, and in another place, the Village neere unto Catarracta: whereupon I ſuppoſe it had the name of Catarracta, that is, a Flud-fall, or water-fall, conſidering hard by there is ſuch a fall, but neerer unto Richmond; where, Swale ruſheth rather than runneth as I have ſaid with foaming waters, meeting heere and there with rockes, whereby his ſtreame is interrupted and broken. And wherefore ſhould he call it the Towne neere unto Catarracta, if there were not there a water-fall? That it was in thoſe daies a moſt famous City may be gathered out of Ptolomee: becauſe he tooke there an obſervation of the heavens poſition: for, in the ſecond booke and 6. chapter of his Great Conſtruction, he deſcribeth and ſetteth downe the 24. Parallele, through Catarractonium in Britaine, and maketh it to bee diſtant from the Æquator 57. degrees: yet in his Geographicall Tables he defineth the longeſt day to be 18. Æquinoctiall houres: ſo that by his owne calculation and account, it is diſtant from the Æquator 58. degrees. But at this day, as ſaid that Poet. C D

But onely a great name.

Catarrick bridge.

For it is but a ſmall Village, called Catarrick and Catarrick-bridge; howbeit well knowne both by the ſituation thereof nere unto the High ſtreet way which the Romans made, that here paſſeth over the river; and alſo by the heapes of rubbiſh here and there diſperſed, which carry ſome ſhew of Antiquity, eſpecially about Kettercikſwart and Burghale, ſomewhat farther off from the Bridge, and more Eaſtward hard by the river, where we beheld a mighty Mount and foure Bulwarkes raiſed as it were with exceeding great labour up to a great height. What ſorrow it ſuſteined in times paſt at the Picts and Saxons hands, when with fire and ſword they made foule havocke of all the Cities in Britaine, I cannot certainly tell: but it ſeemeth to have flouriſhed after the Saxon Empire was eſtabliſhed: (Although Bede in every place calleth it Vicum, that is, a Village) untill that in the yeere 769. it was ſet on fire and burnt by Eanred or Beanred the Tyrant, who pitifully mangled the Kingdome of Northumberland. But both he ſtreight after miſerably periſhed by fire; and Catarractoninum alſo beganne to revive againe out of the very aſhes: For, in the 77. yeere after King Etheldred ſolemnized heere his marriage with the daughter of Offa King of the Mercians. Notwithſtanding, it continued not long in good and flouriſhing eſtate: for, in that confuſion immediately enſuing of the Danes who laied all waſte, it was quite deſtroied. E F

Swale

A Swale driveth on with a long course, not without some lets heere and there in his streame, not farre from Hornby Castle, belonging to the Family of Saint Quintin, which afterwards came to the Cogniers: and seeth nothing besides fresh pastures, country houses, and Villages, unlesse it be Bedal, standing by another River running into him: which Bedal glorieth much of a Baron it had named Sir Brian Fitz-Alan who flourished in the daies of King Edward the First, in regard of his worth, and his ancient Nobility, as descended from the Earles of Britaine, and Richmond: But for default of heires males the inheritance came by the daughters, to Stapletons, and the Greies of Rotherfeld. By this time Swale having left Richmond-shire behinde, commeth neerer unto Ure or Ouse, where hee visiteth Topcliffe the chiefe seat of the Percies; B Marianus calleth it Taben-clive; who writeth, that in the yeere of our Redemption 949. the States of Northumberland bound themselves there by an oath of Allegiance unto King Eldred the West-Saxon. And at the very confluence of these Rivers standeth Mitton, a small Village, but remarkable by no small slaughter. For, the Scottish in the yeere 1319. when the pestilence had consumed in manner all the manhood of England, having made an inrode thus farre robbing and ransacking all where they came, soone discomfited and put to flight no small power of Priests and country people, which the Archbishop of Yorke had led forth, with banner displaied into the field. But to returne backe againe to our matter. From CATARACTONIUM, the high street or Port way divided it selfe in twaine: where it taketh Northward, it leadeth by Caldwell and Aldburgh, which betokeneth An old Burrough. By what name it was knowne in ancient times I cannot easily guesse. By the great ruines it should seeme to have beene some notable place: and neere at hand there is seene a ditch by Stanwig a little Village, that runneth eight miles in length betweene the River Tees and Swale. Where the said High way goeth Northwestward about twelve miles off you meet with Bowes, which also is written Bough; now, a little Village: where in the ages aforegoing the Earles of Richmond had a prety Castelet, a certaine custome called Thorough-toll, and there Furcas, i. power to hang. But that in old time it was called in Antonines Itinerary, LAVATRÆ and LEVATRÆ, both the account of distance, and the site thereof by D the High street, which heere is evidently apparent by the ridge thereof, doe easily prove. But, that which maketh much to confirme the antiquity of it, is an ancient large Stone in the Church, sometimes used by them for an altar stone, with this inscription upon it, to the honour of Hadrian the Emperour.

Whiles under Severus the Emperour, Virius Lupus ruled as Lieutenant Generall and Proprætor of Britaine, the first Cohort of the Thracians lay heere in Garison: for whose sake, he reedified the Bath or hote house: as appeareth by this inscription, which from hence hath beene translated to Cunnington, unto the house of that right worshipfull and learned Sir Robert Cotton, Knight.

Heere must I cause them to forgoe their errour, who by this Inscription falsely copied forth, whiles they read untruly BALINGIUM, for BALINEUM, are of opinion, that the name of the place was BALINGIUM. But if a man looke neerer to the words, hee shall finde it most evidently engraven in the stone BALINEUM: which word they used in old time, as the learned know, for BALNEUM, that is, A BATH, or Hote-house: who also are not ignorant that souldiers, as well as others, used ordinarily to bathe, both for health, and cleanlinesse: as who every day, before they did eate, in that age were wont to bathe: as also, that such like bathing houses both publique and private were made every where with so great coste and superfluous excesse, That he thought himselfe poore and a very begger, who had not the walles of his bathing house resplendent with great and costly embossed Glasses. In which Bathes men and women both, washed one with another: albeit this had oftentimes beene prohibited as well by the Imperiall lawes, as the Synodall decrees.

Balineum or Balneum.

Seneca.

In the declining estate of the Roman Empire the Company or Band of the Exploratores, with their Captaine kept their station heere, under the dispose of the Generall of Britaine: as appeareth for certaine out of the NOTICE of Provinces, where it is named LAVATRES. But whereas such Bathes as these, were called also in Latine Lavacra, some Criticke, no doubt, will pronounce, that this place was named LAVATRÆ in stead of LAVACRA: yet would I rather have it take the name of a little river running neere by, which, as I heare say, is called Laver. As for the later name Bowes, considering the old Towne was heere burnt downe to the ground (as the inhabitants with one voice doe report) I would thinke, it grew upon that occasion. For, that which is burnt with fire the Britans still at this day, doe terme Boeth; and by the same word, the Suburbes of Chester beyond the River Dee, which the Englishmen call Hanbridge, the Britans or Welshmen name Treboeth, that is, The burnt Towne, becaus in a tumult of the Welshmen it was consumed with fire.

Heere beginneth to rise that high hilly and solitary Country exposed to winde and raine, which because it is stony, is called in our native language Stane more. All heere round about is nothing but a wilde Desert, unlesse it bee an homely Hostelry, or Inne, in the very middest thereof, called The Spitle on Stane more, for to entertaine waifaring persons, and neere to it is a fragment of a Crosse, which wee call Rerecrosse, the Scots Reicrosse, as one would say, The Kings Crosse. Which Crosse, Hector Boetius the Scottish Writer recordeth to have beene erected as a meere stone confining England and Scotland; what time as King William the Conquerour granted granted Cumberland unto the Scots on this condition, that they ſhould hold it of him as his Tenants, and not attempt any thing prejudiciall or hurtfull to the Crowne of England. And a little lower, upon the Romanes high ſtreet, there ſtood a little Fort of the Romans built foure ſquare, which at this day they call Maiden-Caſtle. From whence, as the borderers reported, the ſaid High way went with many windings in and out, as farre as to Caer Verran in Northumberland. Maiden Caſtle.

There have beene divers Earles of Richmond according as the Princes favour enclined, and thoſe out of divers families: whom I will notwithſtanding ſet downe as exactly and truely as I can, in their right order. The firſt Earles were out of the houſe of little Britaine in France, whoſe deſcent is confuſedly intricate amongſt their owne Writers, for that there were two principall Earles at once, one of Haulte Britaine, and another of Baſe Britaine for many yeeres, and every one of their children had their part in Gavell kinde, and were ſtiled Earles of Britaine without diſtinction. But of theſe the firſt Earle of Richmond, according to our Writers and Records, was Alane ſirnamed Feregaunt, that is, The Red, ſonne of Hoel Earle of Britaine, deſcended from Hawiſe great Aunt to William Conquerour, who gave this Country unto him by name of the lands of Earle Eadwin in Yorke-ſhire, and withall beſtowed his daughter upon him by whom he had no iſſue. He built Richmond Caſtle, as is before ſpecified, to defend himſelfe from diſinherited and outlawed Engliſhmen in thoſe parts: and dying left Britaine to his ſonne Conan Le Groſſe by a ſecond wife. But Alane the Blacke ſonne of Eudo ſonne of Geffrey Earle of Britaine and Hawiſe aforeſaid, ſucceeded in Richmond, and he having no childe, left it to Stephen his brother. This Stephen begat Alan ſirnamed Le Savage his ſonne and ſucceſſour, who aſſiſted king Stephen againſt Maude the Empreſſe in the battaile at Lincolne, and married Bertha one of the heires of Conan Le Groſſe Earle of Hault Britaine by whom hee had Conan Le Petit Earle of both Britaines by hereditary right, as well as of Richmond. Hee by the aſſiſtance of King Henrie the Second of England diſpoſſeſſed Eudo Vicount of Porhoet his Father in Lawe who uſurped the Title of Britaine in right of the ſaid Bertha his Wife: and ended his life leaving onely one daughter Conſtance by Margaret ſiſter to Malcolne king of the Scots. Geffrey third Sonne to King Henry the Second of England was advanced by his Father to the marriage of the ſaid Conſtance, whereby hee was Earle of Britaine and Richmond; and begat of her Arthur who ſucceeded him, and as the French write was made away by King Iohn his Unkle. True it is indeed, that for this cauſe, the French called King Iohn into queſtion, as Duke of Normandy: And notwithſtanding he was abſent, and not heard once to plead, neither confeſſing ought, nor convicted, yet by a definitive ſentence they condemned him, and awarded from him, Normandy and his hereditary poſſeſſions in France: Albeit himſelfe had promiſed, under ſafe conduct to appeare in perſonally at Paris, there, to make anſwere as touching the death of Arthur: who as a Liege ſubject had bound himſelfe by oath to bee true and loyall unto him, and yet ſtarted backe from his allegeance, raiſed a rebellion, and was taken priſoner in battaile. At which time this queſtion was debated; whether the Peeres of France might give judgement of a King annointed, and therefore ſuperiour? conſidering that a greater dignity drowneth the leſſer; and now one and the ſame perſon was both King of England and Duke of Normandy. But whither doe I digreſſe? After Arthur, theſe ſucceeded orderly in the Earldome of Richmond. Guy Vicount of Thovars, unto whom the foreſaid Conſtance was ſecondly married. Ranulph the third, Earle of Cheſter, the third husband of the ſaid Conſtance. Peter of Dreux, deſcended from the bloud royall of France; who wedded Alice the onely daughter of Conſtance by her husband abovenamed Guy. Then upon diſlike of the houſe of Britaine, Peter of Savoy, Unkle by the mothers ſide unto Eleonor the wife of king Henry the Third, was made Earle of Richmond, who for feare of the Nobles and Commons of England that murmured againſt ſtrangers preferred to honours in England, voluntarily ſurrendred up this Honour which was reſtored to Iohn Earle of Britaine, ſonne to Peter of Dreux. After whom ſucceeded Iohn his ſonne, the firſt Duke of Britaine, who who wedded Beatrice daughter to Henry the Third King of England. Whose sonne Arthur was Duke of Britaine, and as some write, Earle of Richmond. Certes, John of Britaine his younger brother, immediately after the fathers death, bare this honourable Title. And he added unto the ancient Armes of Drewx with the Canton of Britaine, the Lions of England in Bordeur. Hee was Guardian of Scotland under King Edward the Second, and there taken and detained prisoner for three yeeres space, and dyed at length without issue, in the Raigne of Edward the Third. And John Duke of Britaine, his nephew, the sonne of Arthur succeeded in this Earledome. After his decease without children, when there was hote contention about the Dutchy of Britaine, betweene John Earle of Montfort of the halfe bloud, and Joane his brothers daughter and heire of the whole bloud marryed to Charles of Bloys: King Edward the Third affecting the said John Earle of Montfort, and to strengthen his owne party in France, favoured the Title of the said John Earle of Montfort for that he was a man and neerer in degree, and therefore seemed to have better right and to bee preferred before his Niece (to whom the Parliament of France had adjudged it) and which is more for that he sware fealty to him as King of France, for the Dutchy of Britaine. In these respects he granted the Earldome of Richmond unto the said Iohn untill he might recover his owne possessions in France, which being soone after recovered by aide of the English, the said King bestowed it upon Iohn of Gaunt his sonne. And he afterward surrendred it againe into the King his fathers hands for other possessions. Who forthwith created Iohn Earle of Montfort Duke of Britaine sirnamed The valiant Earle of Richmond unto whom hee had given his daughter to wife, that thereby hee might more surely oblige unto him a warlique person, and then ill affected to the French. But in the fourth yeere of Richard the Second he by authority of the Parliament forfaited his Earldome because he adhered unto the French King against England: howbeit hee kept still the bare Title, and left it unto his posterity: But the possession was granted to Dame Ioane of Britaine his sister, and the widdow of Ralph Lord Basset of Draiton. After her decease first Ralph Nevill Earle of Westmorland, had the Castle and Earldome of Richmond for the tearme of his owne life, by the gift of King Henry the Fourth. And after him Iohn Duke of Bedford. Then king Henry the Sixth conferred the Title of Earle of Richmond upon Edmund of Hadham his halfe brother by the mothers side, with this speciall and peculiar prerogative, To take his place in Parliament next unto Dukes. After him succeeded Henry his sonne who was King of England by the name of Henry the Seventh. But during his exile George Duke of Clarence, and Richard Duke of Glocester received the Signiory of Richmond, but not the Title from their brother king Edward the Fourth. Last of all Henry the base sonne of king Henry the Eighth was by his father invested Duke of Richmond, who departed this life without issue 1535. As for Sir Thomas Grey who was made Baron of Richmount by king Henry the Sixth, was not Lord of this Richmond, but of a place in Bedfordshire called Rugemound, and Richmount Greies.

Robert de Arthois was not Earle of Richmond as Froissard writeth, but of Beaumont. The booke of Tenures or Fees of Richmond.

BISHOPRICK OF DURHAM.

THe Biſhopricke of Durham or Dureſme, bordering on the North ſide upon Yorke-ſhire is ſhaped in faſhion of a triangle, the utmoſt angle whereof is made up, toward the Weſt, where the Northren limit and the Spring-head of Tees doe meete. One of the ſides which lieth Southward is bounded in with the continued courſe of the river Tees running downe along by it: the other that looketh Northward, is limited firſt, with a ſhort line, from the utmoſt point to the river Derwent, then, with Derwent it ſelfe, untill it hath taken unto it Chopwell a little river, and afterward with the river Tine. The Sea coaſt faſhioneth out the Baſe of the Triangle which lieth Eaſtward, and the German Ocean with a mighty roaring, and forcible violence beateth thereupon.

On that part where it gathereth narrow to the Weſterne angle, the fields are naked and barren, the woods very thin, the hills bare without graſſe, but not without mynes of iron. As for the Vallies, they are reaſonably graſſie, and that high hill which I termed the Apennine of England, cutteth in twain this angle. But on the Eaſt part or Baſe of the Triangle, as alſo on both ſides, the ground being well manured, is very fruitful, and the increaſe yeeldeth good recompence for the husbandmans toile: it is alſo well garniſhed with meddowes, paſtures, and corn-fields, beſet every where with townes and yeelding plenty of Sea coale, which in many places we uſe for fewell. Some will have this coale to be an earthy black Bitumen, others, to be Gagates, and ſome againe the Lapis Thracius; all which, that great Philoſopher in Minerals, George Agricola, hath prooved to be one and the ſame thing. Surely this of ours, is nothing elſe but Bitumen, or a clammy kind of cley hardned with heat under the earth, and ſo throughly concocted: For, it yeeldeth the ſmell of Bitumen, and if water bee ſprinkled upon it, it burneth more vehemently and the cleerer: but, whether it may bee quenched with oile, I have not yet tried. And if the Stone called Obſidianus be in our country, I would take that to bee it, which is found in other places of England, and commonly called Canole cole: For it is hard, bright, light, and ſomewhat eaſie to be cloven piece meale into flakes, and being once kindled it burneth very quickly. But let us leave theſe matters to thoſe that ſearch more deeply into Natures cloſets.

All this country with other territories alſo thereto adjoyning the Monaſticall writers tearme the Land, or Patrimonie of Saint Cuthbert. For, ſo they called whatſoever belonged to the Church of Durham, whereof S. Cuthbert was the Patron: who in the primitive ſtate of the Engliſh Church, being Biſhop of Lindefarn, led all his life in ſuch holineſſe and ſo ſincerely, that he was enrolled among the Engliſh Saints. Our kings alſo, and Peeres of the Realme, becauſe they verily perſwaded themſelves that he was their Tutelar Saint and Protectour againſt the Scots, went not onely in Pilgrimage with devotion to viſite his body (which, they beleeved to have continued ſtill ſound and uncorrupt) but alſo gave very large poſſeſſions to this Church, and endowed the ſame with many immunities. King Edgfride beſtowed upon Cuthbert himſelfe whiles he lived, great revenewes in the very City of Yorke, and Creake alſo whereof I ſpake, and the City Luguballia, as wee reade in the Hiſtory of Durham. King Aelfred and Guthrum the Dane, whom hee made Lieutenant of Northumberland, gave afterwards all the Lands betweene the Rivers Were and Tine unto Cuthbert, and to thoſe who miniſtred in his Church, to have and to hold for ever, as their rightfull Poſſeſſion. (Theſe bee the very words in effect of an ancient Booke) whence they might have ſufficient maintenance to live upon, and not be pinched with poverty: over and beſides, they ordeined his Church to bee a ſafe Sanctuary for all fugitives: that whoſoever for any cauſe fled unto his Corps, ſhould have peaceable being for 37. dales, and the ſame liberty never for any occaſion to bee infringed or denyed. Edward and Athelſtan, kings;

Saint Cuthberts Patrimony.

Kings; Knute alſo or Canutus the Dane, who came on his bare feete to Cuthberts Tombe, not onely confirmed but enlarged alſo theſe liberties. In like manner King William the Conquerour, ſince whoſe time it hath alwayes beene deemed a County Palatine: yea and ſome of the Biſhops, as Counts Palatine have engraven in their ſeales a Knight or man at armes in compleat harneſſe ſitting upon an horſe all trapped, with one hand brandiſhing a ſword, and in the other holding out the Armes of the Biſhopricke. A

The Biſhops alſo have had their royalties and princely rights, ſo that the goods of outlawed and attainted perſons out of the Kings protection, fell into their hands and not into the Kings: yea and the Commons of that Province ſtanding upon their priviledges have refuſed to ſerve in warre under the King in Scotland. For, they pleaded (the Story of Dureſme ſhall ſpeake for mee) That they were Haliwerke folkes, and held their lands to defend the Corps of Saint Cuthbert; neither ought they to goe out of the precincts of the Biſhopricke, namely beyond Tine and Teeſe, for King or Biſhop. But King Edward the Firſt, was the firſt that abridged them of theſe liberties. For, when as he interpoſed himſelfe as Arbitratour betweene the Biſhop Antony Bec, and the Priour who contended moſt egerly about certaine lands, and they would not ſtand to his award, Hee ſeiſed, as ſaith mine Authour, the liberty of the Biſhopricke into his owne hand, and there were many corners ſearched, many flawes found, and the Liberty in many points much impaired. Howbeit, the Church afterward recovered her rights, and held them inviolate unto the daies of King Edward the Sixth; unto whom, upon the diſſolution of the Biſhopricke, the States in Parliament granted all the revenewes and liberties thereof. But forthwith Queene Mary by the ſame authority repealed this Act, and reſtored all things ſafe and ſound unto the Church againe, which it enjoyeth at this day. For, the Biſhop, James Pilkinton of late time entred his action againſt Queene Elizabeth, about the poſſeſſions and goods of Charles Nevill Earle of Weſtmorland and of others that ſtood attainted for treaſon in this precinct, becauſe they had moſt wickedly levied warre againſt their native Country: and he the ſaid Biſhop had followed the ſuit to a triall, if the authority of Parliament had not interpoſed and adjudged the ſame for that time, unto the Queene, becauſe to her exceeding great charges ſhe had delivered both Biſhop and Biſhopricke from the outrage of the Rebels. But leaving theſe matters, let us proceed forward to the deſcription of places. B C D

The tiuer that boundeth the South part of this country, is called by Latin writers Teiſis, and Teeſa, commonly Tees: by Polydore Virgill the Italian (whoſe minde ranne of Atheſis in his owne country Italy) without any reaſon, Atheſis. In Ptolomee it ſeemeth to be called, ΤΟΤΑΞΙΣ and TUESIS: and yet I thinke that in him it is removed out of his proper place through the negligence of tranſcribers. For, conſidering that he hath placed TUESIS and TINA in the more remote part of Britaine, where the Scots now inhabite; and ſeeing that this Region is encloſed within Tees and Tine; If I durſt, as a Criticke, correct that ancient Geographer, I would recall them home againe hither into their owne places, though they have been long diſplaced, and that with the Scots good leave I hope, who have no Rivers upon which they can truely father theſe names. TEES ſpringeth out of that ſtony country called Stanemore, and carrying with him away in his chanell along, many brookes and beckes on each ſide, and running through rockes (out of which at Egleſton, where there is a marble Quarroy, and where Conan Earle of Britaine, and Richmond founded a ſmall Abbay) firſt beateth upon Bernard Caſtle, built and ſo named by Bernard Balliol the great grandfathers father of John Balliol King of the Scots. But this John Balliol, whom King Edward the Firſt had declared King of Scotland, loſt the ſame with other his poſſeſſions, becauſe he had broken his alleageance which he ſware unto Edward. At which time the King being highly diſpleaſed with Antony Biſhop of Durrham, tooke this Caſtle (as witneſſeth the booke of Dureſme) with the appertinences thereto from him, and conferred the ſame upon the Earle of Warwicke: as Herkes alſo and Hertnes, which hee gave unto Robert Clifford: Kewerſton alſo, which hee beſtowed upon Geffrey of Hertpole, which E F

Stretlham. Bowes. * Ermin.

Not full five miles from hence, ſtandeth ſomewhat farther from Tees banke Standrop, which alſo is called Stainthorpe, that is, Stony Village, a little Mercate Towne, where there was a Collegiat Church, founded by the Nevills, and was their Buriall-place. Neere unto it is Raby, which Cnut or Canute the Daniſh King gave freely unto the Church of Durham together with the land lying round about it, and Stanthorpe, to be held for ever. Since which time, as mine Authour informeth mee, The Family of the Nevills, or De nova villa, held Raby of the Church, paying yeerely for it foure pounds and a Stagge. Theſe Nevilles deduce their Deſcent from Waltheof Earle of Northumberland, out of whoſe poſterity, when Robert the ſonne of Maldred, Lord of Raby had married the daughter of Geffrey Nevill the Norman (whoſe C Grandſire Gilbert Nevill is reported to have beene Admirall to King William the Conquerour) their ſucceeding Progeny tooke unto them the name of Nevilles, and grew up into a moſt numerous honourable, and mighty houſe: who erected heere a great and ſpacious Caſtle, which was the firſt and principall ſeate. Theſe two places Stainthorpe and Raby are ſevered one from another onely by a little rill which after ſome few miles runneth into Tees, neere unto Selaby, where now is the habitation of the Brakenburies, a Family of right good note both in regard of their owne Antiquity, as alſo for their marriages contracted with the heires of Denton and of Wicliff.

D Tees paſſing on from thence by Sockburne, the dwelling houſe of the ancient and noble Family of the Coigniers, out of which were the Barons Coigniers of Hornby (whoſe inheritance much bettered by matching in marriage with the heires of the Lord Darcy of Metnill, and of William Nevill Earle of Kent, and Lord of Fauconberg, is deſcended from them in the memory of our fathers, to the Atherſtons and the Darcies) holdeth his courſe neere unto Derlington, a Mercate Towne of good reſort, which Seir, an Engliſh Saxon the ſonne of Ulph, having obtained leave of King Etheldred gave unto the Church of Durham: and Hugh Pudſey adorned it with a faire Church and other edifices.

In this Towne field are three pittes of a wonderfull depth, the common people E tearme them Hell-Kettles, becauſe the water in them by the Antiperiſtaſis or reverberation of the cold aire ſtriking thereupon, waxeth hote. The wiſer ſort and men of better judgement doe thinke, they came by the ſinking downe of the ground ſwallowed up in ſome earth-quake, and that by a good probable reaſon. For, thus we reade in the Chronicles of Tinmouth. In the yeere of our Lord 1179. on Chriſtmas day, at Oxenhall in the Territory of Derlington, within the Biſhopricke of Durham, the ground heaved it ſelfe up aloft like unto an high Towre, and ſo continued all that day as it were unmoveable, untill the evening: and then, fell with ſo horrible a noiſe, that it made all the neighbour dwellers afraide: and the earth ſwallowed it up and made in the ſame place a deepe pit, which is there to bee ſeene for a teſtimony, unto this day. That theſe Pittes have F paſſages under the ground Biſhop Cuthbert Tonſtall firſt obſerved, by finding that Gooſe in the River Tees, which he for the better triall and experience of theſe Pits, had marked and let downe into them.

but gliding along the skirtes of greene fields, and by country Villages, winding in and out as he paſſeth; at length diſchargeth himſelfe at a large mouth into the Ocean, whence the baſe or bothom of the Triangle aforeſaid towards the Sea beginneth.

Gretham.

From hence the ſhore coaſteth Northward, holding on entire ſtill, ſave that it is interrupted with one or two little Brookes and no more, neere unto Gretham; where Robert Biſhop of Durham having the Manour given freely unto him by Sir Peter de Montfort, founded a goodly Hoſpitall. Next unto it is Claxton, which gave name unto a Family of good and ancient note, in this Tract: whereof, I have beene the more willing to make mention, becauſe of the ſame houſe was T. Claxton, an affectionate lover of venerable Antiquity. From thence, the ſhore ſhooteth forth into the Sea with one onely Promontory ſcarce ſeven miles above Tees mouth, on which ſtandeth very commodiouſly Hartlepoole, a good Towne of trade, and a ſafe harbour for ſhipping. Bede ſeemeth to call it Heoρτu, which Henry of Huntingdon, interpreteth The Harts or Stagges Iſland, where hee writeth, that Hein a religious woman founded a Monaſtery in times paſt. This river firſt groweth into one out of three riverets Burden-hop, Wel-hop, and Kel-hop, in the utmoſt part of this Country Weſtward: which when they are joyned in one chanell is called by one name Were, and ſpeedeth into the Eaſt, by vaſt

For, King Edward the Firſt, gave unto them for their valiant ſervice Kettnes a little Towne in Scotland, and King Henry the Eighth within our fathers remembrance honoured them in that reſpect with the Title of Barons.

Barons Evers, or D'Eure.

Then Were after a few miles taketh into him from the South Gaunleſſe a Riveret; where, at the very meeting of them both together, there ſtandeth upon an high hill

Auk-land.

Aukland ſo called of Okes (like as Sarron in Greece) which ſheweth an houſe of the Biſhops ſtately built with Turrets by Antony Bec, and withall a beautifull Bridge, made by Walter Skirlaw a Biſhop of Durham about the yeere 1400. who alſo enlarged this houſe and built the Bridge over Tees at Yare. From hence Were turneth his courſe Northward, that he might water this ſhire the longer, and then forthwith looketh up to the remaines of an ancient City not now a dying, but dead many yeeres agoe, ſtanding on the brow of an hill: which Antonine the Emperour called Bincheſter.

Antonine pointed at it with his finger. Wee call it at this day Bincheſter, and it hath in it a very few houſes: yet it is very well knowne to them that dwell thereabout, both by reaſon of the heapes of rubbiſh, and the reliques of walles yet to be ſeene, as alſo for peeces of Romane Coine often digged up there, which they call Bincheſter Penies, yea and for the Inſcriptions of the Romanes, amongſt which I happened of late when I was there upon an Altar with this Inſcription.

Anno Chriſti. 236. Votum ſolvit. libens. merito. i. Paid his vow willingly and duly.

Another ſtone alſo was heere lately gotten out of the ground, but defaced with voide places, where the letters were worne out: which notwithſtanding, if one beheld it wiſhly, ſeemeth to ſhew this Inſcription.

Neither have I read any thing elſe of it, but that an old booke maketh mention, how the Earles of Northumberland, long ſince plucked away this with other Villages from the Church, what time as that accurſed and unſatiable hunger after Gold ſwallowed up alſo the ſacred patrimony of the Church.

On the other banke of Were, among the mounting Hilles appeareth Branſpeth Caſtle, which the Bulmers built, and the daughter of Sir Bertram Bulmer coupled in marriage unto Geffrey Nevill, adjoyned with other great Poſſeſſions unto the Family of the Nevills. Within a while after Were runneth downe much troubled and hindered in his Courſe with many great Stones apparent above the water, which unleſſe the River doe riſe and ſwell with great ſtore of raine, are never over covered: and upon which (a thing that happeneth not elſewhere) if yee powre water, and temper it a little with them, it ſucketh in a ſaltiſh quality. Nay, that which more is, at Butterby a little Village, when the River in Summer time is very ebbe and ſhallow, there iſſueth out of thoſe ſtones a certaine ſalt reddiſh water, which by the heat of the Sunne waxeth ſo white, and withall groweth to a thicke ſubſtance, that the people dwelling thereby gather from hence ſalt ſufficiently for their uſe.

And now the River, as though it purpoſed to make an Iſland, compaſſeth almoſt on every ſide the chiefe City of this Province ſtanding on an hill, whence the Saxons gave it the name Dunholm. For, as you may gather out of Bede, they called an hill Dun, and a river Iſland Holme. Heereof, the Latine Writers have made DUNELMUM, the Normans Dureſme, but the common people moſt corruptly name it Durham. It is ſeated on high, and paſſing ſtrongly withall, yet taketh it up no great circuit of ground; ſhaped in forme, as one would ſay, of an egge, environed on every ſide ſave on the North with the River, and fortified with a wall. Toward the South ſide almoſt, whereas the River fetcheth it ſelfe about, ſtandeth the Cathedrall Church aloft, making a ſolemne and a ſightly ſhew with an high Towre in the middeſt and two Spires at the Weſt end.

Dunelmus. Durham, or Dureſme.

In the middeſt there is a Caſtle placed, as it were betweene two ſtone bridges over the river, the one Eaſtward, the other Weſtward. From the Caſtle Northward is ſeene a ſpacious Mercate-place and Saint Nicholas Church: from whence there runneth out a great length North-East a Suburbe compaſſed on two ſides the River: like as others on both ſides beyond the River, which leade unto the Bridges, and euery of them have their ſeverall Churches. The originall of this City is of no great Antiquity. For, when the diſtreſſed Monkes of Lindisfarn driven hither, and thither by the Danes Warres, wandered up and downe without any certaine place of abode with the corps of Saint Cuthbert, at length heere they ſetled themſelves by divine direction, about the yeere of our Salvation 995. But heare the whole matter out of mine Authour of Durham. All the people accompanying the corps of that moſt holy Father Cuthbert came into Dunholme, a place verily ſtrong of it ſelfe by nature, but not eaſily to bee inhabited, as being wholly beſet on every ſide with a moſt thicke Wood: onely in the middeſt was a little Plaine, which was wont to bee tilled and ſowed with Corne: where Biſhop Aldwin built afterwards a faire Church of ſtone. The foreſaid Prelate therefore, through the helpe of all the people and the aſsiſtance of Uthred Earle of Northumberland, ſtocked up all the Wood and in ſhort time made the whole place habitable. To conclude, the people generally from the River Coqued as farre as to Tees, came right willingly, as well to this worke, as after that to build a Church: and untill it was finiſhed ceaſed not to follow that buſineſſe devoutly. Wherefore after the Wood was quite grub'd up, and every one had their manſion places aſsigned out by lot; The ſaid Biſhop in a fervent love to Chriſt and Saint Cuthbert, upon an honeſt and godly intent beganne (no ſmall peece of worke) to build a Church, and endeavoured by all meanes to finiſh the ſame. Thus farre mine Authour.

Not many yeeres after, thoſe Engliſhmen who could not endure the inſolent command of the Normans, preſuming upon the naturall ſtrength of the place, choſe it for their chiefe Hold and ſeat of reſiſtance, yea and from thence troubled the Conquerour not a little. For, William Gemeticenſis writeth thus. They went into a part of the Country which for waters and woods was inacceſſible, raiſing a Caſtle with a moſt ſtrong trench and rampier; which they called Dunholme: out of which making many rodes ſundry waies, for a certaine ſpace they kept themſelves cloſe there, waiting for the comming of Swene King of the Danes. But when that fell not out according to their expectation, they provided for themſelves by flight: and King William comming to Durham, granted many priviledges for eſtabliſhing the liberty of the Church, and built the Caſtle whereof I ſpake, on the higheſt part of the hill, which afterwards became the Biſhops houſe: and the keies thereof when the Biſhopricke was voide, were wont by an ancient cuſtome to be hanged upon Saint Cuthberts ſhrine.

When this Caſtle was once built, William of Malmesbury who lived about that time, deſcribeth this City in theſe words. Durham is a prety hill riſing by little and little from one plaine of the Valley with a gentle aſcent, untill it come to bee a mount: and although by reaſon of the rough and ſteepe ſituation of the Rockes, there is no way for the enemy to enter it; yet they of theſe daies have erected a Caſtle upon the hill. At the very foote and bottom of the Caſtle, runneth a River, wherein is great ſtore of fiſh, but of Salmons eſpecially. At the ſame time well neere (as that ancient Booke reporteth) William de Careleph the Biſhop, who gathered againe the diſperſed Monkes hither (for, the Danes in every place had overthrowne their Cloiſtures) pulled downe that Church which Aldwin had formerly built, and beganne the foundation of another of a fairer worke, which his ſucceſſour Ralph finiſhed. And after that, Nicholas Feruham Biſhop, and Thomas Meſcomb Prior, adjoyned a new Fabrique or frame unto it, in the yeere of Chriſt 1242. And a good while after, W. Skirlaw the Biſhop, built at the Weſt end of the Church a faire peece of worke which they call Galilee, whereinto hee tranſlated the marble Tombe of Venerable Bede. In which place Hugh Pudſey, beganne in times paſt an houſe, wherein (I uſe the words of an ancient Booke) women might lawfully enter, that whereas they had not corporall acceſſe unto the more ſecret holy places; yet they might have ſome comfort by the beholding of the holy myſteries.

Galilee.

For no woman might enter into Durham Church.

But, that Ralph the Biſhop aforeſaid, as our Hiſtorian writeth, reduced the place betweene the Church and the Caſtle, which had beene taken up with many dwelling houſes, into

A into a plaine and open ground; for feare leaſt either any annoyance by filth, or dangers by fire, might come neere unto the Church. And all be it the City was ſtrong enough by the naturall ſite, yet hee made it more ſtrong, and ſtately with a Wall, reaching in length from the Chauncell of the Church, unto the Keepe and Towre of the Caſtle: Which wall now by little and little giveth place unto time, and never that I could heare, ſuffered any aſſault of enemy.

For, when David Brus, King of Scots, had forraied the Country with fire and ſword, as farre as to Beamparke or Beereparke, which is a Parke neere unto the City, whiles King Edward the Third beſieged Calais, Henry Percy and William Zouch Archbiſhop of Yorke, with their Companies of men muſtered up in haſte, encoun- Beere-parke. 1346.

B tered the Scots, and ſo couragiouſly charged them, that having taken the King priſoner they ſlew the moſt of the firſt and ſecond battaile, and put the third to a fearefull flight: neither ſtaied they at moſt ſteepe and cumberſome places, untill they recovered their owne Holds. This is that famous Battaile, which our people call The Battaile at Nevils Croſſe. For, the chiefeſt of the Scottiſh Nobility being Battaile of Nevils Croſſe.
ſlaine, and the King taken priſoner at this field, they were enforced to yeeld much ground within their Confines, yea and to render many Caſtles. But this may ſuffice as touching Durham: which I will take my leave of, if you thinke good, with a Diſtichon of Necham, and an Hexaſtichon of John Jonſton.

E Concerning the Monkes that were caſt out at the ſuppreſſion of the Abbaies, the twelve Prebendaries and two Arch-Deacons placed in this Church, and the Priours name changed into the Dignity of a Deane, I neede not to ſay any thing: for, they are yet in freſh memory. And unwilling I am to remember how this Biſhopricke was diſſolved by a private Statute, and all the poſſeſſions thereof given to Edward the Sixth, when private greedineſſe edged by Church-men did grinde the Church, and withdrew much from God, wherewith Chriſtian Piety had formerly honoured God. But Queene Mary repealed that Statute and reſtored the ſaid Biſhopricke with all the Poſſeſſions, and Franchiſes thereof, that God might enjoy his owne. The Longitude of this City is 22. Degrees. Beneath Durham, that I may not overpaſſe it, ſtandeth Eaſtward a very faire Hoſpitall, which Hugh Pudſey that moſt wealthy Biſhop, and Earle of Northumberland, ſo long as it was, Being very indulgently compaßionate to Lepres (as Neubrigenſis writeth) built with coſte (I muſt needes ſay profuſe enough) but in ſome ſort not Shirburne Hoſpitall.

Finchdale. From Durham Were carrieth his ſtreame Northward with a more direct courſe, by Finchdale; where, in the Reigne of King Henry the Second Goodrick a man of the ancient Chriſtian ſimplicity, and auſterity wholly devoted to the ſervice of God, led a ſolitary life and ended his daies: being buried in the ſame place, wherein, as that William of Neuborrow ſaith, hee was wont either to lye proſtrate whiles he prayed, or to lay him downe when he was ſicke. Who with this his devout ſimplicity, drew men into ſo great an admiration of him, that R. brother unto that rich Biſhop Hugh Pudſey built a Chappell in memoriall of him. B

Lumley. Barons Lumley. From thence Were paſſeth by Lumley Caſtle ſtanding within a Parke, the ancient ſeat of the Lumleies, who deſcended from Liulph, a man in this tract of right great Nobility in the time of King Edward the Confeſſour, who marryed Aldgitha the daughter of Aldred Earle of Northumberland. Of theſe Lumleies, Marmaduke aſſumed unto him his mothers Coate of Armes (in whoſe right hee was ſeized of a goodly inheritance of the Thwengs) namely, Argent of Feſſe Gueles betweene three Poppinjaes Vert, whereas the Lumleies before time had borne for their Armes, Six Poppinjaes Argent, in Gueles. For ſhe was the eldeſt daughter of Sir Marmaduke Thweng Lord of Kilton, and one of the heires of Thomas Thweng her brother. But Ralph ſonne to the ſaid Marmaduke was the firſt Baron Lumley, created by King Richard the Second: which honour John the ninth from him enjoyed in our daies a man moſt honourable for all the ornaments of true Nobility. C

Cheſter upon the ſtreet. Condercum. Juſt over againſt this place, not farre from the other banke of the River ſtandeth Cheſter upon the Street, as one would ſay, the Caſtle or little City by the Port way ſide: the Saxons called it Conceſtep: whereupon, I would deeme it to be CONDERCUM, in which as the booke of Notices recordeth, the firſt wing of the Aſſures, in the Romanes time kept ſtation and lay in Gariſon, within the Line or precinct (as that booke ſaith) of the WALL. For it is but a few miles diſtant from that famous WALL, whereof I am to ſpeake heereafter. The Biſhops of Lindiſarne lived obſcurely heere with the corps of Saint Cuthbert, whiles the raging ſtormes of the Danes were up, for the ſpace of an hundred and thirteene yeeres. In memory whereof, when Egelricke Biſhop of Durham layed the foundation of a new Church in that place, he found ſuch a mighty maſſe of money buried within the ground, as is thought by the Romans, that wallowing now in wealth, he gave over his Biſhopricke: and being returned to Peterborrow whereof hee had beene Abbot before, made cauſeies through the Fennes and raiſed other Workes, not without exceeding great charges. D

And a long time after Anthony Bec, Biſhop of Durham and Patriarch of Jeruſalem erected heere a Collegiat Church, a Deane, and ſeven Prebends. In which Church, the Lord Lumley aboveſaid placed and ranged in goodly order the Monuments of his Anceſtours in a continued line of ſucceſſion even from Liulph unto theſe our daies; which he had either gotten together out of Monaſteries that were ſubverted, or cauſed to bee made a new. And further within, almoſt in the middeſt of the Triangle, there is another little Village alſo knowne of late by reaſon of the College of a Deane and Prebendaries founded by that Antony Bec at Lanchester, which I once thought to have beene LONGOVICUM a ſtation of the Romanes. E

Hilton Caſtle. But let us returne unto Were, which now at length turneth his courſe Eaſtward, and running beſide Hilton a Caſtle of the Hiltons, a Family of ancient Gentry; venteth his waters with a vaſt mouth into the ſea at Wiran-muth, as Bede tearmeth it, now named Monkes Were-mouth, becauſe it belonged to the Monkes. Touching which mouth or out-let, thus writeth William of Malmesbury. This Were where hee entereth into the Sea, entertaineth Shippes brought in with a faire Gale of Winde, within the gentle and quiet boſome of his Out-let. Both the Bankes whereof, Benedict F

Five miles higher, the River Tine doth alſo unlade it ſelfe, which together with Derwent for a good way lineth out (as it were) the North ſide of this Country. Upon Derwent which hath his ſpring head neere unto the top of the Triangle, there ſtandeth nothing of note, unleſſe it bee a little Village which now they call Ebchester, of Ebba a virgin of the bloud royall of the Northumbers, of whom there went ſo great a name and opinion for her ſanctimony and devotion about the yeere 630. Ebchester. Saint Ebba.

B that being canonized among the Saints, ſhe hath many Churches in this Iſland dedicated unto her, which the common ſort uſually call Saint Tabbs for Saint Ebbes. Saint Tabbs.

But by Tine there is ſituate a memorable Towne called Gateſhead in the Engliſh Saxon tongue Gaeſheafod, and by Latin Hiſtorians, Capræ Caput, which is the ſame, as one would ſay, Goates head: and is as it were the Suburbs of Newcaſtle, ſtanding on the hether ſide of Tine, whereunto alſo it was annexed by King Edward the Sixth, when the Biſhopricke was diſſolved. But Queene Mary ſoone after reſtored it againe unto the Church. The common people thinke it is farre more ancient than Newcaſtle it ſelfe. And if I alſo ſhould ſay, that this and Newcaſtle together (for one Towne it may ſeeme in old time to have beene, divided onely by the River)

C was that Frontier Station, which under the later Emperours they called GABROSENTUM, and was kept by the ſecond Band of the Thracians, and that it retained ſtill the ancient name in ſenſe and ſignification, whereas, New-caſtle hath gotten once or twice a new name, I hope my opinion would be nothing diſſonant from the truth: For, Gaffr in the Britiſh tongue ſignifieth a Goat, and Hen in ordinary ſpeech is uſed for Pen, which betokeneth an Head: and in the very ſame ſignification our old Hiſtoriographers tearme it in Latine Capræ Caput, like as Brunduſium, in the Meſſapians Language tooke that name, from a Stagges head. I would thinke that this name was given unto this place, by occaſion of ſome Inne that had a Goats head for the ſigne: even as Gallus Gallinaceus, that is, The Houſecocke, Tres Sorores, that is, Three

D ſiſters, and Pirum, that is, The Peare, Places in Africke, Spaine, and Italie, whereof Antonine maketh mention: which, of ſuch ſignes (as ſome learned men ſuppoſe) tooke their names. And our Hiſtorians all with one accord, name this Towne Capræ Caput, when they record, that Walcher Biſhop of Durham, whom King William the Firſt had made Governour over Northumberland with the authority of an Earle, was ſlaine in this place by the furious multitude, for miſgoverning the Country.

Beneath this Towne, almoſt at the very mouth of Tine, is to be ſeene Girwy, now Iarrow, the native ſoile of venerable Bede, where alſo in ancient times flouriſhed a little Monaſtery: The Founder whereof and the time of the foundation, this inſcription ſheweth, which is yet extant in the Church wall. CONDITORIS ANNO IIII.

F These greater Churches when the Saving light of Chriſt ſhone upon the world (let it not ſeeme impertinent to note ſo much by occaſion of the word Baſilica) were termed BASILICÆ, for that the Baſilicæ of the Gentiles which were large and ſpatious Hauls, wherein Magiſtrates ſat in judgement and miniſtred Juſtice, were converted into Chriſtian Churches. Whence Auſonius wrote thus, Baſilica olim negotijs Baſilicæ.

Saint Bede. Heere our Bede, the ſingular glory and ornament of England, who for his Piety and learning got the ſirname of VENERABILIS, beſtowed all diligence, as himſelfe ſaith, in meditation of the Scriptures, and amid the moſt boiſterous billowes and ſurging waves of Barbariſme wrote many moſt learned Volumes. When hee was once dead, there was buried with him, as William of Malmesbury ſaith, all the knowledge, well neere of Acts and Monuments, untill our time. For, when there ſucceeded ever one more lazie than another, the heat of good ſtudies was abated, and cooled through the whole Land. And the Danes for their parr, plagued this holy place in ſuch wiſe, that ſhortly after the Conqueſt, when ſome in theſe Countries went in hand to reeſtabliſh the Monkes againe, and Walcher the Biſhop aſſigned this place for them; Onely walles, as ſaith mine Authour, were ſtanding without any roofe, and it ſcarcely retained any ſigne of the ancient dignity: howbeit for all that, they framing a roofe over head of rough hewen wood ſuch as they could get, and thatching it with ſtraw, beganne to celebrate Divine Service therein. B

Biſhops of Durham. I needе not to make a Catalogue of the Biſhops of Durham who are reputed Count-Palatines. Let it ſuffice to intimate thus much, that ſince the firſt time, a See was heere erected, in the yeere of our Redemption 995. there have ſitten in it 35. Biſhops unto our daies. Of which theſe were moſt eminent: Hugh Pudſey nobly deſcended, and allyed to King Stephen: who for a thouſand and thirteene pounds preſently diſburſed, purchaſed of King Richard the Firſt, the County of Northumberland for his life; and Sathbrege, to his ſucceſſours for ever, and built that goodly Hoſpitall whereof I ſpake: betweene whom and the Archbiſhop there aroſe a moſt bitter controverſie, Whiles (as he writeth of them) hic præeſſe, ille non ſubeſſe, & neuter prodeſſe contenderet, that is, One would bee ſuperiour, the other would not bee inferiour, and neither of them would doe any good. Antony Bec, Patriarch of Jeruſalem, who ſpent infinite ſummes of money, upon vaſt buildings, and glorious furniture. Thomas Wolſey Cardinall, who in his high proſperity wanted nothing but moderation (but his Hiſtory is ſufficiently knowne.) And Cuthbert Tunſtall, who dyed in our time, for ſingular knowledge in the beſt Sciences, ſincere holineſſe of life, and great wiſdome approved in domeſticall, and forraigne imployments, was (without offence bee it ſpoken) equivalent to them all, and a ſingular Ornament to his native Countrie. LANCA-SHIRE.

I Muſt now turne the courſe of my journey another way, unto the reſt of the BRIGANTES, who were planted on the farther ſide of the Hilles toward the Iriſh Sea: and firſt unto LANCA-SHIRE, which I goe unto (God ſpeede mee well) after a ſort ſomewhat againſt my will: For I feare me that I ſhall not ſatisfie my ſelfe, and much leſſe the Reader. For very few things fell out to my deſire, when I travailed over the greateſt part thereof, the old names in every place have beene ſo worne out by the continuall aſſault of Time. But leaſt I might bee thought to neglect the hearty good Lanca-ſhire men, I will proceed, in hope that Gods aſſiſtance, which hitherto hath beene favourable unto me, will not now faile me.

Under thoſe mountraines, which (as I have often ſaid heeretofore) ſhoote along through the middle of England, and interpoſe themſelves as umpires and Bounders betweene divers ſhires, Lanca-ſhire lyeth toward the Weſt, in the Engliſh Saxon tongue Loncaꝛ-ꝺeꝛ-ꝑcyꝛe, commonly termed Lonka-ſhire, Lanca-ſhire, and The County Palatine of Lancaſter, becauſe it is notably knowne by the title of a County Palatine. It is ſo encloſed betweene Yorke-ſhire on the Eaſt ſide, and the Iriſh ſea on the Weſt, that on the South ſide where it boundeth upon Cheſhire it is broader, and by little and little the more Northward it goeth, where it confineth upon Weſtmorland, the narrower it groweth. And there, by an Arme of the ſea inſinuating it ſelfe, is interrupted, and hath a good part of it which butteth upon Cumberland, beyond the ſaid Arme.

Where the ground is plaine and champion, it yeeldeth good ſtore of Barly and Wheat: that which lieth at the botom of the hilles, is better for Otes: The ſoile every where is meetely good and tolerable, unleſſe it be in certaine moiſt places and unwholſome called Moſſes, which notwithſtanding make amends for theſe their diſcommodities, with more plentifull commodities. For, if their upper coate bee pared away, they yeeld certaine unctuous or fattiſh * Turffs for fewell, and ſome times under-ground trees, or which have lien a long time buried there. Underneath alſo in divers places they affourd abundance of marle, which ſerveth in ſtead of mucke to enrich their grounds. Whereby, the ſoile that in mans opinion was held moſt unapt to beare Corne, beginneth now to be ſo kinde and arable, that it may be juſtly thought, mens idleneſſe in times paſt was greater than any naturall barraineſſe of the ſoile. But a man may judge of the goodneſſe of the ſoile, partly by the conſtitution and complexion of the Inhabitants, who are to ſee to, paſſing faire and beautifull, and in part, if you pleaſe, by the Cattalle. For, in their Kine and Oxen which have goodly heads and faire ſpread hornes, and are in body well proportionate withall, you ſhall finde in manner no one point wanting, that Mago the Carthaginian doth require, as Columella ſpecifieth out of him.

Moſſes.

* Ceſpites.

Lanca-ſhire beaſts.

On the South part, it is ſeparated from Cheſhire with the River Merſey which ſpringing forth of the midland hilles, having paſſed a little from his head, becommeth a bound to diſtinguiſh the Shires, and with a ſlow current runneth Weſtward, calling as it were, other rivers (to uſe the words of the Poet) into his skie coloured and azure lappe, and forthwith gladly biddeth welcome unto Irwell from the North, which river bringeth along with him all the rivers of this Eaſterne part. Among theſe, Roch is of greateſt name, which hath ſtanding upon it in the Vale, Rochdale a Mercate Towne well frequented; like as Irwell it ſelfe hath ſituate upon it Bury a Mercate Towne nothing inferiour to the other: and hard by, whiles I carefully ſought for COCCIUM, mentioned by Antonine the Emperour, I ſaw Cockley, a Chapell built of timber, beſet round about with trees: Alſo Turton Chapell among very ſteepe downfalls, and overgrowne unpleaſant places: Turton Towre, and Entwiſſell a proper per faire houſe: which had in times paſt Gentlemen of that name, as Turton is the A ſeate at this day of the right ancient family of Orell. But, where Irke and Irwell meet together, on the left hand banke raiſed of a reddiſh kinde of ſtone, ſcarce three miles from Merſey, flouriſhed that Towne of right great antiquity which we now call Man- Mancunium. cheſter, and Antonine the Emperour called MANCUNIUM, and MANUCIUM, according to the variety of the Copies. This retaining the firſt part of his ancient name, farre excelleth the Townes lying round about it, for the beautifull ſhew it carrieth, for reſort unto it, and for clothing: in regard alſo of the Mercate-place, the faire Church, and College, founded by Thomas Lord De-la-ware, a Prieſt (the laſt heire male of his Family) and ſummoned to the Parliament among the Lords Temporall by the name of Magiſter Thomas de-la-ware. For he deſcended from the B

Greleies, who were the ancient Lords of this Towne, and by Ioane ſiſter of the ſaid Sir Thomas, it came to Weſts now Lords De-la-ware. But, in the foregoing age, this Towne was of farre greater account, both for certaine wollen clothes there wrought and in great requeſt commonly called Mancheſter Cottons, and alſo for the liberty of a Sanctuary, which under King Henry the Eighth, was by Parliamentary authority, tranſlated to Cheſter. In a Parke of the Earle of Derbies neere adjoyning, called Alparke, where the Brooke Medlocke entreth into Irwell, I ſaw the plot and groundworke of an ancient Fortreſſe built foure ſquare, commonly called Mancaſtle:
which I will not in any wiſe ſay, was that ancient MANCUNIUM, it is contained in ſo narrow a peece of ground, but rather the Fort of Mancunium, and ſtation of C the Romanes where they kept watch and ward: at which I ſaw this ancient Inſcription in a long ſtone to the memory of Candidus a Centurion.

* Centurionis.

As for this other, Iohn Dee that moſt famous Mathematician, and Warden of Mancheſter College, who had a ſight of the ſame heere, copied it out for me.

Both which may ſeeme erected in honour of thoſe Centurious, for their loyalty and honeſty ſo many yeeres approoved.

In the yeere of our Salvation 920. King Edward the Elder, as Marianus writeth, ſent an Army of Mercians into Northumberland, To reedifie the City of Mancheſter, and to place a Gariſon there (for it belonged formerly unto the Kings of Northumberland) and ſeemeth to have beene quite deſtroyed in the Daniſh warre: againſt whom, becauſe the inhabitants had borne themſelves as valiant men, they will have their towne to be called Mancheſter, that is, as they expound it, The City of Men, and in this conceit which implieth their owne commendation, they wonderfully pleaſe F

and

A and flatter themſelves. But full little know the good honeſt men, that MANCUNIUM was the name of it in the Britans time, ſo that the Etymologie thereof, out of our Engliſh tongue, can by no meanes ſeeme probable. I for my part therefore would derive it rather from Main a Britiſh word which ſignifieth a Stone: For, upon a ſtony hill it is ſeated, and beneath the very Towne, at Colyhurſt, there are very good and famous quarries of ſtone.

But, to returne againe. Merſey now by this time carrying a fuller ſtreame by reaſon of Irwell conſociating with him, holdeth on in his journey toward the Ocean, by Trafford, from whence the Traffords a Family of great good note tooke their name as they had their habitation: alſo by Chatmoſſe, a low moſſie ground, lying a great B way in length and bredth: a good part whereof, the Brookes ſwelling high within our fathers remembrance carried quite away with them not without much danger: Whereby, the Rivers were corrupted, and a number of freſh fiſh periſhed. In which place now lyeth a Vale ſomewhat low, watered with a little Brooke, and trees have beene diſcovered lying along. So that it may be thought, when the ground lay neglected, and the chanels were not skoured in thoſe open and flat Valleies for riverets and Brookes to paſſe away, but the water-lades ſtopped up either through negligence, or depopulation: that then all the grounds that lay lower than others, became ſuch boggy plots, as we call Moſſes, or elſe ſtanding Meeres. Which if it bee true, wee neede not mervaile that ſo many trees in the like places every where C throughout England (but in this ſhire eſpecially) lie overwhelmed, and as it were, buried. For, when their rootes were looſened through over much moiſture, the trees could not chuſe but fall, and in ſuch ſoft ground ſinke and bee quite ſwallowed up. They that dwell thereabouts, aſſay and try with poles and ſpits, where they lie hidden, and when they light upon them marke the place, digge them out, and uſe them for fire wood: For they burne cleere and give light, as well as torch wood, which haply is by reaſon of a bituminous and clammy fat earth wherein they lye: whence the common ſort take them for Firres: which notwithſtanding Cæſar denieth to have growne in Britaine. I know it is an opinion currant with the moſt, that theſe trees overturned with the force of waters, have lien ever ſince Noahs Floud, when D the World was drowned, and ſo much the rather, becauſe they are elſewhere digged out of very high places: and yet they deny not, but thoſe high grounds are very mariſh and wateriſh.

Trafford.

Moſſes whence they come.

Firre trees in Cæſars time grew not in Britaine.

Such mighty trees alſo are found oftentimes in Holland, a Country of Germany: which the learned men there, ſuppoſe were either undermined by waves working into the ſhore, or by windes driven forward and brought unto thoſe lower and moiſt places; where they ſetled and ſunke downe. But let the curious company of Philoſophers ſearch into theſe matters to whom I commend them, and to their further inquirie, whether there are not Subterranean trees growing under earth; as well as plants and other Creatures. After Chatmoſſe, Holcroſt ſheweth it ſelfe, which, as it afE forded the ſeat, ſo it gave the name alſo, to that right ancient family of the Holcrofts: whoſe eſtate in old time was much amended by marriage with one of the heires of Culchit a place ſeated hard by, which Gilbert de Culchit held, Of the Fee of Almaricke Butler, as hee himſelfe did of the Earle of Ferrars, in King Henry the Third his time. Whoſe eldeſt daughter and heire, when Richard Fitz-Hugh of Hindley had married, he aſſumed to himſelfe the name of Culchith: like as his brother Thomas, who wedded the ſecond daughter, was of the poſſeſſion, called Holcroft: another alſo by the ſame reaſon was named de Peasfalong, and a fourth de Riſeley. Which I note, that the Reader may underſtand, how our Anceſtours, as they were in other F things conſtant and grave, ſo in leaving and taking up names out of their poſſeſſions, they were as vaine and variable as might bee. But even in other parts of England alſo, this was in old time a thing in uſuall practiſe.

Holcroft.

Heere lie there round about every way little Townes, which (as throughout this whole County, and Cheſhire, and other Northren parts) as they imparted their names to worſhipfull houſes, ſo they to have their Lords even unto theſe daies, men of the very ſame name with them. As for example, Aſton of Aſton: Atherton of Atherton, Tilleſley of Tilleſley, Standiſh of Standiſh, Bold of Bold, Heſket of Heſket, Worthington of Worthington, Torbec of Torbec, &c. And an endleſſe peece of worke it were to name them one by one, neither is it any part of my purpoſe to reckon up all families of name and worſhip, but to take a view and ſurvey of the more ancient places. And as vertue and wealth laied the foundations of theſe and ſuch like Families in theſe North Countries, and elſewhere (that I may ſpeake it once for all) and prouident moderation with ſimplicity ſtanding contented with their owne eſtate, both preſerved and encreaſed them: So, in the South part of England, riotous expenſe and ſuperfluity, uſurious contracts, voluptuous and vicious life, together with indirect courſes and crafty dealings; have in ſhort ſpace utterly overthrowne moſt flouriſhing houſes, in ſo much as men complaine, that the offspring of the ancient Gentry hath now a long time faded. But Families as plants have their times of encreaſing and decreaſing, I and overpaſſing this, will follow on with the courſe of Merſey, which now by this time runneth downe by Warrington, a Towne knowne by reaſon of the Lords thereof ſirnamed * Butlers, who obtained of King Edward the Firſt the liberty of a Mercate for it: From which, Northward, Winwicke is not farre diſtant: a place among other fat Benefices of England of greateſt name: in the upmoſt part of the Church whereof, are read theſe rude Verſes engraven in an old Character, concerning King Oſwald.

* Pincernæ.

Winwicke.

Hic locus Oſwalde quondam placuit tibi valde.
Northanhumbrorum fueras Rex, nuncq; Polorum Regna tenes, loco paſſus Marcelde vocato.

This place ſometime thee pleaſed well, Oſwald,
King thou hadſt beene once of Northumberland,
Thou ſufferedſt in a place Marcelde call'd,
Thy Kingdome now is heaven, that aye doth ſtand.

From Warrington, the River Merſey ſpreading abroad, and ſtraightwaies drawing in himſelfe againe, with a wide and open outlet, very commodious for merchandiſe entreth into the Iriſh Sea, where Litherpoole, called in the elder ages Lirep-pole, commonly Lirpoole is ſeated, ſo named, as it is thought, of the water ſpreading it ſelfe in manner of a Poole: whence there is a convenient paſſage over into Ireland and much frequented, and in that reſpect more notorious, than for any Antiquity. For, there is no mention extant thereof any where in ancient Writers, but that Roger of Poictiers, who was Lord, as they ſpake in thoſe dayes, of the Honour of Lancaſter, built a Caſtle heere. Whereof the worthy family of the Molineaux Knights have had the cuſtody now a long time, whoſe chiefe ſeat is hard by at Seſton, which, the ſaid Roger of Poictiers gave unto Vivian de Molineaux, ſhortly after the firſt entry of the Normans. For, all that Territory betweene the two Rivers Ribel and Merſey, the ſame Roger held: as appeareth evidently by the authenticall Record of Domeſday booke. Neere unto Seſton, Alt a little River ſeeketh a way into the Sea, and when hee hath found it, giveth name to a ſmall Village Attmouth ſtanding by, and hath Ferneby neere unto it: wherein the moiſt and moſſie ſoile turffes are digged up, which ſerve the inhabitants for fewell and candle light. Under the ſaid turfes, there is a certaine dead and blackiſh water, upon which there ſwimmeth, I wot not what unctuous matter, and in it ſwimme little fiſhes that are caught by the diggers of turfe: So that wee may ſay, there bee fiſhes digged heere out of the earth, no leſſe than about Heraclea, and Tios in Pontus. And no mervaile, ſeeing that in ſuch watery places fiſhes otherwhiles ſeeking for moiſture get under the ground, and men goe a fiſhing with ſpades. But, that in Paphlagonia many and thoſe good fiſhes are gotten by digging in places nothing watery, there is ſome ſecret and peculiar reaſon thereof in Nature: and pleaſantly wrote Seneca, Why ſhould not fiſhes enter and paſſe into the land, if we paſſe over the Sea?

Fiſhes digged out of the ground.

From

A From hence the open ſhore ſhooteth out with a great bent; and more within land from the ſea ſtandeth Ormeskirke a mercate towne, well knowne, by reaſon of the ſepulture there of the Stanleys, Earles of Derby, whoſe chiefe ſeat Latham is hard by: a ſtately houſe, which they have enlarged continually, ever ſince King Henry the Fourth his dayes, what time Sir John Stanley knight, father to John Lord deputy of Ireland, deſcended of the ſame ſtemme whence the Barons de Audley, married the daughter and heire of Sir Thomas Latham, a right noble knight, who brought to him for her dowrie this faire inheritance, with many other poſſeſsions. And from that time have the Stanleys planted their ſeat heere: of whom Thomas, the B ſonne of Thomas Lord Stanley, was by King Henry the ſeventh created Earle of Derby; and had iſſue by Eleonor Nevill daughter to the Earle of Salisbury, George Lord Strange, for he had wedded Joan the onely daughter and heire of John Baron Le Strange of Knockin, who dying in his fathers life time, begat a ſonne named Thomas, the ſecond Earle of Derby; unto whom Anne, the daughter of Edward Lord Haſtings, bare Edward the third Earle of Derby, who begat of Dorothea, daughter of Thomas Howard Duke of Norfolke, Henry the fourth Earle; who married Margaret, daughter of Henry Clifford Earle of Cumberland, mother unto Ferdinando the fifth Earle lately deceaſed, and to William now the ſixth Earle, who ſucceeded his brother: but I forget my ſelfe now, when as I have formerly remembred as C much.

Ormeskirk.

Stanleys Earles of Derby.

Dugleſſe a riveret, creepeth and ſtealeth along quietly by this place; neere unto which our noble Arthur, as Ninnius writeth, put the Saxons to flight in a memorable battaile. At the head hereof ſtandeth the towne Wiggin, called in ancient times Wibiggin: of which name I have nothing elſe to ſay, but that in Lancaſhire they call buildings and houſes Biggins: neither of the towne, but that it is faire, and a Corporation alſo with a Maior and Burgeſſes: and the parſon of the Church, as I have learned, is Lord of the towne. Hard by it Holland ſheweth it ſelfe, out of a younger brother, whereof that moſt noble and renowned race of the Hollands Earles of Kent, and Dukes alſo of Surry and Exceſter, fetched both their originall and their ſirname. But D the daughter and heire of the eldeſt brother, who flouriſhed here in knights degree, being in the end married into the houſe of the Lovels, brought unto them an addition of poſſeſsions, with her Armes, viz. *in a ſhield Azure * florete Argent a Lion rampant gardant Arg.* Neere unto the mouth of Dugleſſe is Merton, a very great & large poole, which emptieth it ſelfe into this river, and then ſtreight waies meeteth with the river Ribell, neare his out-let; for this is the next river after Merſey that runneth into the ſea, and hath not yet loſt quite his former ancient name; for Ptolomee calleth the ſalt water or arme of the ſea here BELISAMA, and we Ribell, perhaps by addition of the Saxon word Rhe unto it, that ſignifieth a River. This river comming with a quicke and haſty ſtreame out of the hils in Yorke-ſhire, taketh his courſe firſt E Southward, by three exceeding high mountaines, Ingleborow hill at the ſpring head, which I wondered at to ſee how it aſcendeth as it were by degrees with a huge and mighty ridge Weſtward, and at the fartheſt end mounteth up into the aire, as if an other hill were ſet upon the head of it: Penigent, haply ſo called of his whitiſh & ſnowy top, for ſo Pengwin ſignifieth in the britiſh tongue: and he riſeth aloft with an huge bulke, howbeit not altogether ſo high as the other. But when Ribell commeth into Lancaſhire (for thoſe two ſtand in Yorke-ſhire) Pendle-hill advanceth it ſelfe up to the skie with a lofty head, and in the very top thereof bringeth forth a peculiar plant, which, as though it came out of the clowdes, they tearme Clowdes-bery. But this mountaine is moſt notorious for the harme that it did not long ſince to the coun- F try lying beneath it, by reaſon of a mighty deale of water guſhing out of it: as alſo for an infallible prognoſtication of raine, ſo often as the top thereof is covered with a miſt. Of theſe hils I have made mention the more willingly, both becauſe they are the higheſt in our Apennine: whence commeth this vulgar Rhime.

For Pen in the Britiſh tongue ſignifieth the tops of hils. By an out corner or parcel of Pendle hill, ſtandeth Clithero caſtle, built by the Lacies neere unto Ribell, and a neighbour unto it Whaley, in the Saxon tongue Walale3, famous for the monaſtery that the ſaid Lacies founded, which was tranſlated from Stanlaw in Cheſhire hither, in the yeere 1296. where in the yeere 798. duke Wade unfortunately gave battaile to Ardulph King of Northumberland, at Billangho, which is more ſhort called Langho. This Ribell no ſooner turneth into the Weſt, but imparteth his name to a ſmall towne, which in our age is called Ribleche-ſter: where are digged up from time to time ſo many monuments of Romane antiquity, ſtatues, peeces of coyn, Pillars, Piedeſtals & Chapters of pillars, heathen altars, Marble-ſtones and inſcriptions, that the inhabitants may ſeeme not without cauſe to have this hobling rhyme ſo rife in their mouthes.

It is written upon a wall in Rome,
Ribcheſter was as rich as any towne in Chriſtendome.

And the port high wayes came directly hither, raiſed up with eminent cauſeis: one from Yorke, another out of the North, through Bowland-Forreſt, a ſpacious peece of ground, which as yet is moſt evidently to be ſeene for many miles together. But the country folke have ſo disfigured the inſcriptions, that although I did ſee many, yet could I ſcarce read one or two of them. At Salesbury hall, an houſe of that ancient family of the Talbots, ſtanding neere by, I ſaw the baſe or foot of a pillar with this inſcription.

In a wall neare unto it, there is another great ſtone infixed, ſhewing in the fore-part Cupid and another little image; out of the backe-ſide or reverſe whereof this was exemplified for me: but the inſcription carrieth no ſenſe with it, which becauſe it troubled me a long time, I will ſet down here underneath, to ſee what the opinion of other men is of it.

For mine owne part, I can make nothing elſe thereof, but that moſt of theſe words were the Britiſh names of places adjoining. In the yeere 1603. when I went a ſecond time to ſee this place, I hapned upon the greateſt and faireſt Altar that ever I ſaw, dedicated to the Mother Goddeſſes by a Captain of the Aſturians, with this inſcription.

C Concerning these DEABUS, or DEIS MATRIBUS, that is, Mothers Goddesses, what they were I cannot finde out with all my searching: for in the volumes of Inscriptions gathered through the world, save in another Altar besides found among us, they are not mentioned, as farre as I remember. Onely I read that Enguium, a little towne in Sicily, was ennobled for the presence of the MOTHER GODDESSES, wherein were shewed certaine speares and brazen helmets, which Metio and Ulysses consecrated to those Goddesses.

E So small a one this was, that it may seeme to have beene some poore mans little altar to carry with him to and fro, serving only to burne and offer incense or salt, and meale upon it: whereas that other was farre bigger, and made for to sacrifice and offer greater beasts upon it. In these altars the posterity no doubt imitated Noah, even after they had fallen away and revolted from the true worship of God. Neither erected they altars to their Gods onely, but also unto their Emperours by way of servile flattery, with this impious title, NUMINI MAIESTATIQUE EORUM, that is, Unto their GOD-HEAD and Majesty. Unto these they kneeled in humble maner, these they clasped about and embraced as they prayed, before these they tooke their oathes: and in one word, in these and in their sacrifices consisted the maine substance F of all their religion, so farre forth, that whosoever had no altar of their owne, they were thought verily to have no religion, nor to acknowledge any God at all.

Moreover, very lately, and but the other day, a stone was digged up here, wherein was engraven the naked portract or image of a man on horse-backe, without saddle, without bridle, with both hands seeming to launce his speare, and ready to ride over a naked man lying downe along at his foot, who holdeth before I wot not what foure square peece. But hence have wee no light at all toward the finding out of the ancient name of this place which now is in queſtion, unleſſe it hath now and then changed the name, which otherwhiles uſually happeneth. For in this place Ptolomy hath ſet RIGODUNUM: if for RIBODUNUM, the name is not altogether unlike to Ribbecheſter: and juſt at this diſtance from Mancunium, that is, Mancheſter, that is to ſay 18. miles off, doth Antonine place COCCIM, which alſo in ſome copies we read GOCCIUM. But when the flouriſhing fortune of this City, having runne the full and fatall period, was faded, either by warre, or earthquake, as the common ſort doe think, ſomewhat lower where Ribell ſuffereth the violence of the flowing tides of the Sea, and is called of the Geographer BELLISAMA ÆSTUARIUM, that is, the ſalt-water BELLISAMA, neare unto Peneworth, where in the Conquerors reigne there was a little caſtle (as appeareth by the Records of the ſaid King) out of the fall of Riblecheſter aroſe in ſteed of it her daughter Preſton, a great, and (for theſe Countries) a faire town, & well inhabited, ſo called of religious men; for in our ſpeech the name ſoundeth as much as Prieſts towne. Beneath this Ribell, Derwen a rill commeth in with his water: and the firſt mercate towne that hee watereth is Blacke-borne, ſo called of the Blacke-water, E which towne belonging in times paſt to the Lacies, gave name unto Blackburne-ſhire, a little territory adjoining; from thence it runneth by Houghton-towre, which communicated the name unto a notable family that long time dwelt in it: and by Waleton, which William, Lord of Lancaſter, King Stephens ſonne, gave unto Walter de Walton: and afterward it was the poſſeſsion of the ancient race of the Langtons, who deſcended from the ſaid Waltons. But now let us returne.

The ſaid Preſton whereof I ſpake, is by the common people called Preſton in Anderneſſe, for Acmundeſ-neſſe, for ſo the Engliſh Saxons tearmed this part of the ſhire, which lying between the two rivers, Ribel and Cocar, ſtretcheth out with a promontory in manner of a noſe, which afterwards they alſo called Acmunderneſſe. Wherein F were no more but 16. villages inhabited in King William the Conquerors time; the reſt lay waſt, as we read in Doomeſ-day booke, and Roger of Poictiers held the ſame.

Ander-neſſe.

But afterwards it belonged to Theobald Walter: from whom the Bottelers of Ireland derive their beginning: for thus wee read in a Charter of K. Richard the firſt, Know yee, that wee have given, and by this preſent Charter confirmed unto Theobald Walter,

A Walter, for his homage and ſervice, Agmonderneſſe full and whole, with all the appertenences, &c. This part yeeldeth plenty of oates, but not ſo apt to beare barly. Howbeit it is full of freſh paſtures, eſpecially to the ſea ſide, where it is partly Champion ground, and thereupon it ſeemeth that a good part of it is called The File, for the Field (and yet in the Kings Rolls it goeth under the Latine name LIMA, that is, a File, namely, that Smithes toole or inſtrument wherewith Iron, or any other thing is ſmoothed.) But becauſe elſewhere it is mariſh ground, they hold it not very wholſome. Wie, a little river ſpeedily cutting over this part, commeth rolling downe out of Wierdale, a very ſolitary place, and runneth by Grenhaugh Caſtle, which Tho-
B mas Stanley, the firſt Earle of Derby out of this family, built: what time as hee ſtood in feare of certaine out-lawed Gentlemen of this ſhire, whoſe poſſeſſions King Henry the ſeventh had freely given unto him. For many an aſſault they gave him, and other whiles in hoſtile manner made inrodes into his lands, untill the moderate carriage of the good and worthy man, and proceſſe of time pacified theſe quarrels.

Grenhaugh caſtle.

Here along the ſea ſhore, you may ſee in many places heaps of ſand, whereupon they powre water, untill it gather a ſaltiſh humour, which afterwards with turfes they boile untill it be white ſalt. There be alſo here uncertaine ſands not to bee truſted, but ready to catch and ſwallow (they call them Quick-ſands) ſo dangerous for
C travellers, whiles at a low water, when ride is paſt, they ſeeke to goe the neareſt way, that they had need to take very good heed leſt in going a foot (I uſe Sidonius his words) they ſuffer not ſhipwracke, and be caſt away on the land. But eſpecially about the mouth of Cocar, where, as it were, in a field of Syrts or Quick-ſands, Cokar ſand Abbey, an Abbey not long ſince of the Cluniack Monkes, built by Ranulph de Meſchines, but open to the violence of windes, ſtood betweene the mouths of Cocar and Lune or Lone, and hath a bleake proſpect into the wide Iriſh ſea. This river
Lone, commonly called Lune, ſpringing out of the mountaines of Weſtmorland, running Southward in a chanell now broad, now narrow, with many a reach in and out hindring his ſtreame, enricheth the dwellers thereby in Summer time with great
D ſtore of Salmons: which becauſe they delight in cleere water, and eſpecially in ſhallow places that are ſandy, come up thicke together into this, and other rivers of this coaſt. As ſoone as Lune is entred into Lancaſhire, Lacc, a little brooke from out of the Eaſt, joyneth his ſtreame with it. In which place now ſtandeth Over-Burrow, a very ſmall village of husbandmen; which, as the inhabitants enformed mee, had beene ſometimes a great City, and tooke up all thoſe large fields betweene Lacce and Lone, and after it had ſuffered all miſeries that follow famine, was driven to compoſition through extremity. This tradition they received from their anceſtours, delivered as it were from hand to hand unto them. And in very truth by diverſ and ſundry monuments exceeding ancient, by engraven ſtones, pavements of E ſquare checker worke, peeces of Romane coine, and by this new name Burrow, which with us ſignifieth a Burgh, that place ſhould ſeeme to bee of great antiquity. But if it recover the ancient name, it may thanke other and not mee, although I have ſought as narrowly, and diligently for it, as for Ants pathes: neither is any man to thinke, that the ſeverall names of every towne in Britaine are preciſely noted and ſet done in Ptolomee, Antonine, The Notice of Provinces, and other approved and principall Authors. But if a man may goe by gheſſe, I would willingly thinke that it was BREMETONACUM (which Jerome Surita, a Spaniard, in his notes upon Antonine, deemeth truely to be a different place from BREMENTURACUM) and that by the diſtance from COCCIUM, or Ribble-cheſter.

and advanced to that title by King Henry the eighth, of whom the third and the laſt named William, left behind him his onely daughter and heire, Elizabeth, wife to Edward Parker Baron Morley, mother to Sir William Parker, whom in that regard King James commanded to be ſummoned to Parliament by the title of Lord Mont-Eagle, and whom wee and all our poſterity may acknowledge to have beene borne for the good of all Britain. For, by a ſhort letter, obſcurely penned, and ſecretly ſent unto him, and by him dutifully diſcovered, in a happy houre was detected, at the very laſt houre, in a maner, when the whole State was at the point to periſh by the moſt horrible and deteſtable treaſon, that ever any barbarous impiety could contrive: what time certaine godleſſe and irreligious monſters of men, masking under the mantle of religion, having beſtowed a great quantity of gun-powder under the Parliament houſe, ſtood ready with match in hand to give fire thereto, for to blow up both Prince and Countrey with one blaſt in a moment.

The Gunpowder treaſon.

Lone having paſſed on ſome few miles from hence, commeth within the ſight of Lancaſter, ſtanding on his South banke, the chiefe towne of this region: which the inhabitants more truly call Loncaſter, as the Scots alſo, who name it Loncaſtell, of the River Lone. Both the name ſtill remaining, and the river running under it, doe argue in ſome ſort that it is LONGOVICUM, where, under the Lievtenant Generall of Britaine, as wee finde in the Notice of Provinces, a company of the Longovicarians, who of the place borrowed that name, kept their ſtation. Although the towne at this day is not very well peopled, nor much frequented, and all the inhabitants thereof are given to husbandry (for the territory all round about is well manured, lying open, freſh and faire, and not voide of woods:) yet for proofe of Romane antiquity, they finde otherwhiles peeces of the Emperours coine, eſpecially where the Friery ſtood: for there, they ſay, was the plot upon which the ancient City was planted, which the Scots, after they had with a ſudden out-road waſted all in their way, in the yeere of our Redemption 1322. ſet on fire and burnt. Since which time they have begunne to build nearer unto a greene hill by the river ſide, on which ſtandeth the caſtle, great I cannot ſay, nor of any antiquity, but faire and ſtrong. And hard by it ſtandeth upon the height of the hill, the onely Church they have, where the Monkes aliens had in times paſt a cell founded by Roger of Poictiers. A little beneath which, by a faire bridge over Lone, in the deſcent and ſide of the hill where it is ſteepeſt, hangeth a peece of a moſt ancient wall of Romane work, ſeeming ready to reele; Wery wall they call it, after a later Britiſh name, as it ſhould ſeeme, of this towne. For they called it Caer Werid, as one would ſay, The Greene City, happely of that freſh greene hill. But I leave this to others. John Lord of Moriton and of Lancaſter, afterwards King of England, confirmed by Charter to his Burgeſſes of Lancaſter, all the liberties which he had granted unto the Burgeſſes of Briſtoll. And King Edward the third in the ſixe and thirtieth yeere of his reign, granted unto the Mayor and Bailives, and Commonalty of the towne of Lancaſter, that Plees and Seſsions ſhould not elſewhere bee holden. This towne ſeeth the Pole Arcticke (that I may note ſo much) elevated foure and fifty degrees and five minutes, and ſtandeth removed from the utmoſt line of the Weſt, twenty degrees and forty eight minutes in Longitude.

Lancaſter.

Whiles I looked round about from the top of the ſaid caſtle hill, to ſee the mouth of Lone, that iſſueth it ſelfe into the ſea a little lower, Forneſſe the other part of this ſhire appeared in ſight, which the ſea hath after a ſort violently rent apart from the reſt. For when as the ſhore did from hence ſhoote out a maine way into the Weſt, the Ocean, as it were much diſpleaſed and angry hereat, obſtinately ceaſed not to ſlaſh and mangle it, nay, which is more, hath with his fell flowing at boiſterous tides devoured the ſhore: and thereby maketh three wide creekes or bayes; namely, Kent-ſand, at which the river Ken powreth it ſelfe forth; Leven-ſand, and Dudden-ſand: betweene which (two) the land beareth out ſo much, that thereupon it tooke the name. For with us in our language, For-neſſe & Foreland is all one with the Latine Promontorium anterius (that is, a Fore-promontory.) All this part, unleſſe it bee

A be hard by the ſea ſide, mounteth up aloft with high topped hils, and huge fels ſtanding thicke together (which they tearme Forneſſ-fells. Among which the Britans lived ſafe a great while, truſting upon theſe ſtrong naturall fenſes: although the victorious Engliſh Saxons made way through all in the end. For in the yeere 228. after there comming in, I gather that the Britans had their abode here, becauſe Egfride King of Northumberland, gave unto Holy Saint Cuthbert, the land called Carthmell, and all the Britans in it (thus we finde written in his life) and it is very well knowne that Carthmell is a part of this ſhire by Kentſand, and a little towne in it retaineth yet the ſame name: Wherein William Mareſchall the elder, Earle of Pembroch built a B Priory, and endowed it with living. If you read in Ptolomee SETANTIORUM λιμὴν, that is, The Setantians Mere, as ſome Copies have; and not Setantiorum λιμὴν, that is, The Setantians Haven, I durſt boldly avouch that theſe Britans here were called SETANTII. For among theſe mountaines the greateſt ſtanding water in all England, now called Winander-mere; in the Engliſh Saxon Winpaðe-mere (haply of his winding and turning in and out) lieth ſtretched out for the ſpace of ten miles or thereabout with crooked bankes, and is all paved (as it were) with ſtone in the bottome: in ſome places of wonderfull depth, and breeding a peculiar kinde of fiſh found no where elſe, which the inhabitants there by call A Chare. And a little village ſtanding hard by carrieth the name thereof: In which Eathred King of Nor- C thumberland, in the yeer of Chriſt 792. when he had by force fetched King Elfwolds ſonnes out of Yorke, ſlue them, that by his owne wickedneſſe, and their blood, hee might ſecure the Kingdome to himſelfe and his.

Betwixt this Mere and the river Dudden, the promontory runneth out, which wee commonly call Forneſſe, and hath the Iland Walney, as a fore-fence or countremure lying along by it, with a ſmall arme of the ſea betweene: The gullet or entry into which is defended with a fort, called the Pile of Fouldrey, ſtanding in the midſt of the waves upon a rocke, erected there by the Abbot of Forneſſe, in the firſt yeere of King Edward the third.

As for the Promontory it ſelfe, there is nothing worth the ſight in it, unleſſe it be D the ruines of a monaſtery of Ciſtertian Monkes, called Forneſſe Abbey, which Stephen Earle of Bullen, afterwards King of England, in the yeere of our redemption 1127. built in a place called ſometimes Bekenſgill, or tranſlated rather from Tulkes in Anderneſſe. Out of the Monkes whereof, and from no place elſe (as they themſelves have reported) the Biſhops of the Iſle of Man (that lieth juſt over againſt) were by an ancient cuſtome wont to bee elected: as having beene the mother (as it were) of many Monaſteries in the ſaid Man, and in Ireland. More Eaſtward ſtandeth Aldingham, an ancient hereditament belonging to the family of the Haveringtons, or Harringtons, unto whom it came from the Flemmings, by the Cancefelds; and whoſe inheritance deſcended by a daughter unto William Bonvill of Somerſetſhire, and at laſt E by him unto the Greies, Marqueſſes of Dorſet. And ſomwhat higher is Ulverſton, in this regard not to bee paſſed over in ſilence, for that King Edward the third gave a moity thereof unto Sir John Coupland, a moſt brave warriour: whom alſo he advanced to the dignity of a Banaret, becauſe in the battaile at Durham, he took David the ſecond King of the Scots priſoner. But after his deceaſe, the ſame King granted it with other faire lands in this tract, and the title alſo of Earle of Bedford, unto Ingelram Lord Coucy of France, as who had married his daughter Iſabel, and whoſe anceſtours in right of Chriſtiana Lindſey, had great revenewes in England.

Touching the noble men which have borne the title of Lancaſter, there were in the firſt infancy of the Norman Empire three ſtiled Lords of the Honour of Lancaſter: F namely, Roger of * Poitou, the ſonne of Roger Mont-gomery, who was ſurnamed Pictavenſis, as William of Malmesbury writeth, becauſe hee had married a wife from out of Poitou in France. But when he had by his perfidious diſloyalty loſt this honour, honour, William the ſonne of King Stephen, and Earle of Moriton and Warren, had the ſame given unto him by his Father. After whoſe death King Richard the firſt beſtowed it upon his brother John, who was afterward King of England. For thus we read in an old Hiſtory: King Richard declared his ſingular love to his brother John. For beſide Ireland, and the Earledome of Moriton in Normandy, he heaped upon him ſo many dignities in England, that he was in maner a Tetrarch there: Finally, he conferred upon him Cornwall, Lancaſter, Notingham, Derby, with the country adjoining, and many more beſide. A good while after King Henry the third, the ſonne of John, firſt advanced Edmund his ſecond ſonne, called by ſome Crouth-backe, to the title of Earle of Lancaſter, unto whom hee conveyed and made over the inheritances and honours of Simon Montfort Earle of Leiceſter, Robert Ferrars Earle of Derby, and John of Monmouth, becauſe they had riſen, and rebelliouſly born armes againſt him: and he gave this Honor of Lancaſter unto him in theſe words, The Honour, County, Caſtle and Town of Lancaſter, with the Cow-paſtures, & forreſts of Wireſdale, & Lownſdale, New-caſtle under Lime, the manour, forreſt, and Caſtle of Pickering, the manor of Scaleby, the towne of Gomiceſter, and the rents of the towne of Huntendon, &c. After hee the ſaid Edmund had miſſed the kingdome of Sicily, in which the Pope had inveſted him in vaine by a ring, and not without ridiculous diſgrace to the Engliſh nation, cauſed in honour of him certaine peeces of gold to bee ſtamped, with this title, AIMUNDUS REX SICILIÆ, having firſt cunningly ſuckt a great maſſe of money from the credulous King in this regard. This Edmund (when his firſt wife Avelina, daughter and heire to William de Fortibus Earle of Albemarle, was dead iſſueleſſe, who nevertheleſſe in her Will had made him her heire) married Blanch of Artois, of the roiall family of France, to his ſecond wife, and by her had Thomas, Henry, and John, that died an infant. Thomas was the ſecond Earle of Lancaſter, who tooke to wife Alice, the onely daughter and heire of Henry Lacy Earle of Lincolne: who by her deed paſſed over unto the houſe of Lancaſter her owne inheritance, and her mothers, that which belonged to the family of Long Eſpee, who were Earles of Salisbury, like as her father the ſaid Henry Lacy had made the like conveiance before of his owne lands, in caſe Alice ſhould dye without iſſue, as it afterward happened. But this Thomas, for behaving himſelfe inſolently toward his ſoveraigne Edward the ſecond, and ſtill ſupplying fewell to civill warres, being taken priſoner in the field, loſt his head, leaving no iſſue. Howbeit, when this ſentence of death pronounced againſt him, was afterwards by authority of Parliament reverſed, becauſe hee had not his tryall by his Peeres, according to the Law, and great Charter, his brother Henry ſucceeded after him in all his poſſeſſions and honours. Hee alſo was advanced in eſtate by his wife Maude, daughter and ſole heire of Sir Patricke * Chaworth, who brought unto him not onely her owne patrimony, but alſo great inheritances in Wales, of Mauric of London, and of Siward, from whom ſhe deſcended. This Henry left behind him Henry his onely ſonne, whom King Edward the third from an Earle raiſed unto the honour of a Duke: and he was ſecond man of all our Nobility which received the name of Duke. But hee, having no iſſue male, departed this life, leaving behind him two daughters, Maude and Blanch, betweene whom the inheritance was divided. Maud was married to William of Bavaria, who was Earle of Holland, Zeland, Friſland, Henault, and in his wives right, of Leiceſter. And when as ſhe deceaſed without children, John of Gaunt, ſo called becauſe hee was borne at Gaunt in Flanders, fourth ſonne of King Edward the third, who had married Blanch, the other daughter of Henry aforeſaid, entred upon the whole inheritance: and now being for wealth equivalent to many Kings, and created withall by his father Duke of Lancaſter, he obtained alſo at his hands great roialties; for hee, having related what noble ſervice he had performed to his countrey, at home and abroad in the warres, preferred the County of Lancaſter to the dignity of a County Palatine

Dukes of Lancaſter.

A Palatine, by his letters Patent, the tenour whereof runneth in this wiſe. Wee have granted for us and our heires, unto our foreſaid ſonne, that he may have for tearme of his life, his Chancery within the County of Lancaſter, and his writs to be ſealed under his own ſeale to be appointed for the office of the Chancellour: alſo Juſtices of his owne, as well to hold Plees of the Crowne, as alſo other plees whatſoever touching common Law: alſo the hearing and deciding of the ſame, yea and the making of all executions whatſoever, by vertue of their owne writs and officers there.

Moreover, all other liberties and Roialties whatſoever to a County Palatine belonging, as freely and in as ample maner, as the Earle of Cheſter within the ſame County of Cheſter
B is known to have &c. Neither was he Duke of Lancaſter onely, but alſo by his marriage with Conſtance the daughter of Peter King of Leon and Caſtile, hee for a time was ſtiled by the name of King of Leon and of Caſtile. But by a compoſition he gave this over; and in the thirteenth yeere of King Richard the Second, by conſent of Parliament was created Duke of Aquitaine, to have and hold the ſame for tearme of life of the King of England, as King of France: but to the univerſall diſlike of Aquitaine, repining, and affirming that their Seigniory was inſeparably annexed to the Crowne of England. At which time his ſtile ranne thus, John, ſonne to the King of England, Duke of Aquitaine and of Lancaſter, Earle of Derby, Lincolne, and Leiceſter, and high Steward of England.

John of Gaunt King of Caſtile.

C After him, Henry of Bollinbroke his ſonne ſucceeded in the Dukedome of Lancaſter, who when hee had diſpoſſeſſed Richard the ſecond, and obtained the Kingdom of England; he conſidering that being now King he could not beare the title of Duke of Lancaſter, and unwilling that the ſaid title ſhould be diſcontinued, ordained by aſſent of Parliament, that Henry his eldeſt ſonne ſhould enjoy the ſame, and be ſtiled, Prince of Wales, Duke of Aquitain, Lancaſter, and Cornwall, and Earle of Cheſter: and alſo that the liberties and franchiſes of the Dutchy of Lancaſter, ſhould remaine to his ſaid ſonne ſevered from the Crowne of England: and to make better aſſurance to himſelfe, his heires and ſucceſſours in theſe inheritances, by authority of Parliament he ordained in theſe words. We, not willing that our ſaid inheritance, or the liber-
D ties of the ſame, by occaſion of this preſent aſſumption upon us of our regall ſtate & dignity, ſhould be in any thing changed, transferred, diminiſhed, or impaired, will that the ſame our inheritance, with the foreſaid rights and liberties thereof, be kept, continued, and held fully and wholly, to us & our ſaid heires in the ſaid Charters ſpecified, in the ſame maner and forme, condition and ſtate, as they deſcended and came unto us: and alſo with all and every ſuch liberties and franchiſes, and other priviledges, commodities, and profits whatſoever, in which our Lord and father whiles he lived had and held it for terme of his own life, by the grant of Richard late King. And by the tenour of theſe preſents, of our own certaine knowledge, with the conſent of this our preſent Parliament, we grant, declare, decree, and ordaine for us and our heires, that as well our Dutchy of Lancaſter, as all other
E things and every one, Counties, Honours, Caſtles, Manours, Fees, or Inheritances, Advocations, Poſſeſſions, Annuities, and Seignories whatſoever, deſcended unto us before the obtaining of our Regall dignity, howſoever & whereſoever, by right of inheritance in ſervice, or in reverſion, or any way whatſoever, remaine for ever to us and our ſaid heires, ſpecified in the Charters aboveſaid, in forme aforeſaid.

King Henry the fourth.

Parliament Roll 1.H.4.

After this, K. Henry the fifth by authority of Parliament diſſevered from the crown and annexed unto this Dutchy a very great and large inheritance, which had deſcended unto him in right of his mother Dame Mary, who was daughter and one of the heires of Humfrey Bohun Earle of Hereford. In this forme and eſtate it remained under Henry the fifth, and Henry the ſixth: but King Edward the fourth in the firſt
F yeere of his reigne, when hee had in Parliament attainted and forfeited Henry the ſixth, appropriated it, as they uſe to ſpeake, unto the Crowne, that is to ſay, unto himſelfe, and his heires Kings of England: From which King Henry the ſeventh notwithſtanding notwithſtanding forthwith ſeparated. And ſo it continueth, having ſeverall officers, A namely, A Chancellor, an Attourney, a Receiver, a Clerke of the Court, ſixe Aſſiſtants, a Meſſenger, two Auditors, 23. Receivers, and three Supervisors, &c.

There are counted in this ſhire, beſide very many Chappels, Pariſhes 36. and no more: but thoſe wonderfull populous, and which for multitude of inhabitants, farre exceed the greateſt pariſhes elſewhere.

Catadupæ or Forſes.

faire weather: when that on the South ſide doth the ſame, they expect no other A than ſhowers of raine, and foggy miſts. Thus much for the South and narrower part of this region, which Weſtward is bounded with the river Winſter, and the ſpatious Lake Winander-mere, whereof I ſpake erewhile, and Eaſtward with the river Lone or Lune.

At the upper corner of Winander-mere lieth the dead carcaſſe, as one would ſay, of an ancient City, with great ruines of walls, and many heapes of rubbiſh one from another, remaining of buildings without the walls yet to bee ſeene. The fortreſſe thereof was ſomewhat long, fenſed with a ditch and rampire; for it tooke up in length 132. Ells, and in bredth 80. That it had beene the Romans worke is evident, B by the Britiſh brickes, by the mortar tempered with little peeces of bricke among, by ſmall earthen pots or pitchers, by ſmall cruets or vials of glaſſe, by peeces of Roman money oftentimes there found, and by round ſtones as much as milſtones or quernſtones, of which layed and couched together they framed in old time their columnes, and by the paved high waies leading unto it. Now the ancient name thereof is gone, unleſſe a man would gheſſe at it, and thinke it were that AMBOGLANA, whereof the booke of Notices maketh mention, ſeeing at this day it is called Ambleſide.

Ambleſide. Amboglana.

On the Eaſt ſide the river Lone ſerveth for a limit, and after his name the tract lying about it is called Lonſdale: the principall towne whereof is Kirkby Lonſdale, C whither all the people round about repaire to Church and mercate. Above the Spring-head of Lone, the countrey ſpreadeth broader, and the hills ſhoot out with many turnings, betweene which there lye ſome vallies marvellous ſteepe and deepe withall, with many hollow places in manner of caves. Among theſe hills that notable river Eden, which Ptolomee calleth ITUNA, ſhewing his head firſt in Yorkſhire, carrying a ſmall and faint ſtreame in the beginning, but afterwards growing by little and little bigger, with ſundry beckes ſtill augmenting it, ſeeketh a way Northweſt, by Pendragon Caſtle, which hath nothing left unto it unconſumed by time, beſides the bare name, and an heape of ſtones: From thence hee paſſeth by Wharton Hall, the ſeat of the Barons Wharton; of whom the firſt was Sir Thomas Wharton, advanced to that dignity by King Henry the Eighth, whom ſucceeded his ſonne of the D ſame name; and after him Philip that now liveth, the third Baron, a right honourable perſon. Afterwards it runneth downe by Kirkby Stephen, a mercate towne well knowne, and both the Muſgraves, two little villages, which gave name unto that martiall and warlike family of the Muſgraves: out of which in the reigne of King Edward the third, Thomas Muſgrave flouriſhed, and was by ſolemne writ of ſummons called to the Parliament in the ranke of Barons: and theſe Muſgraves had their principall habitation in Heartly caſtle adjoining.

Baron Wharton.

Heartly caſtle.

Heere Eden doth, as it were, make ſtay with his ſtreame, to give meeting unto other petty rivers: upon one of which, ſcarce two miles off from Eden it ſelfe, ſtood VERTERÆ, a towne of ancient memory, mentioned by Antonine the Emperour, E and the booke of Notices: wherein it is notified, that in the declining age of the Romane Empire, a Romane Captaine made his abode there, with a band of the Directores. But now the towne is decayed, and become a ſmall poore village fenſed with a little Fortreſſe, and the name turned into Burgh, for it is commonly named * Burgh under Stanemore. For in the time of the later Emperours (and willing I am to note ſo much once for all) little caſtles, meet for warre occaſions, and furniſhed with ſtore of corne, began to bee tearmed Burgi, that is, Burghs, by a new name: which after that the Empire was tranſlated into the Eaſt, the Germans and others may ſeeme to have borrowed of the Greek word πυργος. Hence alſo came the name of Burgundians, becauſe they inhabited Burghs; for ſo in that age they uſed to call F thoſe dwelling places which were planted heere and there, along limits and marches. Neither have I read any thing elſe of that Burgh, but that in the beginning of the Norman government, the Northren Engliſh conſpired heere againſt William the Conquerour. That this Burgh was VERTERÆ, I dare be bold to affirme, becauſe

* Burgus ſubſaxeto. Burgh under Stanmore. Burgus. Vegetius lib. 4. cap. 10.

A cauſe the diſtance thereof from Levatræ of the one ſide, and from Brovonacum on the other, being reduced into Italian miles, doth exactly agree with Antonines numbers: and for that the high ſtreet of the Romans, as yet evidently apparent by the ridges thereof, leadeth this way to BROVONACUM by ABALLABA, whereof mention is made in the booke of Notices, which hath hitherto kept the ancient name ſo well, that it doth moſt evidently deſcrie and ſhew it ſelfe, yea in ſome ſort remove all doubt. For we call it ſhort in ſteed of ABALLABA Apelby. Memorable is it, for the antiquity and ſituation only. In the Romans time, no doubt, the Aurelian Maures kept a ſtation there. It ſtandeth alſo in a pleaſant ſite, encompaſſed for the moſt B part with the river Eden: but ſo ſlenderly inhabited, and the building ſo ſimple, that were it not that by reaſon of the antiquity it had deſerved to be counted the chiefe towne of the ſhire, and to have Seſſions and Aſſiſes kept in the caſtle, which is the comon gaole for maletactors, it would be little better than a village. For all the beautie of it is in one broad ſtreet, which from North to South riſeth with an eaſie aſcent of the hill: in the upper part whereof ſtandeth the caſtle aloft, environed wholly almoſt with the river. In the nether end of it is the Church, and thereby a ſchool, which Robert Langton and Miles Spenſer, Doctors of the law founded; the Maſter whereof is Reginald Bainbrige, a right learned man, who governeth the ſame with great commendation; and who of his courteſie hath exemplified for mee many an- C tique inſcriptions, and brought ſome hither into his garden. Neither verily was it for nought, that William of Newborrough calleth this town and Burgh Princely holds, where he writeth that William King of Scots, ſurpriſed them on the ſuddain, a little before himſelfe was taken priſoner at Alnewick. Which King John afterwards having recovered, gave liberally unto Robert Vipont, in conſideration of his ſingular good ſervice to him and the ſtate. From hence the river with his full courſe paſſeth directly North-weſt by Buley, a caſtle of the Biſhops of Carlile; and by Kirby Thore, under which are ſeene great ruines of an old towne, and pieces of Roman coin otherwhiles digged up; and not long ſince this inſcription.

Aballaba, Apelby.

But tract of time hath quite out-worne the old name, and it is called at this day Whealop-Caſtle. If I might without prejudice to the Judges of antiquitie, I would ſay it were GALLAGUM mentioned by Ptolomee, which Antonine nameth GALLATUM, E the diſtance of journies accord ſo well, and the name doth not altogether gainſay. For what words the Britans began with GALL, the Engliſh turned into Wall. Thus they called GALENA Wallingford, and Gall Sever Wall of Sever, Gall-dour Wall-broke, &c. Doubtleſſe it was a place in old time of better note, ſeeing that from hence there leadeth a paved ſtreet (Maiden way they call it) to Caer Vorran neare the Picts wall, 20. miles or thereabouts in length, by fells, waſtes, and moores. Along which ſtreet I would willingly think, were placed thoſe Stations and Manſions mentioned by Antonine in the ninth journey of Britain; although no man is able preciſely to ſay in what places they ſtood: and no marvaile, conſidering that time, which devoureth and conſumeth all things, hath continually fed upon their carcaſes ſo many ages together. F Not far from Whellop, hard by Crawdundale, there are evident remaines of ditches, trenches, and mounts caſt up: and among them this Roman inſcription (the draught whereof Reginald Bainbrig before named, head ſchoolemaſter of Applebey, took out for me) was ingraven in a craggie rocke, the forepart of which was quite eaten out with continuance of time, or thruſt out by the root of a tree there growing.

That is to say, by my reading---- Varronius Præfectus legionis viceſimæ valentis victricis--- Ælius Lucanus Præfectus legionis ſecundæ Auguſtæ, caſtrametati ſunt--- Varronius captaine of the xx. legion valens victrix ---- Ælius Lucanus Captaine of the ſecond legion Auguſta, encamped, or did ſome ſuch thing. For the twentieth legion called Valens victrix, which kept reſience at DEVA, that is, Weſtchester: and the ſecond legion named Auguſta, that abode at ISCA, that is, Caer-Leon in Wales, may ſeeme to have beene employed againſt the enemies in theſe parts, and here to have ſtaied and kept their ſtanding campe for a time, and that their Captains or Collonells in memoriall hereof engraved this upon the cragge. The juſt time I may not eaſily ſet downe. Yet to the pointing out of the verie time, there remaine to be ſeen in a rocke there by, theſe great capitall letters engraven, CN.OCT. COT.COSS. But in the Conſular Rolles among all the Paires of Conſulls, I can meet with no ſuch names. Yet have I obſerved thus much, that from the time of Severus unto Gordian and afterwards, the letter A. in all the inſcriptions of that age, e-verie where in this Iland, wanteth the overthwart little line or ſtroke, and is made thus, Λ.

Λ. for A.

Eden holdeth on his courſe from hence, not farre from Howgill caſtle, belonging to the family of the Sandfords: but the Romane high-way goeth ſtraight into the Weſt by Whinfield, a large Parke ſhaded with trees, hard by BROVONIACUM, ſtanding twentie Italian miles, or ſeventeene Engliſh miles from VERTERÆ, as Antonine hath ſet it, who alſo hath called it Brovocum, like as the book of Notices, Broconiacum; which ſpecifieth, that a companie or band of Defenſors had here their abode. The beautie and buildings of this towne although time hath conſumed, yet the name remaineth almoſt untouched, for we call it Brogham. Here the river Eimot, flowing out of a great lake, & for a good ſpace dividing this ſhire from Cumberland, receiveth the river Loder into it: neere unto the ſpring head whereof, hard by Shape, in times paſt Hepe, a little monaſterie built by Thomas the ſonne of Goſpatrick, ſonne of Orms, there is a Well or Fountaine, which after the manner of Euripus ebbeth and floweth many times in a day: alſo there be huge ſtones in forme of Pyramides, ſome 9. foot high, and fourteene foot thick, ranged directly as it were in a row, for a mile in length, with equall diſtance almoſt betweene: which may ſeeme to have beene pitched and erected for to continue the memoriall of ſome act there atchieved; but what the ſame was, by the injurie of time it is quite forgotten. Hard by Loder, there is a place bearing the ſame name, which, like as Stricland neere unto it, hath imparted their names to families of ancient gentrie and worſhip. Somewhat above, where Loder and Eimot meet in one chanell, in the yeere of our Lord 1602. there was a ſtone gotten out of the ground, erected in the honour of Conſtantine the Great, with theſe words.

As for ſuch as have borne the title of Weſtmorland, the firſt Lord, to my knowledge, was Robert de Vipont, who bare Gules, ſixe Annulets Or in his coat armour. For King John gave unto him the balliwicke and revenues of Weſtmorland, by the ſervice of foure Knights: whereupon the Cliffords his ſucceſſors, untill our daies held the office of the Sherifdome of Weſtmorland. For Robert de Vipont, the laſt of that name, left behind him only two daughters, Iſabel wife to Roger Lord Clifford, and Idonea married unto Sir Roger Leybourne. Long time after, K. Richard the ſecond created Ralph Nevill of Raby the firſt Earle of Weſtmorland, a man of the greateſt and moſt ancient birth of Engliſh nobility, as deſcended from Ucthred Earl of Northumberland: whoſe heires ſucceſſively by his former wife Margaret, daughter to the Earle of Stafford, flouriſhed in that honour, untill that Charles by his wilfull ſtomack, and wicked conſpiracy, caſting off his allegeance to Q. Elizabeth, and covering treaſon under the mantle of religion, moſt ſhamefully diſhonoured that moſt noble houſe, and foully ſteined his owne reputation by actuall rebellion, in the yeere 1599. Whereupon hee fled into the Low countries, led a miſerable life, and died as miſerably. The ſaid firſt Earle, to note ſo much incidently, by his ſecond wife Catharine, daughter to John of Gaunt Duke of Lancaſter, had ſo faire iſſue, and the name of Nevill thereby ſo greatly multiplied, that almoſt at one and the ſame time there flouriſhed out, beſide the Earle of Weſtmorland, an Earle of Salisbury, an Earle of Warwicke, an Earle of Kent, Marqueſſe Montacute, a Duke of Bedford, Lord Latimer, and Lord Abergevenny, all Nevils.

CUMBER-LAND.

WEstward, Northward from Westmorland lieth CUMBERLAND, the utmost region this way of the realme of England, as that which on the North side boundeth upon Scotland: on the South
B side and the West the Irish sea beateth upon it: and Eastward above Westmorland it butteth upon Northumberland. It tooke the name of the inhabitants, who were the true and naturall Britans, and called themselves in their owne language Kumbri, and Kambri. For the Histories testifie, that the Britans remained here a long time, maugre the English Saxons, howsoever they stormed thereat: yea and Marianus himselfe recordeth as much, who tearmed this countrey Cumbrorum terram, that is, The land of the Cumbri, or Britans: to say nothing of the places, that everie where here beare British names, as Caer-Luel, Caer-dronoc, Pen-rith, Pen-rodoc, &c. which most evidently declare the same, and as cleerly prove mine assertion.

C The country, although it be somewhat with the coldest, as lying farre North, and seemeth as rough by reason of hills, yet for the varietie thereof it smileth upon the beholders, and giveth contentment to as many as travaile it. For after the rockes bunching out, the mountaines standing thicke together rich of metall mines, and betweene them great meeres stored with all kindes of wilde foule, you come to prettie hills good for pastorage, and well replenished with flockes of sheepe; beneath which againe you meet with goodly plaines spreading out a great way, yeelding corne sufficiently. Besides all this, the Ocean driving and dashing upon the shore, affoordeth plentie of excellent good fish, and upbraideth, as it were, the inhabitants thereabouts with their negligence, for that they practise fishing no more than they D doe.

The South part of this shire is called Copeland, and Coupland, for that it beareth up the head aloft with sharpe edged and pointed hills, which the Britans tearme Copa: or, as others would have it, named Copeland, as one would say Coperland, of rich mines of copper therein. Copeland.

In this part, at the very mouth of the river Duden, whereby it is severed apart from Lancashire, standeth Millum Castle, belonging to the ancient house of the Hodlestones; from whence as the shore fetcheth about with a bent Northward, two rivers very commodiously enclose within them Ravenglasse, a station or roade for ships, where also, as I have learned, were to be seene Roman inscriptions: some will have
E it called in old time Aven-glasse, as one would say, the blew river, and they talke much of King Eueling, that here had his Court and royall palace. One of these rivers named Eske springeth up at the foot of Hard-knot, an high steepe mountaine; in the top whereof were discovered of late huge stones and foundations of a castle, not without great wonder; considering it is so steep and upright, that one can hardly ascend up to it. Millum castle. Raven-glas. Hard-knot neer Wrinose.

Somewhat higher, Irt a little river maketh way toward the sea, wherein the muscles and cochles, after they have with a kinde of yawning or gaping sucked in dew, which they lust after to conceive by, bring forth pearles; or, to speake as the Poet doth, Shell-berries; which the inhabitants there by search after at a low water, and F our Lapidaries and Jewellers buy of the poore needie people for a little, but sell again at an high rate: of these and such like Marbodæus seemeth to speake in this verse, Irt a riveret. See Plinie. Pearles.

Now by this time the ſhore extendeth out more and more, and encloſeth Weſtward, where it maketh a little promontorie, which the common ſort for Saint Bega call St. Bees. For Bega, a devout and religious Iriſh woman, led there a ſolitarie life; unto whoſe holineſſe are aſcribed certain vain miracles, as the taming of a wild bull, and the procuring of a mightie deep ſnow, which in the longeſt ſummers day by her praiers fell, and lay thicke upon the vallies and tops of hills. Scarce a mile hence ſtandeth Egremont Caſtle on the top of an hill, the ſeat in times paſt of William de Meſchines, unto whom King Henrie the firſt gave it, to hold by one knights ſervice, and that he ſhould ſerve at the Kings commandement in the army for Wales and Scotland. Who left behind him a daughter, the wife of William Fitz-Duncan, of the blood roiall of Scotland: by whoſe daughter alſo the inheritance came into the family of the Lucies: from them likewiſe by the Moltons and Fitz-waters, the title of Egremont deſcended unto the Ratcliffes Earles of Suſſex. And yet Sir Thomas Percie, through the favour of King Henrie the ſixth, enjoyed it for a time, being ſummoned to the Parliament by the name of Th. Percie of Egremont.

From hence the ſhore drawing it ſelfe backe by little and little, and as it appeareth by the heapes of rubbiſh, it hath beene fortified all along by the Romanes, whereſoever there was eaſie landing. For it was the outmoſt bound of the Roman Empire, and the Scots lay ſoreſt upon this coaſt, and infeſted it moſt, when (as it were with continuall ſurges of warre) they flowed and flocked hither by heapes out of Ireland: and certaine it is that Moresby, a little village where is a roade for ſhips, was one of theſe fortifications. For there are many monuments of antiquitie, as vaults under the ground, great foundations, many caves, which they uſe to tearme Picts-Holes; many fragments of ſtones with inſcriptions engraven in them are there often times found in the ground: of which upon one I read this, LUCIUS SEVERINUS ORDINATUS, on another, COH. VII. And this Altar I ſaw lately digged out there, with a little horned image repreſenting Sylvanus, erected to his honour by the ſecond Cohort of the Lingones.

As alſo this fragment, which I. Fletcher Lord of the place tranſcribed out for me, and ſent unto mee.

But no ſtone hitherto hath beene found, that aſſureth us that it was MORBIUM, where the Cataphractarii horſemen, or men at armes ſerved, notwithſtanding the name in ſome ſort implieth as much. Neither is Hay-caſtle which I ſaw hard by, to be paſſed over with ſilence, a place verily to be regarded for antiquity ſake, which by report of the inhabitants belonged ſucceſſively in elder time to Gentlemen ſurnamed Moresby and Diſtinton:

After

A After this, the river Derwent hideth himselfe in the Ocean, which having his first beginning in Borrodale, a valley hemmed in with crooked hills, creepeth betweene the mountains called Derwent Fels; wherein at Newlands & elsewhere, copper mines were discovered by Thomas Shurland, and Daniel Hotchstatter, a German of Auspurge, in our daies: and yet the same were knowne before, as appeareth by closse rowles of King Henrie the third n. 18. Upon the discoverie of these mines, there was a memorable case in law between the late QUEEN ELIZABETH of sacred memorie, and Thomas Percie Earl of Northumberland, in whose Lordship they were found: but in regard of the Queenes royall prerogative, and for that there were in B them veins of gold and silver, they were adjudged to the Queen. But hereby it is well seene how untrue it was, that Cicero wrote in his Epistles unto Atticus: This is for certaine knowne, saith he, that there is not in the Iland Britaine so much as one scruple of silver. Neither would Cæsar, if he had known of these mines, have written, That the Britans had use of copper brought in to them from other parts beyond sea, seeing that the mines not onely serve all England over, but also affoord great plentie beside, that is carried yeerly forth of the realme.

Copper or brasse mines.

Veines of gold gold and silver.

See Ploiden's Reports.

Here also is commonly found that minerall kind of earth, or hardned glittering stone (we call it Black-lead) with which Painters use to draw their lines, and make pictures of one colour in their first draughts: which whether it bee Pnigitis or Melanteria, spoken of by Dioscorides, or Ochre, a kind of earth so burnt with heat, that it C becommeth blacke, or whether it were unknowne unto the old writers, I cannot certainly averre, and let others for me search it out. Derwent, after it hath passed through these hills, spreadeth abroad into a large lake, Bede termeth it prægrande stagnum, that is, a very great poole, wherein are three Ilands eminent above the water: The one hath an house in it of the Ratcliffes, a family of Knights degree: the second is inhabited by the Dutch Minerall men: the third is thought to be that, wherein, as Bede writeth, Saint Herbert lived an Heremeticall life. On the very skirt of this bottome, in a pleasant soile compassed about with deawie hills; and fenced on the North side with that high mountaine Skiddaw, lieth Keswike, a little towne which King D Edward the first made a mercate, by the procurement of S. Thomas of Derwentwater Lord of the place, from whom it lineally descended to the family of the Ratcliffs: It was well knowne many yeeres agoe by reason of the mines of copper, as we may see in a certaine Charter of King Edward the fourth, and is at this day much inhabited by Minerall men, who have here their smelting house by Derwent side, which with his forcible streame, and their ingenuous inventions, serveth them in notable steed for easie bellowes workes, hammer workes, forge workes, and sawing of boords, not without admiration of such as behold it. As for that mountain Skiddaw aforesaid, it riseth up to such an height with two heads like unto Parnassus, and with a kind of emulation beholdeth Scruffel hill before it in Anandale within Scotland, that E from these two mountaines, according as the mistie clouds arise or fall, the people there by dwelling, make their prognostication of the change of weather, and commonly sing this note.

If Skiddaw hath a cap,

Like as there goes also this usuall by-word concerning the heigth as well of this hill, as of other twaine in this tract.

F Skiddaw, Lauuellin, and Casticand,
Are the highest hills in all England.

From hence Derwent sometimes within a narrow channell, other whiles with a broader streame, speedeth him very fast Northward, to entertaine Cockar. Which when they meete, doe encompasse almost round about Cokarmouth a mereate towne

towne of good wealth, and a caſtle of the Earles of Northumberland. The towne is A built faire enough, but ſtandeth ſomewhat with the loweſt betweene two hills:
upon the one of which the Church is ſeated, and upon the other right over againſt it, a very ſtrong caſtle, the gate whereof carrieth in the front the Armes of the Moltons, Humfranvills, Lucies, & Percies. Oppoſite unto this, beyond the river two miles off, lieth the carcaſe of an ancient caſtle, called Papcaſtle, which by a number of monuments layeth claime to bee a Romane antiquitie: whether this were Guaſmoric. Guaſmoric, which, as Ninnius writeth, King Vortigern built neere unto Lugubalibia, and the Engliſhmen of old time called Palme-caſtle, I cannot ſo eaſily affirme. Where among many monuments of antiquitie, was found a broad veſſell of a greeniſh ſtone, B artificially engraven with little images: which whether it had bin a Laver to waſh in, or a font, or as one calleth it, Sacrarium Regenerationis, for which purpoſe it ſerveth now at Brid-kirke, that is, at S. Brigids Church hard by, I dare not ſay. But I have read that Fonts were adorned with the pictures of holy men, to the end that ſuch as were baptized might afterward have before their eies, whoſe deeds they were to imitate, Epiſt. ad Sever. as ſaith Pontius Paulinus. For in the firſt plantation of Chriſtianitie among the Gentiles, ſuch onely as were of full age, after they were inſtructed in the Principles of Chriſtian Religion, were admitted to Baptiſme; and that but twice in the yeere, Catechumeni, or hearers. at Eaſter and Whitſontide, except upon urgent neceſſitie. At which times, they which were to be baptiſed were attired in white garments exorciſed, and exſuffled, C with ſundrie ceremonies, which I leave to the learned in Chriſtian antiquities: but this Font we ſpeake of was thus inſcribed.

But what they ſignifie, or what nations characters they ſhould be, I know not, let the learned determine thereof. The firſt and eighth differ not much from that which in the time of the Emperour Conſtantine the great, Chriſtians uſed for the name of Chriſt: the reſt in forme, though not in ſound, come very neere unto thoſe which are ſeene in the tombe of Gormon, a King of the Danes, at Ielling in Denmark, the which Peter of Lindeberge did put forth, in the yeere 1591.

Theſe places which erewhile I have named, together with a fourth part of the Ba-ronie of Egremond, Wigton, Lewſewater, Aſpatric, Uldal, &c. a right faire and goodly inheritance, Maud Lucie (who was the heire of Anthony Molton or de Lucie her bro- F ther) gave unto her husband Henry Percie Earle of Northumberland; and albeit ſhe had no iſſue by him, yet made ſhe the family of the Percies her heires, upon this con-Armes of the Lucies and Percies. dition, That they ſhould beare quarterly the Lucies Armes, &c. three * Luces Argent in
* Pikes. a ſhield Gueles, with their owne Armes: or that I may uſe the words of the originall, * Luces. On condition, to give their own armes Gueles with three * Luces Argent, together with
the

A the Armes of Percy, Or, a Lion Azure quarterly; and the ſame condition by a fine levied.

Afterwards Derwent having gathered his waters into one ſtreame, entreth into the Ocean at Wirkinton, a place famous for taking of Salmons, and now the ſeat of the ancient family of the Curwens Knights, who fetch their diſcent from Goſpatric Earle of Northumberland, and their ſirname they tooke by covenant and compoſition from Culwen a family in Galloway, the heire whereof they had married; and here have they a ſtately houſe built Caſtle-like, and from whom (without offence or vanity be it ſpoken) my ſelfe am deſcended by the mothers ſide. Culwen, commonly Curwen.

B From hence ſome thinke there was a wall made to defend the ſhore in convenient places, for foure miles, or thereabout, by Stilico the potent Commander in the Roman ſtate, what time as the Scots annoyed theſe coaſts out of Ireland. For thus ſpeaketh Britaine of her ſelfe, in Claudian. Under Honorius and Arcadius.

Me quoque vicinis pereuntem gentibus, inquit,
Munivit Stilico, totam cùm Scotus Hibernem
Movit, & infeſto ſpumavit remige Thetis.

And me likewiſe at hands (quoth ſhe) to periſh, through deſpight
Of neighbour-Nations, Stilico fenſed againſt their might,
C What time the Scots all Ireland mov'd offenſive armes to take, &c.

There are alſo as yet, ſuch continued ruines and broken walls to bee ſeene as farre as to Elne Mouth, which river holding no long courſe, hath at his ſpring head Jerby, a good big mercate towne ſtanding upon it. I judge it to have beene that ARBEIA, where the Baccarii Tigrienſes kept their ſtanding guard: and at his mouth Elenborrough, that is, the Burgh upon Elen, where the firſt band of the Dolmatians together with their Captaine in old time made their abode. The neere reſemblance of the name Elenborough with OLENACUM, where the Firſt Herculean Wing lay in Garriſon in the time of Theodoſius the younger, is ſome motive to thinke that this was Olenacum.
D that OLENACUM, but yet I dare not affirme it. Seated it was upon the height of a hill, and hath a goodly proſpect farre into the Iriſh ſea: but now Corne growes where the towne ſtood; nevertheleſſe many expreſſe footings thereof are evidently to be ſeene: The ancient vaults ſtand open, and many altars, ſtones with inſcriptions, and Statues are here gotten out of the ground. Which I. Sinhow, a very honeſt man, in whoſe grounds they are digged up, keepeth charily, and hath placed orderly about his houſe. In the mids of his yard there ſtandeth erected a moſt beautifull foure ſquare Altar of a reddiſh ſtone, right artificially in antique worke engraven,
E five foot or thereabouts high, with an inſcription therein of an excellent good letter: but loe the thing it ſelfe all whole, and every ſide thereof, as the draught was moſt lively taken out by the hand of Sir Robert Cotton of Connington Knight, a ſingular lover of antiquity, what time as hee and I together, of an affectionate love to illuſtrate our native countrey, made a ſurvey of theſe coaſts, in the yeere of our redemption 1599. not without the ſweet food and contentment of our mindes. And I cannot chuſe but with thankfull heart remember that very good and worthy Gentleman; not only in this regard that moſt kindly he gave us right courteous and friendly entertainment, but alſo for that being himſelfe well learned, he is a lover of ancient literature, and moſt diligently preſerveth theſe inſcriptions, which by others that are
F unskilfull and unlettered be ſtraight waies defaced, broken, and converted to other uſes, to exceeding great prejudice and detriment of antiquity.

A In the inſcription all is as plaine as may bee; onely in the laſt line ſave one (Et and Æ D E S) are read by implication of the letters: the laſt part being maimed, may haply be amended in this wiſe, D E C V R I O N V M O R D I N E M R E S T I T V I T, &c. Theſe Decurions were in free-townes (called Municipia) the ſame that Senators were in Rome and Colonies, ſo called, becauſe they executed the office of Curiæ, whereupon they were named alſo Curiales, who had the ordering and managing of civill offices. Decuriones. Iſidor. l. 9. c. 4.

On the back-ſide of this Altar in the upper edge & border thereof, are read, as you ſee, theſe two words, V O L A N T I I V I V A S; which doe perplexe me, neither can I expound them, unleſſe the Decurions, Gentlemen, and Commons (for of theſe three ſtates conſiſted a Municipium, or free Corporation) added this as a well-wiſhing, and votive inſcription unto G. Cornelius Peregrinus (who reſtored houſes, habitations and Decurions) that ſo bounteous and beneficiall a man V O L A N T I I V I V E R E T, that is, might live at Volantium. Hence I ſuppoſe, if conjecture may carrie it, that V O L A N T I V M in times paſt was the name of the place. Underneath are engraven inſtruments belonging to ſacrifice, an Axe or Cleaver, and a chopping Knife. On the left ſide, a Mallet and a great Baſon: in that on the right ſide, a platter, a diſh, and a peare, if my ſight ſerve mee well; or as others would have it, a drinking cup or jugge; for theſe were veſſels pertaining to ſacrifice: and others beſide, as a Cruet, an Incenſe pan or Cenſer, a footleſſe pot, the Prieſts miter, &c. which I have ſeene expreſly portraied upon the ſides of other altars in this tract. The ſecond Altar, which I have here adjoined, was digged up at Old Carlile, and is now to be ſeene in the Barhouſes houſe at Ilkirk: an inſcription it had with that intricate connexion of letters one in another, as the Graver hath here very lively portraied, and thus it ſeemeth they are to be read. Volantium.

Jovi Optimo Maximo. Ala Auguſta ob virtutem appellata, cui præeſt Publius Ælius, Publii filius Sergia Magnus de Murſa ex Pannonia inferiore Præfectus. Aproniano (& fortaſſe) Bradua Conſulibus. Under Commodus Anno Chriſti 193.

D Unto moſt gracious and mightie Jupiter. The Wing named for their vertue Auguſta, the Captaine whereof is Publius Ælius, ſonne of Publius Magnus of Murſa, from out of the lower Pannonia, Præfect. When Apronianus, and (haply) Bradua were Conſuls.

The third Altar, with an inſcription to Belatucadrus the tutelar God of the place, is in this wiſe to be read.

Belatucadro Julius Civilis Optio, id eſt, Excubiis Præfectus, votum ſolvit libens, merito.

E Unto Belatucadrus, Julius Civilis Optio, that is, Prefect over the watch and ward, hath performed his vow willingly and duly.

In the fourth Altar, which is of all the reſt the faireſt, there is no difficultie at all, and this is the tenour of it.

Diis, Deabuſq; Publius Poſthumius Acilianus Præfectus Cohortis primæ Delmatarum.

To the Gods and Goddeſſes, Publius Poſthumius Acilianus, Prefect or Captain of the firſt Cohort of the Dalmatians.

F Such Altars as theſe (neither needs we think much to obſerve thoſe ancient rites, which now long ſince the moſt ſacred Chriſtian religion hath chaſed away, and baniſhed quite) they were wont to crowne with greene branches, like as they did the beaſts for ſacrifice, and themſelves: and then they uſed with frankincenſe and wine to make ſupplication, to kill, and offer their ſacrifices: yea, and their manner was to enhuile or anoint their very altars all over. Concerning the demoliſhing and overthrow Gentiles or Heathen altars. See in Lancaſhire.

throw of which, as Christian religion came in place and began to prevaile, Prudentius the Christian Poet wrote thus. A

Exercere manum non pœnitet, & lapis illic
Si ſtetit antiquus, quem cingere ſuerat error
Faſciolis, aut gallinæ pulmone rigare, Frangitur.——

Men thought not much their hands thus to employ,
And if in place ſome antique ſtone there ſtood,
Which folke were wont in errour, with much joy
To garniſh round with ribbands, and with blood
Of Hens to imbrue, they brake it in that mood.

These inſcriptions likewiſe hereunder I ſaw there.

A That is, for the victorie of the Auguſti (or Emperours) our Lords.

When the ſhore hath paſſed on right forward a little way from hence, it bendeth ſo backe againe with an arme of the ſea retiring inward, that it may ſeeme to bee that MORICAMBE which Ptolomee ſetteth here, the nature of the place and the name doe ſo juſt agree. For a crooked creeke it is of ſalt water, and Moricambe in the Britiſh tongue ſignifieth a crooked ſea. Hard by this, David the firſt King of Scots built the Abbey de Ulmo, commonly called Holme Cultrain: and the Abbots thereof erected Ulſtey a fortreſſe neere unto it, for a treaſurie and place of ſuretie to lay up their books, charters, and evidences, againſt the ſodain invaſions of the Scot-

B tiſh: wherein the ſecrets workes, they ſay, of Michael the Scot, lie in conflict with mothes; which Michael profeſſing here a religious life, was ſo wholly poſſeſſed with the ſtudie of the Mathematicks and other abſtruſe arts, about the yeere of our Lord 1290. that being taken of the common people for a Necromancer, there went a name of him (ſuch was their credulitie) that hee wrought divers wonders and miracles. Beneath this Abbey, the brooke called Waver runneth into the ſaid arme of the ſea; which brook taketh into it the riveret Wiza, at the head whereof lye the very bones and pitifull reliques of an ancient Citie: which ſheweth unto us, that there is nothing upon earth, but the ſame is ſubject to mortalitie. The neighbours call it at this day Old Carlile. What name it had in old time I know not, unleſſe it were

C CASTRA EXPLORATORUM, that is, The Eſpialls or Diſcoverers Caſtle. The diſtance put downe by Antonine (who doth not ſo much ſeeke after the ſhorteſt waies, as reckon up the places of greater note and name) as well from Bulgium as Lugo-vallum ſuiteth thereto verie aptly; the ſituation alſo to diſcover and deſcry afar off is paſſing fit and commodious: for ſeated it is upon the top of a good high hill, from whence a man may eaſily take a full view of all the country round about. Howbeit, moſt certaine it is that the wing of Horſe-men, which for their valour was named AUGUSTA, and AUGUSTA GORDIANA, kept reſiance here in Gordian the Emperours time, as appeareth evidently by theſe inſcriptions, which I ſaw hard by.

Like

A Likewiſe another ſuch like altar to a private tutelar God of the place, was there found, with this unperfect inſcription.

Beſides an infinite number of pety images, ſtatues of horſemen, Ægles, Lions, Ganimedes, and many other monuments of antiquity, which are daily diſcovered.

C Something higher a little promontory ſhooteth out, and a great frith or arme of the Sea lieth under it, being now the common limit confining England and Scotland, ſerving in times paſt to make a ſeparation betweene the Romane Province, and the Picts. Upon this ſtandeth that ancient town, BLATUM-BULGIUM (happily of Bulch a Britaine word, that ſignifieth a ſeparation) from which, as from the moſt remote place, and the limit of the Roman province, Antonine the Emperour beginneth his journies through Britaine. The inhabitants at this day call it Bulneſſe: and as ſmall a village as it is, yet hath it a pile, and in token of the antiquity thereof, beſides the tracts of ſtreets, ruinous walls, and an haven now ſtopped up with mud; there led a paved high-way from hence along the ſea-ſhore, as farre as to Elen Bor-

D rough, if we may relie upon the report of the by-dwellers.

Beyond this a mile (as is to bee ſeene by the foundations at a nepe tide) beganne that WALL, the moſt renowned worke of the Romanes, which was the bound in times paſt of the Romane province; raiſed of purpoſe to ſeclude and keepe out the barbarous nations, that in this tract, were evermore barking and baying (as an ancient writer ſaith) about the Roman Empire. I marvailed at firſt, why they built here ſo great fortifications, conſidering that for eight miles, or thereabout, there lieth oppoſite a very great frith and arme of the ſea: but now I underſtand, that at every ebbe the water is ſo low, that the borderers and beaſt-ſtealers may eaſily wade over. That the form of theſe ſhores hath bin changed, it doth evidently appeare by the tree roots

E covered over with ſand a good way off from the ſhore, which oftentimes at a low ebbe are diſcovered with the windes. I know not whether I may relate here, which the inhabitants reported concerning trees without boughes under the ground, oftentimes found out here in the moſſes, by the direction of dew in ſummer: for they have obſerved that the dew never ſtandeth on that ground under which they lye.

By the ſame Frith, more within the land ſtandeth Drumbough Caſtle, belonging of later time to the Lords of Dacre, a ſtation in times paſt of the Romans. Some will have it to have beene EXPLORATORUM CASTRA, notwithſtanding the diſtance utterly controuleth it. There was alſo another ſtation of the Romans beſide it, which now being changed into a new name is called Burgh upon Sands:

F whence the territory adjoyning is named the Barony of Burgh, the which R. Meſchines, Lord of Cumberland, gave unto Robert de Trivers: but from him it came to the Morvils: the laſt of which houſe, named Hugh, left behind him a daughter, who by her ſecond husband, Thomas de Molton had iſſue Thomas Molton, Lord of this place: whoſe ſonne Thomas, by marriage with the heire of Hubert de Vaulx adjoyned Gilleſ-land to his poſſeſſions: which in the end were devolved all unto Ranulph Dacre, who married M. the heire of Moulton. A But for no one thing was this little Burgh upon Sands more famous, than that Edward the first. King Edward the first, that triumphant Conquerour of his enemies, was here taken out of this world by untimely death. A right noble and worthy Prince, to whom God proportioned moſt princely preſence and perſonage, as a right worthy ſeat to entertaine ſo heroicall a minde. For hee not onely in regard of fortitude and wiſedome, but alſo for a beautifull and a perſonall preſence was in all points anſwerable to the height of royall majeſty: whom fortune alſo in the very prime and flowre of his age inured to many a warre, and exerciſed in moſt dangerous troubles of the State, whiles ſhe framed and fitted him for the Empire of Britain: which he, being B once crowned King, managed and governed in ſuch wiſe, that having ſubdued the Welſh, and vanquiſhed the Scots, hee may moſt juſtly bee counted the ſecond ornament of Great Britaine. Under this Burgh, within the very Frith where the ſalt Solway Frith. water ebbeth and floweth, the Engliſhmen and Scotiſh, by report of the inhabitants, fought with their fleets at full Sea, and alſo with their horſemen and footmen at the ebbe. A thing which may ſeeme no leſſe marvellous than that which Plinie hath reported, not without wonder, of the like place in Caramania. This arme of the ſea both nations call Solway Frith, of Solway a towne in Scotland ſtanding upon The river Ituna, or Eden. it. But Ptolomee more truely tearmeth it ITUNA: For Eden, that notable river, History of Malroſſe. which wandreth through Weſtmorland, and the inner parts of this ſhire, powreth C forth into it a mighty maſſe of water, having not yet forgotten what adoe it had to paſſe away ſtruggling and wreſtling as it did, among the carcaſſes of free-butters, lying dead in it on heapes, in the yeere of ſalvation 1216. when it ſwallowed them up loaden with booties out of England, and ſo buried that rabble of robbers under his waves.

This river Eden when it is entred into this ſhire, receiveth from the Weſt the river Eimot, flowing out of Ulſe, a great lake heretofore mentioned: neer unto the bank Dacre. Barons Dacre. whereof, hard by the riveret Dacor, ſtandeth Dacre Caſtle, of ſignall note, for that it hath given ſirname to the honourable family of the Barons Dacre; and mentioned anciently by Bede, for that it had a monaſtery in thoſe dayes; as alſo by William of Malmesbury, in regard that Conſtantine King of Scots, and Eugenius or Ewain King D of Cumberland, yeelded themſelves there, together with their kingdomes, unto Athelſtane King of England, upon condition to be protected by him.

Not much higher, and not farre from the confluence of Eimot and Loder, where is ſeene that round trench of earth, which the countrey people tearme Arthurs Table, ſtands Penrith, which is, if you interpret it out of the Britiſh language, The Red head or hill (for the ſoile, and the ſtones there are of a reddiſh colour:) but commonly called Perith: a little towne, and of indifferent trade, fortified on the Weſt ſide with a caſtle of the Kings, which in the reigne of King Henry the ſixth was repaired out of the ruines of a Romane fort thereby called Maburg, adorned with a proper Church: and the mercate place is large, with an edifice of timber therein, for the uſe of thoſe E that reſort thither to mercate, garniſhed with Beares at a ragged ſtaffe, which was the deviſe of the Earles of Warwicke. It belonged in times paſt unto the Biſhops of Durham: but when Antony Bec the Biſhop, overweening himſelfe with over much wealth, waxed proud and inſolent, King Edward the firſt (as wee finde in Durham book) took from him Werk in Tividale, Perith, and the Church of Simondburne.
Perith. But for the commodious uſe of this Towne, William Stricland, Biſhop of Carlile, deſcended from a worſhipfull Family in this tract, at his owne charges cauſed a channell for a water-courſe to be made out of Petter-rill, that is, the little Petter, which neer unto the bank had Plumpton park, a very large plot of ground Called in old time Haia de Plompton. which the Kings of England allotted in old time for wild beaſts, but King Henry F
the eighth diſparked it, and wiſely appointed it for habitation of men, as being in the very merches well neere, where the Realmes of England and Scotland confine one upon the other. Juſt by this place I ſaw many remaines of a decayed towne, which they there for the vicinity thereof, doe now call Old Perith:

A I for my part would deeme it to be PETRIANÆ. For the fragment of an antique inſcription erected by ULPIUS TRAIANUS, EMERITUS an old diſcharged and penſionary ſouldier of the Petreian wing, doth convince and prove that the wing Petriana made abode here. But behold both it and others which wee copied out here. Petriana.

After that Eden hath now given Eimot entertainment, hee turneth his courſe Northward, by both the Salkelds, watering as hee goes obſcure ſmall villages, and fortreſſes. Amongſt which at the leſſe Salkeld, there bee erected in manner of a circle ſeventy ſeven ſtones, every one ten foot high, and a ſpeciall one by it ſelfe before them, at the very entrance riſeth fifteene foot in height. This ſtone the common people thereby dwelling, name Long Megge, like as the reſt, her daughters. And within that ring or circle, are heapes of ſtones, under which, they ſay, lye covered the bodies of men ſlaine. And verily there is reaſon to thinke that this was a F monument of ſome victory there atchieved, for no man would deeme that they were erected in vaine.

From thence paſſeth Eden by Kirk-Oſwald, conſecrated to Saint Oſwald, the poſſeſſion in old time of that Sir Hugh Morvill, who with his aſſociates ſlew Thomas Archbiſhop of Canterbury: and in memoriall of this fact, the ſword which hee then uſed, was kept here a long time: and ſo goeth on by Armanthwayte, a Caſtle of the Skeltons, by Corby Caſtle; belonging to the worthy and ancient Kirk Oſwald. By Peterill, beſide PETRIANÆ, which I ſpake of, ſtandeth Greiſtock, a caſtle belonging not long ſince to an honorable houſe, which derived their firſt deſcent from with the title of Lord Greiſtock, but about King Henry the ſeventh his dayes expired and came to an end, and ſo the inheritance came by marriage unto the Barons of Dacre: and the female heires generall of the laſt Baron Dacre, were married unto Philip Earle of Arundell, and Lord William Howard, ſonnes of Thomas Howard, late Duke of Norfolke.

Mines of Braſſe. Upon Caud, beſide the coper mines neere unto Caudheck, ſtandeth Highgate, a caſtle of the Richmonds, of ancient deſcent, and a proper fine caſtle of the Biſhops of Congavata. Carlile, called the Roſe caſtle: it ſeemeth alſo that CONGAVATA was hereabout, in which the ſecond band of the Lergi ſerved in gariſon: for Congavata in the Britiſh tongue ſignifieth, The valley by Gavata, which now is called ſhort Caud. But the very place where this towne ſtood I cannot preciſely point out. Betwixt the meeting of D
Carlile. theſe rivers, the ancient City Carlile is paſſing commodiouſly and pleaſantly ſeated, garded on the North ſide with the chanell of Eden, on the Eaſt with Peterill, on the Weſt with Caud: and beſide theſe naturall fenſes it is fortified with ſtrong walls of ſtone, with a caſtle and a citadell, as they tearme it. In faſhion it lyeth ſomewhat long, running out from Weſt to Eaſt: on the Weſt ſide is the Caſtle of a good large compaſſe, which King Richard the third, as appeareth by his Armes, repaired. In the midſt almoſt of the City, riſeth on high the Cathedrall Church, the upper part whereof being the newer, is very artificially and curiouſly wrought: yet the nether part is much more ancient. But on the Eaſt ſide it is defended with the Citadel, that K. Henry the eighth built ſtrongly with ſundry bulwarks. The Romans and Britans E Luguvallum. called this city LUGU-VALLUM, and LUGU-BALLIUM, or LUGU-BALIA: the Engliſh Saxons, Luell, as Bede witneſſeth: Ptolomee, as ſome think, LEUCOPIBIA. Ninnius, Caer Lualid: the ridiculous propheſies of the Britans, tearmed it The City of Duball, we, Carlile, and Latine writers by a newer name, Carleolum. For our Hiſtoriographers accord with common conſent, that Luguballia and Carleolum were the ſame. But in ſearching out the Etymology thereof, good God, how hath Leland beſtirred him, being in the end driven to this point, that he thought verily Eden was called Lugus, and Ballum came from Vallis, that is, a vale, ſo that Lugu-ballum ſoundeth as much as the Vale by Lugus. But I, if ſo bee I may alſo hatch a conjecture, would rather ſuppoſe, but without prejudice, that the ſaid termination Vallum and Vallia, F are derived from that moſt famous military Vallum or Trench, that ſtandeth apparent a little from the City. For that Picts Wall, which was afterwards ſet upon the Trench, or rampire of Severus, appeareth ſomewhat beyond the River Eden, which now hath a woodden bridge over it, neere unto a little village

A village called Stanwicke, and went over the very river juſt againſt the Caſtle: where within the chanell of the river, mighty ſtones, the remaines thereof, are yet extant. Alſo Lugu or Lucus amongſt the ancient Celts, or Gaules, who ſpake the ſame language that once the Britans did, ſignifieth a Tower, as we may learn by Pomponius Mela. For that which in Antonine is named LUGO-AUGUSTI, hee calleth TURRIM AUGUSTI, that is, The Tower of Auguſtus: ſo that Lugu-Vallum is as much to ſay, as the Tower or Fort by the wall. From this originall if the Frenchmen had derived Lugudunum, as it were, The tower on an hill; and Lucotecia, (for ſo in old time they called that city which we doe Lutetia) that is Paris, as it were, The faire
B Tower, (for ſo thoſe words ſignifie in the Britiſh tongue) peradventure they had aimed neerer unto the marke, than in fetching the one from Lutum, that is, Dirt, and that other from Lugdus an imagined King. That this Carlile flouriſhed in the time of the Romanes, divers tokens of antiquity now and then digged up there, and the famous mention of it in thoſe dayes, doe ſufficiently prove. After the furious outrages alſo of the Picts and Scots were allayed, it retained ſome part ſtill of the ancient dignity, and was counted a City. For in the yeere of Chriſt 619. Egfrid King of Northumberland paſſed a gift unto that holy Saint Cuthbert, in this forme, I have given unto him alſo the City called Lugubalia, and 15. miles round about it: at which time alſo it was walled ſtrong. The Citizens, ſaith Bede, brought Cuthbert to ſee the
C walls of their City, and a fountain or Well in it, built in times paſt according to the wonderfull workmanſhip of the Romanes: who at the very ſame time, as ſaith the book of Durham, ordained there a Covent of Nuns, with an Abbeſſe and Schooles. Afterwards being defaced and brought to exceeding ruin by the Danes, it lay about 200. yeeres buried under his owne aſhes: untill it began againe to flouriſh under the government and favour of King William Rufus, who repaired it with new edifices, built the Caſtle, and placed a Colony there firſt of Flemmings (whom ſtreightwaies upon better advice he removed into Wales) but afterwards of Southerne Engliſhmen. Then was there ſeen, as William of Malmesbury writeth, A dining chamber after the Roman faſhion, built of ſtone, & arched with vaults, ſo that no ſpitefull force of tempeſts,
D nor furious flame of fire could ever ſhake or hurt it: in the forefront whereof was this Inſcription, MARII VICTORIÆ, that is, To the victory of Marius. This Marius ſome will needs have to be Arviragus the Britan: others, that Marius, who being proclaimed Emperour againſt Gallienus, was named to bee of wonderfull ſtrength, that as writers report of him, He had in his fingers no veines, but all ſinewes. Yet have I learned, that another, making mention of this ſtone, ſaith it was not inſcribed MARII VICTORIÆ, but MARTI VICTORI, that is, To victorious Mars, which perhaps may better content ſome, and ſeeme to come nearer unto the truth. * Carlile being now better peopled, and of greater reſort, had, as they write, for Earle, or more truly for Lord thereof, Ralph * Meſchines; from whom came the Earles of Cheſter: and at E the ſame time, being raiſed by King Henry the firſt to an Epiſcopall dignity, had Artulph for the firſt Biſhop. Which the Monks of Durham have written was prejudiciall to their Church, when Ranulph (ſay they) Biſhop of Durham was baniſhed, and the Church had none to defend her, certain Biſhops laid Carlile and Tividale to their Diœceſes. But how the Scotiſh under the reign of Stephen won this City, and King Henry the ſecond recovered it: how alſo King Henry the third committed the caſtle of Carlile and the County to Robert Vipont: how likewiſe in the yeere 1292. it was burnt, together with the Cathedrall Church and the Suburbs: and how Robert Brus King of Scots, in the yeere 1315. laid ſiege unto it in vaine, you may finde in the common Chronicles. And yet it ſeemes it would quit my paines to adjoyne here two inſcrip-
F tions that I ſaw here, the one in Thomas Aglionby his houſe, neere unto the Citadell, but made in the worſe age.

Andrew Harcla Earle of Carlile.

The onely Earle that Carlile had, was Sir Andrew de Harcla, whom King Edward the ſecond created Earle (that I may ſpeake out of the very originall inſtrument of his Creation) for his laudable & good ſervice performed againſt Thomas Earle of Lancaſter, and other his abetters, in vanquiſhing the Kings enemies and diſloiall ſubjects, & in delivering them up into the Kings hands when they were vanquiſhed, girt with a ſword, and created Earle under the honour and name of the Earle of Carlile: Who notwithſtanding proved a wretched Traitour himſelfe, unthankfull and diſloyally falſe both to his Prince and country: and being afterwards apprehended, was with ſhame and reproach paied duly for the deſert of his perfidious ingratitude, degraded in this maner: firſt by cutting off his ſpurres with an hatchet, afterwards diſgirded of his military * Belt: then diſpoiled of his ſhooes and gantlets: laſt of all, and was drawne, hanged, beheaded, and quartered.

* Or girdle.

As for the poſition of Carlile, the Meridian is diſtant from the utmoſt line of the Weſt 21. degrees and 31. minutes; and elevation of the North pole 54. degrees and 55. minutes: and ſo with theſe encomiaſticall verſes of M. I. Jonſton, I bid Carlile adue.

B Unto the Romane legions ſometimes the ſureſt Station,
The fartheſt bound and Captaines toile of that victorious nation.
From proſpect high, farre all abroad it lookes to neighbour fields:
Hence fight and skirmiſh it maintaines, and thence all danger ſhields.
People quicke witted, fierce in field, in martiall feats well ſeene, Expert likewiſe right skilfully to fight with weapons keene.
Whilom the Kings of Scots it held, whiles their ſtate ſtood upright,
And once againe to ancient crowne it now reverts by right.
What? Romane Ceſar thinkeſt thou the world hath here an end?
And ſeeſt thou not another world behind doth yet extend?
C Well maiſt thou ſee this and no more: for Scotiſh valour taught Such haughty mindes to gage themſelves, and here to make default.

If you now croſſe over the river Eden, you may ſee hard by the banke Rowcliffe, a little caſtle erected not long ſince by the Lords de Dacres for the defence of their Tenants. And above it the two rivers, Eske and Leven, running jointly together enter at one out-gate into the Solway Frith. As for Eske, he rumbleth down out of Scotland, and for certaine miles together confeſſeth himſelfe to bee within the Engliſh dominion, and entertaineth the river Kirſop, where the Engliſh and Scottiſh parted aſunder of late, not by waters, but by mutuall feare one of another, having made D paſſing good proofe on both ſides of their great valour and proweſſe. Neere this river Kirſop, where is now ſeene by Nether-By a little village with a few cottages in it, where are ſuch ſtrange and great ruines of an ancient City, and the name of Eske running before it doth ſound ſo neare, that wee may imagine ÆSICA ſtood there: wherein the Tribune of the firſt band of the Aſtures kept watch and ward in old time againſt the Northren enemies. But now dwelleth here the chiefe of the Grayhams family, very famous among the Borderers for their martiall diſpoſition: Grayhams.
and in a wall of his houſe this Romane inſcription is ſet up, in memoriall of Hadrian the Emperour, by the Legion ſurnamed Auguſta Secunda.

But where the River Lidd and Eske conjoine their ſtreames, there was ſometimes, Barony of Liddel. Liddeſdale.
as I have heard, Liddel caſtle, and the Barony of the Eſtotevils, who held lands in Cornage; which Earle Ranulph, as I read in an old Inquiſition, gave unto Turgill Brundas: But from Eſtotevill it came hereditarily unto the Wakes, and by them unto the Earles of Kent of the blood roiall. And John Earle of Kent granted it unto King Edward the third, and King Richard the ſecond, unto John of Gaunt Duke of Lancaſter.

ſter. Beyond this river Eske, the land for certaine miles together is accounted Engliſh ground: wherein Solom Moſſe became very famous, by reaſon eſpecially of ſo many of the Scottiſh Nobility taken there priſoners in the yeere 1543. What time as the Scottiſh reſolute to ſet upon Sir Thomas Wharton, Lord warden of the Engliſh marches: ſo ſoone as they underſtood that their King had committed the command of the army to Oliver Sincler (whom they diſdained) they conceived ſuch indignation thereat, that with their owne ſhame and loſſe, breaking their arraies in tumultuous manner, they made a generall confuſion of all: which the Engliſh beholding from the higher ground, forthwith charged violently upon them, and put them to flight: many they took priſoners, who flinging away their weapons, yeelded themſelves, after ſome few ſouldiers on both ſides ſlaine, into the hands of the Engliſh, and of the borderers. Preſently whereupon James the fifth, King of Scots was ſo disjected, that weary of his life he died for very ſorrow. The land thereabout is called Batable ground, as one would ſay, Litigious; becauſe the Engliſh and the Scottiſh have litigiouſly contended about it. For the inhabitants on both ſides, as borderers in all other parts, are a military kind of men, nimble, wily, alwaies in readines for any ſervice, yea and by reaſon of often skirmiſhes, paſſing well experienced. Leven, the other river whereof I ſpake, ſpringing in the limit juſt of both kingdomes, runneth by no memorable place, unleſſe it be Beucaſtle (as they commonly call it) a Caſtle of the Kings, which ſtanding in a wild and ſolitary country, hath beene defended onely by a ward of ſouldiers. But this in publicke records is written Bueth-caſtle, ſo that the name may ſeeme to have come from that Bueth, who about King Henry the firſt his dayes, after a ſort ruled all in this tract. Certaine it is that in the reigne of Edward the third it was the patrimony of Sir John of Strivelin a Baron, who married the daughter and one of the heires of Adam of Swinborne. In the Church, now much decaied, there is layed for a grave-ſtone this old inſcription, tranſlated thither from ſome other place.

Leven.

In the Church-yard there is erected a Croſſe about 20. foot high, all of one entire foure ſquare ſtone, very artificially cut and engraven, but the letters are ſo worn and gone, that they cannot be read. But whereas the Croſſe is chequy, in that manner as the ſhield of Armes belonging to the family of Vaulx, ſometime Lords in this tract, we may well thinke that it was erected by them.

More into the South, and farther within the country lyeth the Barony of Gilleſland; a little region ſo encombred, by reaſon of ſudden riſing brookes, which they call Gilles, that I would have deemed it tooke the name of them, had I not read in a booke, belonging to the Abbey of Lanercoſt, that one Gill Fitz-Bueth, who is called alſo Gilbert in a Charter of King Henry the ſecond, held it as Lord in old time, of whom it is probable this name was rather given to it. Through this Gilleſland, the wall of Severus, that moſt famous monument of all Britaine, runneth ſtreight, as it were by a line, from Carlile Eaſtward, by Stanwicks, a little village; by Scalby caſtle, belonging in times paſt to the Tilliols (ſometimes a name in this tract of good worſhip and reputation) from whom it came to the Pickerings; then Cambec, a ſmall brooke runneth under the wall: Neere unto which the Barons of Dacre built Askerton caſtle, a little pile, where the Governour of Gilleſland, whom they call Land-Sergeant, had a ward. Beneath the wall it conjoyneth it ſelfe with the river Irthing, where ſtandeth Irthington a chiefe Manour, as they tearme it, of this Barony of Gilleſland

A Ieſland: And great ruins are here to be ſeen at Caſtle-ſteed. Neere unto it, is Brampton a little mercate towne, which we ſuppoſe to bee BREMETURACUM, at the very line and range of the wall, for it is ſcarce a mile from the ſaid wall: where in times paſt, lay the firſt Band of the Tungri out of Germanie in the declining ſtate of the Romane Empire, and a company of Armaturæ, under the generall of Britaine. Theſe were horſemen armed at all peeces. But whether theſe Armatures were Duplar or Simplar, it is doubtfull. Duplar or Duple Armaturæ they were called in thoſe daies, who had double allowances of corne: Simplar, that had but ſingle. Neither verily muſt I overpaſſe in ſilence, that hard by Brampton, there mounteth up an high hill, fortified in the verie top with a trench; they call it the Mote: from which there is a faire proſpect every way into the country. Beneath this, and by Caſtle-ſteeds, like as at Trederman joining unto it, were found theſe inſcriptions, exemplified for me by the hand of the right honourable Lord William Howard of Naworth, third ſonne unto Thomas late Duke of Norfolke, a ſingular lover of venerable antiquitie, and learned withall, who in theſe parts in right of his wife, a ſiſter and one of the heires of the laſt Lord Dacre, enjoieth faire poſſeſſions.

A soone discomfited and put to flight: in which conflict many were slaine, but more ranne away, amongst whom Leonard himselfe escaped. But of him more in my Annales. Neerer unto the wall beyond the river Irthing, was lately found this faire votive altar, erected to the Goddesse Nymphe of the Brigantes, for the health of the Empresse Plautilla, wife to *M. Lords of Gillesland. Out of an old Missal. Also R. Cook Clarenceux calleth him Radulph. i. Raulph. So doth Manuscript bookes of Fountaines and Holme.

The first Lord of Gillesland, that hitherto I have read of, was William Meschines, the brother of Ralph Lord of Cumberland (I meane not that William brother to Ranulph Earle of Chester, from whom came Ranulph de Ruelent, but the brother of Ralph) yet could hee never wrest it wholly out of the Scots hands: for Gill, the sonne of Bueth held the greatest part of it by force and armes. After his death, King Henry the second gave it to Hubert de Vaulx, or de Vallibus, whose shield of Armes was Chequy Or & Gueles. His sonne Robert founded and endowed the Priory of Lanercost. But the inheritance after a few yeeres was by marriage translated to the Moltons, and from them by a daughter to Ranulph Lord Dacre, whose line hath flourished unto our daies in very great honour. Having now in some sort surveied the maritime coasts, and more inward parts of Cumberland; the side that lieth more Easterly, being leane, hungry, and a wast, remaineth to bee viewed: and yet it sheweth nothing but the spring-head of South-Tine in a moorish place, and an ancient Romane high-way eight ells broad, paved with great stone (commonly called Mayden Way) which leadeth out of Westmorland; and where the riveret Alon, and the aforesaid South Tine meet together in one channell, by the side of an hill Maiden way.

A hill of gentle descent, there remaine yet the footings of a very great and ancient towne: which was toward the North enclosed within a fourefold rampier, and Westward, with one and an halfe: the name of the place is now Whiteley Castle: and for to testifie the antiquity thereof, there remaineth this imperfect inscription, with letters inserted one in another, after a short and compendious manner of writing, whereby wee learne that the third Cohort of the Nervians erected there a Temple unto the Emperour Antonine, sonne of Severus.

Whereas therefore the third Cohort of the Nervii served in this place, which Cohort the booke of Notices in a latter time placeth at ALIONE, or as Antonine nameth it ALONE, and the little river running underneath is named Alne: if I should thinke this were ALONE, it might seeme rather probable than true, considering the injury of devouring time, and the fury of enemies have long agoe outworne these matters out of all remembrance. Alone.

Albeit when the State of the Romane Empire decaied most in Britain, this country had been most grievously harried and spoiled by the Scots and Picts, yet it preserved and kept long the ancient and naturall inhabitants the Britans, and late it was ere it became subject to the English Saxons. But when againe the English Saxons state, sore E shaken by Danish warres, ran to ruine, it had peculiar Governors, called Kings of Cumberland, unto the yeere of our Lord 946. at what time, as the * Floure-gatherer of Westminster saith, King Edmund, by the helpe of Leoline Prince of South-wales, wasted and spoiled all Cumberland, and having put out the eyes of both the sonnes of Dunmail King of the same Province, hee granted that kingdome unto Malcolme King of Scots, to be holden of him, that he might defend the North parts of England by land and sea from the inrodes and invasions of the common enemies. Whereupon the eldest sons of the Kings of Scotland were for a while under the English Saxons, and Danes both, called the Prefects, or Deputy Rulers of Cumberland. But when England had yeelded it selfe into the hands of the Normans, this part also became subject F unto them; and fell unto the lot of Ralph de Meschines, whose eldest sonne Ranulph, was Lord of Cumberland, and partly in his mothers right, and partly by his Princes favour together, Earle also of Chester. But King Stephen, to purchase favour with the Scots, restored it unto them againe, that they should hold it of him and the Kings of England. Howbeit K. Henry the second, who succeeded after him, perceiving that this over great liberality of Stephen was prejudiciall both to himself and his realme, demanded againe of the Scot Northumberland, Cumberland, and Westmorland: And the K. of Scots (as Newbrigensis writeth) wisely considering that the King of England had in thoſe parts both the better right and alſo greater power, although he might have pretended the oath, which he was ſaid to have made unto his grandfather David, what time hee was knighted by him: yet reſtored he the foreſaid marches, according to his demand, fully and wholly, and received of him againe the Earledome of Huntingdon, which by ancient right appertained to him.

Earles of Cumberland.

As for Earles of Cumberland, there were none before the time of King Henry the eighth, who created Henry Lord Clifford (who derived his pedigree from the Lords Vipont) the firſt Earle of Cumberland: who of Margaret, the daughter of Henry Percy Earle of Northumberland, begat Henry the ſecond Earle: hee by his firſt wife, daughter to Charles Brandon Duke of Suffolk, had iſſue Margaret Counteſſe of Derby; and by a ſecond wife, the daughter of Lord Dacre of Gilleſland, two ſonnes, George and Francis: George the third Earle, renowned for ſea-ſervice, armed with an able body to endure travaile, and a valorous minde to undertake dangers, died in the yeere 1605. leaving one onely daughter, the Lady Anne, now Counteſſe of Dorſet. But his brother, Sir Francis Clifford, ſucceeded in the Earledome; a man whoſe ardent and honorable affection to vertue, is anſwerable in all points to his honourable parentage.

As for the Wardens of the Weſt-marches againſt Scotland in this County, which were Noblemen of eſpeciall truſt, I need to ſay nothing, when as by the union of both kingdomes under one head, that office is now determined.

VALLUM,
SIVE MURUS PICTICUS:
That is,
THE PICTS VVALL.

THrough the high part of Cumberland ſhooteth that moſt famous Wall (in no caſe to be paſſed over in ſilence) the limit of the Roman Province, the Barbarian Rampier, the Forefence and Encloſure, for ſo the ancient writers termed it, being called in Dion Διατείχισμα, that is, a croſſe Wall; in Herodian, χῶμα, that is, a Trench or Foſſe caſt up; by Antonine, Caſſiodore, and others, VALLUM, that is, the Rampier; by Bede, MURUS, that is, the Wall; by the Britans, Gual-Sever, Gal-Sever, Bal, Val, and Mur-Sever; by the Scottiſh, Scottiſhwaith; by the Engliſh, and thoſe that dwell thereabout, the Picts Wall, or the Pebits Wall, the Keepe Wall, and ſimply by way of excellencie, The Wall.

Frontier fenſes or Forts, writers termed Cluſuræ, becauſe they excluded the enemies; and Prætenturæ, becauſe they were ſet againſt or affront the enemies. See P. Pithœus in adverſariis lib. 1. cap. 14.

When the ambitious and valiant Romans, finding by the guidance of God and aſſiſtance of vertue, their ſucceſſe in all their affaires above their wiſhes, had enlarged their Empire every way, ſo as that the very unwealdineſſe thereof began now to be of it ſelfe fearefully ſuſpected; their Emperours thought it their beſt and ſafeſt policie to limit and containe the ſame within certaine bounds: for in wiſedome they ſaw, That in all greatneſſe there ought to be a meane, like as the heaven it ſelfe reacheth not beyond the limited compaſſe, and the ſeas are toſſed to and fro within their owne precincts. Now thoſe limits or bounds, according to the natures of the places, were either naturall, as the ſea, greater rivers, mountaines, waſts and deſart grounds; or artificiall, as frontier-fenſes, namely trenches or dikes, caſtles, keeps or fortreſſes, wards, mounds, and baricadoes by trees cut downe and plaſhed, bankes, rampiers and walls: along which were planted garriſons of ſouldiers againſt the barbarous nations confining. Whence it is that we read thus in the Novellæ of Theodoſius the Emperour, Whatſoever lieth included within the power and regiment of the Romans, is by the appointment and diſpoſe of our Anceſtors defended from the incurſions of Barbarians with the rampier of a Limit. Along theſe limits or borders ſouldiers lay garriſoned in time of peace within frontier-caſtles and cities: but when there was any feare of waſte and ſpoile from bordering nations, ſome of them had their field-ſtations within the Barbarian ground, for defence of the lands: others made out-rodes into the enemies marches, to diſcover how the enemies ſtirred; yea, and if good occaſion were offered, to encounter with them before they came to the Limits.

The Limits or Bounds of the Empire.

Tit. 43.

Vallo Limiti.

Hence come Stationes Agartæ in Vegetius.

In this Iland the Romans, when they perceived that the farther parts of Britaine lying North were cold, and a rough barren ſoile, and inhabited by the Caledonian Britans and barbarous nations, in ſubduing whereof they were ſure to take much paines, and reape very ſmall profit, built at ſundry times divers fore-fenſes, as well to bound, as to defend the Province. The firſt of theſe ſeemeth to have beene made by Julius Agricola, when he fortified with holds and garriſons that narrow ſpace of ground that lieth betweene Edenborrough Frith and Dunbretten Frith, which afterwards was eftſoones ſtrengthened.

The firſt fore-fenſe.

Bodotria and Glotta.

When TERMINUS the god of bounds, who would not give place to Jupiter himſelfe, was ſo enforced to yeeld to Hadrian the Emperour, that he withdrew the Limit of the Roman Empire in the Eaſt to the river Euphrates, whether for envie to Trajans glory,

S. Auſtin. de Civ. Dei, l. 4. c. 19.

The ſecond fore-fenſe.

glorie, under whom the Empire extended furtheſt, or for feare; he likewiſe withdrew A the limits foureſcore miles, or thereabout, within this Iland, to the river Tine, and there made the ſecond fore-fence. He, ſaith Spartianus, brought a wall on for foure- ſcore miles in length (which ſhould divide the Barbarians and the Romans aſunder) raiſed with great ſtakes or piles pitched deep in the ground, and faſtned together in maner of a murall or military mound for defence, as may be gathered out of that which followeth in Spartianus. And this is that fore-fenſe wherewith we are now in hand: for it goeth out in length Lxxx. Italian miles. About which were PONS ÆLIUS, CLASSIS ÆLIA, COHORS ÆLIA, ALA SABINIANA, which tooke their names from Ælius Hadrianus and Sabina his wife. And that Scottiſh Hiſtoriographer who wrote The Rota tempo-rum. wheele of Times, writeth thus, Hadrian was the firſt of all that made a rampier or wall B of a huge and wonderfull bigneſſe, like unto a mountaine, all of turfes digged out of the ground, with a ditch lying to it afront from the mouth of Tine unto the river Eske, that is, from the German Sea unto the Iriſh Ocean; which Hector Boetius accordingly witneſſeth in the ſame words.

The third Fenſe. Lollius Urbicus, Lievtenant of Britain under the Emperour Antoninus Pius, by his fortunate fights did enlarge the bounds againe as farre as to that firſt frontier fenſe that was made by Julius Agricola, and even there raiſed up a third fenſe with a wall.
He, ſaith Capitolinus, vanquiſhed the Britans, and having driven out the Barbarians, made another wall of turfes beyond that of Hadrianus. The honour of which war hap- C pily diſpatched and finiſhed in Britain, Fronto, as the Panegyricall Orator ſaith, aſcri-bed unto Antonine the Emperour, and hath teſtified that he, although ſitting ſtill at home in the very Palace of Rome, had given charge and commiſſion to another Generall for the war, yet like unto the Pilot of a Galley ſitting at the ſterne, and guiding the helme, deſerved the glorie of the whole voiage and expedition. But that this Wall of Antoninus Pius, and of his Lievtenant Lollius Urbicus, was in Scotland, ſhalbe proved hereafter.

The fourth Fenſe. When the Caledonian Britans, whiles Commodus was Emperor, had broken through this wall, Severus, neglecting that farre and huge big Countrey, made a fortification croſſe over the Iland from Solway Frith to Tinmouth, in that very place (if I have any judgement) where Hadrian made his wall of ſtakes and piles: and of mine opinion is D Hector Boetius: Severus, ſaith he, commanded Hadrians wall to be repaired with Bul- warks of ſtone and Turrets, placed in ſuch convenient diſtance, as that the ſound of a trumpet, though againſt the wind, might be heard from the one unto the other. And in another place, Our Chronicles report, that the wall begun by Hadrian was finiſhed by Severus.
Alſo Hierom Surita, a moſt learned Spaniard, who writeth, That the Fenſe of Hadrian was extended farther by Sept. Severus with great fortifications, by the name of Vallum.
Semblably, Guidus Paucirolus, who affirmeth, that Severus did but re-ediſie and re- paire the wall of Hadrian being falne downe. He, ſaith Spartianus, fenſed Britain (which is one of the chiefe acts recorded in his time) by erecting up a wall overthwart the Iland, to the bound of the Ocean on both ſides the Ile: whereupon he got the title of BRITANNI- E CUS. After he had driven out the enemies, as ſaith Aurelius Victor, he fenſed Britaine ſo far forth as it was commodious unto him, &c. As alſo Spartianus: Againe Eutropius, To the end that he might fortifie with all ſafety and ſecurity the Provinces which he had recovered, he made a wall for 35. or rather more truely, 80. miles in length, even from ſea to ſea: That part of the Iland which he had recovered, as Oroſius writeth, he thought good to ſever from other untamed Nations by a rampier or wall: and therefore he caſt a great ditch, and raiſed a moſt ſtrong wall, fortified with many turrets for the ſpace of an hundred and twenty two miles, from ſea to ſea: with whom Bede agreeth, who will not willingly heare that Severus made a wall; for that he laboureth to prove that a wall is made of ſtone, and a rampier, named Vallum, of ſtakes or piles that be called Valli, F Murus. Vallum. and of turfes (whereas in very truth Vallum and Murus, that is, a wall, be indifferently uſed on for another.) And yet Spartianus called it Murus, that is a wall, and ſhould ſeeme to ſhew that he made both a wall and a trench, by theſe words, Poſt murum a- pud vallum in Britannia miſſum, &c.

Howbeit, we gather out of Bede, that the ſaid Vallum or Rampier was nothing

A thing elſe but a wall of turfes: and no man can truely ſay that the wall of Severus was built of ſtone. But have here the very words of Bede himſelfe: Severus having Lib. 1. c. 5.
gotten the victorie in civill wars at home, which had fallen out to be very dangerous, was drawne into Britain upon generall revolt almoſt of all the allies there. Where, after great and ſore battells many times fought, when he had regain'd part of the Iland, he thought good to have the ſame divided from other wild and untamed nations, not with a wall, as ſome thinke, but with a rampier: for a wall is made of ſtones, but a rampier whereby Camps are fortified to repell the force of enemies, is made of turfes cut out of the earth round about, but raiſed high in maner of a wall above ground; ſo that there be a ditch or B trench afront it, whereout the turfes were gotten, upon which are pitched piles of very ſtrong timber. And ſo Severus caſt a great ditch, and raiſed a moſt ſtrong rampier, ſtrengthened with many turrets thereupon, from ſea to ſea. Neither is it knowne by any other name in Antonine, or the Notice of Provinces, than by Vallum, that is, a Rampier, and is in the Britiſh tongue termed Gual-Sever. Hereto we may annexe the authoritie alſo of Ethelward our ancienteſt writer next unto Bede; who, as touching Severus, hath theſe words, He did caſt a ditch or trench croſſe over the Iland, from ſea to ſea; within it alſo he built a wall with turrets and bulwarkes. Which afterwards he calleth Foſſam Severiam, that is, Severs foſſe or ditch: like as we read in the moſt ancient Annales of the Engliſh-Saxons, Seveꝛus Bꝛẏꝃenlanꝺ miꝺ ðic þoꝛgẏnꝺ þnam ſæ oþ ſæ, that is, Se-
C verus foregirded and fenced Britain with a ditch from ſea to ſea. And other later writers in this wiſe, Seveꝛus on Bꝛẏꝃene ȝeþoꝛhꝛ þeal oþ ꝃuþꝛum þnam ſæ to ſæ, that is, Severus in Britain made and finiſhed a wall of turfes, or a rampier from ſea to ſea. William of Malmesburie likewiſe nameth it a famous and moſt notorious trench. In which very place, two hundred yeeres after, or much thereabout, a wall of ſtone was ſet up, whereof I am to ſpeake anon.

Whereas Eutropius hath ſet downe the length of it to be 35. miles, Victor 32. and other Authors 132. I ſuppoſe ſome faults have crept into the numbers. For the Iland is not ſo broad in that place, although a man ſhould take the meaſure of the wall as it ſtood winding in and out, riſing alſo and falling here and there. Nay, if one ſhould
D reduce it into Italian miles, he ſhould find little above foureſcore, as Spartianus hath truely reckoned them. Some few yeeres after, this Munition, as it ſeemes, was forlet. Howbeit, when Alexander Severus the Emperour, as we read in Lampridius, had once given unto the Captaines and ſouldiers of the marches, thoſe grounds and lands which were won from the enemies, ſo that they ſhould be their proprietie, if their heires ſerved as ſouldiers, and that they ſhould never returne to any private men; ſuppoſing they would goe to the wars more willingly, and take the better care, if they ſhould defend their owne peculiar poſſeſſions. Note theſe words well I pray you: for hence may be deduced either a kind of Feudum, or the beginning of Feuds. After this the Romans marching beyond the wall, and building themſelves ſtations within the out-land and barbarian
E ſoile, fortifying alſo and furniſhing them accordingly, enlarged the limits of the Roman Empire againe as farre as to Edenborough Frith. Nevertheleſſe, the ſavage and barbarous people, never ceaſing to aſſaile them upon advantages, drave them backe now and then as farre as to Severus Trench.

Why lands were given to the Captaines of the Marches.

Dioclesian the Emperour had a provident eye to theſe limits, under whom when as the whole command in Britaine was committed unto Carauſius, for that he was reputed the fitter man to warre againſt theſe warlike nations, he did ſet up againe the fore-ſenſe betweene Dunbritton Frith and Edenborough Frith, as I will ſhew in place convenient. The firſt that ever had blame for neglecting theſe limits was Conſtantine the Great: for thus writeth Zoſimus, Whereas the Roman Empire by the provi-
F dence of Dioclesian was in the utmoſt marches thereof every where ſurely fenſed with Townes, Caſtles, and Burghs, and all their military companies made their abode in them, it was impoſſible for the barbarous nations to paſſe in, but they were ſo met withall at every turne by forces there ſet to repell them backe. Conſtantine abolishing this munition of Garriſons, placed the greater part of the ſouldiers, whom hee had removed from out of the marches, in townes that had no need of Garriſons and defence. So hee left the marches open to the inrodes of barbarous nations, without garrisons, and pestered the Cities that were at peace and quiet with a sort of souldiers, whereby most of them are now already become desolate, and the souldiers themselves, addicted to Theatricall sports and pleasures, grew by his meanes deboshed. To conclude, and simply to speake in one word, he it was that gave the first cause and beginning that the state of the Empire runneth to wrecke and ruine. A Marcellinus lib. 38. About the yeere 367.

The Countrey that lay betweene these enclosures or fore-fenses, Theodosius father unto Theodosius the Emperour recovered: he re-edified and repaired the Cities, strengthened the garrison castles and the limits with such watch, and ward, and forticications, yea and when he had recovered the Province, restored it to the ancient estate, in such wise, as that it had a lawfull Governour by it selfe, and was afterward in honour of Valentinian the Emperour called VALENTIA. Theodosius also his sonne, having now by his own vertue attained unto the Imperiall Majestie, had a provident care of these limits, and gave commandement that the * Master of the Offices should yeere by yeer give advice and advertisement unto the Emperour how all things went with the souldiers, and in what sort the charge of castles, holds, and fore-fenses was performed. But when the Roman Empire began once to decay apparently, and the Picts, together with the Scots, breaking through the wall of Turfes by Edenborrow-frith, cruelly wasted and over-ranne these parts, the Roman legion sent to aid the Britans under the leading of Gallio of Ravenna, after they had driven away and quite removed the Barbarians, being now called backe againe for the defence of France, exhorted the Britans (these be the very words of Gildas and Bede) to make a wall overthwart the Iland betweene the two seas, which might serve for a defence to keep off the enemies, and so returned home with great triumph. But the Ilanders fall to building of a wall as they were willed, not so much with stone as with turfes, considering they had no workman to bring up so great a piece of work, and so they did set up one good for nothing. Which, as Gildas saith, being made by the rude and unskilfull common multitude, without any one to give direction, not so much of stone as of turfe, served them in no stead. As touching the place where this wall was made, Bede proceedeth to write in this maner: They raised it betweene the two friths or armes of the sea, for the space of many miles, that where the fense of water failed, there by the help of a rampier they might defend the borders from the invasion of enemies. And such a fore-fense, reaching a great length, secured Assyria from the inrodes of forraine nations, as Ammianus Marcellinus writeth. And the Seres at this day, as we read in Osorius, fortifie their vales and plaine champion with walls, that they might thereby shelter and defend themselves from the violent incursions of the Scythians. Of which worke there made (saith Bede) that is to say, of a most broad and high rampier, a man may see the expresse and certaine remaines to this day: which beginneth almost two miles from a Monastery called Abercurving, Eastward, at a place named in the Picts language Penvahel, in the English tongue Penveltun, and reaching Westward, endeth neere the Citie Alcluid. But the former enemies no sooner perceived that the Roman souldiers were returned, but presently sailing thither by water, breake through the bounds into the marches, kill and slay all before them, and whatever stood in their way, they went downe with it under foot, they over-trample it, as if it had bin standing corne ready for harvest. Whereupon Embassadours were dispatched againe to Rome, making piteous moan, and with teares craving aide, that their miserable countrey might not utterly be destroyed, nor the name of a Roman Province, which had so long time flourished among them, waxe contemptible, being now overwhelmed with the outrage of strange nations. Hereupon a Legion was sent over, which being arrived unlooked for toward Winter, made great slaughter of the enemies: as for the rest that were able to shift away and escape, they drave beyond the seas, who before time made it a practice every yeere, while no souldiers made head against them, to passe over the said seas, and raise booties. Now by this time the Romans were retired backe unto the Wall or Rampier of Severus, and Perlineam Valli (as the booke of Notices termeth it, which was written toward the later end of Theodosius the younger his reigne) that is on both sides as well within as without the wall, they kept a standing watch and ward in

A in their ſeverall Stations appointed, namely five wings of Horſemen with their Captaines, 15. Cohorts of footmen with their Colonels, one band, and likewiſe one ſquadron; which I have mentioned and will againe in due place. As touching the time immediatly enſuing, Bede goeth forward to relate in theſe words. Then the Romans denounced unto the Britans, that they could endure no longer to be out-toyled and wearied with ſuch painfull voiages and expeditions for defence of them, adviſing them to take weapon in hand themſelves, and endevour to fight with the enemy, who could not by any meanes be ſtronger than themſelves, unleſſe they would give way to idleneſſe, and become feeble therewith: Moreover, the Romans, becauſe they thought this alſo might B ſerve their allies in ſome ſtead, whom they were forced to leave, placed a wall of ſtrong ſtone from ſea to ſea, directly betweene the Cities, which had beene built there for feare of the enemies (where Severus alſo in times paſt had made a rampire.) Here will I alſo put downe the words of Gildas, from whom Bede borrowed all this. The Romans directly levell a wall after their uſuall maner of building, not like unto the other, at the common and private charges, adjoining unto them the poore & miſerable naturall home born inhabitants, from ſea to ſea betwixt the cities, which chanced to have beene placed there for feare of the enemies. And now heare what Bede ſaith againe: Which wall, that hath beene hitherto famous and conſpicuous, they with publicke and private coſt, having with them the Britans helping hand alſo, built eight foot broad and twelve foot high, in a di- C rect line from Eaſt forward to Weſt, as is evident even at this day to the beholders. Out of which words of Bede you may ſee that a great learned man, whiles he thinketh to hit the bird in the eye, hath miſſed the marke, ſtraining and ſtriving mightily to prove againſt Boetius and other Scottiſh writers, that Severus his wall of turfe was in Scotland. Doth not Bede write in plaine tearmes, after hee had ſpoken of the Earth-wall at Abercuruing in Scotland, that a wall was reared of ſtrong ſtone where Severus had made his of turfe? and where I pray is that wall of ſtone but in this place, betweene Tine-mouth and Solwey frith? where was then that wall of Severus? As for the wall, there are yet ſuch expreſſe tokens of it in this place, that you may tracke it as it were all the way it went: and in the * Waſts, as they tearme them, I * In Vaſtis. The Waſts.
D my ſelfe have beheld with my owne eyes on either ſide, huge peeces thereof ſtanding for a great way together, only wanting their battlements.

Verily I have ſeene the tract of it over the high pitches and ſteepe deſcents of hills, wonderfully riſing and falling: and where the fields lye more plaine and open, a broad and deepe ditch without, juſt before it, which now in many places is grounded up: and within a banke or military high-way, but in moſt places interrupted. It had many towres or fortreſſes, about a mile diſtant from another, which they call Caſtle-ſteeds; and more within little fenſed townes, tearmed in theſe dayes Cheſters,
E the plots or ground workes whereof are to be ſeene in ſome places foure ſquare: alſo turrets ſtanding betweene theſe, wherein ſouldiers being placed might diſcover the enemies, and be ready to ſet upon them: wherein alſo the Areani might have their Stations, whom the foreſaid Theodoſius, after they were convicted of falſhood, diſplaced and removed from their Stations. Theſe Areani (as Marcellinus ſaith) were a kinde of men ordained in old time, whoſe office it was to runne a great way too and fro from place to place, to intimate or give intelligence unto our Leaders what ſtirre and noiſe there was abroad among the neighbour nations. So that the firſt founders of this wall may ſeeme to have beene directed by his counſell, who wrote unto Theodoſius and his ſonnes as touching military affaires in this manner. Among the commodities of F State and Weale publike, right behovefull is the care concerning the limits, which in all places doe guard and encloſe the ſides of the Empire: The defence whereof may bee beſt aſſured by certain caſtles built neare together, ſo that they be erected with a ſteedy wall & ſtrong towres a mile aſunder one from another: Which munitions verily the Land-lords ought to arreare without the publicke charge, by a diſtribution of that care among themſelves, for to keep watch and ward in them and in the field forefences, that the peace and quiet of the Provinces being guarded round about therewith, as with a girdle of defence, may reſt ſafe and ſecure from hurt and harme.

Souldiers placed in gariſons, and along the Wall.

Areani, certain diſcoverers, lib. 28.

The

The dwellers hereabout talke much of a braſen trunke (whereof they found peeces now and then) that ſet and fitted in the wall artificially, ranne betweene every Fortreſſe and Towre, ſo as that if any one in what towre ſoever, conveyed the watchword into it, the ſound would have beene carried ſtraightwaies without any ſtay to the next, then to the third, and ſo to them all one after another, and all to ſignifie at what place the aſſault of the enemy was feared. The like miraculous device of the Towres in Bizantium, Xiphiline relateth out of Dion in the life of Severus. But ſince the wall now lies along, and no pipe remaineth there, many tenants hold farmes and lands of our Kings here round about in Cornage, as our Lawyers ſpeake: that is, that they ſhould give knowledge unto their neighbours of the enemies approaching, by winding of an horne: which ſome thinke, had the firſt originall from an ancient cuſtome of the Romans: who alſo were bound to goe by the Kings precept in the army and ſervice for Scotland (theſe be the words of the Record) as they marched forth in the Vantward, as they returned home in the Rereward.

Cornage.

But that I may follow the tract of this wall more directly in particular, it beginneth at the Iriſh ſea, hard by BLATUM BULGIUM or Bulneſſe, and goeth on along the ſide of Solway frith, and ſo by Burgh upon Sands unto LUGU-VALLUM or Carlile, where it paſſeth over Eden. From thence it runneth forth, and hath the river Irthing beneath it, croſſing over Camberke, a little brooke running crooked with many turnings in and out, where are great tokens to be ſeene of a fortification. After this having cut over the rivers Irthing and Poltroſſe, it entreth into Northumberland, and among the mountaines hudled together, goeth along by the ſide of the river which they call South-Tine without any interruption (ſave only that it is divided by North-Tine, where in ancient time there was a bridge over it) as farre as to the German Ocean: as I will ſhew in due place when I am come once into Northumberland.

Yet this admirable worke could not avert and keepe out the tempeſtuous ſtormes of forraine enemies: But when the Romane armies were retired out of Britaine, the Picts and Scots aſſaulting the wall upon the ſudden with their engines and hooked weapons, pluckt and puld downe the garriſon ſouldiers, brake through the fence, and overranne Britaine far and neere, being then diſarmed and ſhaken with civill broiles, and moſt miſerably afflicted with extreme famine. But the moſt wofull and lamentable miſery of theſe heavie times, Gildas a Britan, who lived not long after, penſilleth out lively in theſe words. *As the Romans were returning homeward, there appear ſtriving who could come firſt out of their Caroches, in which they had paſſed over the vale * Stitica, like unto dunkiſh ſwarmes of wormes, comming forth of their little caves, with moſt narrow holes at noone day in ſummer, and when the heat of the ſunne is at the higheſt, a rabble of Scots and Picts, in maners partly different, but in one and the ſame greedy deſigne of bloodſhed: And having knowledge once that our friends and aſſociates were retired home, and had denied ever to returne again, they with greater confidence and boldneſſe than before time attempt to poſſeſſe themſelves of all the North ſide, and the utmoſt part of the land from out of the Inlanders hands, as far as to the very wall. Againſt theſe invaſions there ſtands placed on high in a Keepe, a laſie crew, unable to fight, unfit (God he knowes) for ſervice, trembling and quaking at the heart, which night and day ſate ſtill as benummed, and ſtirred not abroad. Mean while the hooked engines of their naked and bareſhanked enemies ceaſe not, wherewith the moſt miſerable inhabitants were plucked downe from the walls, and daſhed againſt the hard ground. This good yet did ſuch an untimely death unto thoſe that thus loſt their lives, that by ſo quicke a diſpatch and end, they were freed from the view of moſt piteous paines and imminent afflictions of their brethren and children. What ſhould I ſay more? when they had left the Cities and high wall, they were againe driven to flye and hide themſelves; and being thus diſperſed, in more deſperate caſe they were than they had been before. The enemies likewiſe preſſe ſtill ſorer upon them, and ſemblably haſten bloody carnage and ſlaughters one in the necke of another. And even as lambs are torn in pieces by butchers, ſo are theſe lamentable inhabitants by the enemies; inſomuch as their abode and continuance together might be well compared to wild beaſts. For both they preyed one upon another, and by robbing alſo forbare not the*

*The Paris edition hath Scytica Vallem, and meaneth haply the Scottiſh ſea.

A the ſhort pittance of food that the poorer ſort of the inhabitants had for their owne ſmall ſuſtentation: & alſo theſe outward calamities were encreaſed with domeſticall commotions, ſo that by reaſon of ſo great robbing, pilling, and ſpoiling, the whole countrey wanted the ſtay of all kind of food, ſave onely that which they got by hunting, to comfort their poor pining bodies.

But this is worth the obſervation, that as by the wiſdome of the Romans this wall was ſo built, that it had two very great rivers neere to it on the inner ſide (as it were) for another defence, namely, Tine and Irthing, that are divided one from the other with a very narrow parcell of ground: So on the other ſide the barbarous people B were ſo cunning, that in the ſame place eſpecially they made their firſt entrance betwixt theſe rivers, where they might have free paſſage farther into the heart of the Province, without hinderance of any river: according as we will ſhew by and by in Northumberland. The fabulous tales of the common people concerning this wall, I doe wittingly and willingly overpaſſe. Yet this one thing, which I was enformed of by men of good credit, I will not conceale from the Reader. There continueth a ſetled perſwaſion among a great part of the people thereabout, and the ſame received by tradition, That the Roman ſouldiers of the marches did plant here every where in old time for their uſe certaine medicinable hearbs, for to cure wounds: whence it is that ſome Emperick practitioners of Chirurgery in Scotland, flock hither every C yeere in the beginning of ſummer, to gather ſuch Simples and wound-herbes; the vertue whereof they highly commend as found by long experience, and to be of ſingular efficacy.

OTTADINI

OTTADINI.

AFter the Brigantes, Ptolomee placeth those who (according to the divers readings in Copies) are called OTTALINI, OTTADENI, and OTTADINI: In steed of all which names, I would, if I durst presume so far, with a very easie alteration substitute OTTATINI, that it might signifie, On the farther side of, or above the river Tine. And so verily would the name of the Inhabitants bee consonant with the position and site of the countrey. For these are planted beyond Tine. And the Welsh-Britans at this day call a country in Wales beyond the river Conwey, Uch Conwey: beyond the hils, Uchmynith: beyond the wood, Uch-Coed: beyond the river Gwyrway, Uch-Gwyrway. Neither can it be, I assure you, altogether absurd, if after the same manner they tearmed this country beyond Tine, Uch Tin: whence the Romans may seeme to have framed this name OTTADINI, by a word somewhat disjointed, but more smooth and pleasanter to the eare. And whereas Xiphilinus reporteth out of Dio, that all the Britans that dwelt neere unto the wall, which we spake of even now, were called Μαάται, or MAEATAE, good reason it is that we should thinke these our Ottadini dwelling by the said wall, were among those Mæatæ, who in that memorable revolt and rebellion of the Britans, called in the Caledonians to assist them, and take armes with them. At which time Severus the Emperour commanded his souldiers peremptorily to kill all the Britans, using these verses of Homer.

MAEATAE.

Μὴ τὶς ὑποφυγέτω αἰ πὺν ὄλεθρον
Χεῖρας ϑ' ἡμετέρας, μηδ' ἐν πυὰ γαστέι μήτηρ
Κῦρον ἔοντα φέροι, μηδ' ὃς φύγοι αἰπὺν ὄλεθρον.

Let none scape cruell death,
Nor dint of sword: no not the child unborne
In mothers womb that lies: his death is sworne.

But the tempestuous storme of this rebellion was calmed by the death of Severus, who in his very preparation for warre died at Yorke.

Long

A Long after, this Countrey ſeemeth to have beene a part of VALENTIA. For ſo Theodoſius called it in honour of Valentinian the Emperour, after he had ſubdued the barbarous people, and recovered this tract or Province, which before had beene loſt. Valentia.

But theſe ancient names were quite worne out of uſe in the Engliſh Saxon war, and all the Countries lying North on the other ſide of the Arme of the ſea called Humber, began by a Saxon name to bee called Noꝛþan-humbꝛa-ric, that is, The Kingdome of Northumberland: which name notwithſtanding
B being now cleane gone in the reſt of the Shires, remaineth ſtill, as it were, ſurviving in Northumberland onely. Which when that ſtate or kingdome ſtood, was knowne to bee a part of the Kingdome of Bernicia, which had peculiar petty Kings, and reached from the River TEES to Eden-borough Frith.

NORTH-HUMBER-LAND.

North-umber-land, which the Englisſh Saxons called Noppan-humberlono, lieth after a ſort encloſed in faſhion of a Triangle, but not with equall ſides. The South ſide is ſhut in with Derwent running into Tine, and with Tine it ſelfe, where it butteth upon the Biſhoprick of Durham. The Eaſt ſide the German ſea lieth and beateth upon it. But the Weſt ſide, which reacheth out from South-weſt to North-eaſt, is firſt parted from Cumber-land, afterward with Cheviot and hills linked one to another, and laſtly with the river Twede it affronteth Scotland, and ſo was the limit of both kingdomes: over which were ſet in this countie two Governours, the one called L. Warden of the middle Marches, the other of the Eaſt marches. The ground it ſelfe for the moſt part rough, and hard to be manured, ſeemeth to have hardened the inhabitants, whom the Scots their neighbours alſo made more fierce and hardie, while ſometimes they keep them exerciſed in warres, and other whiles in time of peace intermingle their manners among them, ſo that by theſe meanes they are a moſt warlike nation, and excellent good light-horſemen. And whereas they addicted themſelves as it were wholly to Mars and Armes, there is not a man amongſt them of the better ſort, that hath not his little tower or pile: and ſo it was divided into a number of Baronies, the Lords whereof in times paſt, before King Edward the firſt his dayes, went commonly under the name Barons, although ſome of them were of no great living. But a wiſe and politicke device this was of our Anceſtours, to cheriſh and maintaine martiall proweſſe among them in the marches of the kingdome, if it were nothing elſe but with an honourable bare title. Howbeit this title came to nothing among them, what time as under King Edward the firſt, thoſe onely began to enjoy the name and honour of Barons, whom the Kings ſummoned unto the high Court of Parliament by ſpeciall ſummons. Toward the ſea and Tine, by diligence and good husbandrie it becommeth very fruitfull; but elſewhere it is more barraine, rough, and as it were unmanurable: And in many places thoſe ſtones Lithanthraces, which we call Sea-coales, are digged up in great plentie, to the great gaine of the inhabitants, and commoditie of others.

The hithermore part bending toward the South-weſt, and called Hexam-ſhire, acknowledged a long time the Archbiſhop of Yorke for the Lord thereof, and challenged unto it ſelfe, by what right I know not, the priviledge of a Countie Palatine. But after it became of late annexed unto the crowne land, upon an exchange made with Robert the Archbiſhop, by authority of Parliament it was laied unto the countie of Northumberland, that it ſhould be ſubject to the ſame juriſdiction, and in all cauſes have recourſe unto the high Sheriffe thereof.

The river South-Tine.

F

For the Wall having left Cumberland behind it, and croſſed over the Irthing, paſſed likewiſe with an arch over the ſwift riveret Poltroſſe, where I ſaw within the wall high mounts of earth caſt up, as it were to over look and diſcover the country. Neer this ſtandeth Thirl-wale Caſtle, which is not great, but ſtrongly built; yet it gave both habitation and ſurname to the ancient and noble family, which was firſt called Wade: where the Picts and Scottiſh made their paſſage into the Province, between Irthing and Tine (and that verily upon good forecaſt) in that place where they had free entrance by reaſon of no river in their way, into the inmore parts of England. But you ſhall better underſtand this, and the name of the place, out of John Fordon the Scottiſh Hiſtorian, whoſe words it will not bee amiſſe, as I thinke, to ſet downe here, becauſe the booke is not everie where to bee had. The Scots (ſaith hee) when by conqueſt they had gotten the poſſeſsion of thoſe countries, which are on this ſide the wall, toward Scotland, began to inhabite them, and having of a ſuddaine raiſed a ſort of the Country people, with their mattockes, pickaxes, rakes, three tined forkes and ſpades, make wide gappes, and a number of holes in it, by which breaches they might paſſe in & out readily at their pleaſure. Of thoſe holes therefore this mound of the wall afterward took the name Thirlwall, which it hath at this day in this place: for in the Engliſh tongue that very place is called Thirlwall, which is as much as a wall pierced through. Then ſaw we Blenkenſop, which gave name unto a generous family, as alſo their habitation in a right pleaſant country Southward; which was part of the Baronie of Sir Nicholas of Bolteby, a Baron of renowne in the time of King Edward the firſt.

Scoto-Chronicon.

When you are paſt Thirlwall, the ſaid wall openeth it ſelfe unto the raging river Tippall, where in the deſcent of an hill, a little within the wall, is to bee ſeene the ground worke of a Caſtle of the Romans, in forme foure ſquare, everie ſide whereof taketh an hundred and fortie paces. The verie foundations likewiſe of houſes, and trackes of ſtreets appeare ſtill moſt evidently to the beholders. The Ranke-riders, or taking men of the borders doe report, that a great port-way, paved with flint and bigge ſtone, led from hence through waſtes unto Maiden caſtle in Stanemore. Certes, it paſſed directly to Kirkby Thor, whereof I ſpake. A poore old woman that dwelt in a little poore cottage hard by, ſhewed unto us an ancient little altar-ſtone, in teſtimonie of ſome vow, with this inſcription unto VITIRINEUS, a tutelar God, as it ſeemed, of the place.

Caer Vorran.

Poſuit libens merito.

This place is now named Caer Vorran; what it was in old time it paſſeth my wit to find out, ſeeing that amongſt all the ſtations mentioned along the range of the wall, there is not one commeth neere to it in name; neither have wee any light out of inſcriptions to lead us thereunto. What ever it was, ſure the wall thereby was both ſtrongeſt and higheſt by farre: for ſcarce a furlong or two from hence, upon a good high hill, there remaineth as yet ſome of it to be ſeene fifteen foot high, and nine foot thicke, built on both ſides with foure ſquare aſhler ſtone, although Bede reporteth it was not above twelve foot in heighth.

From hence the wall goeth forward more aſlope by Iuerton, Forſten, and Cheſter in the Wall, neere to Buſie-Gap, a place infamous for theeving and robbing: where ſtood ſome Caſtles, Cheſters they call them, as I have heard (but I could not with ſafetie take the full ſurvey of it, for the ranke-robbers thereabout.) As for Cheſter, the

A the neighbours told us that it was a very great building, ſo that we may well think it to have been that ſecond ſtation of the Dalmatians, which is called in the old booke of Notice, MAGNA, where this inſcription was found upon an ancient altar.

At which time ſome Cohort under his command erected this Altar unto THE GODDESSE SURIA, whom with a turreted crown on her head, and a Tabber in her hand, was ſet in a coach drawn with Lions, as Lucian ſheweth at large in his Narration of the goddeſſe Suria. Which goddeſſe alſo Nero, albeit he contemned all religion, eſpecially worſhipped for a time; and ſoone after ſo aviled and deſpiſed, that he defiled her with his urine.

May

A May wee not hence gheſſe that BREMENIUM, for which there hath beene made ſo long and great ſearch, was here, whereof Ptolomee hath made mention in this very ſite and poſition of the country, and from which Antonine the Emperor beginneth the firſt journey of Britaine, as from the utmoſt limit of the Romane Province in Britaine at that time? And the limits or bounds of a Dominion were ſeas, great rivers, Mountaines, Deſert lands, and uppaſſable, ſuch as be in this tract. Trenches alſo with their rampires, walls, mounds of trees cut downe or plaſhed, and Caſtles eſpecially built in places more ſuſpected and dangerous than others: to all which there are to bee ſeene remaines here every where about. Certes, when the Barba-
B rous nations, after they had broken through the wall of Antoninus Pius in Scotland, harried all over the countrey, and laid all waſt before them, and the wall of Hadrian lay neglected unto the time of Severus, wee may well thinke that even here was ſet downe the limit of the Romane Empire: and that from hence the old Itinerary which goes about under the name of Antoninus beganthus, A limite, that is, From the Bound. As for that which is ſet to it, id eſt, A vallo, that is, From the wall or rampier, may ſeeme a gloſſe put downe by the tranſcribers, conſidering that BREMENIUM is foureteene miles Northward diſtant from the ſaid wall: unleſſe it may ſeeme to have been one of thoſe out Field-ſtations, which, as I ſaid even now, were placed within the Barbarians ground, beyond the Wall.

C Scarce five miles from old BREMENIUM Southward, ſtandeth Otterburne, where there was a field moſt valiantly fought betweene the Scottiſh and Engliſh; in which the victory waved alternatively too and fro three or foure times, and fell in the end to the Scottiſh. For Sir Henry Percy, for his overforward ſpirit and youthfull heat by-named Hot-Spurre, who had the leading of the Engliſh, loſt 15. hundred of his men in fight, and was himſelfe led away priſoner: William Douglas alſo the leader of the Scots, with moſt of his company was ſlaine, ſo that the martiall valour of both nations was never more illuſtrious.

There is alſo another towne beneath of ancient memory, which Rhead watereth, or rather hath now well neare waſhed away: they call it at this day Riſingham, Riesenheim
D which is in the ancient Engliſh and German language, The Giants Habitation, as Riſingberg in Germany, the Giants Hill. Many ſhewes are there, and thoſe right evident of antiquity. The inhabitants report that God Magon defended and made good this place a great while againſt a certaine Soldan, that is, an Heathenish Prince. Neither is this altogether a vaine tale. For that ſuch a God was here honoured and worſhipped, is plainly proved by theſe two altar ſtones lately drawne out of the river there, with theſe Inſcriptions.

leader & conducter of an armie, directed thereto by faithfull devotion, did ſet up this ſign

Oſwald perceived in this battell the preſent aſſiſtance of Chriſt, which he had ſo ear-neſtly implored, ſtreightwaies he became a profeſſed Chriſtian, and ſent for Aidan

Heafonfield, now Haledon. of victorie was called Heafenfielð, that is, Heaven-field; which at this day in the ſame

Both of the place ſo memorable, and this ſo noble victory,
The Monkes of Hanguſtald-Church in great devoutneſſe here,
Are wont to be, and Chriſt to praiſe duely from yeere to yeere.
And that the honour of this place might ſtill remaine entire,
In honour of Saint Oſwald King, they built a Chappell there.

And another in praiſe of him wrote in that unlearned age, not unlearnedly, thus:

B Quis fuit Alcides? quis Cæſar Julius? aut quis
Magnus Alexander? Alcides ſe ſuperaſſe Fertur. Alexander mundum, ſed Julius hoſtem:
Se ſimul Oſwaldus, & mundum vicit, & hoſtem.

What was to Oſwald Hercules? what Julius Cæſar? what Great Alexander? Hercules is named much for that Himſelfe he won: Xander the world: Julius made foes to flye, Oſwald at once conquer'd himſelfe, the world, and enemy.

C Beneath Saint Oſwalds both Tines meet in one, after that South-Tine (which keepeth juſt pace in parallel, as it were, with the wall, about two miles from it) hath paſſed by Langley Caſtle, where ſometimes, under King John, Sir Adam de Tindale had his Barony, which afterwards came to Sir Nicolas Bolteby, and of late belonged to the Percies: and at Aidon runneth under the woodden weake bridge, and ſhaking through the violence of the ſtreame Tine, by this time being now broader and broader, continueth his courſe in one channell apace toward the Ocean, by Hexham, which Bede calleth Hanguſtald, but the old Engliſh-Saxon Hexwolberham. That this was named in the Romans time AXELODUNUM (where the firſt Cohort of the Spaniards had their ſtation) both the name implieth, & the high ſituation upon an hill
D anſwerable to the name, when as the ancient Britans called an hill Dunum. But as touching this, heare what Richard Prior of this place ſaith, who flouriſhed 500. yeeres agoe. Not farre from the river Tine Southward there ſtandeth a towne, now in theſe dayes verily but of meane bigneſſe, and ſlenderly inhabited, but in times paſt, as the remaines of antiquity do beare witneſſe, very large and ſtately. This place, of the little river Hextold running downe by it, and ſwelling otherwhiles like unto a flood, with a ſwift ſtreame, is named Hextoldeſham: which town Etheldreda the wife of King Egfrid gave
E unto Saint Wilfrid in the yeere 675. that hee ſhould exalt it with an Epiſcopall See; who built there a Church, that for the artificiall frame and paſſing beauty went beyond all the Minſters in England. Take with you alſo that which William of Malmesbury wrote: This was Crown-land, when Wilfrid the Biſhop exchanged with Queen Etheldreda other lands. It was wonderfull to ſee what buildings were erected there with mighty high walls, and how they were ſet out & contrived with divers turnings in & out by winding ſtaires, all poliſhed and garniſhed by the curious workmanſhip of Maſons and Pargetters, whom the hope of his liberality had allured from Rome; ſo that theſe buildings carried a ſhew of the Romanes ſtately magnificence, and ſtood very long ſtruggling with time. The foreſaid King Egfrid placed an Epiſcopall See in this little City. But that dignity, after the eighth Biſhop, vaniſhed cleane away, whileſt the Daniſh warres were at the hot-F teſt. And ſo ever ſince it was counted onely a manour or Townſhip belonging to the Archbiſhops of Yorke, before the exchange made with King Henry the eighth; wherby they reſigned up their right. This place was alſo renowned by reaſon of that bloudy battaile wherein John Nevill, Marqueſſe Montacute, encountred the leaders of the Lancaſtrian Faction with much courage, and with greater ſucceſſe put them to flight: and therefore was created Earle of Northumberland by King Edward the fourth. But now all the glory that it hath is in that ancient Abbey, a part whereof is converted into a faire dwelling houſe, belonging to Sir John Foſter Knight. As A for the Church, it ſtandeth whole and ſound, ſave that the Weſt end onely thereof is pulled downe: and I aſſure you a right ſtately and ſumptuous building it is: within the quire whereof is to be ſeene an ancient tombe of a noble-man, of that warlike family of the Umfranvils, as appeareth by his Eſcutcheon of Armes, lying with his Men buried with their legs a croſſe. legges acroſſe. After which faſhion in thoſe dayes were they onely enterred (that I may note ſo much by the way) who tooke upon them the croſſe, and were marked with the badge of the croſſe for ſacred warfare, to recover the Holy land from the Mahometans and Turkes. Hard by the Eaſt end alſo of this Church, upon the brow of an hill, are erected two moſt ſtrong bulwarks of free ſtone, which belong, as I have B heard, unto the Archbiſhop of Yorke.

From hence we went Eaſtward, and came to Dilſton, a manſion houſe of the Ratcliffes: In old evidence it is found written Divelſtone, of a little river running into Bede lib. 3. cap. 1. Tine, which Bede called Divelesburn, where, as he writeth, Oſwald having the faith of Chriſt for his armour and defence, in a ſet battaile ſlew Cedwalla the Britan, that wicked and horrible Tyrant, who had already ſlaine two Kings of Northumberland, and depopulated the country all over. On the other banke of Tine lieth CURIA OTTADINORUM, whereof Ptolomee maketh mention; it may ſeeme by the diſtance thereof to bee CORSTOPITUM in Antonine, called at this day of the bridg, Corbridge; in Hovedons Annals, Corobridge; and in Henry of Huntingdon, Cure. C
It can ſhew nothing now but a Church, and a little tower hard by, which the Vicars of the Church built, and wherein they dwell. Howbeit there remaine ſtill ſundry Treaſure in vaine. reliques of antique worke: among which King John ſearched for ancient treaſure, Hoveden. Tacitus. ſuppoſed to have beene buried there: But he was overtaken in his owne vanity, and deceived of his great expectation, no leſſe than Nero, when hee ſearched for the hidden wealth of Dido at Carthage. For nothing found hee but ſtones ſigned with braſſe, iron, and lead. But whoſo ſhall ſee the heap of rubbiſh that lieth there-Colecester. by, and is called Colecester, will ſoon ſay it was ſome hold of a Romane garriſon. Forward ſtill upon the ſame banke, wee ſaw Biwell a proper faire caſtle, which in the reigne of King John was the Barony of Sir Hugh Balliol; for which he did owe to the Ward of Newcaſtle upon Tine, thirty Knights [ſervice.] D

Beneath this Caſtle there is a very goodly Weare for the catching of Salmons:
and two ſolid piles of moſt firme ſtone, which in times paſt ſupported the bridge, ſtand up in the midſt of the river. From hence Tine running underneath, looketh up to Prudhow Caſtle, in ancient bookes written Prodhow, ſituate very pleaſantly upon the ridge of an hill. This may I gheſſe to have beene PROTOLITIA, which alſo is called PROCOLITIA, the ſtation of the firſt band of the Batavians, till time tell me more, and inſtruct mee better. But it is famous in this regard, that in King Henry the ſecond his dayes it valiantly gave the check unto William King of Scots laying ſiege unto it; when, as William of Newborrough writeth, hee had taken great paines to no purpoſe, to his loſſe and hurt. Afterwards it belonged to the Umfranvils, E men of great eſtimation, among whom Sir Gilbert Umfranvill flouriſhing in the profeſſion of armes, in right of his wife attained the title of Earle of Anguiſh in Scotland, in the reign of K. Edward the firſt, and left that honour to his poſterity. But Eleanor, daughter to the ſiſter, and heire of the laſt Earle, was married at length into the family of Talebois: and afterward this caſtle by the Princes bountifull gift came to the Duke of Bedford.

But to retire to the wall. Beyond Saint Oſwalds there are ſeene in the wall the foundations of two forts, which they call Caſtle-ſteeds: then a place named Portgate, where there ſtood a gate in the wall, as may appeare by the word, that in both lan- F guages importeth as much. Beneath this, more within the country, is Halton-Hall; where flouriſheth the family of the Carnabies, in great name for their antiquity and military proweſſe: neere unto which is ſeated Aidon caſtle, ſometimes part of the Barony of that Hugh Balliol before named. But for as much as many places about

A about the wall carry this name Aidon, and the very ſame ſignifieth a Militare Wing, or a troupe of horſemen, in the Britiſh tongue, of which ſort there were many wings placed along the Wall (as plainely appeareth by the booke of Notices) in their ſtations; I would have the reader throughly to conſider, whether this name was not thereupon impoſed upon theſe places, like as Leon, upon thoſe townes where the Legions had their ſtanding campe. Well, hard by there was digged up the fragment of an antique ſtone, wherein is the expreſſe portrait or image of a man lying in bed, leaning upon his left hand, and with the right touching his right knee, with theſe inſcriptions.

Then the river Pont, having his ſpring head more outwardly, and running downe neere to Fenwick-Hall, the dwelling houſe of the worthy and martiall family of the Fenwickes, for certaine miles together gardeth the wall, and upon his banke had for a defence in gariſon the firſt Cohort of the Cornavii, at a place called PONS ÆLII, built as it ſeemeth by Ælium Hadrianum the Emperor, now called Pont-eland: at which King Henry the third, in the yeere 1244. concluded a peace; and neere unto this the firſt Cohort of the Tungri had their abode at Borwick, which in the Notice of Provinces is called BORCOVICUS. From Port-gate the wall runneth along to

E Waltowne, which, ſeeing the ſignification accordeth ſo well with the name, and that it ſtandeth twelve miles from the Eaſt ſea, I beleeve verily it is the ſame royall town which Bede called ADMURUM, wherein Segbert King of the Eaſt Saxons was by the hands of Finanus baptized and received into the Church of Chriſt. Neere unto this was a fortification, called Old Wincheſter (I would gladly take it to be that VINDOLANA) which that Booke of Notice ſo often cited, recordeth to have beene the Frontier-ſtation in times paſt of the fourth Cohort of the Gaules. And then have yee Roucheſter, where we beheld very plainly the expreſſe footings, in form four ſquare, of a gariſon Caſtle, that joined hard to the wall. Neere unto it Headon ſheweth it ſelfe, which was part of the Barony of Sir Hugh de Bolebec, who fetched his deſcent

F by his mother from the noble Barons of Mont-Fichet; and had iſſue none but daughters, matched in wedlock with Ralph Lord Greiſtock, I. Lovel, Huntercomb, and Corbet.

Now where the wall and Tine almoſt meet together, New-caſtle ſheweth it ſelfe glorioufly, the very eye of all the townes in theſe parts, ennobled by a notable haven, which Tine maketh, being of that depth, that it beareth very tall ſhips, and ſo defendeth them, that they can neither eaſily bee toſſed with tempeſts, nor driven upon ſhallowes and ſhelves. It is ſituate on the riſing of an hill, very uneven, upon the North-banke of the river (which hath a paſſing faire bridge over it.) On the left hand whereof ſtandeth the Caſtle: after that, a ſteepe and upright pitch of an hill riſeth: on the right hand you have the Mercat place, and the better part of the City in regard of faire buildings. A

From whence the aſcent is not eaſie to the upper part, which is larger by farre. It is adorned with foure Churches, and fortified with moſt ſtrong walls that have eight gates in them, with many towres, what it was in old time it is not knowne. I would Gabroſentum. ſoone deeme it to have beene GABROSENTUM, conſidering that Gateſ-head the ſuburbe, as it were, thereof, doth in the owne proper ſignification expreſſe that Britiſh B name Gabroſentum derived from Goates, as hath been ſaid before. The Notice alſo of Provinces placeth Gabroſentum and the ſecond Cohort of the Thracians in it, within the range of the wall. And moſt certaine it is that both the Rampier and the Wall went through this City, and at Pandon gate there remaineth, as it is thought, one of the turrets of that wall. Surely for workmanſhip and faſhion it is different from the other.

Moreover, whereas it was named before the Conqueſt Monk-cheſter, becauſe it was as it ſeemeth in the poſſeſſion of Monkes; this addition Cheſter, which ſignifieth a place fortified, implyeth that it was anciently a place of ſtrength. But after the Conqueſt of the New caſtle, which Robert the ſonne of William the Conqueror built out C of the ground, it got this new name New-caſtle, and by little and little encreaſed marveilouſly in wealth, partly by entercourſe of trafficke with the Germans, and partly by carrying out ſea-coales, wherewith this country aboundeth, both into forraine Countries, and alſo into other parts of England. In the reigne of Edward the firſt a rich man chanced to bee haled way priſoner by the Scottiſh, out of the middle of the towne: who after hee had ranſomed himſelfe with a great ſumme of money, began with all ſpeed to fortifie the ſame: and the reſt of the inhabitants moved by his example finiſhed the worke, and compaſſed it with faire ſtrong walls. Since which time it hath with ſecurity avoided the force and threats of the enemies and robbers, which ſwarmed all over the country, and withall fell to trading & merchandiſe ſo freſhly, that for quick commerce & wealth it became in very flouriſhing D eſtate; in which regard King Richard the ſecond granted that a ſword ſhould bee carried before the Maior, and King Henry the ſixth made it a County, incorporate by it ſelfe. It is diſtant from the firſt Meridian or Weſt line 21. degrees and 30. minutes, and from the Æquinoctiall line toward the North pole 34. degrees and 57. minutes. As touching the ſuburbs of Gateſhead, which is conjoyned to New-caſtle with a faire bridge over the river, and appertaineth to the Biſhops of Durham, I have already written. Now in regard of the ſite of New-caſtle, and the abundance of ſea-cole vented thence, unto which a great part of England and the Low Countries of Germanie are beholden for their good fires, read theſe verſes of Maſter John Jonſton, out of his Poem of the Cities of Britaine. Seated upon high rocke ſhee ſees dame Natures wonders ſtrange,
Or elſe to others wittily doth vent them for exchange.
In vaine why ſeeke yee fire to fetch from heaven to ſerve your turne?
The ground here either keeps it cloſe, or quickly makes it burne.
Not that which folke with ſtony flaſh or whirlewind grim affrights,
But giveth life to earthly things, and mindes to living wights.
B This melteth iron, braſſe and gold ſo pliable and ſoft:
What mindes th'allective ſhade of gold ſtirres not, nor ſets aloft?
Nay more than ſo, men ſay it doth dull metals change to gold,
To ſay therefore he is a God our Alchymiſts are bold.
If God he be, as thou giv'ſt out (Great Maſter) of thy word,
How many Gods then doth this place, and our Scotland afford?

Scarce three miles hence (for I over paſſe Goſſeford, which was the Barony in old time of Richard Sur-Teis, who came up under King Henry the firſt, and lived in great honour) ſtandeth a village named Wallſ-end. The very ſignification of the C name ſheweth, that this was a ſtation of the ſecond Cohort of Thracians, which in the booke of Notices is called VINDOBALA, in Antonine VINDOMORA: for it may ſeeme that in the provinciall language of the Britans, as the latter of them betokened The Walls-end, ſo the former the Rampiers-end, conſidering that long ſince they tearmed a Wall Mur, and a Rampire Bal, Val, and Gual.

Barons Sur-Teis.

Vindobala. Vindomora. Walls end.

Neither is it credible that the Rampire or Wall reached any farther, ſeeing that beyond this place there are no tokens thereof: and Tine being now very neere unto the Ocean, with his exceeding deepe channell ſerveth in ſtead of a moſt ſtrong fenſe. Yet ſome there be who thinke, that the rampire, and not the wall, went as farre as to the very mouth of Tine, which is called Tinmouth; and ſtifly affirm that it was termed D Pen-bal-crag, that is, the head of the rampire in the rocke, whom I will not contradict. But I durſt almoſt avouch, that this was in the Romanes time TUNNOCELLUM, ſeeing that Tunnocellum ſoundeth as much as the Promontory of Tunn or Tine, where the firſt Cohort Ælia Claſſica, enrolled (as it is probable by the very name) by Ælius Hadrianus the Emperour, was in pay for ſea ſervice. For the Romans had certaine light Foiſts or Pinnaces, tearmed Luſoriæ, upon the rivers in the marches: as well to repreſſe the outrodes of them that dwelt there by, as to quit them with like inrodes, as we may ſee in the books of Theodoſius his Code, under the title, de Luſoriis Danu- E bii, that is, touching The pinnaces of the river Danow. Under the Saxons Heptarchy it was called Tunnacæſtep, not of Tunna the Abbot, as Bede writeth, but doubtleſſe of the river; and a little Monaſtery it had, which was oftentimes rifled by the Danes: But now it is called Tinmouth Caſtle, and takes great glory in a ſtately and ſtrong caſtle, which, as an ancient writer ſaith, on the Eaſt and North ſide is unpoſſible to be entered, by reaſon of a mighty high rocke over the ſea, and in other places ſuch is the height of it, that it needs but ſmall defence: Whereupon Robert Mowbray, Earle of Northumberland, made choice of it for his ſtrongeſt hold, when hee rebelled againſt King William Rufus. But, as commonly it falleth out with rebels, he had but ill ſucceſſe: who being forthwith very ſtreightly beſieged, withdrew himſelfe into a F monaſtery hard by, which was counted a Sanctuary, and therefore not to bee forced and broken; nevertheleſſe he was drawne out thence, and kept a long time cloſe priſoner in miſery; a juſt reward for his ſo perfidious treachery.

Now muſt I coaſt along the ſhore. On the back ſide of the Promontory, on which Tinmouth is ſituate, next unto Seton, which under King Henry the third was part of the Barony Dela-vall; Seghill ſheweth it ſelfe called in old time SEGEDUNUM, a ſtation of the third Cohort of the Lergi, by the wall or Rampire: and verily SEGEDUNUM in Britiſh, is all one with Seghill in Engliſh.

Some few miles from hence, the ſhore maketh roome for the river Blith to fall into the ſea: which river watering Belſey, belonging in times paſt to the Midletons, and Ogle, a Caſtle of the Barons Ogle, is here, together with the river Pont, diſcharged into the ſea. A Barons Ogle.

Theſe Ogles, from the very beginning of Edward the fourth his reigne, flouriſhed in the dignity of Barons, enriched by marrying the heires of Sir Berthram Bothall, of Alan Heton, and of Alexander Kirkby. The iſſue male of theſe Barons went out lately, and expired in Cuthbert, the ſeventh Baron of that houſe: who begat two daughters, Joan married to Edward Talbot, a younger ſonne of George Earle of Shrewſbury; and Katharine wife to Sir Charles Cavendiſh Knight. B

Wentſ-beck. Barony of Mitford.

A little higher the river Wents-beck is ſwallowed up of the Ocean; it runneth beſide Mitford, which King John and his Rutars ſet on fire, when in moſt grievous manner they over-ranne theſe Countries. That age called forraine and willing ſouldiers, Rutars, whom Falques de Brent, and Walter Buc brought out of the Low-Countries, and from other parts, to aide King John. Brent a wilde madbraine, was at length baniſhed out of the Realme: But Buc a more ſtaid man, after hee had done the King ſtout ſervice, had given unto him by the King poſſeſſions in Yorkeſhire and Northamptonſhire: and his race flouriſhed there, untill that John Buc was attainted under King Henry the ſeventh: whoſe great grand-ſon is Sir George Buc knight, a man well learned, of great reading, and Maſter of the Kings Revels; who (for I take pleaſure to profeſſe by whom I have profited) hath obſerved many things in hiſtory, and gently imparted the ſame to me. This was ſometimes the Barony of William Berthram, whoſe iſſue male ſoone had an end in Roger his grand-ſonne; and his three daughters inheritrices were beſtowed in marriage upon Sir Norman Darcy T. Penbury, and William of Elmeley. C

Morpeth.

From thence Wents-beck paſſeth through Morpeth, a famous little towne. For on the North banke of the river is the towne ſituate, and on the South banke ſtandeth the Church, and the Caſtle by it, upon a ſhady hill beſet with trees; which, together with the town, came from Sir Roger Merley, whoſe Baronyit was, unto the Lords of Greiſtock, and ſo from them to the Barons Dacre of Gilleſland. Nothing I have of any antiquity to ſay of this towne, but that in the yeere of Chriſt 1215. it was ſet on fire by the inhabitants themſelves in ſpitefull malice to King John. From hence the river Wents-beck paſſeth by Bothall Caſtle, and the Barony ſomtimes of Richard Berthram, from whoſe poſterity it was devolved unto the Barons of Ogle: Upon the bank whereof, I have thought this great while (whether truly, or upon a bare ſuppoſall I know not) that in old time GLANOVENTA ſtood, which was fortified by the Romans with a garriſon of the firſt Cohort of the Morini, for defence of the marches. Which the very ſituation doth as it were perſwade; and the rivers name, together with the ſignification of the ſame, induceth me to thinke. For it is ſeated within the raunge of the rampire or wall, even where the booke of Notices placeth it: the rivers name is Wantſ-beck, and GLANOVENTA in the Britiſh tongue ſignifieth the ſhore or bank of Venta. Whence alſo Glanon, a city in France upon the ſea-ſhore, whereof Pomponius Mela hath made mention, may ſeeme to have drawn that appellation. D E

Not farre hence, to let paſſe little piles and towres of leſſe account, is to be ſeene neere unto the ſhore Withrington or Woderington, in the Engliſh Saxon tongue of old time called Wiðringtun, an ancient Caſtle, which gave the name unto the Withringtons, Gentlemen of good birth, and Knights, whoſe valour in the warre hath beene from time to time remarkable. Then the river Coquet falleth into the ſea, which ſpringing among the rough and ſtony mountaines of Cheviot, not farre from his head, hath Billeſdun upon it; from whence ſprang the ancient family of the Selbies: and ſomewhat lower Southward, Harbottle, in the Engliſh Saxons tongue Herbottle, that is, The ſtation of the Army, whence the family of the Harbottles deſcended, that in the ages aforegoing flouriſhed. And at the verie mouth of Coquet, Warkworth a proper faire Caſtle of the Percies ſtandeth and defendeth the ſhore, where there is a chappell wonderfully built out of a rocke hewen hollow, and wrought without beames, rafters, or anie peeces of timber. This Caſtle King Edward the third gave unto Hentie Percie, together with the Mannour of Rochburie. Afore time it had beene the Baronie of Roger Fitz-Richard, by the gift of Henrie the ſecond King of England, who gave alſo unto his ſonne, Clavering in Eſſex, whereof at the commandement of King Edward the firſt, they aſſumed unto them the ſurname of Clavering, B leaving the ancient maner of taking their names from the forename, or Chriſtian name of the father: for before that time they were ſurnamed according to the forename of the father, as Robert Fitz Roger, Roger Fitz John, &c. Part of this inheritance the Nevils entred upon by Fine and Covenant, who afterward were Earles of Weſtmorland; and part of it a daughter named Eve inherited, who was wedded to Sir Th. Ufford; from whoſe poſteritie it came hereditarily unto the Fienes Barons of Dacres. But from the younger ſonnes branched the Barons of Evers, the Evers of Axholme, and the Claverings of Kalaly in this Countie, and others. Hard unto this alſo lieth Morwick, which may likewiſe boaſt of the Lords it had, whoſe iſſue male had an end about the yeere of our Lord 1258. and ſo the inheritance paſſed over by the daughC ters unto the Lumleies, Seimors, Bulmers, and Roſcells.

The ſhore after this openeth it ſelfe to give paſſage unto the river ALAUNUS, which being not yet bereft of that name, whereby it was knowne unto Ptolomee, is called ſhort Alne: Upon the bank whereof, beſides Twifford, that is, A double fourd (where was holden a ſolemne Synod under King Egfrid) and Eſlington, the habitation of the Collingwoods (men renowned for their warlike exploits) there ſheweth alſo it ſelfe Alan-wic, in the Engliſh Saxon tongue Ealn-pic, now commonly called Anwick, a towne ennobled by the victorie of Engliſhmen (wherein our anceſtors ſhewed ſuch valour and proweſſe, that they tooke William King of Scots, and preſented him priſoner unto King Henrie the ſecond) and fortified beſides with a goodly caD ſtle: which when Malcome the third, King of the Scots, had by long ſiege enforced to ſuch extremitie, that it was at the point now to bee yeelded up, hee was ſlaine by a ſouldier, that making ſemblance to deliver unto him the keyes of the Caſtle hanging at the head of a ſpeare, ranne him into the bodie with it. And withall, his ſonne Edward, whiles to revenge his fathers death he charged unadviſedly upon the enemie, was ſo wounded, that hee died thereof ſhortly after. This was a Baronie ſometimes belonging to the Veſcies. For King Henrie the ſecond gave it unto Euſtach Fitz-John, father to William Veſci, to be held by the ſervice of twelve knights. E Sir John Veſcy, of this race, returning out of the ſacred warre in the Holy-land, was the firſt that brought with him into England the Friers Carmelites, and built for them a Covent here in Holme, a deſart place, not unlike to Mount Carmel in Syria. William, the laſt of the Veſcies, made Antonine Bec Biſhop of Durham his feofie upon truſt, that he ſhould deliver this Caſtle, with all the lands lying thereto, unto his baſe ſonne, the onely childe that he left behind him; but the Biſhop falſly conveied away from him the inheritance, and for readie money ſold it unto William Lord Percie: ſince which time it hath evermore belonged to the Percies.

Our Bede, where hee reports that this Caſtle was beſieged and burnt by Penda King of the Mercians, writeth that Queene Bebba gave it this name: but the Floure-gatherer recordeth, that Ida the firſt King of Northumberland built it, which hee fenſed firſt with great ſtakes or pils of timber, and afterward with a wall. But take here with you the deſcription thereof out of Roger Hoveden: Bebba (ſaith hee) is a moſt ſtrong Citie, not verie great, but containing the ſpace of two or three fields, having into it one hollow entrance, and the ſame raiſed on high with ſtaires after a wonderfull manner, and on the pitch of an hill, a very faire Church, and Weſtward on the top thereof, there is a well ſet out with marvailous workmanſhip, ſweet to drink of, and moſt pure to ſee to. A

But in our age it is counted a caſtle rather than a city, yet ſo bigge and large, as that it may ſeeme to match with a city. Neither went it for any other but a caſtle, when King William Rufus having raiſed over againſt it a tower called Mal-voiſin, gave aſſault continually to Mowbray, while hee rebelled and lurked there, who at length privily ſtole away, & eſcaped by flight. The greateſt part of the beauty thereof was loſt long time after, in the civill warre, when Breſsie the Norman, a redoubted ſouldier, who ſided with the houſe of Lancaſter, exerciſed his rage againſt it very outragiouſly. Since then it hath beene ſore beaten with time, and the windes together, which have blowne by drifts an incredible deale of ſand of the ſea into the fortreſſes. Hereto adjoyneth Emildon, ſometime the Barony of John Le Viſcont, but Rametta the heire of that houſe ſold away the poſſeſſions to Simon de Montfort, Earle of Leiceſter. In this was borne John Duns, called Scotus, becauſe hee was deſcended of Scotiſh bloud, who being brought up in Merton Colledge at Oxford, became wonderfull well learned in Logicke, and in that crabbed and intricate Divinity of thoſe dayes: yet as one ſtill doubtfull and unreſolved, he did overcaſt the truth of religion with miſts of obſcurity. And with ſo profound and admirable ſubtlety, in a darke and rude ſtile hee wrote many workes, that hee deſerved the title of the Subtile Doctor: and after his owne name erected a new ſect of the Scotiſts. But hee died pitifully, being taken with an Apoplexy, and overhaſtily buried for dead; whiles upon returne of life, nature (though too late) was about to diſcuſſe the violence of the diſeaſe, and hee, making meanes in vaine by a lamentable noiſe to call for helpe, after he had a long time knocked his head againſt the grave ſtone, daſhed out his owne braines, and at laſt yeelded up his vitall breath. Whereupon a certain Italian wrote thus of him.

That he was borne here in England, I avouch it out of his owne manuſcript works in the Library of Merton Colledge in Oxford, and upon their faithfull teſtimony, which conclude in this maner: Explicit Lectura, &c. that is, Thus endeth the Lecture of the ſubtle Doctor in the Univerſity of Paris, John Duns, borne in a certaine little village or hamlet within the Pariſh of Emildon, called Dunſton, in the county of Northumberland, pertaining to the houſe of the ſcholars of Merton Hall in Oxford.

On this ſhore forward there is nothing to be ſeene worth relation, but the Holy Iſland (whereof I will write in due place) untill a man come to the mouth of Twede, which parteth England and Scotland a great way aſunder, and is called the Eaſt limit: and thereupon our Necham thus writeth, inſinuating that the hither part of Scotland was called Pict-land.

The river Twede.

The

A The river Twede, a certaine bound,
Divides * Pict-land from Engliſh ground.

This river breaking forth at a number of Springs out of the mountaines of Scotland, wandereth a great while with many a crooked winding in and out, among the ranke-riders and borderers (to give them no worſe tearme) whoſe manner is, as one ſaith, to try their right by the ſwords point. But when hee is come hard to a village called Carram, waxing a great deale bigger by reaſon of many waters fallen unto him, hee begins to diſtinguiſh the Confines of the Kingdomes. And when hee hath watered Werke, a Caſtle often aſſaulted by the Scottiſh, belonging in times paſt to
B the Roſſes, and now to the Graies, who by feats of armes have wonne much honour, hee is encreaſed more with the ſtreame of Till, a river that hath two names. For at the head, which is in the innermore part of this country, it is called Bramiſh, and upon it ſtandeth Bramton, a little village, very obſcure and almoſt of no reckoning: from whence it goeth Northward by Bengeley, which together with Brampton it ſelfe, with Broundum, Rodam (which hath given name to a ſtock in this tract of good note) Edelingham, &c. was in King Henry the third his time the Barony of Patricke Earle of Dunbar: who alſo, as we read in the book of Inquiſitions, was Inborow and Outborow betweene England and Scotland, that is to ſay if I miſtake it not, he was to allow and obſerve in this part, the ingreſſe and egreſſe of thoſe that travailed too
C and fro betweene both Realmes. For Engliſhmen in ancient time called in their language an Entry, and fore Court or Gatehouſe, Inborou. Higher ſomewhat ſtandeth Chevelingham, now called Chillingham, hard by the river, which, like as Horton not farre diſtant from it, had their Caſtles belonging to the Greies, ever ſince that thoſe two families of the Greies were conjoyned in one by marriage.

There lyeth neere unto it Wollover, a Barony which King Henry the firſt gave to Robert * Muſchampe, who bare Azure three Butterflies or Papilions Argent: of whoſe race deſcended Robert, who in Henry the third his reigne was reputed the mightieſt Baron in theſe North parts. But the inheritance was quickly diſmembred and parted among the females: one of whom was married unto the Earle of D Stratherne in Scotland, a ſecond to Sir William de Huntercombe, and a third to Odonell Ford. Then the river of Glen from out of the Weſt augmenteth Till with his waters, and nameth the vale that he runneth thorow Glendale. Touching this little river Bede writeth thus: Paulinus comming with the King and Queen into a Manour or houſe of the Kings, called Ad-Gebrin (at this day Yeverin) abode with them 36. daies there, emploied wholly in the catechizing and baptiſing: during all which time he did nothing from morning but inſtruct the people reſorting to him in the ſaving word of Chriſt, and being thus inſtructed, he baptiſed them to the forgiveneſſe of their ſinnes in the river of Glen, which was hard by. This houſe was in the time of the ſucceeding Kings neglected, and another made for it in a place called Melmin, but at this day Melfeld.

E Here within a little of Brum-ridge, by Brumeford, K. Athelſtan fought a pitched field with Aulaſe the Dane, Conſtantine K. of Scots, and Eugenius or Owein Prince of Cumberland, with ſo fortunate ſucceſſe, that this battaile was moſt famous farre and neere, yea and triumphantly deſcribed by the Hiſtorians and Poets of that time in the higheſt degree, with ſtately ſtile and lofty verſe in the language of that age, in barbarous Latin.

Here Bramiſh, loſing his owne name, comes to bee called Till, and firſt ſaluteth Ford Caſtle, belonging ſometimes to the warlike and valiant houſe of the Herons, now to the family of the Carrs: then Etall, where the family ſurnamed De Maneriis, or Manours ſometimes inhabited, reckoned in the ranke of worſhipfull Knights, out
F of which flouriſh the right honourable Earles of Rutland at this day. Many ſmall caſtles and piles in this tract I wittingly let paſſe: For an endleſſe peece of worke it were to goe through them all one by one, conſidering it is certaine that in King Henry the ſecond his time there were eleven hundred and fifteene Caſtles in England.

Caſtles 1115. in England.

Right over againſt this Ford weſtward, there mounteth aloft an high hill called A Floddon neere Bramton, memorable in regard of James the fourth, King of Scots, who was there ſlaine, and his army overthrowne: who, whiles King Henry the eighth lay at the ſiege of Tournay in France, marched forward in great courage, and greater hope with Banner diſplayed againſt England. But Thomas Howard Earle of Surry, arraunged in good order of battaile, valiantly in this place received him: where the fight continued ſharpe and hot on both parts, untill the night came upon them, uncertaine as then whether ſide had the victory. But the day enſuing manifeſted both the Conquerour and conquered: and the King of Scots himſelfe with many a mortall wound, was found among the heapes of dead bodies. And B hereupon was granted a new augmentation unto the Armes of the Howards, as I have formerly ſpecified.

Twede having now entertained Till, runneth downe with a fuller ſtreame by Norham or Northam, in old time called Ubbanford, a towne belonging to the Biſhops of Durham. For Egfrid the Biſhop built it, and Raulph his ſucceſſour erected a Caſtle upon the top of an high ſteepe rocke, and fortified it with a trench: in the utmore wall whereof, which is of greater circuit, are placed ſundry turrets in a Canton toward the river: within there is another encloſure or wall much ſtronger: in the midſt of which there riſeth up the Keepe of great heigth: But the ſecure peace of our age, hath now a long time neglected theſe fortifications, albeit they ſtand in C the borders. Under it lieth the towne in a plaine Weſtward, and hath in it a Church, wherein was enterred Ceolwulph King of Northumberland, unto whom Venerable Bede dedicated his booke of the Eccleſiaſticall hiſtory of England; and who afterwards renouncing the world, became a Monke in Lindiſfarn Church, and ſerved as a Chriſtian ſouldier for the Kingdome of heaven, and his body was conveyed after that into the Church of Norham. Alſo when the Danes harried and ſpoiled the Holy Iland, where Saint Cuthbert, whom Bede ſo highly extolleth, both ſate as Biſhop, and lay buried: and ſome went about by a devout and religious kind of ſtealth, to tranſport his body over; by occaſion that the winds were againſt them, They laid the ſacred body downe with due honour at Ubbanford, (whether it were an Epiſcopall See or no, it is uncertaine) hard by the river Twede, and there it lay for many yeeres together, untill the com- D ming of K. Etheldred. Of this, and of other things, I had information (for I will never conceale by whom I have found any good) by George Carleton borne here, as who was the Caſtellanes ſonne of this place; whom for that I have loved in regard of his ſingular knowledge in Divinity (which hee profeſſeth) and in other more delightfull literature, and am loved againe of him, I were not worthy I aſſure you of love, if I did not acknowledge thus much. Beneath Norham, at Killey a little village hard by, were found, as I have heard old men ſay, in our grandfathers remembrance, the ornaments or Harniſh of a Knights belt, and the hilt of a ſword of maſſie gold, which were preſented unto Thomas Ruthall then Biſhop of Durham.

William Malmesbury lib. 1. de Geſtis Pontificum In printed books corruptly ye read Bubbeford.

A little lower appeareth the Mouth of Twede; upon the farther ſide whereof ſtan- E deth Berwicke, the utmoſt towne in England, and the ſtrongeſt hold in all Britaine. Which name ſome derive from one Berengarius a Duke, whom they never heard of, unleſſe it were in a dreame. Leland fetcheth it from Aber, which in the Britiſh tongue ſignifieth the mouth of a river, ſo that Aberwic ſhould ſound as much as The towne by the rivers mouth. But he that knowes what Berwic in the Charters of our Kings ſignifieth, wherein nothing is more common than theſe words, I give C. and D. that is, ſuch and ſuch townes, cum ſuis Berwicis, ſurely he muſt needs underſtand the true Etymologie of this Berwicke. For mine owne part I cannot conjecture what it meaneth, unleſſe it be a Village or Hamlet annexed, as it were a parcell of the Demeſne, unto ſome place of greater reckoning. For in the donations of Edward the Confeſ- F ſour, Totthill is called the Berwicke of Weſtminſter, and Wandleſworth the Berwicke of Patricſeie, and a hundred ſuch. But to what end is all this? Surely we doe but loſe this labour, if, as ſome will have it, the name thereof were in old time Beopnica-pic, in Ingulph expoundeth Berwicke a Manour.

A in the Engliſh Saxon tongue, that is, The towne or village of the Bernicians. Now that theſe countries were named Bernicia, it is better knowne than can bee ſaid, and I have already notified as much. But whence ſoever it hath the name, it is ſo ſituate that it ſhooteth farre into the ſea, in ſo much as it is well neere compaſſed about with the ſea, and Twede together; and ſeated betwixt two moſt mighty Kingdomes, as Pliny hath reported of Palmyra in Syria. It was the firſt thing alwayes that both nations tooke care of whenſoever they were at any diſcord: ſo that ſince the time that King Edward the firſt of that name, firſt wreſted it perforce out of the Scots hands, the Scots have oftentimes repoſſeſſed it, and the Engliſhmen as often
B recovered it from them againe. But let us here (if you pleaſe) abridge the Hiſtory thereof. Of this Berwicke I have read nothing of greater antiquity than this, that William King of Scots being taken Priſoner in the field by the Engliſh, delivered it up unto our King Henry the ſecond for his enlargement out of priſon, on this condition, that unleſſe by a certaine day appointed hee payd a ſumme of money for his ranſome, it ſhould belong unto the Crowne of England for ever; and preſently, as it is in the Polychronicon of Durham, the ſaid King Henry fortified it with a Caſtle. Howbeit King Richard the firſt, upon payment of the money releaſed it againe unto the Scotiſh. Afterwards King John, as we read in the hiſtory of Melroſſe, wonne both the towne and Caſtle of Berwick, what time as he with his Rutars burnt Werke, Rox-
C burgh, Mitford and Morpath, yea and laid all Northumberland waſt, becauſe the Barons of Northumberland had done homage at Felton to Alexander King of Scots. Many yeeres after, when John Balioll King of Scots had broken his oath, King Edward the firſt, in the yeere of ſalvation 1297. brought Berwick under his ſubjection: yet within a little while after, when the fortune of warre began to ſmile upon the Scots, they ſurpriſed it ſtanding for-let and neglected, but ſtraightwayes it was yeelded up, and the Engliſh became Maſters of it. Afterward, in that looſe reigne of King Edward the ſecond, Peter Spalding betraied it unto Robert Brus King of the Scots, who hotly aſſaulted it: and the Engliſh laid ſiege unto it in vaine, untill that our Hector, King Edward the third, in the yeere of Chriſt 1333. ſetting valiantly upon it, wonne
D it as happily. Howbeit in the reigne of Richard the ſecond, certaine Scottiſh robbers upon a ſudden ſurpriſed the Caſtle: but within nine dayes Henry Pearcy Earle of Northumberland regained it. Scarce ſeven yeeres were overpaſſed, when the Scots recovered it againe, not by force but by money: For which cauſe, the ſaid Henry Percy, Governour of the place, was accuſed of high treaſon: but he, with money likewiſe corrupted both their faith and fortitude, and ſtreightway got it in his hands againe. A great while after, when England was even pining by reaſon of civill warre, King Henry the ſixth being now fled the Realme into Scotland, ſurrendred it up into the hands of the Scot, for to be ſecured of his life and ſafety in Scotland. But after twenty two yeeres were expired, Sir Thomas Stanley, not without loſſe of his E men, reduced it under the command of King Edward the Fourth. Since which time, our Kings have at divers times fortified and fenced it with new works: but eſpecially Queen Elizabeth, who of late, to the terrour of the enemy, and ſafeguard of her ſtate, encloſed it about in a narrower compaſſe within the old wall, with an high wall of ſtone moſt ſtrangely compacted together; which ſhee hath ſo forewarded againe with a counterſcarſe, a banke round about, with mounts of earth caſt up by mans hand, and open terraces above head, that either the forme of theſe munitions, or ſtrength thereof may juſtly cut off all hope of winning it. To ſay nothing all this while of the valour of the gariſon ſouldiers, the ſtore of great Ordnance and furniture of warre, which was wonderfull. He that was wont to be chiefe Governour of this F towne (that I may note thus much alſo) was alwaies one of the wiſeſt and moſt approved of the Nobility of England, and withall Warden of theſe Eaſt marches againſt Scotland. The Longitude of this towne, as our Mathematicians have obſerved, is 21. degrees and 43. minutes: the Latitude 55. degrees and 48. minutes. And by this inclination and poſition of the heaven, the longeſt day is 17. houres and 22. minutes, and

Britaine hath day plenty.

the night but ſixe houres and 38. minutes: ſo that that there was no untruth in Servius Honoratus, when he wrote thus, Britanni lucis dives, &c. that is, Britain is ſo plentifull of day light, that it affordeth ſcarce any time for the nights. Neither is it any marvaile that ſouldiers without other light doe play here all night long at Dice, conſidering the ſide light that the ſunne beames caſt all night long: and therefore this verſe of Juvenall is true:

Minimâ contentos nocte Britannos.
The Britaines who with leaſt night ſtand content.

Concerning Berwicke, have here now for an Overdeale, theſe verſes of Maſter I. Jonſton.

Afront the bound of Scottiſh ground, where ſtaid the furious broile
Of Engliſh warres; and Nations both were put to equall toile.
Now won, then loſt, a thouſand turnes it felt of fortunes will,
After ſo many miſeries, wonder, it ſtandeth ſtill.
And ſtill it ſtands: although laid waſt it were and deſolate,
Yet alwaies after every fall it roſe to firmer ſtate:
So that for ſtrength beſt fenced townes it matcheth at this day.
The Citizens were ſouldiers all, and ſerv'd in warres for pay.
But after ſervice long performed, and hard adventures paſt,
Of joy and mirth the gladſome ſignes it putteth forth at laſt.
And now her ancient honour ſhe doth vaunt in happy plight,
When to her Soveraigne Lord ſhe yeelds all ſervice due by right.
Whoſe bleſſed Crowne united hath great Britain now at laſt, Whereby her head ſhe lifts on high, ſince quarrels all be paſt.

The Commentary of Pius Secundus, ſet forth in the name of John Gebellin.

That which Æneas Sylvius, or Pope Pius the ſecond, who when hee was a private perſon was Embaſſadour into Scotland about the yeere 1448. hath reported in his owne life, by himſelfe penned, and publiſhed under the name of another, touching the borderers that dwelt there round about, I thinke good here to put downe, conſidering that as yet they have nothing degenerated.

There is a river (ſaith he) which ſpreading broad from out of an high hill, confineth both the lands: This river when Æneas had ferried over, and turned aſide into a great village about ſun ſetting, where he ſupped in a country-mans houſe, with the Prieſt of the place and his hoaſt, many ſorts of gruels and pottage, hens and geeſe, were ſet on the board, but no wine nor bread at all, and all the men & women of the village came running thither, as it were to ſee ſome ſtrange ſight: and as our countreymen are wont to wonder at Blackamores

A Moors, or men of Inde, ſo they ſtood gaſing & gaping, as aſtonied at Æneas, asking of the Prieſt what countreyman he was? upon what buſines he came? and whether he were a Chriſtian or no? Now Æneas having bin enformed before what ſcarcity of victuals he ſhould finde in thoſe parts, had received at a certaine Abbey ſome loaves of white bread, and a rundlet of red wine: which when they had brought forth, the people made a greater wonder than before, as who had never ſeen either wine or white bread. There approached unto the table great bellied women and their husbands, who handling the bread, & ſmelling to the wine, craved ſome part thereof, and there was no remedy but to deale and give all away among them. Now when we had ſitten at ſupper untill it was two houres within night,
B the Prieſt and our Hoaſt, together with the children and all the men, left Æneas, and made haſte away; for they ſaid they were to flye for feare of the Scots unto a certaine pile, that ſtood a great way off: which Scots, at a low water when the tide was paſt, uſed to paſſe over the river, and fall to foot-haling. But they would in no wiſe take Æneas with them, although hee intreated them very inſtantly; no nor any woman, albeit amongſt them there were many both young maids, and wives paſſing faire: For they are perſwaded verily, that the enemies will doe them no hurt, as who reckon whoredome no hurt nor evill at all. So Æneas remaines there alone with two ſervants and his Guide, in company of an hundred women; who ſitting round in a ring, with a good fire in the mids before them, fell to hitchell and dreſſe hemp, ſate up all night without ſleep, and had a great deale of talk with
C his Interpreter. When the night was far ſpent, what with barking of dogs, and gaggling of geeſe, a mighty noiſe and outcry was made: then all the women ſlipped forth divers waies, his Guide alſo made ſhift to be gone, and all was of an hurry, as if the enemies had beene come. But Æneas thought it his beſt courſe to expect the event within his bed-chamber, (and that was a ſtable) for feare leſt if he had runne forth of dores, knowing not the way, he ſhould become a prey and booty to him that ſhould firſt meet him. But ſee, ſtreightwaies the women returned with the Interpreter, bring word all was well, and that they were friends and not enemies were come thither.

There have been in this countrey certaine petty nations, called Scovenburgenſes, and Fisburgingi; but to point out preciſely the very place of their abode, in ſo great Scovenburgenſes. Fisburgenſes.
D obſcurity, paſſeth my skill: Neither can I define whether they were Danes or Engliſh. But Florentius of Worceſter, publiſhed by the right honourable Lord William Howard, writeth, That when there was an aſſembly or Parliament holden at Oxenford, Sigeferth and Morcar, the worthier & mightier miniſters of the Scovenburgenſes, were ſecretly made away by Edrike Streona. Alſo that Prince Edmund againſt his fathers will married Alfrith the wife of Sigefrith, and having made a journey to the Fisburgings, invaded Sigeferth his land, and brought his people in ſubjection to him. But let others inquire farther into theſe matters. 1013.

Clitonem. Prince of Fiſburgings. 1015.

E This region of North-humberland being brought under the Engliſh Saxons dominion by Oſca Hengiſts brother, and by his ſonne Jebuſa, had firſt officiall governors under the fealty of the Kings of Kent. After that, when the kingdome of the Bernicii, whom the Britans call Guir a Brinaich, as it were, Mountainers, was erected; that which reached from Tees to the Scottiſh Frith, was the beſt part thereof, and ſubject to the Kings of North-humberland: who having finiſhed their period, whatſoever lay beyond Twede, became Scottiſh and was counted Scotland; Then Egbert King of the Weſt-Saxons laied it to his owne kingdome, when it was yeelded up to him. Afterwards King Aelfred permitted the Danes to poſſeſſe it, whom Athelſtane ſome few yeeres after diſpoſſeſſed and drave out: yet after this the people ſet up Eil-
F rick the Dane for their king, whom King Ealdred forthwith diſplaced and expelled. From which time forward this countrey had no more Kings over it, but ſuch as governed it were tearmed Earles: Amongſt whom theſe are reckoned up in order ſucceſſively in our Hiſtories, Oſulfe, Oſlake, Edulph, Waldeof the elder, Uchtred, Adulph, Alred, Siward, Toſtie, Edwin, Morcar, Oſculph, and that right valiant Siward, who as he lived in armes, ſo would he dye alſo armed. Then his Earldome and theſe parts were given unto Toſtie the brother of Earle Harold: but the Earldomes of Northampton and Hunting-

Kings, Dukes, and Earles of Northumberland. Bernicii.

Huntingdon, with other lands of his, were aſsigned to the noble Earle Waldeof his ſonne and heire. Theſe words of Ingulphus have I put downe, becauſe ſome deny that hee was Earle of Huntingdon. And now will I adde moreover to the reſt, that which I have read in an old manuſcript memoriall of this matter, in the Librarie of John Stow, a right honeſt Citizen, and diligent Antiquarie of the City of London. Copſo being made Earle of Northumberland by the gift of King William Conquerour, expelled Oſculph, who notwithſtanding within a few daies after ſlew him. Then Oſculph being runne through with a Javelin by a thiefe, ended his life. After this, Goſpatricke purchaſed the Earldome of the Conquerour, who not long after depoſed him from that honour; and then ſucceeded after him Waldeof Siwards ſonne. His fortune was to loſe his head; and in his roome was placed Walcher Biſhop of Durham, who (like as Robert Comin his ſucceſſour) was ſlaine in a tumultuous commotion of the common people. Afterwards Robert Mowbray attained to the ſame honour, which hee ſoone loſt through his owne perfidious treacherie, when he deviſed to deprive King William Rufus of his royall eſtate, and to advance Stephen Earle of Albemarle, a ſonne to the Conquerors ſiſter, thereunto. Then K. Stephen made Henrie, the ſonne of David King of Scotland (as wee read in the Poly Chronicon of Durham) Earle of Northumberland: whoſe ſonne alſo William, that afterwards was King of Scots, writ himſelfe, William de Warrenna Earle of Northumberland: for his mother was deſcended out of the familie of the Earles of Warren, as appeareth out of the booke of Brinkburne Abbey. After ſome few yeeres, King Richard the firſt paſſed away this Earldome for a ſumme of money, unto Hugh Pudſey Biſhop of Durham for tearm of his life, ſcoffing that he had made a young Earle of an old Biſhop. But when the ſaid King was impriſoned by the Emperour in his returne out of the Holy-land, and Hugh for his deliverie had contributed only 2000. pounds of ſilver, which the King took not well at his hands, becauſe he was deemed to have performed but a little, whom hee underſtood to have raiſed and gotten together a huge maſſe of money, under pretence of his ranſome and releaſe, he deveſted and deprived him of his Earldome. After which time the title of the Earledome of Northumberland lay diſcontinued about an hundred and foureſcore yeeres.

Percies deſcended from Charlemaine.

But at this day the family of the Percies enjoyeth the ſame, which family being deſcended from the Earles of Brabant, inherited together with the ſurname of Percie the poſſeſſions alſo of Percie, ever ſince that Joſcelin of Lovaine, younger ſonne of Godfrey Duke of Brabant, the true iſſue of the Emperour Charles the Great by Gerberga, the daughter of Charles, a younger brother to Lothar, the laſt King of France of the line of Charles, tooke to wife Agnes the daughter and ſole heire of William Percie: of which William the great grandfather William Percie, comming into England with King William the Conquerour, was rewarded by him for his ſervice, with lands in Tatcaſter, Linton, Normanby, and other places. Between this Agnes and Joſcelin it was covenanted, that hee ſhould aſſume the name of Percies, and retaine ſtill unto him the ancient Armes of Brabant, viz. A Lion azure (which the Brabanters afterwards changed) in a ſhield Or. The firſt Earle of Northumberland out of this family, was Henrie Percie, begotten of Marie daughter to Henrie Earle of Lancaſter, who being deſcended of ancient bloud, and renowned for his martiall proweſſe, was rewarded alſo by King Edward the third with faire poſſeſſions in Scotland, created Earle of North-humberland by King Richard the ſecond on the day of his Coronation, and much enriched by his ſecond wife Dame Maud Lucie (although by her hee had no iſſue) upon a fine levied unto her, that hee ſhould beare quarterly the Armes of the Lucies with his owne, and lived in great honour, confidence, and favour with King Richard the ſecond. Yet full badly hee requited him againe for all his ſingular good demerits. For in his adverſitie hee forſooke him, and made way for Henrie the fourth to the kingdome, who made him Conſtable of England, and beſtowed upon him the Iſle of Man: againſt whom within a while, hee feeling the corroſive and ſecret pricke of conſcience, for that King Richard

A Richard by his meanes was unjuſtly depoſed, and beſides, taking at the heart indignantly, that Edmund Mortimer Earle of March, the true and undoubted heire of the Kingdome, and his neere ally, was neglected in priſon, hee conceived inward enmity, grievouſly complaining, and charging him with perjury, that whereas hee had ſolemnly ſworne to him, and others that hee would not challenge the Crowne, but onely his owne inheritance; and that King Richard ſhould be governed during his life by the good advice of the Peeres of the realme: he to the contrary had by impriſonment and terror of death enforced him to reſigne his Crown, and uſurped the ſame, by the concurrence of his faction, horribly murthering the ſaid K. and defrau-
B ding Edmund Mortimer Earle of March of his lawfull right to the Crown, whom he had ſuffered to languiſh long in priſon under Owen Glendowr, reputing thoſe traitours who with their owne money had procured his enlargement. After the publication of theſe complaints, he, confident in the promiſes of his confederates, who yet failed him, ſent his brother Thomas Earle of Worceſter, and his courageous ſonne Henry ſurnamed Hot-Spurre, with a power of men againſt the King, who both loſt their lives at the battaile of Shrewesbury. Whereupon he was proclaimed traitour, and attainted; but ſhortly after, by a kind of connivency, received againe into the Kings favour (unto whom he was a terrour) yea and reſtored to all his lands and goods, ſave onely the Iſle of Man, which the King reſumed into his owne hands. Howbeit within
C a while after, being now become popular, and over forward to entertaine new deſignes, and having procured the Scots to bandy and joyne with him in armes, himſelfe in perſon entred with banner diſplayed into the field, againſt the King, as an Uſurper, and on a ſudden at Barrhammore in a tumultuary skirmiſh in the yeere 1408. was diſcomfited and ſlaine by Thomas Rokesby the high Sheriffe of Yorke-ſhire. Eleven yeeres after, Henry, this mans nephew by his ſonne Henry Hot-Spur (whoſe mother was Elizabeth, daughter to Edmund Mortimer the elder, Earle of March, by Philippa the daughter of Leonel Duke of Clarence) was reſtored in bloud and inheritance by authority of Parliament, in the time of King Henry the fifth: which Henry Percie, whiles he ſtoutly maintained King Henry the ſixth his part againſt
D the houſe of Yorke, was ſlaine at the battell of Saint Albans, like as his ſonne Henry, the third Earle of Northumberland, who married Aelenor, the daughter of Richard Lord Poinings, Brian, and Fitz-Pain, in the ſame quarrell loſt his life in the battaile at Towton, in the yeere 1461. The houſe of Lancaſter being now kept under, and downe the wind, and the Percies with it troden under foot, King Edward the fourth made John Nevill, Lord Montacute, Earle of Northumberland: but he after a while ſurrendred this title into the Kings hands, and was created by him Marqueſſe Montacute. After this Henry Percy, the ſonne of Henry Percy aforeſaid, recovering the E favour of King Edward the fourth, obtained reſtitution in bloud, and hereditaments; who in the reigne of Henry the ſeventh was ſlaine by the countrey people, that about a certaine levie of money exacted by an Act of Parliament, roſe up againſt the Collectours and Aſſeſſours thereof. After him ſucceeded Henry Percy, the fifth Earle, whoſe ſonne Henry by a daughter and Coheire of Sir Robert Spenſer, and Eleanor the daughter likewiſe and Coheire of Edmund Beaufort Duke of Somerſet, was the ſixth Earle; who (having no children, and his brother Thomas being executed for taking armes againſt King Henry the eighth, in the firſt difference about Religion) as if now that family had beene at a finall end for ever) prodigally gave away a great part of that moſt goodly inheritance unto the King and others. Some few F yeeres after, Sir John Dudley Earle of Warwick, got to himſelfe the title of Duke of Northumberland, by the name of John Earl of Warwick, Marſhal of England, Vicount Liſle, Baron Somery, Baſſet, and Ties, Lord of Dudley, Great Maſter and Steward of the Kings houſe; when as in the tender age of King Edward the ſixth, the Chieftaines and leaders of the factions ſhared titles of honour among themſelves, their fautors, and followers. This was that Duke of Northumberland, who for the time, like unto a tempeſtuous whirlewind, began to ſhake and teare the publicke peace of the John Harding Manuſcript.

State

ſtate, whiles he with vaſt ambition plotted and practiſed to exclude Mary and Elizabeth the daughters of King Henry the eighth from their lawfull right of ſucceſſion, and to ſet the Emperiall Crowne upon Lady Jane Grey, his daughter in law (being ſeconded therein by the great Lawyers, who are alwaies forward enough to humour and ſooth up thoſe that bee in higheſt place.) For which being attainted of high treaſon, he loſt his head, and at his execution embraced and publikely profeſſed Popery, which long before, either ſeriouſly or colorably for his own advantage, he had renounced. When he was gone, Queene Mary reſtored Thomas Percy, nephew unto Henry the ſixth Earle by his brother Thomas, unto his bloud, and by a new Patent created him firſt Baron Percy, and anon Earle of Northumberland, to himſelfe and the heires males of his body, and for default thereof, to his brother Henry, and his heires males. But this Thomas the ſeventh Earle, for his treaſon to Prince and country, under maske of reſtoring the Romiſh religion againe, loſt both life and dignity in the yeere 1572. Yet through the ſingular favour and bounty of Queen Elizabeth, according to that Patent of Queene Mary, his brother Henry ſucceeded after him, as the eighth Earle; who in the yeere 1585. ended his dayes in priſon, and had for his ſucceſſor Henry his ſonne, by Katherin the eldeſt daughter, and one of the heires of John Nevill, Lord Latimer, the ninth Earle of Northumberland of this family.

SCOTLAND.

NOw am I come to SCOTLAND, and willingly I assure you will I enter into it, but withall lightly passe over it. For I remember well that said saw, In places not well knowne lesse while wee must stay: as also the admonition of that Grecian, ΞΕΝΟΣ ΩΝ ΑΠΡΑΓΜΩΝ ΙΣΘΙ: that is, Art thou a stranger? be no medler. And verily I should play an unadvised part, if I would insist long in that, wherein I am but little conversant. But yet seeing Scotland also joyeth in the name of BRITAIN, let it bee lawfull for me (reserving the due honour to the Scottish) according to my purpose, having boldly undertaken to illustrate BRITAIN, to proceed with their good favour, leave, and licence, and by drawing aside in some sort the curtaine of obscure antiquity, to point out with my finger, if I shall be able, some places of ancient note and memory. Certes, I assure my selfe that I shall bee easily pardoned in this point, the people themselves are so courteous and well meaning, and the happinesse of these daies so rare and admirable, since that by a divine and heavenly oportunity is now fallen into our laps, which we hardly ever hoped, & our Ancestors so often and so earnestly wished: namely, that Britaine, so many ages dis-joined in it selfe and unsociable, should all throughout, like one uniform City, under one most sacred and happy Monarch, the founder of perpetuall peace, by a blessed Union be conjoyned in one entire body. Who being through the propitious goodnesse of Almighty God elected, borne, and preserved to the good of both nations, as he is a Prince of singular wisdome and providence, and fatherly affected to all his subjects, doth so cut off all causes and occasions of feare, of hope, of revenge, complaint, and quarrell; that the dismall DISCORD which hath set these nations (otherwise invincible) so long at debate, might be stifled and crushed for ever; and sweet CONCORD triumph joyously with endlesse comfort, when (as one sometimes sung this tenour) Jam cuncti gens una sumus, that is, Wee all one Nation are this day, whereunto as a Chorus both nations resound, Et simus in ævum, that is, God grant we may be so for aye.

But before my pen commeth to Scotland, thus much I thinke it good to advertise the Reader aforehand, that I leave the first originall of the Scottish nation to their owne Historians: also the primitive derivation of their name to the learned among them, banishing all conjectures whatsoever of others, which either hasty credulity or careless negligence hath forged, as well in the late foregoing age, as in these our dayes. And according to the same order which I kept before in England, I will premise some few lines touching the division of Scotland, the States of the Kingdome, and the Tribunals or Courts of Justice: then will I briefly touch the situations and Commodities of the soile in every severall Region: what places there be of greater fame and name, and what Families more noble and notable than the rest, have most flourished with the title and honour of Earles and Barons of the Parliament, so far forth as hitherto I could find by reading or enquiry: And that so circumspectly, with such an honest desire and sincere affection to truth, that I hope I shall not give offence to the malicious; and with so compendious brevity, that I will not prevent their curious diligence, who are in hand to set out these matters with a fuller pensill, and to polish the same with more lively and lasting colours.

A B C D

THE E F

THE DIVISION OF SCOTLAND.

THe North part of the Iſland of Britaine, was of old time inhabited throughout by the Picts, who were divided into two Nations, the DICALIDONII, and VECTURIONES: of whom I have ſpoken already out of Ammianus Marcellinus. But when the Scots became Lords and Rulers over all this part, it was ſhared into ſeven parts among ſeven Princes, as we finde in a little ancient pamphlet touching the diviſion of Scotland, in theſe words and old name.

The firſt part contained Enegus and Maern.
The ſecond, Atheodl and Goverin.
The third, Stradeern and Meneted.
The fourth was Forthever.
The fift, Mar with Buchen.
The ſixth, Muref and Ros.
The ſeventh Cathanes, which Mound, a mountaine in the midſt divideth, running on forward from the Weſt ſea to the Eaſt.

Then afterwards the ſame Author reporteth, according to the relation of Andrew Biſhop of Cathanes, that the whole Kingdome was divided likewiſe into ſeven territories.

The firſt from Frith, in the Britiſh tongue, called by the Romans Worid, now Scotwade, to the river Tae.
The ſecond to Hilef, according as the ſea fetcheth a compaſſe, to a mountain in the North-eaſt part of Strivelin, named Athran.
The third from Hilef to Dee.
The fourth from Dee to the river Spe.
The fifth from Spe to the mountaine Brunalban.
The ſixth, Mures and Ros.
The ſeventh, the kingdome Argathel, as it were the border and skirt of the Scots: who were ſo called of Gathelgas their Captaine.

Alſo according to the habitation of the people, Scotland is now divided into Highland-men and Lawland-men: Theſe being more civill, uſe the Engliſh language and apparrell: the other, which are rude and unruly, ſpeak Iriſh, and goe apparelled Iriſh-like, as I have already ſaid. Out of this diviſion I exclude the Borderers, becauſe by reaſon of peace ſhining now upon them on every ſide, by a bleſſed and happy Union, they are to bee ranged and reckoned in the very heart and midſt of the Britiſh Empire, as who begin to be weary of wars, and to acquaint themſelves with the delightfull benefits of peace.

Highlandmen.
Lawlandmen.
Borderers.

Moreover, according to the ſituation and poſition of the places, the whole Kingdome is divided into two parts: the South, on this ſide the river Tay, and the North beyond Tay; beſides a number of Iſlands lying round about. In the South part theſe countries are more remarkable than the reſt.

THE STATES OR DEGREES OF SCOTLAND.

C THe Republicke, or Commonwealth of the Scots, like as that of Engliſhmen, conſiſteth of a King, the Nobility or Gentry, and Commons.

The King, that I may uſe the words of their owne Record, is Directus totius Dominus, that is, The direct Lord of the whole Domain, or Dominion, and hath royall authority and juriſdiction over all the States and degrees, as well Eccleſiaſticall as Lay or Temporall.

Next unto the King is his eldeſt ſonne, who is called PRINCE OF SCOTLAND, D and by a peculiar right Duke of Rothſay, and Seneſchall or Steward of Scotland. But all the reſt of the Kings children are named ſimply Princes.

Among the Nobles, the greateſt and moſt honourable were in old time, The Thanes, that is, thoſe who (if my judgement be ought) were ennobled onely by the office which they adminiſtred. For the word in the ancient Engliſh Saxon tongue ſignifieth, The Kings Miniſter. Of theſe, they of the ſuperior place were called Abthanes, the inferior, Under Thanes. But theſe names by little and little grew out of uſe, E ever ſince that King Malcolme the third conferred the titles of Earles and Barons, after the manner received from the Engliſh, upon Noble men of good deſert. Since when, in proceſſe of time new titles of honours were much taken up, and Scotland as well as England, hath had Dukes, Marqueſſes, Earles, Vicounts, and Barons. As for the title of Duke, the firſt that brought it into Scotland was King Robert the third, about the yeere of Salvation 1400. like as the honourable titles of Marqueſſe and Vicount were firſt brought in by our moſt gracious Soveraigne, King James the ſixth. Theſe are counted Nobles of the higher degree, and have both place and voice in the Parliaments, and by a ſpeciall name are called Lords, like as alſo the Biſhops. Thanes. Knights.

Among the Nobles of a lower degree, in the firſt place are ranged Knights, who F verily are dubbed with greater ſolemnity than in any other place throughout all Europe, by taking of an oath, and are proclaimed by the publike voice of an Herald. Lairds. Of a ſecond ſort are they, who are tearmed Lairds and Barons: among whom none were reckoned in old time, but ſuch as held immediatly from the King, lands in Chef, and had jus furcarum, that is, power to hang, &c. In the third place are all ſuch as being deſcended from worſhipfull houſes, and not honoured with any eſpeciall dignitie, be Gentlemen. termed Gentlemen. All the reſt, as Citizens, Merchants, Artiſans, &c. are reputed among the Commons.

THE JUDICATORIES, OR COURTS OF JUSTICE.

Parliament.

THe ſupreme Court, as well for dignitie as authoritie, is accounted the Aſſembly of the States of the Kingdome, which is called by the very ſame name as it is in England, A Parliament: & hath the ſame verie power as abſolute. It conſiſteth of three States, of Lords Spirituall, namely, Biſhops, Abbots, and Priors: and of Lords Temporall, to wit, Dukes, Marqueſſes, Earles, Vicounts, and Barons: and Commiſſioners for Cities & Burghs. Unto whom were adjoined not long ſince for everie Countie alſo two Commiſſioners. It is appointed and ſolemnly called by the King at his pleaſure, at a certain ſet time, before it be holden. When theſe States aboveſaid are aſſembled, and the cauſes of their aſſembly delivered by the King or the Chancellour, the Lords Spirituall chuſe out, apart by themſelves, eight of the Lords Temporall. Semblably, the Lords Temporall make choiſe of as many out of the Lords Spirituall: then the ſame all jointly together nominate 8. of the Commiſſioners for the counties, & as many of the Commiſſioners for the free Burghs regall, which make up in all the number of 32. And then theſe * Lords of the Articles (ſo they are termed) together with the Chancellor, Treaſurer, Keeper of the Privie Seale, Kings Secretarie, &c. do admit or reject everie bill propoſed unto the States, after they have bin firſt imparted unto the King. Being allowed by the whole aſſembly of the States, they are throughly weighed and examined, and ſuch of them as paſſe by the greater number of voices, are exhibited unto the King, who by touching them with his Scepter, pronounceth that hee either ratifieth and approveth them, or diſableth and maketh the ſame voide: But if any thing diſliketh the King, it is razed out before.

* Domini pro articulis.

The Seſſion.

The Second Court, or next unto the Parliament, is the Colledge of Juſtice, or as they call it, The Seſſion, which King James the fifth 1532. inſtituted after the forme of the Parliament of Paris, conſiſting of a Preſident, 14. Senatours, ſeven of the Cleargie, and as many of the Laitie (unto whom was adjoined afterward the Chancellor, who hath the chiefe place, and five other Senatours) three principall Scribes or Clerks, and as many Advocates as the Senatours ſhall thinke good. Theſe ſit and miniſter juſtice, not according to the rigour of law, but with reaſon and equitie, every day (ſave onely on the Lords day and Monday) from the firſt of November to the fifteenth of March; and from Trinitie Sunday unto the Calends of Auguſt. All the ſpace betweene, as being the times of ſowing and harveſt, is vacation and intermiſſion of all ſuites and law matters. They give judgement according to the Parliament Statutes and Municipall Lawes, and where they are defective, they have recourſe to the Imperiall Civill Law.

There are beſides in everie Countie inferiour civill Judicatories or Courts kept, wherein the Sheriffe of the ſhire, or his deputie, decideth the controverſies of the inhabitants, about violent ejections, intruſions, dammages, debts, &c. From which Courts and Judges, in regard of hard and unequall dealing, or elſe of alliance and partialitie, they appeale ſometime to the Seſſion. Theſe Sheriffes are all for the moſt part hereditarie. For the Kings of Scots, like as of England alſo, to oblige more ſurely unto them the better ſort of Gentlemen by their benefits and favours, made in old time theſe Sheriffes hereditarie and perpetuall. But the Engliſh Kings ſoone perceiving the inconveniences thereby enſuing, of purpoſe changed this order, and appointed them from yeere to yeere. There be civill Courts alſo in everie regalitie, holden by their Bailiffes, to whom the Kings have graciouſly granted royalties: as alſo in free Burroughs, by the Magiſtrates thereof.

There are likewiſe Judicatories, which they call Commiſſariats, the higheſt whereof is

A is kept at Edenburgh: in which before foure Judges, actions are pleaded concerning Wills and Teſtaments, the right of Eccleſiaſticall benefices, Tithes, Divorces, and ſuch other Eccleſiaſticall cauſes. In every other ſeverall part almoſt throughout the Kingdome, there ſitteth but one Judge alone in a place about theſe matters.

In criminall cauſes, the Kings chiefe Juſtice holdeth his Court for the moſt part at Edenburgh (which office the Earles of Argile have executed now for ſome yeeres.) And he doth depute two or three Lawyers, who have the hearing and deciding of capitall actions concerning life and death, or of ſuch as inferre loſſe of limbs, or of all goods. In this Court the Defendant is permitted, yea in caſe of high treaſon, B to entertaine a Counſellor or Advocate to pleade his cauſe. Courts of criminall matters.

Moreover, in criminall matters there are ſometimes by vertue of the Kings commiſſion and authoritie, Juſtices appointed for the deciding of this or that particular cauſe.

Alſo the Sheriffes in their territories, and Magiſtrates in ſome Burghs, may ſit in judgement of man-ſlaughter (in caſe the man-ſlayer be taken within 24. houres after the deed committed) and being found guiltie by a Jurie, put him to death. But if that time be once overpaſt, the cauſe is referred and put over to the Kings Juſtice, or his Deputies. The ſame priviledge alſo ſome of the Nobilitie and Gentrie enjoy againſt theeves taken within their owne juriſdictions. There bee likewiſe that have C ſuch Roialties, as that in criminall cauſes they may exerciſe a juriſdiction within their owne limits, and in ſome caſes recall thoſe that dwell within their owne limits and liberties from the Kings Juſtice, howbeit with a caution and proviſo interpoſed, That they judge according to Law.

Thus much briefly have I put downe, as one that hath but ſleightly looked into theſe matters, yet by the information of the judicious Knight, Sir Alexander Hay, his Majeſties Secretarie for that kingdome, who hath therein given me good light. But as touching SCOTLAND, what a noble countrey it is, and what men it breedeth (as ſometimes the Geographer wrote of Britaine) there will within a while more certaine and more evident matter be delivered, ſince that moſt high and mightie Prince hath ſet it D open now for us, which had ſo long time beene ſhut from us. Meane while I will come unto the deſcription of places, the project that I entended eſpecially.

GADENI, or LADENI.

UPon the Ottadini, or Northumberland, bordered as next neighbours the ΓΑΔΕΝΟΙ, that is, GADENI, who alſo by the inverſion or turning of one letter upſide downe, are called in ſome Copies of Ptolomee, LADENI, ſeated in that countrey which lieth betweene the E mouth of the river Twede and Edenburgh Forth: and is at this day divided into many petty Countries: the chiefe whereof are Teiſidale, Tweedale, Merch, and Lothien, in Latine Lodeneium, under which one generall name alone the Writers of the middle time compriſed all the reſt.

TEIFIDALE.

Teiſidale, that is to ſay, the Vale by the river Teiſie, or Teviat, lying F next unto England, among the edges of high craggie hills, is inhabited by a warlike nation, which by reaſon of ſo many encounters in foregoing ages betweene Scottiſh and Engliſh, are alwaies moſt readie for ſervice and ſudden invaſions. The firſt place among theſe that wee meet with, is Jedburgh, a Burrough well inhabited and frequented, ſtanding neere unto the confluence of Teiſie and Jed, whereof it took the name: alſo Mailros, a very ancient Monaſtery, A wherein, at the beginning of our Church, were cloiſtered Monkes of that ancient order and inſtitution, that gave themſelves to prayer, and with their hand-labour earned their living; which holy King David reſtored, and repleniſhed with Ciſtertian Roxburg. Monkes. And more Eaſtward, where Twede and Teiſie joine in one ſtreame, Roſ-burg ſheweth it ſelfe, called alſo Roxburg, and in old time MARCHIDUN, becauſe it was a towne in the Marches; where ſtands a Caſtle, that for naturall ſituation and towred fortifications, was in times paſt exceeding ſtrong. Which being ſurpriſed and held by the Engliſh, whiles James the ſecond King of Scots encircled it with a ſiege, hee was by a peece of a great Ordnance that brake, ſlaine untimely in the B very floure of his youth; a Prince much miſſed and lamented of his Subjects. As for the caſtle, it was yeelded; and being then for the moſt part of it layed even with the ground, is now in a manner quite vaniſhed and not to bee ſeene. The territory ad-joyning, called of it the Sheriſdome of Roxburg, hath one hereditary Sheriffe out of the family of the Douglaſſes, who is uſually called the Sheriffe of Teviot Dale. And now hath Roxburg alſo a Baron, Robert Kerr, through the favour of King James the ſixth, out of the family of the Kerrs, a famous houſe, and ſpred into a number of branches, as any one in that tract: out of which the Fernherſts, and others inured in mar-tiall feats, have been of great name.

Twede aforeſaid runneth through the middeſt of a Dale, taking name of it, reple- C niſhed with ſheepe that beare wooll of great requeſt. A very goodly river this is, which ſpringing more inwardly Eaſtward, after it hath paſſed, as it were, in a ſtreight channell by Drimlar Caſtle, by Peblis a mercate towne, which hath for the Sheriff thereof Baron Zeiſter, like as Selkirk hard by hath another out of the family of Murray of Fallohill, entertaineth Lauder a riveret; at which appeareth Lauder, together with Thirleſtan: where ſtands a very faire houſe of Sir John Mettellan, Maitland late Chancellor of Scotland, whom, for his ſingular wiſdome, King James the ſixth created Baron of Thirleſtan. Then Twede beneath Roxburg, augmented with the river of Teviot reſorting unto him, watereth the Sherifdome of Berwick throughout; a great part whereof is poſſeſſed by the Humes (wherein the chiefe man of that fami- D ly exerciſeth now the juriſdiction of a Sheriffe) and ſo paſſeth under Berwick, the ſtrongeſt towne of Britain (whereof I have ſpoken already) where hee is exceeding full of Salmons, and ſo falleth into the ſea.

MERCHIA, MERCH, or MERS.

MERCH, which is next, and ſo named becauſe it is a march country, lyeth wholly upon the German ſea. In this, firſt Hume Ca-ſtle ſheweth it ſelfe, the ancient poſſeſſion of the Lords of Home, E or Hume, who being deſcended from the family of the Earles of Merch, are growne to be a noble and faire ſpred family: out of which Alexander Hume, who before was the firſt Baron of Earle Hume. Scotland, and Sheriff of Berwick, was of late advanced by James Kelſo. King of great Britaine to the title of Earle Hume. Neere unto which lieth Kelſo, famous ſometime for the monaſtery, which with thirteen others, King David the firſt of that name built out of the ground, for the propagation of Gods glory, but to the great empairing of the Crowne land.

Coldingham. Then is to be ſeene Coldingham, which Bede calleth the City Coldana, and the Ci-Colania. ty of Coludum, haply COLANIA mentioned by Ptolomee, a place conſecrated many F ages ſince unto profeſſed Virgins or Nunnes, whoſe chaſtity is recorded in ancient bookes. For that they, together with Ebba their Prioreſſe, cut off their owne noſes and lips, chooſing rather to preſerve their virginity from the Danes, than their beauty and favour: and yet for all that the Danes burnt their monaſterie, and them with-all. Hard by is Faſt-caſtle, a caſtle of the Lords Humes, ſo called for their firmneſſe

and

A and ſtrength thereof, at the Promontory of the ſaid Saint Ebbe, who being the daughter of Edilfria King of Northumberland, when her Father was taken priſoner, got hold of a boat in Humber, and paſſing along the raging Ocean, landed here in ſafety, became renowned for her ſanctimony, and left her name unto the place. But this Merch is mentioned in the Hiſtoriographers, a great deale more for the Earles thereof, than for any places therein, who for martiall proweſſe were highly renowned, and deſcended from Goſpatricke Earle of Northumberland, whom after he was fled from William Conqueror of England, Malcom Cammor, that is, With the great head, King of Scotland, entertained, enriched him with the caſtle of Dunbar, and honou-
B red with the Earldome of Merch. Whoſe poſterity, beſides other goodly and faire lands in Scotland, held (as appeareth plainly in an old Inquiſition) the Barony of Bengeley in Northumberland, that they ſhould be Inborow and Utborow, betweene England and Scotland. What the meaning ſhould be of theſe tearmes let others gheſſe, what my conjecture is I have ſaid already. In the reigne of King James the firſt, George de Dunbar Earle of Merch by authority of Parliament, for his Fathers rebellion loſt the Propriety and poſſeſsion of the Earledome of Merch, and the Seignorie of Dunbar. And when as hee proved by good evidences and writings brought forth, that his father had beene pardoned for that fault by the Regents of the Kingdome, he was anſwered againe, that it was not in the Regents power to pardon an offence
C againſt the State; and that it was expreſſely provided by the Lawes, that children ſhould undergoe puniſhment for their fathers tranſgreſſions, to the end that being thus heires to their fathers raſhneſſe, as they are to their goods and lands, they ſhould not at any time in the haughty pride of their owne power, plot any treaſon againſt Prince or country. This title of Earle of March, among other honourable titles, was given afterward to Alexander Duke of Albany, and by him forfaited. And in our remembrance, this title of honour was revived againe in Robert, the third brother of Mathew Earle of Lennox, who being of a Biſhop of Cathanes made Earle of Lennox, reſigned up that title ſoone after unto his nephew, then created Duke of Lennox: and he himſelfe in lieu thereof received of the King the name and ſtile of the Earle
D of Merch.

LAUDEN, or LOTHIEN.

LOTHIEN, which is alſo called Lauden, named in times paſt of the Picts, Pictland, ſhooteth out along from Merch unto the Scottiſh ſea, or the Forth, having many hils in it, and little wood; but for fruitfull corn-fields, for courteſie alſo and civility of man-
E ners, commended above all other countries of Scotland. About the yeere of our ſalvation 873. Eadgar King of England (betweene whom and Keneth the third, King of Scots, there was a great knot of alliance againſt the Danes, common enemies to them both) reſigned up his right unto him in this Lothien, as Matthew the * Flo-
F rentine gatherer witneſſeth: and to winne his heart the more unto him, He gave unto him many manſions in the way, wherein both he and his ſucceſſours, in their comming unto the Kings of England, and in returne homeward might be lodged: which unto the time of K. Henry the ſecond continued in the hands of the Kings of Scotland. In this Lothien, the firſt place that offereth it ſelfe unto our ſight upon the ſea ſide is Dunbar, a paſſing ſtrong caſtle in old time, and the ſeat of the Earles of Merch aforeſaid, who thereupon were called Earles of Dunbar. A Peece many a time wonne by Engliſh, and as often recovered by the Scottiſh. But in the yeere 1567. by authority of the States in Parliament it was demoliſhed, becauſe it ſhould not be an hold and place of refuge for rebels. But James King of great Britain conferred the title and honour of Earle of Dunbar upon Sir George Hume, for his approved fidelity, whom he had created before Baron Hume of Barwick, to him, his heires, and aſsignes. ver after it hath runne a ſhort courſe, falleth into the ſea; neere unto the ſpring-head whereof ſtandeth Zeiſter, which hath his Baron out of the family of the Haies Earles of Aroll, who alſo is by inheritance Sheriffe of the little territory of Twedall, or Peblis. By the ſame riveret, ſome few miles higher, is ſeated Hadington or Hadina, in a wide and broad plaine: which towne the Engliſh fortified with a deepe and large ditch, with a mure or rampire alſo without, foure ſquare, and with foure bulwarkes at the corners, and with as many other at the inner wall: and Sir James Wilford, an 1548. Engliſhman valiantly defended it againſt Deſſie the Frenchman, who with ten thouſand French and Dutch together fiercely aſſaulted it, untill that by reaſon of the plague, which grew hot among the garriſon ſouldiers, Henry Earle of Rutland comming with a royall army, raiſed the ſiege, removed the French, and having laid the munitions levell, conducted the Engliſh home. And now of late, King James the ſixth, hath ranged Sir John Ramſey among the Nobles of Scotland, with title and honour of Vicount Hadington, for his faithfull valour, as whoſe RIGHT HAND was the DEFENDER OF PRINCE AND COUNTREY, in that moſt wicked conſpiracy of the Gowries againſt the Kings perſon. Touching this Hadington thus hath Maſter I. Jonſton verſified.

Before it lies a ſpacious plaine, the Tine his ſtreame hard by,
In boſome of that river ſhrill, this towne enclos'd doth lie.
Which having ſuffered grievous ſmart of fire and ſword by turnes, Grones under theſe misfortunes much, and for her loſſes mournes.
But now at length ſelfe-harmes have made it wiſe, and by Gods lore Directed, helpe it hath from heaven, which ſteedeth it much more.

Athelſtanford. Within a little of Hadington ſtandeth Athelſtanford, ſo called of Athelſtane, a chiefe leader of the Engliſh, ſlaine there with his men about the yeere 815. But that he ſhould be that warlike Athelſtane, which was King of the Weſt-Saxons, both the account of the times, and his owne death doe manifeſtly controlle it.

Above the mouth of this Tine, in the very bending of the ſhore, ſtandeth Tantallon Caſtle; from whence Archibald Douglas Earle of Angus, wrought James the fifth, King of Scots, much teene and trouble. Here by retiring backe of the ſhores on both ſides, is roome made for a moſt noble arme of the ſea, and the ſame well furniſhed with Ilands, which by reaſon of many rivers encountring it by the way, and the tides of the ſurging ſea together, ſpreadeth exceeding broad: Ptolomee calleth it BODERIA, Tacitus BODOTRIA, of the depth, as I gueſſe; the Scots The Forth, and Frith; we Edenburgh Frith; others the Freſian ſea, and the Scottiſh ſea, and the Eulogium, Morwiridh. Upon this, after you be paſt Tantallon, are ſeated, firſt, North-Berwick, a famous place ſometime for an houſe there of religious Virgins: and then Dyrlton, which belonged in times paſt to the notable family of the Haliburtons, and now to S. Tho. Ereskin Captain of the guard, whom James K. of great Britain for his happy valour, in preſerving him againſt the traiterous attempts of Gowrye, firſt created Baron of Dirlton, and afterward advanced him to the honourable title of Vicount Felton, making him the firſt Vicount that ever was in Scotland. Againſt theſe places there lyeth in the ſea, not far from the ſhore, the Iland Bas, which riſeth up as it were all one craggy rocke, and the ſame upright and ſteep on every ſide: yet hath it a Block-houſe belonging to it, a fountaine alſo and paſtures: but it is ſo hollowed with the waves working upon it, that it is almoſt pierced thorough. A geese, flocke hither at their times(for,by report,their number is such,that in a cleere day they take away the sunnes light)what a sort of fishes they bring(for as the speech goeth, a hundred garrison souldiers that here lay for defence of the place, fed upon no other meat but the fresh fish that they brought in) what a quantity of sticks and little twigges they get together for the building of their nests,so that by their meanes the inhabitants are abundantly provided of fewell for their fire; what a mighty gaine groweth by their feathers and oyle, the report thereof is so incredible, that no man scarcely would beleeve it, but he that had seene it. Soland Geese, which seeme to be Plinies Picarinæ.

Then as the shore draweth backe Seton sheweth it selfe; which seemeth to have Seton.
B taken that name of the situation by the sea side, and to have imparted the same unto a right noble house of the Setons, branched out of an English family, and from the daughter of King Robert Brus: out of which the Marquesse Huntley, Robert Earle of Wentoun, Alexander Earle of Dunfirmling, advanced to honors by K. James the sixth, are propagated. Earle of Wentoun.

After this the river Eske dischargeth it selfe into this Frith, when it hath runne by Borthwick. Borthwic (which hath Barons surnamed according to that name, and those deriving their pedegree out of Hungary) by Newbottle, that is, The new building, sometimes a Newbottle. faire monasterie, now the Barony of Sir Mark Ker: by Dalkeith, a very pleasant habi- Dalkeith.

Here I must not over-passe in silence this Inscription, which John Napier, a learned man, hath in his Commentaries upon the Apocalyps recorded to have beene here digged up, and which the right learned Knight Sir Peter Young, teacher and trainer of King James the sixth in his youth, hath in this wise, more truely copied forth.

Who this Apollo Granus might bee, and whence hee should have this name, Apollo Granus.
not one, to my knowledge, of our grave Senate of Antiquaries hitherto could ever tell: But if I might be allowed, from out of the lowest bench, to speak what I think,
F I would say that Apollo Granus amongst the Romans, was the same that Ἀπόλλων Ἀκερσεκόμης, that is, Apollo with long haire amongst the Greekes: for Isidor calleth the long haire of the Gothes, Grannos. But here I may seem to wander out of my way, and therefore will returne to it.

Lower yet, and neere unto the Scotish Forth, is seated EDENBUROUGH, which Edenborrow. the Irish Scots call Dun Eaden, that is, the towne Eaden, or Eden Hill, and which no doubt is the very same that Ptolomee named Πτερωτὸν πτέρωμα, that is, The Winged Castle: for Adain in the British tongue signifieth a wing; and Edenborrow a word

(a word compounded out of the Britiſh and Saxon language) is nothing elſe but The Burgh with wings. From Wings therefore wee muſt fetch the reaſon of the name: and fetched it may be, if you thinke good, either from the Companies of Horſemen, which are called Wings, or elſe from thoſe Wings in Architecture, which the great Maſter builders tearme Pteromata, that is, as Vetruvius ſheweth, two Walls ſo riſing up in heigth, as that they reſemble a ſhew of Wings: which, for that a certaine City of Cyprus wanted, it was called in old time (as wee read in the Geographers) Aptera, that is, Without Wings. But if any man beleeve that the name was derived from Ebrauk a Britaine, or from Heth a Pict, good leave have he for me, I will not confront them with this my conjecture. A B

This Citie in regard of the high ſituation, of the holſome aire and plentifull ſoile, and many Noble mens towred houſes built round about it, watered alſo with cleere ſpringing fountaines, reaching from Eaſt to Weſt a mile out in length, and carrying halfe as much in bredth, is worthily counted the chiefe Citie of the whole Kingdome; ſtrongly walled, adorned with houſes as well publike as private, well peopled and frequented, by reaſon of the opportunity from the ſea which the neighbour haven at Leth affordeth. And as it is the ſeat of the Kings, ſo is it the oracle alſo, or cloſet of the Lawes, and the very Palace of Juſtice. For the high Courts of Parliament are here for the moſt part holden, for the enacting or repealing of Lawes: alſo the Seſſion, and the Court of the Kings Juſtice, and of the Commiſſariat, whereof I have ſpoken already, are here ſettled and kept. C

On the Eaſt ſide, hard unto the Monaſtery of Saint Croſſe, or Holy ruide, is the Kings palace, which King David the firſt built: over which, within a Parke ſtored with game, riſeth an hill with two heads, called of Arthur the Britaine, Arthurs Chaire. On the Weſt ſide a moſt ſteepe rocke mounteth up aloft to a ſtately heigth every way, ſave onely where it looketh toward the City: on which is placed a Caſtle with many a towre in it, ſo ſtrong that it is counted impregnable, which the Britans called Caſtle Myned Agned, the Scots, The Maidens Caſtle, and the Virgins Caſtle, of certaine young maidens of the Picts royall blood, who were kept there in old time, and which may ſeeme in truth to have beene that Caſtrum Alatum, or Caſtle with AVVING, aboveſaid. How Edenborrow in the alternative fortune of warres was ſubject one while to the Scots, and another while to the Engliſh, who inhabited this Eaſt part of Scotland, untill it became wholly under the Scots dominion, about the yeere of our ſalvation 960. what time the Engliſh Empire, ſore ſhaken with the Daniſh wars, lay as it were gaſping and dying.

How alſo, as an old booke Of the diviſion of Scotland, in the Library of the right honourable Lord Burghley late high Treaſurer of England, ſheweth: Whiles Indulph reigned, the town of Eden was voided and abandoned to the Scots unto this preſent day, as what variable changes of reciprocall fortune it hath felt from time to time, the Hiſtoriographers doe relate, and out of them ye are to be enformed. Under the rising of an hill, Westward there shoots one way
A castle high; on th'other side the Kings house gorgeous gay.
Betweene them both the citie stands, tall buildings shew it well,
For armes, for courage much renown'd, much people therein dwell.
The Scots head citie large and faire, the kingdomes greatest part,
B Nay, even the nations kingdome whole well neere, by just desart.
Rare arts and riches: what ones minde can wish is therein found,
Or else it will not gotten be throughout all Scottish ground.
A civill people here a man may see, a Senate grave, Gods holy lawes with purest light of Preachers here ye have.
In parts remote of Northren clime would any person weene,
That ever these, or such like things might possibly be seene?
Say Travailer, now after that thou forraine towne hast knowne, Beholding this, beleevest thou these eyes that are thine owne?

C A mile from hence lyeth Leth, a most commodious haven, hard upon the river Leth, which when Dessey the Frenchman for the securitie of Edenborrow had fortified, by reason of manie men repairing thither, within a short time from a meane village it grew to be a bigge towne. Againe, when Francis the second, King of France, had taken to wife Marie the Queene of Scots, the Frenchmen, who in hope and conceit had already devoured Scotland, and began now to gape for England, in the yeere 1560. strengthened it with more fortifications. But Elizabeth Queene of England, solicited by the Nobles of Scotland that embraced the reformed religion to side with them, by her puissance and wisdome effected, that both they returned into France, and these their fortifications were laied levell with the ground, and Scotland ever D since hath been freed from the French. Lyth.

Where this Forth groweth more and more narrow, it had in the middest of it the citie Caer-Guidi, as Bede noteth, which now may seeme to be the Island named Inch-Keith. Whether this were that VICTORIA which Ptolomee mentioneth, I will not stand to prove: although a man may beleeve, that the Romans turned this Guidh into Victoria, as well as the Isle Guith or Wight into Victesis or Vecta: certes, seeing both these Islands bee dissevered from the shore, the same reason of the name will hold well in both languages. For Ninius hath taught us, that Guith in the British tongue betokeneth a separation. More within, upon the same Forth is situate Abercorn, in Bedes time a famous Monasterie, which now by the gracious favour of Caer Guidi.

E King James the sixth, giveth unto James Hamilton the title of the Earle of Abercorn: And fast beside it standeth Blackneſſe Castle; and beneath it Southward, the ancient citie LINDUM, whereof Ptolomee maketh mention: which the better learned as yet call Linlithquo, commonly Lithquo, beautified and set out with a verie faire house of the Kings, a goodly Church, and a fishfull lake; of which lake it may seeme to have assumed that name: for Lin, as I have already shewed, in the British tongue soundeth as much as a Lake. A Sheriffe it had in times past by inheritance out of the family of the Hamiltons of Peyle: and now in our dayes it hath for the first Earle, Sir Alexander Levingston, whom King James the sixth raised from the dignitie of a Baron, wherein his Ancestours had flourished a long time, to the honour of an Earle: like as F within a while after he promoted Mark Ker, Baron of Newbottle aforesaid, to the title of Earle of Lothien. B

Liddeſdale. In Lideſdale there riſeth aloft Armitage, ſo called, becauſe it was in times paſt dedicated to a ſolitarie life; now it is a very ſtrong Caſtle, which belonged to the Hepburnes Earles of Bothwell. Hepburns, who draw their originall from a certaine Engliſhman a priſoner, whom the Earle of March, for delivering him out of a danger, greatly enriched. Theſe were Earles of Bothwell, and a long time by the right of inheritance Admirals of Scotland. But by a ſiſter of James Earle of Bothwel, the laſt of the Hepburns, married unto John Prior of Coldingham, baſe ſonne to King James the fifth (who begat too too many baſtards) the title and inheritance both came unto his ſon. Hard by is Brankenſey, the habitation of the warlike family of Baclugh, ſurnamed Scot; beſide many little piles or forts of militarie men everie where. In Euſdale, I would deeme by the affinitie of the name, that old UZELLUM, mentioned by Ptolomee, ſtood by the river Euſe. C

ANNANDALE.

Annandale. UNto this on the Weſt ſide adjoyneth ANNANDALE, that is, The vale by the river Annan; into which the acceſſe by land is very difficult. The places of greater note herein are theſe: a caſtle by Lough-Maban, three parts whereof are environed with water, and ſtrongly walled; and the towne Annandale, at the very mouth almoſt of the river Annan: which loſt all the glorie and beautie it had, by the Engliſh warre in the reigne of Edward the ſixth. E

Lough Maban.

The Jonſtons. In this territorie, the Jonſtons are men of greateſt name; a kinred even bred to warre: betweene whom and the Maxwels there hath beene profeſſed an open enmitie over long, even to deadly feud and blood-ſhed: which Maxwels by right from their anceſtours, have the rule of this Seneſchalſie, for ſo it is accounted. This vale Eadgar King of Scots, after hee was reſtored to his kingdome by auxiliarie forces out of England, gave in conſideration and reward of good ſervice, unto Robert Bruſe or Brus Lord of Cliveland in Yorke-ſhire; who with the good favour of the King beſtowed it upon Robert his younger ſonne, when himſelfe would not ſerve the King of Scots in his warres. From him flowered the Bruſes Lords of Annandale, of whom Robert Brus married Iſabel, the daughter of William King of Scots by the daughter of Robert Avenall: his ſonne likewiſe, Robert the third of that name, wedded the daughter of David Earle of Huntingtron and of Garioth: whoſe ſonne Robert, ſurnamed The Noble, when the iſſue of Alexander the third King of Scots failed, challenged in his mothers right the Kingdome of Scotland, before

The Stewartie of Annandale.

The Bruſes. F

A before Edward the first King of England, (as the direct and superiour Lord of the Kingdome of Scotland (so the English give it out) or, an honourable Arbitratour (for so say the Scots) as being neerer in proximitie, in degree and blood, to King Alexander the third and Margaret, daughter to the King of Norway, although hee were the sonne by a second sister: who soon after resigning up his own right, granted and gave over to his son Robert Brus Earle of Carrick, and to his heires (I speak out of the verie originall) all the right and claime, which he had or might have to the Kingdome of Scotland. But the action and suit went with John Balliol, who sued for his right, as descended of the eldest sister, although in a degree farther off: and sentence was given in these words,
B For that the person more remote in the second degree descending in the first line, is to bee preferred before a neerer in a second line, in the succession of an inheritance that cannot be parted. Howbeit, the said Robert, sonne to the Earle of Carrick, by his own vertue at length recovered the Kingdome unto himself, and established it to his posteritie. A Prince, who as he flourished notably in regard of the glorious ornaments of his noble acts, so he triumphed as happily with invincible fortitude and courage, over fortune that so often crossed him.

NIDISDALL.

C CLose unto Annandale on the West side lyeth NIDISDALE, sufficiently furnished with corne-fields and pastures; so named of the river Nid, which in Ptolomee is wrongly written NOBIUS, for NODIUS or NIDIUS: of which name there bee other rivers in Britaine, full of shallow foords and muddie shelves, like as this Nid is also. It springeth out of the Lake Logh-Cure, by which flourished CORDA, a towne of the Selgovæ. He taketh his course first by Sanghuer a Castle of the Creightons, who a long time kept a great port, as enjoying the dignitie of the Barons of Sanghuer, and the authoritie besides of hereD ditarie Sheriffes of Nidisdale: then by Morton, which gave title of Earle to some of the family of Douglas: out of which others of that surname have their mansion and abiding at Drumlanrig, by the same river: neere unto the mouth whereof standeth Dunfreys betweene two hills, the most flourishing towne of this tract: which hath to shew also an old Castle in it, famous for making of woollen clothes, and remarkable for the murder of John Commin, the mightiest man for manred and retinew in all Scotland; whom Robert Brus, for feare he should foreclose his way to the kingdome, ranne quite through with his sword in the Church, and soon obtained his pardon from E the Pope, for committing that murder in a sacred place. Neerer unto the mouth, Solway, a little village retaineth still somewhat of the old name of Selgovæ. Upon the verie mouth is situate Caer Laverock, which Ptolomee I suppose called CARBANTORIGUM, accounted an imprenable fort, when King Edward the first, accompanied with the floure of English Nobilitie, besieged and hardly wonne it: but now it is a weake dwelling house of the Barons of Maxwell, who being men of an ancient and noble linage, were a long time Wardens of these West marches, and of late advanced by marriage with the daughter one of the heires of the Earle of Morton; whereby John Lord Maxwell was declared Earle of Morton: as also by the daughter and heire of Hereis Lord Toricles, whom I. a younger sonne took to wife, and obtaiF ned by her the title of Baron Hereis. Moreover, in this vale by the Lake side lyeth Glencarn, whence the Cunninghams, of whom I am to write more in place convenient, bare a long time the title of Earle.

with ſpeares hunt Salmons, whereof there is abundance. What manner of cattaile-ſtealers theſe be, that inhabite theſe vales in the marches of both kingdomes, John Leſley, himſelfe a Scottiſh man, and Biſhop of Roſſe, will tell you in theſe words. They go forth in the night by troops out of their own borders, through deſart by-waies, and many winding crankes. All the day time they refreſh their horſes, and recreate their owne ſtrength in lurking places appointed before hand, untill they be come thither at length, in the dark night, where they would be. When they have laid hold of a bootie, back again they returne home likewiſe by night, through blinde waies onely, and fetching many a compaſſe about. The more skilfull any leader or guide is, to paſſe through thoſe wild deſarts, crooked turnings, and ſleep downe-falls, in the thickeſt miſts and deepeſt darkneſſe, hee is held in greater reputation, as one of an excelling wit. And ſo craftie and wily theſe are, that ſeldome or never they forgo their bootie, and ſuffer it to be taken out of their hands, unleſſe it happen otherwhiles that they be caught by their adverſaries following continually after, and tracing them directly by their footing, according as quick-ſenting Slugh-hounds doe lead them. But ſay they be taken, ſo faire ſpoken they are and eloquent, ſo manie ſugred words they have at will, ſweetly to plead for them, that they are able to move the Judges and adverſaries both, be they never ſo auſtere and ſevere, if not to mercie, yet to admiration, and ſome commiſeration withall.

NOVANTES, GALLOWAY.

FRom Nidiſdale as you goe on Weſtward, the NOVANTES inhabited in the vales, all that tract which runneth out far and wide toward the Weſt, between the ſea and Dunbritain Frith, or Clydſforth: yet ſo indented and hollowed with nookes and creekes, that here and there it is drawne into a narrow roome: and then againe in the verie utmoſt skirt it openeth and ſpreadeth it ſelfe broad at more libertie: whereupon ſome have called it the CHERSOMESUS, that is, The Biland of the NOVANTES. But at this day their countrey containeth Galloway, Carick, Kyle, and Cunningham.

Galloway.

Galloway, in the Latine Writers of the middle time Gaelwallia and Gallovidia, ſo called of the Iriſh, who in times paſt dwelt there, and terme themſelves ſhort in their owne language Gael, is a countrey riſing up everie where with hills, that are better for feeding of cattell than bearing of corne: the inhabitants practiſe fiſhing, as well within the ſea lying round about them, as in little rivers, and the Loches or meeres in everie place ſtanding full of water at the foot of the hills: out of which in September they take in Weeles and Weere-nets, an incredible number of moſt ſweet and ſavourie eeles, whereby they make no leſſe gain than others do by their little nagges, which for being well limmed, faſt knit, and ſtrongly made for to endure travaile, are much in requeſt and bought from hence. Among theſe, the firſt place that offereth it ſelfe by the river DEA, mentioned in Ptolomee, which keeping the name ſtill full and whole, they call Dee, is Kircoubright, the moſt commodious port of this coaſt, & the ſecond Stewartie of Scotland, which belongeth alſo to the Maxwels: then Cardines, a fort ſet upon a craggie and high rocke by the river Fleet, and fenſed with ſtrong walls. Neere unto it the river Ken, corruptly read in Ptolomee IENA, runneth into the ſea: after it is Wigton, an haven towne with a narrow entrance unto it, between the two rivers, Bluidnoo and Crea, which alſo is counted a Sheriffdome, over which Agnew is Sheriffe. In times paſt it had for Earle Archibald Douglaſſe, renowned in the French warre, and at this day, by the favour of King James the ſixth, John Lord Fleming, who deriveth his pedegree from the ancient Earles of Wigton.

In this place Ninia or Ninian the Britan, an holy man, the firſt that inſtructed the South-Picts in Chriſtian faith, in the reigne of the Emperour Theodoſius the younger, had his ſeat, and built a Church conſecrated to the memorie of Saint Martin, after a manner unuſuall among the Britans, as Bede ſaith, who wrote that the Engliſh in his time held this country, and when the number of the faithfull Chriſtians multiplied, an Epiſcopall See was erected at this Candida Caſa. A little higher there is a Bi-land B having the ſea inſinuating it ſelfe on both ſides with two Bayes, that by a narrow neck it is adjoined to the firme land: and this is properly called CHERSONESUS, and PROMONTORIUM NOVANTUM, commonly, the Mull of Galloway.

Beyond this Northward, there is a Bay taking a great compaſſe, and full of Ilands, into which very many rivers on everie ſide doe out-lade themſelves. But firſt of all, from the verie cape or top of the Promontarie is ABRAVANUS, which being ſet a little out of his own place, is ſo called of Ptolomee, for Aber-Ruanus, that is, The mouth of Ruan. For at this day that river is named Rian, and the lake out of which it floweth, Logh-Rian, exceeding full of Herrings and Stone-fiſhes.

As for Uchtred, Gilbert his younger brother tooke him priſoner in battaile, and when hee had cut out his tongue, and plucked his eyes forth of his head, he cruelly bereaved him both of life and inheritance. But within ſome few yeeres, when Gilbert was dead, Uchtreds ſonne recovered his fathers inheritance, who of a ſiſter of William Morvill Conſtable of Scotland, begat Alan Lord of Galloway, and Conſtable of Scotland: Conſtables of

But theſe Engliſhmen ſoone loſt their inheritance in Scotland, as alſo the dignitie of Conſtable: which the Commins Earles of Bucquan, deſcended likewiſe from a daughter of Roger Quincie, obtained, untill it was tranſlated unto the Earls of Arroll. with freſh paſtures; ſupplyed both by land and ſea with commodities abundantly. In this province Ptolomee placed RERIGONIUM a Creeke, and RERIGONIUM a Towne. For which F BERIGONIUM is read in a verie ancient copie of Ptolomee, printed at Rome in the yeere 1480. ſo that wee cannot but verily thinke it was that which now is called Bargeney. A Lord it hath out of the family of the Kennedies, which came forth of Ireland in the reigne of Robert Brus, and is in this tract of high birth, ſpread into many branches, and of great power. The chiefe of which linage is Earle of Caſsile: for this is the name of a Caſtle wherein he dwelleth by the river Dun: upon the banke whereof he hath alſo another Caſtle, named Dunmur: and he is the hereditarie Bailiffe of this Countrey. A For this Carrict, together with Kyle and Cunningham, are counted the three Bailleries of Scotland, becauſe they that governe theſe with an ordinarie power and juriſdiction are called Ballives, by a tearme that came up in the middle times, and among the Greeks, Sicilians, and Frenchmen ſignifieth a Conſervatour or Protector. But in the age aforegoing Carrict had Earles: for, to ſay nothing of Gilberts of Galloway, ſonne unto whom King William gave all Carrict to bee poſſeſſed for ever, wee read that Adam of Kilconath was about the yeere 1270. Earle of Carrict, and died ſerving in the Holy-land: whoſe onely daughter Martha fell extremely in love with Robert Brus, a beautifull young Gentleman, as ſhe ſaw him hunting, and thereupon B made him her husband, advanced him with the title of Earle, and with poſſeſſions: unto whom ſhe bare Robert Brus, that moſt renowned King of Scots, from whom the royall line of the Kings is deſcended. But the title of the Earle of Carrict being left for a time to the younger ſonnes of the family of Brus, afterwards among other honours encreaſed the ſtile of the Princes of Scotland.

KYLE.

MOre inward from Clids-forth followeth KYLE, plentifull in all C things, and as well inhabited. In Bedes Auctarium it is called Campus Cyel, that is, The Field Cyel, and Coil: where it is recorded, That Eadbert King of Northumberland annexed this with other territories unto his owne Kingdome. In Ptolomees time there was known a place here named VIDOGARA, haply Aire, which is a Sherifdome, hath a townlet alſo of merchandiſe, and a well known port by a little river of the ſame name. Touching which I can thinke of no better thing to write, than theſe verſes ſent unto mee from Maſter John Jonſtoun.

Anno 750.

ÆRA, ſive ÆRIA. D

Parva urbs, aſt ingens animus in fortibus hæret,
Inferior nulli nobilitate virûm.
Aeris è campis hauſit puriſsima cœlum,
Incubat & miti mollior aura ſolo.
Aeria hinc, non Æra priùs credo illa vocata eſt,
Cum duris quid enim mollia juris habent?
Infera cum ſuperis quod ſi componere fas eſt,
Aurea fors dici debuit illa priùs.

A City ſmall, but yet great mindes in valiant bodies reſt,
For nobleneſſe of Gentlemen matching the very beſt.
Out of the fields what aire it drawes is right pure, freſh, and kinde,
The ſoile is milde, and upon it there breathes a gentle winde.
Hence I ſuppoſe AERIA firſt, not Æra call'd it was,
For what have elements to doe with matters hard as braſſe?
But to compare low things with high if that I may be bold,
Then haply well it ſhould have beene nam'd AUREA of old.

Beſides the river Aire there be other two riverets that water this little territorie, F having many villages ſcattering along their bankes: namely, Longar, neere unto which the Caufords, and Ceſnocke, by which the Cambels, families (in this tract) of good worſhip, dwell: upon the banke whereof ſtandeth Achiltre caſtle, the ſeat of the Stewarts that are of the blood royall, as who iſſued from the Dukes of Albanie;

and

A and thereupon are the Barons of Uchiltrey, out of which house was that noble Robert Stewart, who kept continually with the Prince of Condie, as an inseparable companion, and was with him slain in France in battaile. The government of Kyle belongeth by an heritable right to the Cambells of Louden, as Bailiffe thereof.

CUNNINGHAM.

B CUNNINGHAM adjoyning to Kyle on the East side and the North, butteth upon the same Forth so close, that it restraineth the breadth thereof, which hitherto lay out and spread at large. The name, if one interpret it, is as much as the Kings Habitation: by which a man may ghesse how commodious and pleasant it is. This territorie is watered with Irwin, that divideth it from Kyle: at the spring-head well neere whereof, Kilmarnock sheweth it selfe, the dwelling place of the Barons Boids: of whom in the reigne of James the first, Thomas, by a prosperous gale of Court favour, was advanced to the authoritie of Regent or Vice-Roy, Robert his sonne to the dignitie of Earle of Arran, and marriage with the Kings sister. But soone after, when the said gale came about, and C blew contrarie, they were judged enemies to the State: Robert also had his wife taken from him, and given unto James Hamilton; their goods were confiscate, fortune made a game of them, and when they had lost all they died in exile. Howbeit their posteritie recovered the ancient honour of Barons, and honorably enjoy it at this day. At the mouth of the river Irwin, standeth Irwin a Burrough, with an haven so barred up with shelves of sand, and so shallow withall, that it can beare none other vessels but small barkes and boates: Ardrossan also, a pile belonging to the Montgomeries, more above standeth higher over the Creeke: this is a verie ancient and famous familiy as any other, who have to shew for witnesse of their warlike prowesse, Poununy, a fort built with the ransome mony of Sir Henrie Percie, surnamed Hot-Spur, whom D I. Montgomerie with his owne hand tooke prisoner in the battaile at Otterburne, and led away captive. Not farre from Ardrossan is Largis, embrued with the blood of the Norwegians by King Alexander the third. From whence, as you follow the shore bending and giving in, you meet with Eglington, a faire castle, which was the possession of certaine Gentlemen highly descended of the same surname: from whom it came by marriage unto the Montgomeries, who thereby received the title of Earles of Eglington. But whence the said surname should come, a man can hardly tell: this I know, that out of Normandie it came into England, and that divers families there were of the same name: but that in Essex, from which Sir Thomas Montgomerie, Knight of the order of the Garter, descended, in the reigne of Edward the fourth E gave Armes a little different from these.

Montgomeries Earles of Eglington.

This noble linage is faire and farre spread, and out of those of Gevan was that Gabriel de Lorges, called Earl of Montgomerie, Captain of the guard of Scots (which Charles the fifth King of France instituted for defence of his owne person, and his successors, in testimonie of their fidelitie, and his love toward them) who in running at tilt slew Henrie the second King of France, by occasion that a broken splint of his speare, where the helmet chanced to be open, entred at his eye, and pierced into his brain; and afterwards in that civill war, wherein all France was in a broile, whiles he took part with the Protestants, he was apprehended and beheaded. But the Cunninghams in this tract are counted to be the greater and more numerous family, the chiefe F whereof, enjoying the honour of Earle of Glencarn, dwelleth at Kilmaurus, and fetcheth his descent out of England, and from an English Gentleman, who, together with other, killed Thomas Archbishop of Canterburie. How true this is I know not, but they ground it haply upon a probable conjecture, taken from an Archbishops pall, which the Cunninghams give in their coat of Armes.

ISLE GLOTTA, OR ARRAN.

WIthin the ſight of Cunningham, among ſundry other Ilands, GLOTA, the Iſle mentioned by Antonine the Emperour, beareth up his head, in the very Forth and ſalt water of the river Glota, or Cluyd, called at this day Arran, of a caſtle bearing the ſame name. Inwardly it mounteth up altogether with high riſing hills, at the bottome and foot whereof, along the ſhore it is well inhabited. The firſt Earle hereof, that I can read of, was Robert Boide, whoſe wife and Earldome together, when Boide was baniſhed the realme, James L. Hamilton, as I ſaid erewhile, obtained, and his poſteritie enjoyed the ſame Earldome, ſaving that of late Sir James Steward, appointed guardian to James Hamilton Earle of Arran, when hee was ſo defective in underſtanding that he could not manage his eſtate, tooke this title in the right of being guardian.

C

Neere unto this ſtandeth Buthe, ſo called of a little religious Cell which Brendanus founded (for ſo is a little Cell tearmed in the Scottiſh tongue.) In this Iland is Rothſay Caſtle, which giveth the title of Dukedome unto the King of Scots eldeſt ſonne, who is borne Prince of Scotland, Duke of Rothſay, and Seneſchall of Scotland, ſince time that King Robert the third inveſted Robert his eldeſt ſonne Duke of Rothſay, the firſt in Scotland that ever was created Duke. With which title alſo Queene Marie honoured Henrie Lord Darly before ſhe tooke him to be her husband. Then ſhew themſelves Hellan, ſometimes called Hellan Leneow, that is, as John Fordon interpreteth it, The Saints Ilands, and Hellan Tinoc, that is, The Swines Iland, with a great number of other Ilands of leſſe note and reckoning in the ſame Forth.

DAMNII, CLUYDSDALE, &c.

BEyond the NOVANTES, more inward, by the river Glotta or Cluyd, and farther ſtill even to the verie Eaſt ſea, dwelt in times paſt the DAMNII, in thoſe countries, if I have any judgement, (for in things ſo farre remote from our remembrance, and in ſo thick a miſt of obſcuritie, who can ſpeake of certaintie?) which are now callled Cluydsdale, the Baronie of Renfraw, Lennox, Strivelinſhire, Menteth, and Fife.

Neere unto the head of Cluyd in Crawford Moore, among the wilde waſts, certaine husbandmen of the countrey, after great ſtore of violent raine, happened to finde certaine ſmall peeces like ſcrapings of gold, which have this long time given great hope of much riches, but moſt of all in our dayes, ſince that Sir Beamis Bulmer undertooke with great endevour to finde out here a Mine of gold. Certes there is Azur gotten forth everie day, without any paines in manner at all. Now the Caſtle of Crawford, together with the title of the Earle of Crawford, was by Robert the ſecond, King of Scots, given unto Sir James Lindeſey, who by a ſingle combate performed with Baron Welles an Engliſhman, won high commendation for his valour. Theſe Lindeſeyes have deſerved paſſing well of their country, and are of ancient nobilitie, ever ſince that Sir William Lindeſey married one of the heires of William of Lancaſter Lord of Kandale in England, whoſe neice in the third degree of lineall deſcent, was married into the moſt honourable family of Coucy in France.

A France. Cluyd, after hee hath from his ſpring head with much ſtruggling got out Northward by Baron Somervils houſe, receiveth unto him from out of the Weſt the river Duglaſſe or Douglaſſe, ſo called of a blackiſh or greeniſh water that it hath: which river communicateth his name both to the vale through which hee runneth, called Douglaſdale, and alſo to Douglaſſe caſtle therein: which name that caſtle likewiſe hath imparted unto the family of the Douglaſſes. Which I aſſure you is very ancient, but moſt famous ever ſince that Sir James Douglaſſe ſtucke verie cloſe at all times as a moſt faſt friend unto King Robert Brus, and was readie alwaies with ſingular courage, reſolution, and wiſdome, to aſſiſt him, claiming the kingdome in moſt B troubleſome and dangerous times: and whom the ſaid King Robert charged at his death to carrie his heart to Jeruſalem, that hee might bee diſcharged of his vow made to goe to the Holy-land. In memoriall whereof the Douglaſſes have inſerted in their Coat of Armes a mans heart. From which time this family grew up to that power and greatneſſe, and namely, after that King David the ſecond had created William Earle of Douglaſſe, that they after a ſort awed the Kings themſelves. For at one time well neere there were ſixe Earles of them, namely, of this Douglaſſe, of Angus, of Ormund, of Wigton, of Murray, and of Morton: among whom, the Earle of Wigton, through his martiall proweſſe and deſert, obtained at the hands of Charles the ſeventh king of France, the title of Duke of Tourain, and left the ſame to two Earles C of Douglaſſe his heires after him.

Baronie Somervils. Douglaſſe.

Above the confluence of Douglaſſe and Cluyd is Lanric, the hereditarie Sheriffdom of the Hamiltons, who for their name are beholden unto Hamilton caſtle, which ſtandeth ſomewhat higher upon Cluyds banke, in a fruitfull and paſſing pleaſant place; but they referre their originall, as they have a tradition, to a certaine Engliſhman ſurnamed Hampton, who having taken part with Robert Brus, received from him faire lands in this tract. Much increaſe of their wealth and eſtate came by the bounteous hand of King James the third, who beſtowed in marriage upon Sir James Hamilton his own eldeſt ſiſter, whom he had taken perforce from the Lord Boide her husband, together with the Earledome of Arran; but of honours and dignities by the States D of the kingdome, who after the death of King James the fifth, ordained James Hamilton grandſonne to the former James, Regent of Scotland, whom Henrie alſo the ſecond, King of France, advanced to be Duke of Chaſteau Herald in Poitou: as alſo by King James the ſixth, who honoured his ſon John with the title of Marqueſſe of Hamilton, which honourable title was then firſt brought into Scotland.

The river Glotta or Cluyd runneth from Hamilton by Bothwell, which glorieth in the Earles thereof, namely, John Ramſey, whoſe greatneſſe with King James the third was exceſſive, but pernicious both to himſelfe and the King: and the Hepburns, E whom I have already ſpoken of, & ſo ſtreight forward with a readie ſtream through Glaſcow, in ancient times paſt a Biſhops ſeat: but diſcontinued a great while, untill that King William reſtored it up againe: but now it is an Archbiſhops See, and an Univerſitie, which Biſhop Turnbull, after hee had in a pious and religious intent built a colledge in the yeere 1554. firſt founded. This Glaſcow is the moſt famous town of merchandiſe in this tract: for pleaſant ſite, and apple trees, and other like fruit trees much commended, having alſo a verie faire bridge ſupported with eight arches. Of which towne I. Jonſtoun thus verſified.

LENNOX.

D
ALong the other banke of Cluyd above Glaſcow, runneth forth Le- vinia or LENNOX Northward, among a number of hills cloſe couched one by another, having that name of the river Levin, which Ptolomee calleth LELANONIUS, and runneth into Cluyd out of Logh Lomund, which ſpreadeth it ſelfe here under the mountaines twenty miles long and eight miles broad, paſſing well ſtored with varietie of fiſh: but moſt eſpecially with a peculiar fiſh that is to be found no where elſe (they call it Pollac) as alſo with Ilands, concerning which manie fables have beene forged, and thoſe riſe among the common people. E
As touching an Iland here that floateth and waveth too and fro, I liſt not to make queſtion thereof. For what ſhould let, but that a lighter bodie, and ſpongeous with-all in manner of a pumice ſtone, may ſwimme above the water? and Plinie writeth, how in the Lake Vadimon there be Ilands full of graſſe, and covered over with ruſhes and reeds, that float up and downe. But I leave it unto them that dwell neerer unto this place, and better know the nature of this Lake, whether this old Diſtichon of our Necham be true or no:

Ditatur fluviis Albania, ſaxea ligna
Dat Lomund multa frigiditate potens. F
With rivers Scotland is enrich'd, and Lomund there a Lake
So cold of nature is, that ſtickes it quickly ſtones doth make.

Round about the edge of this Lake there bee fiſhers cottages, but nothing elſe memorable, unleſſe it be Kilmoronoc, a proper fine houſe of the Earles of Caſsiles on
the

A the East side of it, which hath a most pleasant prospect into the said Lake. But at the confluence where Levin emptieth it selfe out of the Lake into Cluyd, standeth the old Citie called Al-Cluyd. Bede noteth that it signified (in whose language I know not) as much as The rocke Cluyd. True it is, that Ar-Cluyd signifieth in the British tongue, upon Cluyd, or upon the rocke; and Cluyd in ancient English sounded the same that a Rocke. The succeeding posteritie called this place Dunbritton, that is, The Britans towne (and corruptly by a certaine transposition of letters, Dunbarton) because the Britans held it longest against the Scots, Picts, and Saxons. For it is the strongest of all the castles in Scotland by naturall situ-
B ation, towring up on a rough, craggie, and two-headed rocke, at the verie meeting of the rivers in a greene plaine. In one of the tops or heads above said, there standeth up a loftie watch-tower or Keep: on the other, which is the lower, there are sundrie strong bulwarks. Betweene these two tops on the North side, it hath one onely ascent, by which hardly one by one can passe up, and that with a labour by grees or steps, cut out a slope travers the rocke. In steed of ditches, on the West side serveth the river Levin; on the South, Cluyd; and on the East a boggie flat, which at everie tide is wholly covered over with waters; and on the North side the verie upright steepenesse of the place is a most sufficient defence. Certain remaines of the Britans, presuming of the naturall strength of this place, and their owne manhood, who, as
C Gildas writeth, gat themselves a place of refuge in high mountaines and hills, steep and naturally fensed, as it were, with rampires and ditches, in most thick woods and forrests, in rockes also of the sea, stood out and defended themselves here, after the Romans departure, for three hundred yeeres, in the midst of their enemies. For in Bedes time, as himself writeth, it was the best fortified citie of the Britans. But in the yeere 756. Eadbert King of Northumberland, and Oeng King of the Picts, with their joint forces enclosed it round about by siege, and brought it to such a desperate extremitie, that it was rendred unto them by composition. Of this place the territorie round about it is called the Sherifdome of Dunbarton, and hath had the Earles of Lennox this long time for their Sheriffes, by birth-right and inheritance.

D As touching the Earles of Lennox themselves, to omit those of more ancient and obscure times, there was one Duncane Earle of Lennox in the reigne of Robert the second, who died and left none but daughters behinde him. Of whom one was married to Alan Steward, descended from Robert, a younger sonne of Walter the second of that name, High Steward of Scotland; and brother likewise to Alexander Steward the second, from whom the noblest and royall race of Scotland hath beene propagated. This surname Steward was given unto that most noble family, in regard of the honourable office of the Stewardshippe of the kingdome, as who had the charge of the Kings revenues. The said Alan had issue John Earle of Lennox, and Robert, Captain of that companie of Scottishmen at E Armes, which Charles the sixth K. of France first instituted, in lieu of some recompence unto the Scottish nation, which by their valour had deserved passing well of the kingdom of France; who also by the same Prince for his vertues sake was endowed with the Seigniorie of Aubigny in Auvergne. John had a sonne named Matthew Earle of Lennox, who wedded the daughter of James Hamilton by Marion daughter to King James the second; on whom he begat John Earle of Lennox: hee taking armes to deliver King James the fifth out of the hands of the Douglasses and the Hamiltons, was slaine by the Earle of Arran his Unkle on the mothers side. This John was father to Matthew Earle of Lennox, who having sustained sundrie troubles in France and Scotland, found fortune more friendly to him in England, through the F favour of King Henrie the eighth, considering that hee bestowed upon him in marriage his Neice, with faire lands. By the meanes of this happie marriage were brought into the world Henrie and Charles.

Henrie, by Marie Queene of Scots, had issue JAMES the sixth, King of Britain, by the propitious grace of the eternall God, borne in a most auspicate and lucky houre, to knit and unite in one bodie of an Empire the whole Island of Britaine, divided as well in it selfe, as it was heretofore from the rest of the world, and (as we hope and pray) pray) to lay a moſt ſure foundation of an everlaſting ſecuritie, for our heires and the poſteritie. As for Charles, he had iſſue one onely daughter Arbella, who above her ſexe hath ſo embraced the ſtudies of the beſt literature, that therein ſhee hath profited and proceeded with ſingular commendation, and is comparable with the excellent Ladies of old time. When Charles was dead, after that the Earledome of Lennox, whereof he ſtood enfeoffed, was revoked by Parliamentarie authoritie in the yeere of our Lord 1579. and his Unkle by the fathers ſide, Robert Biſhop of Cathanes, had ſome while enjoyed this title (in lieu whereof he received at the Kings hands the honour of the Earle of March) King James the ſixth conferred the honourable title of Duke of Lennox upon Eſme Steward, ſonne to John Lord D' Aubigny, younger brother to Mathew aforeſaid Earle of Lennox, which Lodowic Eſme his ſon at this day honourably enjoieth. For ſince the time of Charles the ſixth, there were of this line Lords of Aubigny in France, the ſaid Robert before named, and Bernard or Eberard under Charles the eighth & Lewis the twelfth, who is commended with great praiſe unto poſteritie by P. Jovius, for his noble acts moſt valerouſly exploited in the warre of Naples, a moſt firme and truſtie companion of King Henrie the ſeventh when he entred into England. Who uſed for his Empreſe or deviſe a Lion betweene buckles, with this Mot, DISTANTIA JUNGIT: for that by his meanes the Kingdomes of France and of Scotland, ſevered and diſ-joined ſo farre in diſtance, were by a ſtraighter league of friendſhip conjoyned: like as Robert Steward Lord D' Aubigny of the ſame race, who was Marſhall of France under King Lewis the eleventh, for the ſame cauſe uſed the royall Armes of France, with buckles Or in a border Gueules: which the Earles and Dukes of Lennox have ever ſince borne quarterly with the Armes of Steward.

STIRLING Sheriffdome,

UPon Lennox North-eaſtward bordereth the territorie of STERLING, ſo named of the principall towne therein: for fruitfull ſoile, and numbers of Gentlemen in it, ſecond to no province of Scotland. Here is that narrow land or ſtreight, by which Dunbritton Frith and Edenborrough Frith (that I may uſe the termes of this our age) piercing farre into the land out of the Weſt and Eaſt Seas, are divided aſunder, that they meet not the one with the other.

Which thing Julius Agricola, who marched hitherto and beyond, firſt obſerved; and fortified this ſpace betweene with garriſons, ſo as all the part of Britaine in this ſide was then in poſſeſſion of the Romans, and the enemies removed and driven, as it were, into another Iſland, in ſo much as Tacitus judged right truely, There was no other bound or limit of Britaine to bee ſought for. Neither verily in the time enſuing, did either the VALOUR of Armies, or the GLORIE of the Romane name, which ſcarcely could be ſtayed, ſet out the marches of the Empire in this part of the world farther, although with inrodes they other whiles moleſted and endammaged them. But after this glorious expedition of Agricola, when himſelfe was called backe, Britaine, as ſaith Tacitus, became for-let, neither was the poſſeſſion kept ſtill thus farre: for the Caledonian Britans drave the Romans backe as farre as to the river Tine: in ſo much as Hadrian, who came into Britaine in perſon about the fortieth yeere after, and reformed many things in it, went no farther forward, but gave commandement that the GOD TERMINUS, which was wont to give ground unto none, ſhould retire backward out of this place, like as in the Eaſt on this ſide Euphrates. Hence it is that S. Auguſtine wrote in this wiſe: God TERMINUS, who gave not place to Jupiter, yeelded unto the will of Hadrianus, yeelded to the raſhneſſe of Julian, yeelded to the neceſſitie of Jovian. In ſo much as Hadrian had enough to doe, for to make a wall of turfe betweene the rivers Tine and Eſk, well neere an hundred miles Southward on this ſide Edenborrough Frith.

God Terminus. Aug. de Civ. Dei l. 4. c. 29.

But

A But Antoninus Pius, who being adopted by Hadrian bare his name, ſtiled thereupon TITUS ÆLIUS HADRIANUS ANTONINUS PIUS, under the conduct of Lollius Urbicus, whom he had ſent hither Lievtenant, repelled the Northern enemies backe againe beyond BODOTRIA, or Edenborrough Forth, and that by raiſing another wall of turfe, namely, beſides that of Hadrianus, as Capitolinus writeth. Which wall, that it was reared in this verie place whereof I now ſpeake, and not by Severus (as it is commonly thought) I will produce no other witneſſes, than two ancient Inſcriptions digged up here: of which the one faſtned in the wall of an houſe at Cader, ſheweth how the ſecond Legion Auguſta, ſet up the wall for the ſpace of three miles and more: the other, now in the houſe of the Earle Marſhall at Dunotyr, B which implieth, that a band of the twentieth Legion Victrix raiſed the ſaid wall three miles long. But ſee here the verie inſcriptions themſelves, as Servatius Riheley, a Gentleman of Sileſia, who curiouſly travailed theſe countries, copied them out for mee.

AVG.
FEC.

And in a village called Miniabruch, out of a Miniſters houſe there was removed F this inſcription into a Gentlemans houſe, which is there new built out of the ground:

* Cohors prima Hamiorum.

But when the Northerne nations in the reigne of Commodus, having paſſed once over this wall, had made much waſt and ſpoile in the countrey, the Emperour Severus, as I have alreadie ſaid, repaired this wall of Hadrian. Howbeit afterwards the Romans brought eftſoones the countrey lying betweene, under their ſubjection. For Ninius hath recorded, that Carauſius under Diocletian ſtrengthened this wall another time, and fortified it with ſeven caſtles. Laſtly, the Romanes fenſed this place (when Theodoſius the younger was Emperour) under the conduct of Gallio of Ravenna. Now, ſaith Bede, they made a turfe wall, rearing it not ſo much with ſtone as with turfes (as having no cunning Artificer for ſo great a piece of worke) and the ſame to no uſe, betweene two Friths or Armes of the ſea, for many miles in length: that where the fenſe of water was wanting, there by the helpe of a wall they might defend their borders from the invaſion of enemies: of which worke, that is to ſay, a very broad and high wall, a man may ſee to this day moſt certaine and evident remaines.

Ninius. This wall began, as the Scots in theſe dayes give out, at the river Aven, that goeth into Edenborrough Forth, and having paſſed over the riveret Carron, reacheth unto Dunbritton. But Bede, as I ſaid erewhile, affirmeth that it beginneth in a place called Penvaell, that is, in the Picts language, as much as The head of the wall; in the Britans tongue Pen-Gual, in Engliſh Penwalton, in Scottiſh Cevall: all which names no doubt are derived from Vallum in Latine: and he ſaith, That place is almoſt two Abercorn. miles from Abercurvig or Abercurving. And it endeth, as the common ſort thinke, at Kirk-Patricke, the native ſoile (as ſome writeth) of Saint Patrick the Iriſh-mens Apoſtle, neere unto Cluyd; according to Bede, at Alcluid; after Ninius, at the Citie Pen Alcloyt, which may ſeeme all one.

Grahams dyke. Now this wall is commonly called Grahams dyke; either of Graham a warlike Scot, whoſe valour was eſpecially ſeene when the breach was made through it, or elſe of the hill Grampie, at the foot whereof it ſtood. The author of Rota Temporum calleth it the wall of Aber-corneth, that is, of the mouth of the river Corneth: where, in Bedes time, there was a famous monaſterie ſtanding, as he hath recorded, upon Engliſh ground, but neere unto that frith or arme of the ſea, which in thoſe daies ſevered the lands of the Engliſh and the Picts.

Hard by this wall of turfe, what way as the river Carron croſſeth this Sheriffdome of Sterling, toward the left hand are ſeene two mounts caſt up by mans hand, which Duni pacis. they call Duni pacis, that is, Knolles of peace: and almoſt two miles lower there is an ancient round building, foure and twentie cubits high, and thirteene broad, open in the top, framed of rough ſtone without lime, having the upper part of everie ſtone ſo tenanted into the nether, as that the whole worke ſtill riſing narrow, by a mutuall interlacing and claſping, upholdeth it ſelfe. Some call this the Temple of God Arthurs oven. TERMINUS, others Arthurs-Oven, who father everie ſtately and ſumptuous thing upon Arthur. Others againe, Julius Hoff, and ſuppoſe it to have been built by Julius Cæſar. But I would think rather that Julius Agricola built it, who fortified this frontier part, were it not that Ninius hath already enformed us, that it was erected by Carauſius for a triumphall Arch. For hee, as Ninius writeth, built upon the banke of Caron, a round houſe of poliſhed ſtone, erecting a Triumphall Arch in memoriall

A memoriall of a victorie: he repaired also the wall, and strengthened it with seven Castles. In the middest space betweene Dunipace and this building, on the right-hand-banke of Carron, there is yet to be discerned a confused face of a little ancient Citie: where the vulgar people beleeveth there was sometimes a road for ships, who call it Camelot, by a name that is rife in King Arthurs booke; and they contend, but all in vaine, to have it that Camalodunum which Tacitus mentioneth. But it would seeme rather, by the name of the river Carron running underneath, to have beene CORTA DAMNIORUM, which Ptolomee mentioneth in this tract. And now take with you that which George Buchanan, that excellent Poet, wrote of the limit of the B Roman Empire at Carron. Coria Damnio-rum.

Roma securigeris prætendit mœnia Scotis,
Hîc spe progressus positâ, Carronis ad undam Terminus Ausonijs signat divertia regni.

Gainst warlike Scots with axes arm'd, a mightie frontier wall
The Romans rais'd: and limit there, which TERMINUS they call,
Neere Carron streame, now past all hope more British ground to gaine, Markes out the Roman Empires end, whence they to turne were faine.

C In this territorie of Sterling on the East side, there sheweth it selfe Castle Callendar, belonging to the Barons of Levingston; and the family of the Barons Fleming dwelleth hard by at Cumbernald, which they received at the hands of King Robert Brus, for their service valiantly & faithfully performed in defence of their country: whereby also they attained unto the hereditarie honour to be Chamberlaines of Scotland. And even very lately the favour of King James the Sixth hath honoured this house with the title of Earle, what time as he created I. Baron Fleming Earle of Wigton. In a place neere adjoining standeth Elphing ston, which likewise hath his Barons, advanced to that dignitie by King James the fourth: And where Forth full of his windings and crooked crankes runneth downe with a rolling pace, and hath a bridge over him, D standeth Sterlin, commonly called Strivelin, and Sterlin Burrough; where on the very brow of a steepe rocke there is mounted on high a passing strong Castle of the Kings, which King James the sixth hath beautified with new buildings, and whereof this long time the Lords of Ereskin have been Captaines, unto whom the charge and tuition of the Princes of Scotland during their minoritie hath been otherwhiles committed. Whereas some there be, that would have the good and lawfull money of England, which is called Sterling money, to take the name from hence, they are much deceived: for that denomination came from the Germans, of their Easterly dwelling termed by Englishmen Esterlings; whom King John of England first sent for to reduce the silver to the due fineneſſe and puritie: and such monies in ancient writing are E ever more found by the name of Esterling. But concerning Sterlin towne the verses that I. Jonston hath made shall supply all the rest. Callendar. Barons Levingston. Fleming Earle of Wigton. Sterling mony.

Sive es, seu non es, hospes an hostis item.
Pro lucro cedit damnum. Discordia tristis
F Heu quoties procerum sanguine tinxit humum?

A regall palace stately set, beholds from mount aloft,

Hence is it that ſhe prides her ſelfe in Kings names and no worſe.
But entertaineth every one, by name it skils not what,
A friend or foe, friend gueſt or no, ſhe reckneth nought of that.
In ſteed of gaine this turnes to loſſe. Beſides, how oft alas,

Banocbourn. About two miles hence the Banoc-bourn runneth between exceeding high banks on B both ſides, and with a verie ſwift ſtreame in winter, toward the Forth: a bourn moſt famous for as glorious a victorie as ever the Scots had, what time as Edward the ſecond King of England was put to flight, who was fain to make hard ſhift, and in great haſt and feare to take a boat and ſave his life: yea and the moſt puiſſant armie which England had before ſent out, was diſcomfited through the valiant proweſſe of King Robert Brus; inſomuch as for two yeeres after the Engliſh came not into the field a-

Alauna. gainſt the Scots. About Sterlin Ptolomee ſeemeth to place ALAUNA, which is either neere the little river Alon, that here entreth into the Forth; or elſe by Alway, an houſe of the Ereskins, who by inheritance are the Sheriffes of all this territorie without the Burgh. But I have not yet read of any one dignified by the title of Earle of Sterlin. C

CALEDONIA.

WHat ſoever part of Britain lieth Northward beyond Grahames Dyke, or the wall of Antoninus Pius before named, and beareth out on both ſeas, is called by Tacitus CALEDONIA, like as the people thereof, Britans inhabiting CALEDONIA. Ptolomee divideth them into many nations, as CALEDONII, EPIDII, VACOMAGI, &c. who were all of them afterward, for continuing their D ancient manner and cuſtome of painting their bodies, named by the Romans and the Provinciall people, PICTS: divided by Ammianus Marcellinus into two nations, the DICALEDONES and VECTURIONES, touching whom I have ſpoken already before. Howbeit in the approved and beſt writers they goe all under the name of Caledonians: whom I would think to have beene ſo called of Kaled, a Britiſh word that ſignifieth Hard, and in the plurall number maketh Kaledion: whence the word Caledonii may be derived, that is to ſay, hard, rough, uncivill, and a wilder kind of people, ſuch as the Northren nations for the moſt part are: who by reaſon of the rigorous cold of the aire, are more rough and fierce, and for their abundance of blood more bold and adventurous. Moreover, beſide the poſition of the E climate, this is furthered by the nature and condition of the ſoile, which riſeth up all throughout with rough and rugged mountaines: and mountainers verily all men know and confeſſe to be hardie, ſtout, and ſtrong. But whereas Varro alledgeth out of Pacuvius, that Caledonia breedeth and nouriſheth men of exceeding bigge bodies, I would underſtand the place rather of Caledonia the region of Epirus, than this of ours; although ours alſo may juſtly challenge unto it ſelfe this commendation. A-Caledon forreſt. mong this was the Wood CALEDONIA, tearmed by Lucius Florus, Salius Caledonius, that is, the forreſt of Caledonia, ſpreading out a mightie way, and impaſſable by reaſon of tall trees ſtanding ſo thicke, divided alſo by Grampe hill, now called Grantzbaine, that is, the crooked bending mountaine. That Ulyſſes arrived in Caledonia (ſaith F Ulyſſes his Altar. Solinus) appeareth plainly by a votive altar with an inſcription in Greek letters; but I would judge it to have been rather erected to the honour of Ulyſſes, than reared by Ulyſſes himſelfe. Martiall the Poet likewiſe in this verſe maketh mention of Caledonian beares.

Caledonian Beares.

Nuda Caledonio ſic pectora præbuit urſo.

Thus

A Thus yeelded he his naked breſt
To beare of Caledon forreſt.

Plutarch alſo hath written, that Beares were brought out of Britaine to Rome, and had there in great admiration; whereas notwithſtanding Britaine for theſe many ages paſt hath bred none. What Caledonian monſter that ſhould bee, whereof Claudian wrote thus,

——Caledonio velata Britannia monſtro,

With monſter Caledonian Britaine all attired, to tell you truth, I know not. Certes, it nouriſhed in times paſt a number of white Caledonian bulls.

B wilde buls, with thicke manes in manner of Lions (but in theſe dayes few) and thoſe verie cruell, fierce, and ſo hatefull of mankinde, that for a certaine time they abhorre whatſoever they had either handled or breathed upon: yea, they utterly ſcorne the forcible ſtrength of dogges; albeit Rome in times paſt wondered ſo much at the fierceneſſe of Scottiſh dogges, that it was thought there, they were brought thither within yron grates and cages. Well, this tearme and name CALEDONII grew ſo rife with Roman writers, that they uſed it for all Britaine, and for all woods of Britaine whatſoever. Hereupon L. Florus writeth, that Cæſar followed the Britans unto the Caledonian woods, and yet he never ſaw them in his life: Hence alſo Valerius Flaccus writeth thus to Veſpaſian the Emperour,

C ——Caledonius poſtquam tua carbaſa vexit
Oceanus: that is, the Britiſh Ocean.

Hence likewiſe it is that Statius verſified thus unto Criſpinus, ſonne of Vettius Volanus Propretour of Britaine about the time of Vitellius.

Quanta Caledonios attollet gloria campos,
Cùm tibi longævus referet trucis incola terræ?
Hîc ſuetus dare jura parens, hoc ceſpite turmas
Affari, ille dedit, cinxitque hæc mœnia foſſa:
D Belligeris hæc dona deis, hæc tela dicavit,
Cernis adhuc titulos: hunc ipſe vacantibus armis
Induit, hunc regi rapuit theraca Britanno.

How much renowned ſhall the fields of Caledonia bee,
When as ſome old inhabitant of that fierce land to thee Shall in theſe tearmes report and ſay? Behold, thy father oft
Was wont in judgement here to ſit: upon this banke aloft
To th'armed troups to ſpeak; alſo 'twas he that wall'd this fort,
That built thus ſtrong, and it with ditch entrenched in this ſort.
By him to gods of warre theſe gifts and armes were conſecrate,
E The titles (lo) are extant yet; himſelfe this brave breſt-plate
In time of battaile did put on, this cuirace, finally,
In fight he pluckt by force of armes from King of Britannie.

But in theſe, as in other things, I may ſay,

Creſcit in immenſum facunda licentia vatum.
Poeticall licence is boundleſſe.

F For neither Cæſar, nor Volanus ſo much as ever knew the Caledonians. In Plinies time, as himſelfe witneſſeth, thirtie yeeres almoſt after Claudius, the Romanes with all their warlike expeditions, had diſcovered no farther in Britaine than to the vicinitie of the Caledonian wood. For Julius Agricola under Domitian, was the firſt that entred Caledonia: whereof at that preſent Galgac was Prince (who is named Galauc ap Lienmauc in the book of * Triplicites, among the three worthies of Britain) a man Galgacus the Britan. * Triadum.

of a mightie ſpirit and ſtout ſtomack: who having put to flight the ninth Legion, in exceeding heat of courage joyned battaile with the Romans, and moſt manfully defended his country ſo long, untill fortune rather than his owne valour failed him. For then, as he ſaith, Theſe Northern Britans, beyond whom there was no land, and beſide whom none were free, were the utmoſt nation verily of this Iland, like as Catullus called the Britans the utmoſt of all the world, in that verſe unto Furius. A

Cæſaris viſens monumenta magni,

Great Cæſars monuments to ſee in his memoriall,
The Rhene in Gaul, and Britans grim, the fartheſt men of all.

Argetocoxus. In the daies of Severus, as we read in Xiphilinus, Argetecox a pettie Prince reigned over this tract; whoſe wife being rated and reviled as an adultereſſe by Julia the Empreſſe, frankly and boldly made this anſwer: We Britaine Dames have to doe with the braveſt and beſt men, and you Roman Ladies with everie leud baſe companion ſecretly.

FIFE. C

IN this large countrey of the Caledonians, beyond the Territorie of Sterlin, whereof I wrote laſt, and two countries or Sheriffedomes of leſſe note, Clackmans, over which a Knight named de Carſſe; and Kinros, over which the Earle of Morton are Sheriffes; FIFE, a moſt goodly Biland, wedged, as it were, betweene the two Armes of the Sea, Forth and Tau, ſhooteth out farre into the Eaſt. This land yeeldeth plentie of corne and forage, yea and of pit coales: the ſea, beſides other fiſhes, affordeth Oiſters and Shell-fiſh in great abundance: and the coaſts are well beſpred with prettie townlets, repleniſhed with ſtout and luſtie mariners. In the South ſide hereof by Forth, firſt appeareth Weſtward Cul-ros, which giveth the title of a Baronie to Sir I. Colvill: then ſtandeth Dunfermling, a famous monaſterie in old time, both the building and buriall place of King Malcolm the third. But now it giveth both name and honour of an Earle unto Sir Alexander Seton a moſt prudent Counſellor, whom lately James King of great Britain worthily raiſed from Baron of Fivie to be Earle of Dunfermling, and Lord Chancellour of the realme of Scotland. Then Kinghorne ſtandeth hard upon the Forth, from which place Sir Patrick Lion, Baron Glamys, lately received at the bountifull hand of King James the ſixth the title and honour of an Earle. After this, there is upon the ſhore Diſert, ſituate on the riſing of an hill, from whence there lieth an open Heath of the ſame name, where there is a good large place which they call the Cole-plot, that hath great plentie of an earthie Bitumen, and partly burneth, to ſome damage of the inhabitants. Unto it adjoineth Ravins-Heuch, as one would ſay, The ſteepe hill of Ravens, the habitation of the Barons Seincler. Above it the river Levin hideth himſelfe in the Forth: which river running out of the Lake Levin, wherein ſtandeth a Caſtle of the Douglaſſes now Earles of Morton, hath at the verie mouth of it Wemmis Caſtle, the ſeat of a noble family, bearing the ſame ſurname: which King James the ſixth hath of late honoured with the dignity of a Baron. From hence the ſhore draweth backe with a crooked and winding tract unto Fif-neſſe, that is, The Promontorie or Noſe of Fife. Above it Saint Andrews an Archiepiſcopall Citie hath a faire proſpect into the open maine ſea. The more ancient name of the place, as old memorials witneſſe, was Regimund, that is, Saint Regulus mount: in which we read thus, Oeng or Ung King of the Picts, granted unto God and Saint

A Saint Andrew, that it ſhould be the chiefe and mother of all Churches in the Pictis Kingdome. Afterward there was placed here an Epiſcopall See, the Biſhops whereof, like as all the reſt within the Kingdome of Scotland, were conſecrated by the Archbiſhop of Yorke, untill at the interceſſion of King James the third, by reaſon of ſo many warres betweene the Scottiſh and Engliſhmen, Pope Sixtus the fourth ordained the Biſhop of Saint Andrewes to be Primate and Metropolitane of all Scotland; and Pope Innocentius the eighth bound him and his ſucceſſours to the imitation and precedent of the Metropolitane of Canterburie, in theſe words: That in matters concerning the Archiepiſcopall ſtate, they ſhould obſerve and firmely hold the offices, droits, and

In commendation whereof Maſter Jonſton, the Kings Profeſſour there in Divinitie, hath made theſe verſes.

SAINT REGULUS, OR S. ANDREWS.

Seated it is hard by the ſea, at even and equall bounds
Of ſtreets, how well encloſed beſides with fat and fertile grounds!
Whilom, when Prelates ſtate was great and glorious withall,
There flouriſh'd here in ſumptuous port a See Pontificall.
Now Schooles it ſhewes and Colledges, both Gods and mans delight,
F To Muſes which be dedicate, and built to ſtately height.
Here Phœbus hath his ſhadie grove, here dwell the Siſters nine,
And chiefe of them the Ladie bright, Uranie divine.
Who when I was returned from farre coaſts of Germanie,
With welcome kinde here did me place in chaire of high degree.

Moſt

Moſt happie towne, wiſt it what were the giſts of learning true, A

All plagues, good God, all nocive things to Muſes hence repell,
That in this Citie Godlineſſe and Peace may jointly dwell.

Falkland. Hard by there loſeth it ſelfe in the ſea Eden or Ethan, a little river, which ſpringing up neere unto Falkland (belonging in times paſt to the Earles of Fife, but now a retyring place of the Kings, verie well ſeated for hunting pleaſures and diſports) runneth under a continued ridge of hills, which divide this countrey in the midſt, by Studer. Struthers (a place ſo called of a Reedplot) a Caſtle of the Barons Lindſey; and by B Cuper. Cupre, a notable Burrough, where the Sheriffe ſitteth to miniſter juſtice. Concerning which the ſame I. Jonſton hath thus verſified.

CUPRUM FIFÆ.

By rich corne fields, by ſhadie woods and paſtures freſh among,
The river Eden glideth ſoft with chryſtall ſtreame along.
Hither to come from coaſts of France if any ſtranger chance,
Here haply may he thinke he hath a ſight againe of France.
What? drew this place from thence their wit and ſpirit hot trow yee?
Or rather had the ſame at firſt by native propertie?

Now where the ſhore turneth inward a front Northward, hard by the ſalt water of Tau, there flouriſhed in old time two goodly Abbyes, Balmerinoch, built by D Queene Ermengard, wife to King William, daughter of Vicount Beaumont in France. But lately King James of great Britaine advanced Sir James Elphinſton to the honour Balmerinoch. of Baron Balmerinoch: and Lundoris. Lundoris, founded among the woods by David Earle of Huntington, and at this day the Baronie of Sir Patrick Leſley: betweene which ſtandeth Banbrich, the habitation of the Earle of Rothes, ſtrongly built caſtle wiſe. But as touching the townes of Fife planted along the ſea ſide, have here now, if it pleaſe you, theſe verſes of Maſter Jonſton.

Oppida ſic toto ſunt ſparſa in littore ut unum
Dixeris, inque uno plurima juncta eadem: E Littore quot curvo Forthæ volvuntur arenæ,
Quotque undis refluo tunditur ora ſalo.
Penè tot hîc cernas inſtratum puppibus æquor,
Urbibus & crebris penè tot ora hominum.
Cuncta operis intenta domus, fœda otia neſcit,
Sedula cura domi, ſedula cura foris.
Quæ maria, & quas non terras animoſa juventus
Ah! fragili fidens audet adire trabe?
Auxit opes virtus, virtuti dura pericla
Juncta etiam lucro damna fuere ſuo. F
Quæ fecêre viris animos, cultumque dedêre, Magnanimis proſunt damna, pericla, labor.

Who ſees how thicke townes ſtand upon this coaſt, will ſay anone,
They are but one, and yet the ſame all joyned in that one.
How many ſands on crooked ſhore of Forth are caſt by tides,

Or

A Or billowes at the ſeas returne beat hard upon bankes ſides.
So many ſhips well neere you may here ſee to ſaile or ride,
And in thoſe townes ſo thicke, almoſt as many folke abide.
In everie houſe they ply their worke, no idle drones they are:
Buſie at home with diligence, buſie abroad with care.
What ſeas or lands are there to which a voiage for to make,
In brittle barkes will not their youth courageous undertake.
By valour be they growne to wealth, yet valour meet with paines,
And perils too; ſome loſſes too have they had with their gaines.
B Theſe things have made them valiant, civill withall and courteous:
Loſſe, perill, painfull toile availe all ſuch as be magnanimous.

The Governour of this province, like as of all the reſt in this Kingdome, was in times paſt a Thane, that is, in the old Engliſh tongue, The Kings Miniſter: as it is alſo at this day in the Daniſh language: but Malcolm Canmore made Macduffe, who before was Thane of Fife, the firſt hereditarie Earle of Fife; and in conſideration of his good deſert and ſingular ſervice done unto him, granted that his poſteritie ſhould have the honour to place the King, when hee is to be crowned, in his chaire; to lead the Vant-guard in the Kings armie; and if any of them ſhould happen by caſualty to C kill either Gentleman or Commoner, to buy it out with a peece of money. And not farre from Lundoris there is to bee ſeene a Croſſe of ſtone, which ſtanding for a limit betweene Fife and Strathern, had an inſcription of barbarous verſes, and a certain priviledge of Sanctuarie, that any Man-ſlaier allied to Macduffe Earle of Fife within the ninth degree, if he came unto this Croſſe, and gave nine kine with an * heifer, ſhould bee quit of manſlaughter. When his poſteritie loſt this title I could never yet find: but it appeareth out of the Records of the kingdome, that K. David the ſecond gave unto William Ramſey this Earldome, with all and everie the immunities and law which is called Clan-Mac-Duffe: and received it is for certaine, that the linage of the Wemeſies and Douglaſſe, yea and that great kinred Clan-Hatan, the chiefe D whereof is Mac-Intoskech, deſcended from them. And the moſt learned I. Skerne Clerke of the Kings Regiſter of Scotland, hath taught mee in his ſignifications of words, that Iſabel daughter and heire to Duncane Earle of Fife, granted upon certaine conditions unto Robert the third King of the Scots, for the uſe and behoofe of Robert Stewart Earle of Menteith, the Earldome of Fife: who being afterwards Duke of Albanie, and affecting the Kingdome, with cruell ambition cauſed David the Kings eldeſt ſon to be moſt pitifully famiſhed to death, which is higheſt extremitie of all miſerie. But his ſon Murdac ſuffered due puniſhment for the wickedneſſe both 1424.
of his father, and his owne ſonnes, being put to death by King James the firſt for their violent oppreſſions, and a decree paſſed, that the Earldome of Fife ſhould be u-

Neere the out-let of Tau, the notable river Ern intermingleth his waters with Tau: which river beginning out of a Lake or Loch of the ſame name, beſtoweth his owne name upon the countrey through which he runneth: For it is called Strath Ern, which in the ancient tongue of the Britans, ſignifieth the Vale along Ern. The river Ern.

banke of this Ern is beautified with Drimein Caſtle, belonging to the family of the Barons of Dromund, advanced to higheſt honours ever ſince that King Robert Stewart the third took to him a wife out of that linage. For the women of this race have for their ſingular beautie and well favoured ſweet countenance won the prize from all others, inſomuch as they have beene the Kings moſt amiable paramours. Upon the ſame banke Tulibardin Caſtle ſheweth it ſelfe aloft, but with greater jollitie, ſince that by the propitious favour of King James the ſixth, Sir John Murray Baron of Tulibardin, was raiſed to the honour and eſtate of Earle of Tulibardin. Upon the other bank, more beneath, Duplin Caſtle, the habitation of the Barons Oliphant, reporteth yet what an overthrow (the like to which was never before) the Engliſhmen that came to aide King Edward Ballioll, gave there unto the Scots; inſomuch as the Engliſh writers in that time doe write, that they won this victorie not by mans hand, but by the power of God: and the Scottiſh writers relate, how that out of the family of the Lindeſeies there were ſlaine in the field foureſcore perſons, and that the name of the Haies had bin quite extinguiſhed, but that the chiefe of that houſe left his wife behind him great with child. Not farre from it ſtandeth Innermeth, well knowne by reaſon of the Lords thereof, the Stewarts out of the family of Lorn. Inch-Chafra, that is in the old Scottiſh tongue, the Iſle of Maſſes, hereby may bee remembred when as it was a moſt famous Abbey of the order of Saint Auguſtin, founded by the Earle of Strathern about the yeere 1200.

When Ern hath joined his water with Tau in one ſtreame, ſo that Tau is now become more ſpatious, hee looketh up to Aberneth ſeated upon his banke, the royall ſeat in old time of the Picts, and a well peopled Citie: which, as we read in an ancient fragment, Nectane King of the Picts gave unto God and S. Brigide untill the day of Doom, together with the bounds thereof, which lye from a ſtone in Abertrent, unto a ſtone nigh to Carfull, that is, Loghfoll, and from thence as farre as to Ethan. But long after it became the poſſeſſion of the Douglaſſes Earles of Anguſe, who are called Lords of Aberneth; and there ſome of them lye enterred.

The firſt Earle of Strathern, that I read of, was Maliſſe, who in the time of King Henrie the third of England married one of the heires of Robert Muſchamp, a potent Baron of England. Long afterward Robert Stewart, in the yeere 1380. Then, David a younger ſonne of King Robert the ſecond, whoſe onely daughter given in marriage to Patricke Graham begat Mailiſe or Meliſſe Graham, from whom King James the firſt tooke away the Earledome as eſcheated, after that he underſtood out of the Records of the Kingdome, that it was given unto his mothers grandfather, and the heires males of his bodie. This territorie, as alſo that of Menteith adjoining, the Barons Dromund governe hereditarily by Seneſchals authority, as their Stewarties.

Earles of Strathern. Fines 35 H. 3. n. 1.

Menteith hath the name of Teith, a river which alſo they call Taich, and thereof this little province they tearme in Latin Taichia; upon the banke of which lieth the Biſhopricke of Dunblan, which King David the firſt of that name erected. At Kirkbird, that is, Saint Brigids Church, the Earles of Menteith have their principall houſe, or Honour: as alſo the Earles of Montroſſe comming from the ſame ſtocke, at Kin-Kardin not farre off. This Menteith reacheth, as I have heard, unto the mountaines that encloſe the Eaſt ſide of the Logh or Lake Lomund. The ancient Earles of Menteith were of the family of Cumen, which in times paſt being the moſt ſpred & mightieſt houſe of all Scotland, was ruinated with the over-weight and ſway thereof: but the latter Earles were of the Grahams line, ever ſince that Sir Mailiſe Graham attained to the honour of an Earle.

ARGATHELIA, OR ARGILE.

B Beyond the Lake Lomund and the West part of Lennox, there ſpreadeth it ſelfe neere unto Dunbriton Forth the large countrey called Argathelia, & Argadia in Latin, but commonly Argile, more truely Argathel, and Ar-Gwithil, that is, Neere unto the Iriſh; or, as old writings have it, The edge or border of Ireland: For it lyeth toward Ireland, the inhabitants whereof, the Britans tearme Gwithil and Gaothel. The countrey runneth out in length and breadth, all mangled with fiſhfull pooles, and in ſome places with riſing mountaines, very commodious for feeding of cattell; in which alſo there range up and downe wilde kine and red Deere: but along the ſhore it is more unpleaſant in ſight, what with rockes, and what with blackiſh barraine mountaines. In this part, as Bede writeth, Britain received after the Britans and Picts, a third nation of Scots, in C that countrey where the Picts inhabited: who comming out of Ireland under the leading of Reuda, either through friendſhip, or by dint of ſword, planted here their ſeat amongſt them, which they ſtill hold. Of which their leader they are to this very day called Dalreudini: for in their language Dal ſignifieth (a part). And a little after, Ireland (ſaith hee) is the proper Countrey of the Scots, for, being departed out of it, they added unto the Britans and Picts a third nation in Britaine. And there is a very great Bay or arme of the ſea, that in old time ſevered the nation of the Britans from the Picts, which from the Weſt breaketh a great way into the land, where ſtandeth the ſtrongeſt Citie of all the Britans even to this day, called Alclith. In the North part of which Bay, the Scots aforeſaid when they came, got themſelves a place to inhabite. Of that name Dalreudin,
D no remaines at all, to my knowledge, are now extant; neither finde wee any thing thereof in Writers, unleſſe it bee the ſame that Dalrieta. For, in an old Pamphlet, touching the diviſion of Albanie, wee read of one Kinnadie (who for certaine was a King of Scots, and ſubdued the Picts) theſe very words; Kinnadie two yeeres before hee came into Pictavia (for ſo it calleth the countrey of the Picts) entred upon the Kingdome of Dalrieta. Alſo in an hiſtorie of later time there is mention made of Dalrea in ſome place of this tract, where King Robert Brus fought a field unfortunately.

E the Kingdome enacted a law. But the Earles themſelves have in ſome caſes their roialties, as being men of very great command and authoritie, followed with a mightie traine of retainers and dependants: who derive their race from the ancient Princes and Potentates of Argile, by an infinite deſcent of Anceſtours, and from their caſtle Cambell tooke their ſurname: but the honour and title of Earle was given unto them by King James the ſecond, who, as it is recorded, inveſted Colin Lord Cambell, Earle of Argile, in regard of his owne vertue, and the worth of his family. Whoſe heires and ſucceſſours ſtanding in the gracious favour of the Kings, have bin Lords of Lorn, and a good while Generall Juſtices of the Kingdome of Scotland, or, as they uſe to Logh Fin. LOgh Fin, a lake breeding ſuch ſtore of herrings at a certaine due ſeaſon, as it is wonderfull, ſevereth Argile from a Promontorie, which for thirtie miles together growing ſtill toward a ſharpe point, thruſteth it ſelfe forth with ſo great a deſire toward Ireland (betwixt which and it there is a narrow ſea, ſcarce thirteene miles over) as if it would conjoine it ſelfe. Ptolomee B Epidium. termeth this, the Promontorie EPIDIORUM, betweene which name, and the Iſlands EBUDÆ lying over againſt it, there is, in my conceit, ſome affinitie. At this day it is called in the Iriſh tongue (which they ſpeake in all this tract) CAN-TYRE, that is, The lands Head; inhabited by the Mac-Conells, a family that here ſwayeth much, howbeit at the pleaſure and diſpoſe of the Earle of Argile: yea and otherwhiles they make out their light pinnaces and gallies for Ireland, to raiſe booties and pillage, who alſo hold in poſſeſſion thoſe little provinces of Ireland, which they call Glines and Rowts. This Promontorie lyeth annexed to Knapdale by ſo thin a necke (as being ſcarce a mile broad, and the ſame all ſandie) that the mariners finde it the neerer way to convey their ſmall veſſels over it C

BRAID ALBIN, or ALBANY.

MOre inwardly, where the uninhabitable, loftie, and rugged ridges of the Mountaine Grampius begin a little to slope and settle downeward, is seated BRAID-ALBIN, that is, The highest part of Scotland: for they that are the true and right Scots indeed, call Scotland in their mother tongue Albin; like as that part B where it mounteth up highest, Drum Albin, that is, the Ridge of Scotland. But in an old booke it is read Brun Albin, where wee finde this written: Fergus filius Eric, &c. that is, Fergus the sonne of Eric was the first of the seed or line of Chonare, that entred upon the Kingdome of Albanie, from Brun-Albain unto the Irish sea and Inch-Gall. And after him the Kings descended from the seed or race of Fergus reigned in Brun-Albain or Brunhere unto Alpin the sonne of Eochall. Albanie.

But this Albanie is better knowne for the Dukes thereof, than for any good gifts that the soile yeeldeth. The first Duke of Albanie that I read of, was Robert Earle of Fife, whom his brother King Robert the third of that name advanced to that ho- C nour: yet he (ungratefull person that he was) pricked on with the spirit of ambition, famished to death his sonne David, that was heire to the crown. But the punishment due for this wicked fact, which himselfe by the long-sufferance of God felt not, his son Mordac, the second Duke of Albanie, suffered most grievously, being condemned for treason and beheaded, when hee had seene his two sonnes the day before executed in the same manner. The third Duke of Albanie was Alexander, second sonne to King James the second, who being Regent of the Kingdome, Earle of March, Marr, and Garioth, Lord of Annandale and of Man, was by his own brother, King James the third outlawed, and after hee had beene turmoiled with many troubles, in the end, as hee stood by to behold a Justs and Tourneament in Paris, chanced to bee woun- D ded with a peece of a shattered launce, and so died. His sonne John, the fourth Duke of Albanie, Regent likewise and made Tutour to King James the fifth, taking contentment in the pleasant delights of the French Court, after hee had wedded there the daughter, and one of the heires of John Earle of Auverne and Lauragveze, died there without issue: Whom in a respective reverence to the bloud royall of the Scots, Francis the first King of France gave thus much honour unto, as that hee allowed him place betweene the Archbishop of Langres, and the Duke of Alenson, Peeres of France. After his death there was no Duke of Albanie untill that Queene Marie in our memorie conferred this title upon Henrie Lord Darly, whom within some few daies after shee made her husband, like as King James the sixth granted E the same unto his owne second sonne Charles being an Infant, who is now Duke of Yorke. Dukes of Albanie. Tillet.

There inhabite these regions a kinde of people, rude, warlike, readie to fight, querulous, and mischievous: they bee commonly tearmed High-landmen, who being in deed the right progenie of the ancient Scots, speak Irish, & call themselves Albinich; their bodies be firmely made and well compact, able withall and strong, nimble of foot, high minded, inbread and nuzzeled in warlike exercises, or robberies rather, and upon a deadly feud and hatred most forward and desperate to take revenge. They goe attired Irish-like, in stript or streaked mantles of divers colours, wearing thicke and long glibbes of haire, living by hunting, fishing, fowling, and stealing. In F the warre their armour is an head-peece or Morion of iron, and an habergeon or coat of maile: their weapons bee bowes, barbed or hooked arrowes, and broad backe-swords: and being divided by certaine families or kinreds, which they terme Clannes, they commit such cruell outrages, what with robbing, spoiling, and killing, that their savage crueltie hath forced a law to bee enacted, whereby it is lawfull, That if any person out of any one Clanne or kinred of theirs hath tres- High-landmen.

Parliament. 1581. passed ought and done harme, whosoever of that Clanne or linage chance to bee taken, he shall either make amends for the harmes, or else suffer death for it; when as the whole Clan commonly beareth feud for any hurt received by any one member thereof, by execution of lawes, order of justice, or otherwise. A

PERTHIA, OR PERTH Sheriffdome. B

The river Tau. OUt of the very bosome of Mountaines of Albany, Tau the greatest river of all Scotland issueth: and first runneth amaine through the fields, untill that spreading broad into a lake full of Islands, hee restraineth and keepeth in his course. Then gathering himselfe narrow within his bankes into a channell, and watering Perth, a large, plentifull and rich countrey, he taketh in unto him Amund, a small river comming out of Athol.

Athol. This Athol, that I may digresse a little out of my way, is infamous for witches and wicked women: the countrey, otherwise fertile enough, hath vallies bespread with C

Caledon wood. forrests: namely, where that WOOD CALEDONIA, dreadfull to see to for the sundrie turnings and windings in and out therein, for the hideous horrour of dark shades, for the burrowes and dennes of wild bulls with thicke manes (whereof I made mention heretofore) extended it selfe in old time farre and wide everie way in these parts. As for the places herein, they are of no great account, but the Earles thereof are very memorable.

Earles of Athol. Thomas, a younger sonne of Rolland of Galloway, was in his wives right Earle of Athol, whose sonne Patricke was by the Bissets his concurrents murdered in feud, at Hadington in his bed-chamber, and forthwith the whole house wherein hee lodged D burnt, that it might be supposed he perished by casualtie of fire.

Chroniron Vairosse. In the Earldome there succeeded David Hastings, who had married the aunt by the mothers side of Patricke; whose sonne that David surnamed of Strathbogie may seeme to be, who a little after, in the reigne of Henrie the third King of England, being Earle of Athol, married one of the daughters and heires of Richard, base sonne to John King of England, and had with her a verie goodly inheritance in England. She bare unto him two sonnes, John Earle of Athol, who being of a variable disposition and untrustie, was hanged up aloft on a gallowes fiftie foot high; and David Earle of Athol, unto whom by marriage with one of the daughters and heires of John Comin of Badzenoth, by one of the heires of Aumar de Valence Earle of Penbroch, there E fell great lands and possessions. His sonne David, who under King Edward the second was otherwhiles amongst Englishe Earles summoned to the Parliaments in England, and under King Edward Balliol made Lord Lievtenant Generall of Scotland, was vanquished by the valerous proweese of Andrew de Murray, and slaine in battaile within the Forrest of Kelblen in the yeere of our Lord 1335. And his sonne David left two young daughters only, Elizabeth wedded unto Sir Thomas Percie, from whom the Barons of Burrough are descended: and Philip, married to Sir Thomas Hallsham an Englishe Knight. Then fell the title of Athol unto that Walter Stewart, sonne to King Robert the second, who cruelly murdered James the first, King of Scotland, and for this execrable crueltie suffered most condigne punishment accordingly: in so much as Æneas Sylvius, Embassadour at that time in Scotland from F Pope Eugenius the fourth, gave out this speech: That hee could not tell whether hee should give them greater commendations that revenged the Kings death, or brand them with sharper censure of condemnation, that distained themselves with so hainous a parricide.

After some few yeeres passed betweene, this honour was granted unto John Stewart

A wart of the family of Lorne, the ſonne of James, ſurnamed The Black Knight, by Joan the widow of King James the firſt, daughter to John Earle of Somerſet, and Niece to John of Gaunt Duke of Lancaſter, whoſe poſteritie at this day enjoy the ſame.

Tau bearing now a bigger ſtreame, by receiving Almund unto him, holdeth on his courſe to Dunkelden, adorned by King David with an Epiſcopall See. Moſt writers grounding upon the ſignification of that word, ſuppoſe it to be a towne of the Caledonians, and interpret it, The Mount or hill of Hazeles, as who would have that name given unto it of the Hazel trees in the wood Caledonia. From hence the Tau goeth forward by the carkaſſe of Berth, a little deſolate Citie, remembring well B enough what a great loſſe and calamitie hee brought upon it in times paſt, when with an extraordinarie ſwelling flood, hee ſurrounded all the fields, layed the goodly ſtanding corne along on the ground, and carried headlong away with him this poore Citie, with the Kings childe and infant in his cradle, and the inhabitants therein. In ſteed whereof in a more commodious place, King William builded Perth, which ſtraightwaies became ſo wealthy, that Necham, who lived in that age, verſified of it in this manner:

Dunkelden.

Berth.

Perth.

Tranſis ample Tai per rura, per oppida, per Perth,
Regnum ſuſtentant iſtius urbis opes.

C By villages, by townes, by Perth, thou runn'ſt great Tay amaine,
The riches of this Citie Perth doth all the realme ſuſtaine.

But the poſteritie enſuing called it of a Church founded in honour of Saint John, Saint Johns towne: and the Engliſh, whiles the warres were hot betweene the Bruſes and the Balliols, fortified it with great bulwarks, which the Scots afterwards, for the moſt part overthrew, and diſmantled it themſelves. Howbeit it is a proper pretie Citie, pleaſantly ſeated betweene two Greenes: and for all that ſome of the Churches be deſtroyed, yet a goodly ſhew it maketh; ranged and ſet out in ſuch an uniforme maner, that in everie ſeverall ſtreet almoſt there dwell ſeverall artificers by D themſelves, and the river Tau bringeth up with the tide ſea commodities by lighters: whereupon J. Jonſton, ſo often now by me cited, writeth thus.

Saint John Towne.

F Neere to the waters cleere of Tay, and pleaſant plaines all greene,
In middle ground betweene them ſtands Perth proudly like a Queene.
Of noble Kings the ſtately ſeat and palace once it was,
Faire for the ſite, and rich with all for ſpring of corne and graſſe.
To neighbour places all it doth lawes, cuſtomes, faſhions give,
Her praiſe to give; theirs to deſerve the ſame for to receive.

Of all the Cities in theſe parts walled alone is ſhe, A Leſt ſhe to foes continuall a ſcambling prey might be.
What Knights ſhe bred, and what rewards they won to knighthood due;
Danes, Saxons fierce, bold Britans eke the Trojans off-ſpring knew.
Happie for praiſes old, happie for praiſes new of late,
New as thou art, thine honour old ſtrive to perpetuate.

Earle of Perth. And now of late King James the ſixth hath erected it to the title of an Earldome, having created James Baron Dromund Earle of Perth.

Baron Methwen. Unto Perth theſe places are neere neighbours, Methven, which Margaret an Engliſh Ladie, widow unto King James the fourth, purchaſed with readie money for her B third husband Henrie Steward deſcended of the royall blood, and for his heires; and withall obtained of her ſonne King James the fifth for him the dignitie of a Baron.

Rethuen, or Reuven. More beneath is Rethuen, a caſtle of the Rethuens, whoſe name is of damned memorie, conſidering that the three ſtates of the kingdome hath ordained, that whoſoever were of that name, ſhould forgoe the ſame, and take unto them a new; after that the Rethuens, brethren in a moſt curſed and horrible conſpiracie, had complotted to murder their ſoveraigne King James the ſixth, who had created William their father Earle of Gourie, and afterward beheaded him being lawfully convicted, when he would inſolently preſcribe lawes to his ſoveraigne. But of men condemned to per- C petuall oblivion I may ſeeme to have ſaid overmuch, although it concerneth poſteritie alſo for a Caveat, that wicked generations be notified, as well as noiſome weeds and venemous plants.

Gourie. As for the countrey Gourie aforeſaid, famous for the corn-fields, and ſingular fertilitie of the ſoile, it lyeth more plaine and flat along the other banke of Tay. In this Scone. tract over againſt Perth, on the farther ſide of Tay, ſtandeth Scone, a renowned monaſterie in old time, and of reverend reſpect for the coronation therein of the Kings of Scotland: ſince that time K. Keneth having hard by put the Picts for the moſt part to the ſword, placed a ſtone here encloſed within a chaire of wood for inauguration of the Kings of Scotland, that had beene tranſported out of Ireland into Argile: which D ſtone Edward the firſt King of England, cauſed to bee conveied unto Weſtminſter. Touching which I have put down this propheſie, ſo rife in everie mans mouth, ſince it hath now proved true and taken effect, as verie few of that ſort doe.

Ni fallat fatum, Scoti quocunque locatum
Inveniunt lapidem, regnare tenentur ibidem.
Except old ſawes be vaine,
And wits of wiſards blind,
The Scots in place muſt raigne,
Where they this ſtone ſhall finde.

Baron of Scone. But now Scone giveth title of Baron of Scone to Sir David Murray, whom K. James E for his good ſervice advanced lately to that honour.

Arrol. Earls of Arrol. Where Tay now growne bigger enlargeth himſelfe, there appeareth over it Arrol, the habitation of the noble Earles of Arrol, who ever ſince the Bruſes daies have beene by inheritance the Conſtables of Scotland: and verily they deduce an ancient pedegree from one Hay, a man of exceeding ſtrength and excellent courage; who together with his ſonnes, in a dangerous battaile of Scots againſt the Danes at Longcartie, caught up an Oxe yoke, and ſo valiantly and fortunately withall, what with fighting, and what with exhorting, re-enforced the Scots at the point to ſhrinke and recule, that they had the day of the Danes, and the King, with the States of the kingdome, aſcribed the victorie and their owne ſafetie unto his valour and proweſſe. F Whereupon in this place, the moſt battle & fruitfull grounds were aſſigned unto him and his heires; who in teſtimony hereof have ſet over their coat a yoke for their creſt, Huntly caſtle. over their Armes, Three Eſcotcheons Geules in Argent. Touching Huntley caſtle, that joyneth unto it, I have nothing to write, but that it hath given title to a very potent, great, and honourable family, whereof I am to ſpeake hereafter.

ANGU-

ANGUSIA, or ANGUS.

BY the out-let or mouth of Tay, and more within, beside the river North-Eske, Anguis called by the naturall and true Scots Æneia, lyeth extended with goodly fields bearing wheat and corne of all kinds plentifully, with large hills also and pooles, forrests, pastures, and meadowes, and also garnished with many
B forts and castles. In the very first entry into it from Goury, standeth Glamis, a castle, and the Baronie of a family surnamed Lions, which arose to honour and reputation, ever since that Sir I. Lion standing in the high favour of King Robert the Second, received this and the dignity of a Baron with the Kings daughter, for her marriage portion, and therewith, as I finde written, the surname of Lion: with a Lion in his Armes, within a Treassure Floury, as the Kings themselves doe beare, but in different colours: like as Sir Patrick Lion, Lord Glamis, who now liveth, was advanced very lately by King James the Sixth of that name to the honour of the Earle of Kinghorn.

Barons Glamys.

Not farre hence standeth Forfare, where for the administration of justice, the
C Barons Greies are hereditary Sheriffs, who being descended from the Greies of Chillingham in the county of Northumberland, came into Scotland with King James the first, at his returne out of England: upon the first of whom named Andrew, the King of his bounteous liberality bestowed the Seignorie of Foulis, together with Helen Mortimer in marriage for his advancement.

Forfar Sheriffdome.

Hard by the mouth of Tay is situate Dundee, sometimes called Alectum: others tearme it in Latin Taodunum; a towne verily of great resort and trade, and the Constable whereof by a speciall priviledge is Standard-bearer to the King of Scots. Hector Boetius, who was here born, expoundeth this name Dundee by way of allusion, to D Donum Dei, that is, Gods gift. This Hector, in the reflourishing time of learning, wrote the Scottish historie elegantly, and that out of such hidden and farre fetched monuments of antiquitie, that Paulus Jovius wondered in his writings, there should be records extant for above a thousand yeeres, of these remote parts of the world, Scotland, the Hebrides, and the Orcades: considering that Italy, the nource of fine wits, for so many ages after the Goths were cast out, was defective of writers and records. But of this place Master Jonston, borne not farre from it, writeth thus.

Where South wind with his whiſtling blaſts aloft doth mildly blow,
There Tay with ſtreame, and ſea with tide doe friendly meet below.

A As touching the Earles of Angus; Gilchriſt of Angus, renowned for his brave exploits under King Malcolm the fourth, was the firſt Earle of Angus that I read of. About the yeere 1242. John Comin was Earle of Angus, who died in France; and his widow (haply inheritrice to the Earldome) was married to Sir Gilbert Umfranvill an Engliſhman. For, both hee and his heires ſucceſſively after him, were ſummoned to the Parliaments in England (untill the third yeere of King Richard the ſecond) by the title of Earles of Angus. Howbeit the Lawyers of England refuſed in their Brieves and inſtruments to acknowledge him Earle, for that Angus was not within the kingdome of England, untill hee had brought forth openly in the face of B the Court, the Kings writ and warrant, wherein he was ſummoned to the Parliament by the name of Earle of Angus. In the reigne of David Brus, Thomas Stewart was Earle of Angus, who by a ſuddaine ſurpriſe won Barwicke, and ſtreightwaies loſt it; yea, and within a while after died miſerably in priſon at Dunbritton. But the Douglaſſes, men of haughtie mindes and invincible hearts, from the time of King Robert the third have beene Earles of Angus (after that George Douglaſſe had taken to wife the Kings daughter) reputed the chiefe and principall Earles of Scotland, and to whom this office belongeth, to carrie the regall Crown before the Kings at all the ſolemne aſſemblies of the kingdome. The ſixth Earle of Angus out of this ſtocke, was Archebald, who eſpouſed Margaret daughter to Henrie the ſeventh K. of England, and C mother to James the fifth King of Scots, by whom he had iſſue Margaret wife to Matthew Stewart Earle of Lennox; who after her brothers deceaſe, that died childleſſe, willingly reſigned up her right and intereſt in this Earldome, unto Sir David Douglaſſe of Peteindreich, her unkles ſonne by the fathers ſide, and that with the conſent of her husband and ſonnes; to the end that ſhe might binde the ſurer unto her ſelfe, by the linke alſo of a beneficiall demerite, that family, which otherwiſe in bloud was moſt neere; what time as Henrie her ſon went about to wed Marie the Queen: by which marriage King JAMES our Soveraigne, the mightie Monarch of great Britaine, was happily borne to the good of all Britaine.

MERNIS.

THeſe regions were in Ptolomees time inhabited by the VERNICONES, the ſame perhaps that the VECTURIONES mentioned by Marcellinus. But this their name is now quite gone, unleſſe wee would imagine ſome little peece thereof to remaine in Mernis. For many times in common ſpeech of the Britiſh tongue, V. turneth into M.

This ſmall province Mernis abutting upon the German O- E cean, and of a rich and battle ſoile, lieth very well, as a plaine and levell Champion. But the moſt memorable place therein is Dunnotyr, a Caſtle advanced upon an high and unacceſſible rocke, whence it looketh downe to the underflowing ſea; well fenſed with ſtrong walls and turrets, which hath beene a long time the habitation of the Keiths, of an ancient and verie noble ſtock; who by the guidance of their vertue became hereditarie Earles Mareſchals of the kingdome of Scotland, and Sheriffes of this province. In a porch or gallerie here, is to bee ſeene that ancient inſcription which I mentioned even now, of a companie belonging to the twentieth legion, the letters whereof the right noble and honourable Earle now living, a great lover of antiquitie, cauſed to be guilded. Somewhat farther from the ſea ſtandeth Fordon, gra- F ced in ſome ſort and commendable in regard of John de Fordon; who being borne here, diligently and with great paines compiled Scoti Chronicon, that is, The Scottiſh Chronicle: unto whoſe laborious ſtudies the Scottiſh Hiſtoriographers are very much indebted: but more glorious and renowned in old time, for the reliques of St. Palladius, beſtowed and ſhrined ſometime, as is verily thought, in this place; who in the yeere 431. was by Pope Celeſtinus appointed the Apoſtle of the Scottiſh nation.

FRom the ſea in the mediterranean or inland parts above Mernis; MAR enlargeth it ſelfe, and runneth forward threeſcore miles, or thereabout: where it lieth broadeſt Weſtwards, it ſwelleth up with mountaines, unleſſe it bee where the rivers Dee, which Ptolomee calleth DIVA, and Done make way for themſelves, and enfertile the fields. Upon the bank of Done, Kildrummy ſtandeth as a faire ornament to the countrey, being the ancient ſeat of the Earles of Marre: and not farre diſtant from it the habitation of the Barons Forbois, who being iſſued from a noble and ancient ſtocke, aſſumed this ſurname; whereas before time they were called Bois, after that the heire of that family had manfully killed a ſavage and cruell Beare. But at the very mouth of this river, there be two townes that give greater ornament, which of the ſaid mouth, that in the Britiſh tongue they call Aber, borrowing one name, are divided aſunder by one little field lying betweene: the hithermore of them, which ſtandeth neerer to Dee mouth, is much ennobled by an Epiſcopall dignitie (which King David the firſt tranſlated hither from Murthlake a little village) by faire houſes of the Canons, an Hoſpitall for poore people, and a free Grammar ſchoole; which William Elphinſton, Biſhop of the place in the yeere 1480. conſecrated to the training up of youth, and is called New Aberdon: The other beyond it, named Old Aberdon, is moſt famous for the taking of Salmons. But J. Jonſton, a native hereof, in theſe his verſes depainteth Aberdon thus.

It

A It is almoſt incredible what abundance of * Salmons as well theſe rivers, as others alſo in Scotland on both ſides of the realme, doe breed. This fiſh was altogether unknowne unto Plinie, unleſſe it were that Eſox of the Rhene: but in this North part of Europe paſſing well known, ſhining and glittering (as he ſaith) with his red bowels. In Autumne they engender within little rivers, and in ſhallow places for the moſt part, what time they caſt their ſpawne, and cover it over with ſand: and then are they ſo poore and leane, that they ſeeme to have nothing elſe in a manner but their ſmall bones. Of that ſpawn in the ſpring next following there comes a frie of tender little fiſhes, which making toward the ſea, in a ſmall time grow to their full bigneſſe: and
B in returning backe againe to ſeeke for the rivers wherein they were bred, they ſtrive and ſtruggle againſt the ſtreame: and looke whatſoever lyeth in their way to hinder their paſſage, with a jerke of their taile, and a certaine leape (whence haply they had their name Salmons) to the wonder of the beholders, they nimbly whip over; and keepe themſelves within theſe rivers of theirs untill they breed. During which time it is enacted by law they ſhould not bee caught; namely, from the feaſt of the Aſſumption of our Ladie, to the feaſt of Saint Andrew in winter. And it ſhould ſeeme they were reputed among the greateſt commodities of Scotland, when likewiſe it was ordained that they ſhould not be ſold unto Engliſhmen, but for Engliſh gold, and no other contentation. But theſe matters I leave for others.

* Bede, and our writers called them in Latin Iſicii. Scotes?

C To come now unto the Earles of Marre. In the reigne of Alexander the third, William Earle of Marre is named among thoſe that were ſore offended and diſpleaſed with the King. Whiles David Brus reigned, Donald Earle of Marre, Protector of the Kingdome, was before the battaile at Dyplin murdered in his bed, by Edward Balliol, and the Engliſhmen that came to aide him: whoſe daughter Iſabel King Robert Brus tooke to be his former wife, on whom he begat Marjorie mother to Robert Stewart King of Scots. Under the ſame David there is mention alſo made of Thomas Earle of Marre, who was baniſhed in the yeere 1361. Likewiſe in the reign of Robert the third, Alexander Stewart is named Earle of Marre, who in the battell at Harley againſt the Ilanders loſt his life, in the yeer 1411. In the daies of King James D the firſt we read in Scoto-Chronicon thus: Alexander Earle of Marre died in the yeere 1435. the baſe ſon of Alexander Stewart Earle of Bucquan, ſonne to Robert the ſecond King of Scots; after whom, as being a baſtard, the King ſucceeded in the inheritance. John the ſecond ſonne of King James the ſecond afterwards bare this title; who being convict for attempting by art magicke to take away the King his brothers life, was let blood to death. And after him Robert Cockeran was promoted from a Maſon to this dignitie by King James the third, and ſoon after hanged by the Nobilitie. Since which time this honourable title was diſcontinued, untill that Queen Marie adorned therewith James her baſtard brother: and not long after, when it was found that by ancient right the title of Earle of Marre appertained to John Lord Ereskin, in lieu of E Marre ſhe conferred upon him the honour of Earle Murray, and created John Ereſkin, a man of ancient and noble birth Earle of Marre; whoſe ſonne bearing the ſame Chriſtian name, now enjoieth alſo the ſame dignity, and is in both realmes one of the Kings Privie Councell.

BUQUHAN.

F THE TAIZALI mentioned by Ptolomee, in ancient times inhabited where now Buquhan, in Latin Boghania and Buchania, above the river Done beareth forth toward the German ſea. Albeit the rivers in this coaſt everie where breed River Ratra. breed great ſtore of Salmons, yet doe they never enter into the river Ratra, as Buchanan hath recorded. Neither let it be offenſive if I cite his teſtimonie, although his bookes by authoritie of Parliament in the yeere 1584. were forbidden: becauſe many things in them contained are to be daſhed out. Who alſo hath written, That on the banke of Ratra there is a cave neere unto Stangs Caſtle, the nature whereof ſeemeth not to be paſſed over. The water diſtilling by drops out of a naturall vault, preſently turneth into Pyramidall ſtones, and were not the ſaid cave or hole otherwhiles rid and cleanſed by mans labour, the whole ſpace as far as up to the vault would in ſhort time be filled therewith. Now the ſtone thus engendred is of a middle nature betweene yce and hard ſtone: for it is brittle and eaſie to crumble, neither groweth it ever to the ſoliditie and hardneſſe of marble. Concerning thoſe Claik-geeſe, which ſome with much admiration have beleeved to grow out of trees, both upon this ſhore & elſewhere, and when they be ripe to fall downe into the ſea, it is ſcarce worth the labour to mention them. That there be little birds engendred of old and rotten keeles of ſhips, they can beare witneſſe, who ſaw that ſhip wherein Francis Drake ſailed about the world, ſtanding in a docke neere the Tamis; to the outſide of the keele whereof a number of ſuch little birds without life and feathers ſtuck cloſe. Yet would I gladly thinke that the generation of theſe birds, was not out of the logges of wood, but from the very Ocean, which the Poets tearmed the Father of all things.

Amber. A mightie maſſe likewiſe of Amber, as bigge as the bodie of an horſe, was not many yeeres ſince caſt upon this ſhore. The learned call it Succinum, Gleſſum, and Chryſo-Electrum: and Sotacus ſuppoſed that it was a certaine juice or liquor which diſtilleth out of trees in Britain, and runneth downe into the ſea, and is therein hardned. Tacitus alſo was of the ſame opinion, when he wrote thus: I can verily beleeve, that like as there be trees in the ſecret and inward parts of the Eaſt, which ſweat out frankincenſe and balme, ſo in the Ilands and other countries of the Weſt, there bee woods and groves of a more fattie and firme ſubſtance, which melting by the hot beames of the Sunne approching ſo neere, runneth into the ſea hard by, and by force of tempeſt floateth up to the ſhores againſt it. But Serapio, and the Philoſophers of later times write that it ariſeth out of a certain clammie and bituminous earth under the ſea, and by the ſea ſide; and that the billowes and tempeſts caſt up part thereof a land, and fiſhes devoure the reſt: But I digreſſe extravagantly, I will into my way againe, and ſince I acknowledge my fault, let my confeſſion purchaſe pardon.

Earles of Buquhan. In the reigne of King Alexander the ſecond, Alexander Comin roſe up to the honour of Earle of Buquhan, who married the daughter and one of the heires of Roger de Quincie Earle of Wincheſter in England, and his Niece by a ſonne brought the ſame title unto Henrie de Beaumont her husband: for he, in King Edward the third his daies had his place in the Parliament of England, by the name of Earl of Buquhan. Afterwards, Alexander Stewart, ſonne to King Robert the ſecond, was Earle of this place; unto whom ſucceeded John, a younger ſonne of Robert Duke of Albanie, who arriving in France with ſeven thouſand Scottiſhmen to aide Charles the ſeventh King of France, bare himſelfe valiantly, and performed ſingular good ſervice againſt the Engliſh men, and that with ſo great commendation, as having victoriouſly ſlaine Thomas Duke of Clarence brother to Henrie the fifth King of England at Baugie, and diſcomfited the Engliſh, he was made Conſtable of France. But in the third yeere following, when the fortune of warre turned, hee, with other moſt valiant Knights, to wit, Archibald Douglaſſe Earle of Wigton, and Duke of Touraine, &c. was vanquiſhed at Vernoil by the Engliſh, and there ſlain. But afterwards King James the firſt gave the Earldome of Buquhan unto George of Dunbar, moved thereto upon pitie and commiſeration, becauſe hee had deprived him before of the Earldom of March by authority of Parliament, for his fathers crime: and not long after, James the ſonne of James Stewart of Lorn, ſurnamed the Black Knight, whom he had by Q. Joan ſiſter to the Duke of Somerſet, and widdow to King James the firſt, obtained this honour, and left it to his poſteritie: but for default not long ſince of heires male, it came by a daughter married to Robert Douglas, a younger brother of Douglas of Lochlevin, to the family of the Douglaſſes.

Earles of Murray.

Under the reigne of Robert Brus, Thomas Randolph his ſiſters ſonne, who in his Countries behalfe undertooke exceeding great paines, and moſt grievous quarrels, was highly renowned by the title of Earle of Murray. Under King Robert the Second, John of Dunbarre tooke to wife the Kings daughter, to make amends for

A for her devirgination, received this Earldome of Murray with her in marriage. Under King James the ſecond William Creichton Chancelour of the Realme, and Archebald Douglas grew to great variance and eagre contention about this Earledome, when as againſt the lawes and ancient cuſtomes, Douglas who had married the younger daughter of James of Dunbar Earle of Murray, was preferred to the Earldom before Creighton who had wedded the elder, and that through the powerfull authoritie that William Earle Douglaſſe had with the King; which was ſo great that he advanced not onely him to the Earldom of Murray, but alſo another brother to the Earldome of Ormund; and made two couſins of his Earles, the one of Angus,
B and the other of Morton. But this greatneſſe of his, not to be truſted upon becauſe it was exceſſive, turned ſoone after to his owne confuſion. Under King James the fifth, his own brother, whom he appointed his Vicegerent in the government of the Kingdome, enjoied this honour: and within our remembrance, James the baſe ſonne of King James the fifth received this honour of Queene Mary his ſiſter: but he requited her baſely, when conſpiring with ſome few of the Nobilitie, he depoſed her from her Royall eſtate and kingdome; a foule preſident, and prejudiciall to all Kings and Princes. Which notwithſtanding was revenged, for ſhortly after hee was ſhot through with a bullet. His onely daughter brought this title unto her husband Sir James Stewart of Downe, who was alſo of the blood royall from the Dukes of Al-

WHatſoever beyond the Neſſe bendeth to the Weſt coaſt, and adjoineth to the Lake Aber, is thereupon called Loghuabre, that is in the ancient tongue of the Britans, The mouth of the Lakes, as what lieth toward the North is commonly called Roſſe.

D Loqhuabre is full of freſh paſtures and woods, neither is without yron mines, but not ſo free in yeeld of corne; but for moſt fiſhfull pooles, and rivers ſcarce inferiour to any country thereabout. At Logh-Lothey, Innerlothey, fenſed with a fort, and well frequented with Merchants, was of great name and importance in times paſt, but being razed by the piracies and warres of Danes and Norwegians, it hath lien for theſe many ages ſo forlet, that there remaineth ſcarce any ſhew of it; which thoſe verſes that I alledged even now doe imply. Loqhuabre hath had, ſo farre as I have read, no Earles: but about the yeere of our ſalvation 1050. there was a Thane over it of great fame, and much
E ſpoken of, named Banqhuo, whom Macbeth the baſtard, when with murder & bloodſhed he had uſurped the crowne, being fearfull and ſuſpicious, cauſed to bee made away; for that he had learned by a Propheſie of certaine wiſe women, that his poſteritie, when the line of Macbeth was expired and extinct, ſhould one day obtaine the Kingdome, and by a long ſucceſſive deſcent reigne in Scotland. Which verily hath fallen out accordingly. For Fleanch the ſonne of Banqhuo, who unknowne in the darke eſcaped the traines laid for him, fled into Wales, where for a time hee kept himſelfe cloſe: and having taken to wife Neſta the daughter of Griffith ap Lewellin
F Prince of North-wales, begat Walter; who returning into Scotland, with ſo great fame of his fortitude repreſſed the rebellion of the Ilanders, and with as great wiſdome managed the Kings revenewes in this tract, that the King made him Seneſchall, whom they commonly call Stewart of the whole Kingdome of Scotland. Whereupon this name of Office impoſed the ſurname Stewart unto his poſteritie: who ſpreading throughout all parts of Scotland into a number of noble branches, after many honours heaped upon them, have flouriſhed a long time, and from out of them, three hundred yeeres agoe and thirtie, Robert Stewart by Marjorie his mother, daughter to King Robert Brus, obtained the Kingdome of Scotland:

and now lately James Stewart of that name the ſixth King of Scots, by Margaret his great grandmother, daughter to King Henrie the ſeventh (the divine power of that moſt high and almightie Ruler of the world ſo diſpoſing) is aſcended with the generall applauſe of all nations, to the height of Monarchicall majeſtie over all Britaine, and the Iſles adjacent. ROSSIA.

THe Province Rosse, ſo called by an old Scottiſh word, which ſome interpret to be a Promontorie, others a Biland, was inhabited by the people named Cantæ (which terme in effect implieth as much) in the time of Ptolomee. This extendeth it ſelfe ſo wide and large, that it reacheth from the one ſea to the other. What way it beareth upon the Vergivian or Weſtern Ocean, by reaſon of huge ſwelling mountaines advancing their heads aloft, and many woods among them, it is full of ſtagges, roe buckes, fallow Deere, and wilde foule: but where it butteth upon the German ſea, it is more lovely bedect with corne fields and paſtures, and withall much more civill. In the very firſt entrance into it Ardmanoch, no ſmall territorie, whereof the ſecond ſonnes of the Kings of Scotland beare the title, riſeth up with high mountaines, that are moſt truſtie preſervers of ſnow. As touching their height, ſome have reported unto me ſtrange wonders: and yet the ancient Geometers have written, that neither the depth of ſea, nor height of hills exceed by the plumbe line ten ſtadia, that is, one mile and a quarter. Which notwithſtanding, they that have beheld Tenariffe, amongſt the Canarie Ilands, which is fifteene leagues high, and ſailed withall the Ocean neere unto them, will in no wiſe admit for truth. In this part ſtandeth Lovet Caſtle, and the Baronie of the worthy family of the Fraſers, whom for their ſingular good ſervice for the Scottiſh kingdome, King James the ſecond accepted into the ranke of Barons: and whom the Clan-Ranalds, a moſt bloodie generation, in a quarrell and braule between them, had wholly deſtroied every mothers ſonne, but that by the providence of God, foureſcore of the principall perſons of this family left their wives at home all great with child, who being delivered of ſo many ſonnes, renewed the houſe, and multiplied the name againe. But at Neſſe mouth there flouriſhed ſometimes Chanonrie, ſo called of a rich Colledge of Chanons, whiles the Eccleſiaſticall ſtate ſtood in proſperitie, in which there is erected a See for the Biſhop of Roſſe. Hard by is placed Cromartie, where Urqhuart, a Gentleman of noble birth, by hereditarie right from his anceſtours, miniſtreth juſtice as Sheriffe to this Sheriffdome: and this is ſo commodious and ſafe an harbour for any fleet, be it never ſo great, that both Sailers and Geographers name it Portus-salutis, that is, The Haven of ſafetie.

Above it is Littus Altum, whereof Ptolomee maketh mention, called now, as it ſeemeth, Tarbarth: for there indeed the ſhore riſeth to a great height, encloſed on the one ſide with Cromer a moſt ſecure and ſafe haven; and on the other with Celnius, now Killian the river: and thus much of the places toward the Eaſt Ocean. Into the weſt ſea the river Longus, mentioned in Ptolomee, at this day named Lough Longus, runneth: then the Cerones anciently dwelt where now is Aſſinſhire, a countrey much mangled with many inlets and armes of the ſea inboſoming it ſelfe with manifold commodities.

As for the Earls of Roſſe, it is full of difficulty to ſet them down in order ſucceſſively out of writers. About foure hundred yeers paſt, we read that Ferqhuard flouriſhed & enjoied this title: But for default of iſſue male, it came by a daughter to Walter Leſley, who for his noble feats of armes courageouſly atchieved under Lewis the Emperour, was worthily named The Noble Knight: he begat Alexander Earle of Roſſe, and a daughter married unto Donald Lord of the Iſlands Hebrides. This Alexander had iſſue one onely daughter, who made over by her deed all her owne title and

A and right unto Robert Duke of Albany: whereat the ſaid Donald of the Iſlands being highly enchafed and repining, ſtiled himſelfe in the reigne of James the third, King of the Iſlands, and Earle of Roſſe, having with fire and ſword laied waſte his native country far & neere. At length, the ſaid K. James the third by authoritie of Parliament, in the yeere 1476. annexed the Earldome of Roſſe to the crowne, ſo as it might not be lawfull for his ſucceſſours to alienate by any meanes from the crowne, either the Earldome it ſelfe, or any parcell thereof, or by any device to grant the ſame unto any perſon, ſave onely to the Kings ſecond ſonnes lawfully borne: whence it is that Charles the Kings ſecond ſonne, Duke of York, at this day holdeth and en-
B joieth the title of Earle of Roſſe.

SUTHERLAND.

C BEyond Roſſe, Sutherland looketh toward the Eaſt Ocean; a land more meet to breed cattell than to beare corne: wherein there be hills of white marble (a wonderfull thing in this ſo cold a climate) but of no uſe almoſt, conſidering exceſſe in building, and that vain oſtentation of riches, is not yet reached to theſe remote regions. Here is Dunrobin, a caſtle of very great name, the principall ſeat of the ancient Earles of Sutherland, deſcended, if I be not deceived, out of the family of Murray. Among whom, one William under King Robert Brus is moſt famous, who married the ſiſter of the whole blood to K. David, and had by her a ſon, whom the ſaid David declared heire apparant of the crown, and compelled his Nobles to ſweare unto him alleageance: but he within a little after departed without iſſue, and the Earldome in the end came by a daughter and heire hereditarily unto A. Gordon, one of the line of the Earles of Huntly.

CATHANES.

D HIgher lieth CATHANES, butting full upon the ſaid Eaſt ſea bending inward with a number of creakes and compaſſes, which the waves as it were indent: In which dwelt in Ptolomees time the CATINI, but written falſly in ſome copies CARINI, among whom the ſelfe ſame Ptolomee placeth the river Ila, which may ſeem to be the Wiſe at this day. The inhabitants of this province raiſed their greateſt gaine and revenues by grazing and raiſing of cattell, and by fiſhing. The chiefe caſtle therein is called Girnego, in which the Earls
E of Catneſſe for the moſt part make their abode. The Biſhops ſea is in Dornock, a little meane town otherwiſe; where alſo King James the fourth appointed the Sheriffe of Catneſſe to reſide, or elſe at Wik, as occaſions ſhould require, for the adminiſtration of juſtice.

Catini a people.

The Earles of Catneſſe in ancient times were alſo Earles of the Orcades, but at laſt they became diſtinct, and by the eldeſt daughter of one Maliſe given in marriage to William Seincler the Kings Pantler, his heires ſucceſsively came to be Earls of Catneſſe, and doe ſtill enjoy the ſame honour.

STRATHNANERN.

F THe utmoſt and fartheſt coaſt of all Britaine, which with the front of the ſhore looketh full againſt the North point, and hath the midſt of the greater Beares taile, which, as Cardan was of opinion, cauſeth tranſlations of Empires, juſt over head, was inhabited, as wee may ſee in Ptolomee, by the CORNABII, among whom he placeth the river NABEUS, which names are of ſo neere neere affinitie; that the nation may ſeeme to have drawne their denomination from the river that they dwelt by: neither doth the moderne name Strath-Navern, which ſignifieth the Valley by Navern, jarre altogether in ſound from them. The country it ſelfe is for the ſoile nothing fertile, and by reaſon of the ſharpe and cold aire, leſſe inhabited; and thereupon ſore haunted and annoied with moſt cruell wolves. Which in ſuch violent rage not only ſet upon cattell, to the exceeding great dammage of the inhabitants, but alſo aſſaile men with great danger; and not in this tract onely, but in many other parts likewiſe of Scotland, in ſo much as by vertue of an act of Parliament, the Sheriffes and inhabitants in every countrey, are commanded to goe forth thrice a yeere a hunting, for to deſtroy the wolves and their whelpes. But (if in this ſo Northerly a countrey this be any comfort to ſpeak of) it hath of all Britain again the ſhorteſt night, and the longeſt day. For, by reaſon of the poſition of heaven here diſtant from the Æquinoctiall line 59. degrees and fortie minutes, the longeſt day containeth 18. houres and 25. ſcruples: and the ſhorteſt night not above five houres and 45. ſcruples. So that the Panegyriſt is not true in this, who made report in times paſt, That the ſunne in manner ſetteth not at all, but paſſeth by, and lightly glanceth upon the Horizon: haply relying upon this authoritie of Tacitus, for that the extreme points, and plaine levels of the earth, with their ſhade ſo low raiſed up no darkneſſe at all. But more truely Plinie (according to true reaſon) where hee treateth of the longeſt dayes, according to the inclination of the ſunnes circle to the Horiſon. The longeſt daies (ſaith he) in Italy are 15. houres, in Britaine 17. where the light nights doe prove that undoubtedly by experience, which reaſon forceth credibly, that in Midſummer daies, when the ſunne approacheth neer to the Pole of the world, the places of the earth under the Pole have day 6. months, though the light having but a narrow compaſſe, the night contrariwiſe when he is farre remote in middle winter.

In this utmoſt tract, which Ptolomee extendeth out farre Eaſt, whereas indeed it beareth full North (for which Roger Bacon in his Geography taxed him long ſince) where Tacitus ſaid, That an huge and enorme ſpace of ground running ſtill forward to the fartheſt point, groweth narrow like a wedge. There run out three Promontories, mentioned by the old writers, namely BERUBIUM, now called Urdehead, neere to Bernſwale a village: VIRVEDRUM, now Dunsby, otherwiſe named Duncansby, which is thought to be the moſt remote promontorie of Britain: ORCAS, now named Howburn, which Ptolomee ſetteth over againſt the Iſlands Orcades, as the utmoſt of them all: this alſo in Ptolomee is called TARVEDRUM, and TARVISIUM, and ſo named, if my conjecture faile me not, becauſe it is the fartheſt end of Britaine: for Tarvus in the Britiſh tongue hath a certaine ſignification of ending. With which I accordingly will end this booke, purpoſing to ſpeake of the out-Iſles, Orcades, Hebudes or Hebrides, and of Shetland, in their due place.

THus have I briefly run over Scotland, and verily more briefly than the worth of ſo great a kingdom requireth: neither doubt I but that ſome one or other will ſet it forth more at large, and depaint it (as I ſaid) with a more flouriſhing penſill, in greater certainty, and upon better knowledge; when as our moſt mighty Monarch now openeth thoſe remote places, hitherto fore-cloſed from us. Meane while, if I have at any time dropt aſleepe (for the moſt watchfull may ſometimes bee taken napping) or if ſome errour in this unknowne tract hath miſled mee from the truth (as nothing is more rife and eaſie than errour) I hope the courteous Reader will pardon it upon my acknowledgment; and of his kindneſſe recalling me from errour, direct me in the right way to the truth.

THE BRITISH OCEAN.

NOw have I rather paſſed over than throughly ſurveied all BRITAIN, namely, thoſe two moſt flouriſhing Kingdomes, ENGLAND and SCOTLAND: And whereas I am now to croſſe the ſeas for IRELAND, and the reſt of the Iſles, if I premiſe ſome few lines touching the Britiſh ſea, I hope it ſhal not ſeem a crooked courſe, or an extravagãt digreſsion. The Britiſh ſea

BRITAIN is encompaſſed round about with the vaſt open and main Ocean, which ebbeth and floweth ſo violently with main tides, that, as Pytheas of Marſiles hath reported, it ſwelleth 80. cubits about Britaine: and St. Baſile hath tearmed it Mare Magnum, &c. The great ſea and dreadfull to Sailers: yea and S Ambroſe wrote thus of it; The great ſea not adventured on by ſailers, nor attempted by Mariners, is that which with a roaring and ſurging current environeth Britaine, and reacheth into far remote parts, and ſo hidden out of ſight, as that the fables have not yet come hither. Certes this ſea ſometimes overfloweth the fields adjoining, otherwhiles again it retireth & leaveth all bare: and that I may uſe the words of Plinie, by reaſon of this open largeneſſe, it feeleth more effectually the force and influence of the Moone, exerciſing her power thereupon without impeachment: and it floweth alwaies up within the land with ſuch violence, that it doth not onely drive back the ſtreames of rivers, but alſo either overtaketh and ſurpriſeth beaſts of the land, or elſe leaveth behind it thoſe of the ſea. For there have bin ſeen in everie age, to the great aſtoniſhment of the beholders, ſo many and ſo huge Seamonſters left on dry land on our ſhore, that Horace ſang this note not without good cauſe: Lib. Hexameron. cap. 3.

Britiſh ſea in times paſt unknowne.

And ſo great an adventure and exploit it was thought, but to croſſe only this our ſea, that Libanius the Grecian ſophiſter, in a Panegyricall oration unto Conſtantinus Chlorus, cried out in theſe words : ὑχείρονα πρεπαίᾳ & μεγίϛᾳ φαίνεαζ ἡ πλῶϛ : that is, This voiage into Britain ſeemed comparable to the greateſt triumph. And Julius Firmicus, not that famous Aſtrologer, but another that was a Chriſtian, in a little treatiſe of the errour of profane religions, written unto the Emperours Conſtans & Conſtantius, brake out into this exclamation. In winter time (a thing that never was done before, nor ever will be done again) ye trampled under your oares the ſwelling and raging billowes of the Britiſh Ocean. The waves of the ſea, unknown in a manner before times unto us, then trembled and quaked, and the Britans were terrified at the ſudden preſence of the Emperor: What will ye more? the verie elements yeelded themſelves as conquered unto your valerous vertues.

Jul. Firmicus.

The famous learned man Julius Scaliger in his Poeticalls, affirmeth that Caurus the North-weſt winde ariſeth and bloweth out of this Britiſh ſea, and that againſt the opinion of Lucan, who wrote thus :

Certes in Ireland he keeps foule work, and plaies the tyrant; and Cæſar writeth that a great part of the yeere he ſtands in this coaſt.

But whereas ſome write that in this our ſea ſhips were firſt deviſed & uſed, I am not diſpoſed to beleeve them. Moreover, there be certain Ilands, which, as it were for a ſhew, Nature hath beſprinkled along theſe ſeas, fewer toward the Eaſt and South parts, but Weſtward and Northward more in number. For there, by their thick ſtanding together, they do after a ſort garniſh the ſea, yea and depaint it as it were with their colours, in moſt pleaſant ſort. But for as much as Ireland farre excelleth all the reſt, in regard of the greatneſſe thereof, and frequencie of reſort thereto, it requireth by due right, that it ſhould firſt be treated of.

IRELAND.

IN the Vergivian ſea, which name is derived, not à vergendo, that is, of bending towards, as ſome are of opinion, but of Mor-weridh; for this name the Britans gave it: or elſe of Farigi, by which name the Iriſh men call it, the moſt famous Iland HIBERNIA, that is to ſay, IRELAND, encloſeth the Weſt ſide of Britain; an Iland which in times paſt challenged the third place amongſt all the Iſles of the then knowne world. For thus as touching Ilands writeth the ancient Geographer. Τῶν νήσων πρωτεύει ἡ Ἰνδικὴ ΤΑΠΡΟΒΑΝΗ μεγέθει καὶ δόξῃ, εἶθ' ἡ ΒΡΕΤΑΝΝΙΚΗ, τρίτη ἐπέχει Βρεττανικὴ ἡ ΟΥΕΡΝΙΑ: that is, Of all Ilands for greatneſſe the Indian TAPROBANE is prime and principall; next after it BRITAINE; and in a third degree another Britiſh Iland, named HIBERNIA, that is, Ireland; and thereupon Ptolomee called it LITTLE BRITAIN.

Whence theſe names have had their originall, ſundry and divers opinions have beene conceived from time to time, as in a doubtfull matter. Some derive Hibernia from Hiberno tempore, that is, from the Winter ſeaſon; others from Hiberus a Spaniard; and ſome againe from the river Iberus: the author of the booke entituled Eulogium, from Duke Irnalph: Poſtellus, a fancifull man, when he read Pomponius Mela publikely in Paris, becauſe hee would ſeeme to have a reach beyond other men, fetcheth the originall thereof from the Hebrewes: ſo that Irin ſhould bee as much as Jurin, that is, the Jewes land: The

D Jewes, forſooth ſaith he, being moſt wiſe Sages, and learned Philoſophers, knowing by their learning that the Empire of the world ſhould be ſetled in the ſtrongeſt Angle, which lieth Weſt, ſeized upon thoſe parts, and Ireland with the firſt: The Syrians alſo and Tyrians, to lay the foundation of their future Empire, endevoured all they could to inhabite thoſe Regions. Pardon me I pray you if I dare not ſubſcribe hereto, no nor give my conſent to that opinion moſt received, as touching the Winter ſeaſon aforeſaid: although I have read, that in this Iland the aire upon every winde is cold and winterlike. As for Hibernia, Juverna, and Ouernia, they came doubtleſſe from IERNA, ſpoken of by Orpheus and Ariſtotle: and the ſame Ierna, as alſo Iris, Yuerdhon, and Ireland, from Erin, the tearme that the inhabitants uſe. From this Erin there-

E fore, a word proper unto the nation, the originall muſt be deduced. Here I, with thoſe great Philoſophers, ἐπέχω, that is, hold off and ſuſpend my judgement: neither know I what to divine and ground my conjecture upon, unleſſe peradventure that name may come from Hiere, an Iriſh word, which with them ſignifieth the Weſt, or a Weſtern coaſt; whence Erin may ſeeme to bee derived, as one would ſay, a Weſtern countrey. Of this opinion have I been a good while ſince, induced thereto with my owne conceit and flattering conjecture, both becauſe it lieth furtheſt Weſtward of any region in all Europe (as being no more than twelve degrees diſtant from the utmoſt Weſt point) as alſo for that the river running in the moſt re-

F mote Weſt part of this Iland, is in Ptolomee called IERNUS, like as the Promontorie or Cape bearing out fartheſt Weſt in Spaine (from whence our Iriſh-men came) is named by Strabo IERNE, and as the next river unto it, which alſo is moſt Weſt of all the rivers in Spaine, is called by Mela IERNA. Moreover, by reaſon of the Weſtern ſituation Spaine is named Heſperia, aud that Weſt Cape in Africk, Heſperium

I have ſpoken of, the Iriſh Bards or Poets have uſually taken up in their ballads theſe tearmes, Tirvolas, Totidanan, and Banno, as the moſt ancient names of this Iland, but tioneth out of Timæus, whiles his pen coaſteth along the outmoſt ſides and skirts of Europe, and the ſhore of the Northren Ocean on the left hand from Scythia, even as farre as Cadis in Spaine. For what countrey that ſame Bannomanna ſhould bee, the Geographers have not yet found out. But Biaun in Iriſh ſignifieth Sacred or Ho- B Ogygia. In his book De macula in Luna, that is, Of the ſpot in the Moone.

If that OGYGIA, which Plutarch placed on the Weſt ſide of our Britaine were not ὄναρ, but ὄνως, not a vaine dreame, but a matter in truth, hee may ſeeme by that name plainly to point at Ireland, although the reports that he ſo ſadly telleth of it, be meer poeticall fictions & Maleſian toies. Neither can any man readily tell, why they called it Ogygia; unleſſe haply of the antiquitie: For the Grecians tearmed nothing by the name of Ogygia but that which was very ancient. And Robert Conſtantine ſee-Iſle Cerne. meth to have ſhot wide all the world over, when he affirmeth that CERNE, mentioned in Lycophron, was our Ireland: for Lycophron himſelfe, and Tzetzes that com- E menteth upon him, doe place Cerne toward the ſunne riſing: and all the beſt learned men thinke it to be Madagaſcar, ſituated as it were in another world, right under the Tropique of Capricorne, right over againſt Æthiopia. Thus much touching the names of Ireland, yet ſo, as we remember withall to take this by the way, that in Hibernia called Scotia. theſe later times it was called alſo SCOTIA, that is, Scotland by Iſidor and Bede, of the Scots who inhabited it: and that thence the name of Scotland, together with the Scots themſelves, came into Britaine. But of this we have ſpoken alreadie once before, and therefore have no cauſe to repeat here.

This Iland is ſtretched out from South to North not broader than it is long, as Strabo hath recorded, but ſhaped in forme of a lentile, or an egge; nor of twentie F dayes ſailing, as Philemon in Ptolomee hath ſet it downe: but according to the later
The ſtate of Ireland. writers, it taketh up three hundred miles and no more in length, and is ſcarcely one hundred and twentie miles broad. On the Eaſt ſide it hath England ſevered from it with a troublous and tempeſtuous ſea, which is called the Iriſh ſea: on the Weſt the huge

A huge maine Weſtern Ocean; on the North the Deucaledonian ſea, and on the South the Vergivian ſea worketh upon it.

The country, if you would heare Giraldus Cambrenſis to ſpeak, is uneven, full of hils, ſoft, wateriſh, and boggie, wild and overgrowne with woods, lying open to the winds, and ſo full of meeres or loghs, that a man may ſee ponds and ſtanding waters even upon the mountaines. The aire (as Mela ſaith) is nothing good and favourable for ripening of corn: but the ground is ſo ranke of graſſe, and the ſame not onely freſh and long, but ſweet alſo withall, that the cattell may fill their bellies in a ſmall piece of the day, and unleſſe they be kept from grazing, and not ſuffered to feed long together, their bellies will burſt. Hence
B it is that they have ſuch an infinite number of cattell, as being indeed the chiefe and principall wealth of the inhabitants, and many goodly flockes of ſheepe, which they ſheare twice a yeere, and make of their courſe wooll, rugges or ſhagge mantles, caddowes alſo or coverlets, which are vented into forraine countries. They have likewiſe excellent good horſes (we tearme them Hobbies) which have not the ſame pace that other horſes in their courſe, but a ſoft and round amble, ſetting one legge before another very finely. Their haukes alſo are right commendable, but theſe, as all other living creatures (beſides men, women, and greyhounds) are ſmaller here than in England. Now as well the aire as the ground is exceſſive moiſt; whence it is that very many there be ſore troubled with looſeneſſe, and rheumes, but ſtrangers eſpe-
C cially: yet for the ſtaying of the ſame they have an * Aqua vitæ of the beſt, which inflameth a great deale leſſe, and dryeth much more than ours. Whereas Giraldus writeth, that thoſe which are borne here ſicken never of any of the three kinds of feavers, it is daily found by experience to be falſe. As for the land it ſelfe (that I may uſe the teſtimonie here of the ſaid Giraldus) it is of all countries moſt temperate; neither doth any frying heat of Cancer drive folke to ſeeke ſhade, nor chilling cold of Capricorne call them in to the fire: but all times in maner, by reaſon of the pleaſantneſſe and temperate diſpoſition of the aire, have a gentle kinde of warmth.

Of Bees there are ſuch numbers, that they bee found not onely in hives, but alſo within the bodies of trees, and holes of the earth. Likewiſe it hath vines, but more
D for ſhade, than for any fruit they yeeld. For no ſooner is the ſunne paſſed out of Leo, but cold blaſts here in this our climat are wont preſently to follow, and in Autumne the after-noone heats are leſſe effectuall and ſhorter, both here and in our Britaine, than to give the full and kinde ripening unto Grapes. Beſides this, there is no ſnake in this countrey, nor any venemous thing whatſoever: howbeit much noiſance they have every where by wolves. And that I may ſpeake all at a word, whether a man reſpect the fertilitie of the ſoil, or the commodiouſneſſe of ſea and havens, or the inhabitants themſelves, who are ſtout, hardie, warlike, wittie, proper men of bodie, and goodly feature, of a wondrous ſoft skin, by reaſon alſo of the tenderneſſe of muſcles paſſing nimble; the Iland aboundeth in ſo many bleſſings, that Giraldus ſaid
E not without juſt cauſe, That nature had caſt into this weſtern kingdome of Zephirus, a more gracious eye than ordinarie. Now that otherwhiles there goeth of it an ill name, it is for that the inhabitants are in ſome places wilde and very uncivill, who in a marvellous contrarietie of nature, both love idleneſſe, and withall hate quietneſſe: who alſo are immoderately given to fleſhly luſt, and that over ſoone. For among the wilder ſort they beſtow their maidens in marriage, as ripe and readie for husbands, when they be once ten or twelve yeeres of age. Neither will they by any meanes ſtay for a competent maturitie of yeeres, a thing obſerved in all other countries. But as touching the manners and qualities of the Iriſh nation, I will diſcourſe more at large in the end of this booke. And now, if it pleaſe you, give Ireland the hearing, whiles ſhe
F ſpeaketh of her ſelfe and her commodities, in theſe verſes of that moſt learned man Hadrianus Junius.

Ireland why called Ogygia.

If that be true which the Iriſh Hiſtoriographers record, this Iland was not without cauſe by Plutarch tearmed Ogygia, that is, very ancient. For they fetch the beginning of their hiſtories from the moſt profound and remote records of antiquitie, ſo that in compariſon of them, the antientneſs of all other nations is but novelty, and, as it were, a matter of yeſterday. They write that one Cæſaria Noah his Niece, inhabited it before Noahs flood: Then that Bartholanus a Scythian came hither about three hundred yeeres after the ſaid Noahs flood, and fought right doughtie battels with giants: That many yeeres after Nemethus a Scythian arrived here, and forth- E with was caſt out by the Giants: After this, that Dela with certaine Grecians ſeized upon this Iſland; and ſoone after, that Gaothel with Scota his wife, daughter to Pharaoh King of Egypt landed here, and nominated after his wives name the Iſland Scotia, and according to his owne name the language Gaothela; and that, about the time of the Iſraelites departure out of Egypt. And the Britiſh hiſtorie reporteth how ſome few ages after, Hiberus and Hermion (Ever and Erimon the Iriſh writers terme them) the ſonnes of Mileſius King of Spaine, by the ſufferance of Gurguntius King of the Britans, planted colonies in this countrey, after it had beene diſpeopled by a peſtilence. My purpoſe is not either to averre theſe reports for true, nor yet to refute them: In ſuch things as theſe let Antiquitie bee pardonable, and enjoy a pre- F rogative.

Surely, as I doubt not but that this Iſland became inhabited even of old time, when as man-kinde was ſpred over all quarters of the world: ſo it is evident, that the firſt inhabitants thereof paſſed thither out of our Britaine: For (to ſay nothing of an infinite number of Britiſh words in the Iriſh tongue, together with the ancient

A ancient names which ſavour of a Britiſh originall); the natures of the people, and their faſhions, as Tacitus ſaith, differ not much from Britain: of all ancient writers it is called A Britiſh Iland: Diodorus Siculus termed Irin a part of Britaine: and Ptolomee named the ſame BRITANNIA PARVA, that is, little Britaine, as you may ſee, if you liſt to compare his Geographickes with his book of Great Conſtruction. And the Epitome of Strabo calleth the inhabitants in plaine words, BRITANS: the old Geographers alſo named it The Britans Iland: yea and Feſtus Aveienus ſheweth this out of Dionyſius Afer, when he treateth of Britiſh Ilands, in theſe verſes.

Britans the firſt inhabitants of Ireland.

B Eminus hic aliæ gelidi prope flabra Aquilonis
Exuperant undas, & vaſta cacumina tollunt,
Hæ numero geminæ, pingues ſola, ceſpitis ampli,
Conditur occidui quâ Rheni gurgitis unda,
Dira Britannorum ſuſtentant agmina terris.

Here other Iſlands neere unto the chilling North winds blaſt,
The waves of ſea ſurmount aloofe, and ſhew their mountaines vaſt,
In number twaine, their ſoile is fat, their ground both large and wide
What way the Weſtern Rhene his gulfe and waters deepe doth hide:
Theſe Lands fierce Britan troups maintaine, and thereon they abide.

C Neither is there any other countrey, out of which by reaſon of the vicinitie they might paſſe over more commodiouſly into Ireland than out of Britaine: from whence there is the like paſſage thither, in reſpect of the ſpace of ſea betweene, as is out of France into Britaine. But afterwards, when the Romanes had enlarged their Empire every way, many there were no doubt who out of Spaine, Gaule, and Britaine withdrew themſelves hither, that they might ſhake off that intolerable yoke of the Romans ſlaverie: Neither do ſome otherwiſe underſtand theſe words of Tacitus: Ireland being ſituate in the middeſt betweene Spaine and Britanie, lying alſo very fitly for the French ſea, would aptly have united, to the great uſe & advantage of the D one and the other, the ſtrongeſt members of the Empire together: the landing places and ports whereof, by entercourſe of trafficke, were better known than thoſe of Britain. And albeit Julius Agricola alſo kept with him a pettie King or Prince of Ireland, who was driven thence by occaſion of civill diſſention, that hee might have the more advantageous opportunitie thereby to invade the Iſland, which he thought would be ſubdued and held with a legion, and a ſmall power of aide forces; and was perſwaded withall, that the ſame would availe much for the affaires of Britaine, in caſe the Roman forces were planted everie where, and hope of libertie baniſhed, as it were, farre out of ſight: yet wee read not that the Romans gave any attempt that way. Notwithſtanding ſome are verily perſwaded that they aſſaied the conqueſt of it, and doe E gather the ſame hardly out of this place of Juvenal.

——Arma quid ultra

Why warred we paſt Iriſh coaſts, and the Orkneis lately wonne,

Yet the Panegyricall oration pronounced before Conſtantius the Emperour, implieth that Ireland was under his government: Britaine (ſaith he) is ſo recovered, that even F thoſe nations alſo which join upon the coaſts of the ſame Iſland, are become ſubject and obedient unto your command. Alſo we find written in the Chronicles of later hiſtorians, that Ireland, together with Britain and Thule, at the diviſion of the Empire fell unto Conſtantine, the ſonne of Conſtantine the Great. And that very fond fable of Cæſarea Noahs Niece, carrieth before it the name of Cæſars, ſo as that therein may ſeeme covertly couched the comming of ſome Cæſar into Ireland. Howbeit I can hardly perſwade my ſelfe to beleeve, that this countrey at any time became ſubject to the Romans. But a bleſſed and happie turne had it beene for Ireland, if it had at any time beene under their ſubjection: ſurely, it had then beene reduced from barbariſme to civilitie. For whereſoever the Romans were victors, they brought them whom they conquered to civilitie: neither verily in any place elſe throughout Europe was there any civilitie, learning, and elegance, but where they ruled. And very inconſiderately alſo they may ſeeme to have neglected this Iſland. For from hence (to the plague and ſpoile of Britaine) brake out moſt dangerous enemies: which Auguſtus ſeemeth to have foreſeene, when he tooke ſo ſmall care of Britaine, for the danger which hee preſaged to hover and approach from the nations round about adjoyning. But when the Roman Empire began now to decay, the nation of the Scots or Scythians (for, in times paſt, as Strabo writeth, all people weſtward were tearmed Celto-Scythæ) grew mightie in Ireland, and began to be renowned. Furthermore, under the Emperours Honorius and Arcadius it was inhabited by the Scottiſh nations, as Oroſius hath written. Whereupon Claudian living in the ſame age wrote thus:

Romane Conqueſts.

Scotorum cumulos flevit glacialis Ierne.
Yce-frozen Ireland wept amaine,
To ſee the Scots on heaps lye ſlaine.

And in another place,

——Totam cùm Scotus Hibernem
Movit——
What time as Scots did make,
All Ireland armes to take.

For from hence it was that the Scots made their forcible invaſions into Britaine, and hither they were otherwhiles with great loſſes and overthrowes repulſed. But whence they came into Ireland, Ninnius a diſciple of Elvodugus, an author of good antiquitie, ſhall enforme you by his own words; who lived, as himſelfe witneſſeth, in the yeere 830. under Anaraugh King of Angleſey and Guineth, or North-Wales. For after he had related, that in the third age of the world the Britans came into Britain, and in the fourth age, the Scythians or Scots into Ireland, hee proceedeth thus:

Iriſhmen out of Spaine. In other copies Iholanus.

Laſt of all came the Scots, from the parts of Spain into Ireland. But the firſt that arrived there, was Partholanus, with a thouſand men and women together, and they grew after to be four thouſand: and there fell a mortalitie among them, ſo that in one week they all died, and there remained of them not ſo much as one alive. The ſecond that landed in Ireland was one Nemeth, the ſon of Aguomenes, who, by report, ſailed upon the ſea one yeere and an halfe: and afterward, when he had ſuffered ſhipwrack, fell with an haven in Ireland, and he returned into Spain. And after that came three ſonnes of a Spaniſh knight, with thirtie Ciules with them, and in every Ciule thirtie wives; and they continued there for the ſpace of one yeere. Laſt of all came Elam-Hoctor, and dwelt there with all his progenie and generation, even to this day. With this Ninnius accordeth Henry of Huntingdon. The Britans (ſaith he) in the third age of the world came into Britain, and the Scots in the fourth into Ireland.

And how ever theſe reports be not moſt certaine, yet ſure it is that they came out of Spaine into Ireland: and part of them departing thence, came and added a third nation unto the Britans & Picts in Britaine. The received opinion of the Iriſh is agreeable hereunto, for they moſt willingly acknowledge themſelves to be an off ſpring of the Spaniards. Neither verily can it bee a marvaile, that a number of them withdrew themſelves into Ireland out of the North part of Spaine, which, as Strabo writeth, is moſt barren, and wherein men live moſt miſerably. Out of thoſe words of Ninnius a man may ſee, that thoſe entries made of Bartholanus and Nemethus, which fabulouſly they fetch ſo farre off, out of moſt profound and remote antiquitie, are to bee drawne backe unto later times. Neither is it needfull for me to note againe, that this Iſland was of the Scottiſh inhabitants called SCOTIA.

Nor

A Not many yeeres after, theſe Scots in Ireland began to profeſſe Chriſtianitie, although they would needs appropriate unto themſelves that hiſtorie out of Ruſinus, concerning the converſion of the Hiberians in Aſia, and Celeſtin Pope of Rome ſent unto theſe Scots Palladius the Biſhop. Whereupon Proſper Aquitanus writeth in this maner againſt Collator. Celeſtin delivered the Britans from the Pelagians hereſie, when he ſecluded certain enemies of grace, who held their own native countrey, even from that unknown part of the Ocean: and having ordained a Biſhop among the Scots, whiles he laboured to keep an Iland of the Romans in the Catholike faith, he brought alſo a barbarous nation to be Chriſtian. Yet Ninnius writeth, that Palladius being taken away by un- B timely death in Britaine, effected nothing: who alſo reporteth out of the Iriſh writers, that Chriſtian religion was publiſhed and preached throughout Ireland by Saint Patrick. For he being a Britan borne, and that as ſome will in Cluidſdale, allied alſo to Sir Martin of Tourain, and a diſciple of Saint German, was appointed ſucceſſour by Pope Celeſtin to Palladius deceaſed; who with ſo good ſucceſſe taught and ſowed the ſeed of Chriſtian religion over all Ireland, that hee converted the greateſt part by farre thereof unto Chriſt, and deſerved the name of the Apoſtle of the Iriſh nation. Touching whom an ancient writer, Hiericus Antiſiodorenſis in his booke of Saint Germans miracles; For as much as (ſaith he) the glory of a Father appeareth bright in the governance of his owne ſonnes, among many ſons whom we beleeve C St. German had in Chriſt, and Diſciples in religion, it ſhall ſuffice by way of compendious brevitie to inſert here the mention of one only, and the ſame of all others moſt famous: namely Patricke, as the whole courſe of his acts declareth, the peculiar Apoſtle of the Iriſh nation, wholly addicted for 18. yeeres unto his moſt holy diſcipline, out of the veine of ſo worthie a fountain drew no mean knowledge & learning in the heavenly ſcriptures. Whom alſo that moſt divine and godly Biſhop, conſidering to be in religion magnanimous, in vertues excellent, and in learning powerfull: and deeming it meere folly, that ſo ſtrong and able an husbandman ſhould live idle in the tillage and ordering of the Lords cornefield, directed him unto holy Celeſtine Pope of Rome, by Segetius a Prieſt of his, who ſhould give teſtimonie unto the Apoſtolicall See, of Eccleſiaſticall honeſtie in the behalfe of that D right excellent man. Being therefore approved with the judgment, ſupported with the authoritie, and laſtly ſtrengthened with the bleſſing of him, he made a voiage into Ireland, and being peculiarly appointed an Apoſtle of that nation, as he then lightned them with his doctrine & miracles, ſo now alſo and for ever adorneth them with wonderful privileges of his Apoſtleſhip. The Iriſh ſcholars of Patricke profited ſo notably in Chriſtianitie, that in the age next following, Ireland was tearmed Sanctorum patria, that is, The native countrey of Saints; and the Scottiſh Monks in Ireland and Britaine highly excelled for their holineſſe and learning, yea and ſent out whole flockes of moſt devout men into all parts of Europe, who were the firſt founders of Luxeul Abbey in Burgundie, of Bobie Abbey in Italy, of Wirtzburge Abbey in Francland, of St. Gallus E in Sweitzerland, of Malmesburie, Lindisfarn, and of many other Monaſteries in Britaine. For out of Ireland came Cælius Sedulius a Prieſt, Columba, Columbane, Colman, Aidan, Gallus, Kilian, Maidulph, Brendan, and many other celebrated for their holy life and learning. Of theſe Monkes is that Hieric above named of Auxerre to be underſtood, when he writeth thus to the Emperour Charles the Bald: What ſhould I ſpeake of Ireland, which ſetting light by the dangers of ſea, flitteth all of it well neere with whole flockes of Philoſophers unto our ſhores? of whom ſo many as are more skilfull and learned than the reſt, doe voluntarily baniſh themſelves, to attend dutifully upon the moſt wiſe Salomon, and be at his command.

Anno Chriſti 431. Palladius. Vincent. l. 9. c. 7

Monks of Ireland holy men and learned.

This Monaſticall profeſſion, although but then newly come up, was farre differ- F rent in thoſe daies from that of our time. They deſired to be that indeed which they were named to be: they were farre from colourable dealing or diſſembling: Erred they in any thing? it was through ſimplicitie, not through lewdneſſe, much leſſe of wilfull obſtinacie. As for wealth and theſe worldly things, they ſo highly contemned them, that they did not onely not ſeeke after, but alſo refuſed the ſame, though they were offered unto them deſcended by inheritance. For a notable apophthegme was that of Columbane (a Monke of Ireland) who, as the Abbat Walafride writeth, A when Sigebert King of the Franckners dealt very earneſtly with him, and that by way of many large and faire promiſes, that he ſhould not depart out of his kingdome, anſwered him after the ſame ſort, as Euſebius hath reported of Thaddeus, namely, That it became not them to embrace other mens riches, who for Chriſts ſake had forſaken their own. And the Biſhops of Britain ſeemed no leſſe to have deſpiſed riches, ſeeing they were ſo poore, that they had nothing of their owne. For, as we read in Sulpitius Severus, three Biſhops of Britaine, in the Councell holden at Rimine, for want of their owne lived of the publick charges. The Engliſh Saxons alſo in that age conflowed and reſorted from all parts into Ireland, as it were to the mart of good learning: and hence it is B that we read ſo often in our writers, concerning holy men thus, Such a one was ſent over into Ireland, for to be trained up in learning: and in the life of Sulgen, who flouriſhed 600. yeeres agoe.

And from thence it may ſeeme our forefathers the ancient Engliſh learned the C manner of framing their letters, and of writing; conſidering that they uſed the ſelfe ſame character, which the Iriſh commonly uſe at this day.

Engliſh Saxons ſeeme to have had their letters and writing from the Iriſh.

And no cauſe have wee to marvaile that Ireland, which now for the moſt part is rude, halfe barbarous, and altogether voide of any polite and exquiſite literature, was full of ſo devout, godly, & good wits in that age, wherein good letters throughout all Chriſtendome lay neglected and halfe buried, ſeeing that the divine providence of that moſt gracious and almightie ruler of the world, ſoweth the ſeeds and bringeth forth the plants of ſanctitie and good arts, one whiles in one nation and other whiles in another, as it were in garden beds and borders, and that in ſundry ages: which being removed and tranſlated hither and thither, may by a new growth D come up one under another, proſper, and bee preſerved to his owne glory, and the good of mankinde.

Arts and pietie ſowed among nations in ſundry ages.

But the outrage of warres by little and little quenched theſe hot affections and ſtudies of holineſſe and good literature. For in the yeere 644. after Chriſts nativitie, Egfrid King of Northumberland with fire and ſword made ſpoile and havocke of Ireland, a nation moſt friendly unto England; for which cauſe Bede chargeth him after a ſort, in moſt grave and important tearmes. Afterward the Norwegians, under the leading of Turgeſe their Captaine, ſpoiled and waſted the countrey in moſt lamentable manner for the ſpace of 30. yeeres: But when he was once ſlaine by a train and ambuſh laid for him, the inhabitants fell upon the Norwegians, and made ſuch a E bloodie maſſacre of them, that ſcarce any one ſurvived to be a meſſenger of ſo great a ſlaughter. Theſe Norwegians were no doubt thoſe Normans, who, as Rhegino ſaith, in the time of Charles the great, ſetting upon Ireland, an Iſle of the Scots, were by the Scots put to flight. After this the Ouſtmans, as one would ſay Eſterlings, or Eaſtmen, came out of the ſea-coaſts of Germanie into Ireland; who having entred into certain Cities under the pretence of great trafficke, in a ſhort ſpace raiſed a moſt dangerous warre. About the very ſame time in manner, Eadgar that moſt puiſſant King of England, conquered alſo a great part of Ireland: For thus we read in a certaine Charter of his: Unto whom God of his gracious favour hath granted, together with the Empire of England, dominion over all the kingdomes of the Iſles lying in the Ocean, with their moſt F ſtout and fierce Kings, even as farre as to Norway, yea and to ſubdue under the Engliſh Empire the greateſt part of Ireland, with her moſt noble Citie Dublin.

Ouſtmanni, who haply are thoſe that Tacitus nameth Aeſtiones, and Egiwardus Aiſti.

After theſe tempeſtuous forraine warres were allaied, there followed a moſt grievous ſtorme of civill diſſention at home, which made way for the Engliſh to conquer Ireland. For Henrie the ſecond King of England, taking occaſion and opportunitie

A tunitie, by the privie diſlikes, heart-burnings, and malicious emulations among the Iriſh Princes, grew into a ſerious deliberation with the Nobles of England, in the yeere of Salvation 1155. about the conqueſt of Ireland, for the behoof of his brother William of Anjou: But through the counſell of his mother Maude the Empreſſe, this project was rejected unto another time. Howbeit not many yeeres betweene, Dermicius, the ſon of Murchard (Dermot Mac Morrog they call him) who reigned over the Eaſt part of Ireland, which in Latin is called Lagenia, and commonly Leinſter, being for his tyrannie and luſtfull leudneſſe thruſt out of his kingdome (for hee had raviſhed the wife of O Rorke, a pettie King of Meth) obtained aide and forces of Hen-

Dermot Mac Morrog.

B rie the ſecond King of England, to be reſtored into his kingdome againe: and made a covenant with Richard Earle of Pembroch, ſurnamed Strongbow, of the houſe of Clare, that he for his part ſhould aide him in the recovering of his Kingdome, and that himſelfe would aſſure unto the Earle, together with his daughter Eva, the ſaid Kingdome in ſucceſſion after him. Hereupon the ſaid Earle having forthwith muſtered up and raiſed an armie of Welſh and Engliſh together, and joined unto him to accompanie him in the warres, the Fitz-Giralds, Fitz-Stephans, and other Gentlemen out of England and Wales, reſtored his father in law Dermot into his former Kingdome againe: and within few yeeres gat by conqueſt ſo great a part of Ireland into his owne hands, that his power became now ſuſpected to the King of England;

Richard Strongbow.

C who by proclamation, and that with grievous menaces, recalled home the ſaid Earle and his followers out of Ireland, and unleſſe they obeyed without delay, pronounced them traitours, and their goods confiſcate. Whereupon the Earle granted unto the King by covenant and writing, whatſoever he either inherited in right of his wife, or won with his ſword, and as his tenant in vaſſailage received from him the Earldomes of Weisford, Oſſorie, Caterlogh, and Kildare, with certain Caſtles. Then King Henrie the ſecond, having gathered a power together in the yeere of Chriſt 1172. ſailed over into Ireland, and obtained the Princely title of ſoveraigne rule of the Iland.

Henrie the ſecond entreth Ireland.

For the States of Ireland paſſed over unto him all their rule and power, namely, Rothericke O Conor Dun, that is, The Browne, Monarch of Ireland, Dermot Mac Carti King of Corke, Donald O Bren King of Limiricke, O Carell King

Giral. Cambr. and a Manuſcript in the hands of Baron Houth.

D of Uriel, Macſhaglin King of Ophaly, O Rorke King of Meth, O Neale King of Ulſter, with the reſt of the Nobles and their people, and the ſame under their Charters ſubſcribed, ſigned, delivered, and tranſmitted to Rome. Which was ratified and confirmed moreover by a Patent of Pope Hadrian, by a ring delivered unto him in token of his inveſtiture, and alſo by the authoritie of certaine Provinciall Synods. This King Henrie afterward delivered up the Seigniorie of Ireland, into the hands of his ſonne John; which conveiance Pope Urban confirmed by his Bull, and in teſtimonie of his confirmation ſent him a Coronet of Peacocks feathers broided and embroidered with gold. Whom, after hee was once eſtabliſhed in his Kingdome, divers authors af-

E firme to have granted by his Charter or Patent, Ireland and England both unto the Church of Rome, to be held of it ever after in fee, and to have received it againe from the Church, as a Feudatarie: alſo to have bound his ſucceſſours to pay three hundred Markes unto the Biſhop of Rome: But that moſt worthie and famous Sir Thomas Moore, who tooke the Popes part even unto death, affirmeth this to be falſe: For hee writeth that the Romaniſts can ſhew no ſuch grant; that they never demanded the foreſaid money, and that the Kings of England never acknowledged it. But by his leave, as great a man as hee was, the caſe ſtood otherwiſe, as evidently appeareth by the Parliament Records, the credit whereof cannot bee impugned. For in an aſſembly of all the States of the Realme, in the reigne of Edward

F the third, the Lord Chancellour of England propoſed and related, that the Pope would judicially ſue the King of England, as well for the Homage as the tribute, which was to be yeelded for England and Ireland, to the performance whereof King John in times paſt had obliged himſelfe and his ſucceſſours: and of this point which hee put to queſtion, required their opinion. The Biſhops deſired to have a day by themſelves for to conſult about this matter: the Nobles likewiſe and the people or Communaltie munaltie. The day after, they all met, and with one generall accord ordained and A enacted: That for aſmuch as neither King John, nor any other King whatſoever, could impoſe ſuch ſervitude upon the Kingdome, but with the common conſent and aſſent of a Parliament; which was not done: and whatſoever he had paſſed was againſt his oath at his coronation by him in expreſſe words religiouſly taken before God: Therefore in caſe the Pope ſhould urge this matter, they were moſt readie, to the uttermoſt of their power, to reſiſt him reſolutely with their bodies and goods. They alſo who are skilfull in ſcanning and ſifting everie pricke and tittle of the lawes, cry out with one voice, That the ſaid Grant or Charter of King John was voide in Law, by that clauſe and reſervation in the end thereof; Saving unto us and our heires, all our Rights, Liberties, and Regalities. But B this may ſeeme beſide my text.

Ever ſince King Johns time, the Kings of England were ſtiled Lords of Ireland, untill that King Henrie the eighth in the memorie of our fathers was in a Parliament of Ireland, by the States thereof declared King of Ireland, becauſe the name of Lord ſeemed in the judgement of certaine ſeditious perſons, nothing ſo ſacred and full of majeſtie as the name of King.

This name and title of the Kingdome of Ireland were by the Popes authoritie (what time as Queene Marie in the yeere 1555. had by her Embaſſadours in the name of the Kingdom of England tendred obedience unto the Pope Paul the fourth) confirmed in theſe words. To the laud and glorie of almightie God, and his moſt glori- C ous mother the Virgin Mary: to the honour alſo of the whole Court of heaven, and the exaltation of the Catholike faith, at the humble requeſt and ſuite made unto us by King Philip and Queen Marie about this matter, wee, with the advice of our brethren, and of plenarie power Apoſtolicall by our Apoſtolicall authoritie, erect for ever Ireland to bee a Kingdome, and endow, dignifie, and exalt with the title, dignitie, honour, faculties, rights, enſignes, prerogatives, preferments, preeminencies royall, and ſuch as other Realmes of Chriſtians have, uſe, and enjoy, and may have, uſe, and enjoy for the times to come.

And ſeeing that I have hapned upon thoſe Noblemens names, who firſt of all Engliſh gave the attempt upon Ireland, and moſt valiantly ſubdued it under the imperiall D crowne of England, leſt I might ſeeme upon envie to deprive both them and their poſteritie of this due and deſerved glorie, I will ſet them downe here out of the Chancerie of Ireland, according as the title doth purport.

The Government of the Kingdome of Ireland.

EVer since that Ireland became subject unto England, the Kings of England have sent over thither, to manage the state of the Realme, their Regents or Vice-gerents, whom they tearmed in those writings or letters Patents of theirs (whereby authoritie and jurisdiction is committed unto them) first, * Keepers of Ireland: then afterwards, according as it pleased them, Justices of Ireland, Lievtenants, and Deputies. Which authoritie and E jurisdiction of theirs is very large, ample, and royall; whereby they have power to make warre, to conclude peace, to bestow all Magistracies and Offices, except a very few; to pardon all crimes, unlesse they be some of high treason, to dub Knights, &c. These letters Patents, when any one entreth upon this honourable place of government, are publikely read, and after a solemne oath taken in a set forme of words before the Chancellour, the sword is delivered into his hands, which is to be borne before him; he is placed in a chaire of estate, having standing by him the Chancellour of the Realme, those of the Privie Councell, the Peeres and Nobles of the kingdome, with a King of Armes, a Serjeant of Armes, and other Officers of State. And verily there is not (looke throughout all Christendome againe) any other Vice-Roy F that commeth neerer unto the majestie of a King, whether you respect his jurisdiction and authoritie, or his traine, furniture and provision. There bee assistant unto him in counsell, the Lord Chancellour of the Realm, the Treasurer of the Kingdome, and others of the Earles, Bishops, Barons, and Judges, which are of the Privie Councell. For Ireland hath the very same degrees of States that England hath, namely, Earles, Barons, Knights, Esquires, &c.

The Courts of Iuſtice, or Tribunals of Ireland.

THe ſupreme Court of the Kingdome of Ireland is the Parliament, which at the pleaſure of the Kings of England is uſually called by the Deputie, and by him diſſolved: although in the reigne of King Edward the ſecond, a Law was enacted, That every yeer there ſhould be Parliaments holden in Ireland, which ſeemeth yet not to have been effected. There be likewiſe foure Tearmes kept, as in England, yeerely: and there are five Courts of Iuſtice; The Star-chamber, the Chancerie, the Kings Bench, the common Pleas, and the Exchequer. There are alſo Iuſtices of Aſſiſes, B of Niſi prius, and of Oyer and Determiner, according as in England: yea and Iuſtices of Peace in every countie, for the keeping of peace. Moreover, the King hath his Serjeant at law, his Atturney Generall, his Sollicitour, &c.

Parliamentum clauſ. anno 12. The Tribunals of Ireland.

Over and beſides, in the more remote Provinces there be Governours to miniſter Iuſtice; as a principall Commiſſioner in Connaught, and a Preſident in Mounſter: who have to aſſiſt them in Commiſſion certaine Gentlemen and Lawyers, and yet every of them are directed by the Kings Lievtenant Deputie. As for the common lawes, Ireland is governed by the ſame that England hath. For we read in the Records of the Kingdome thus: King Henry the third, in the 12. yeere of his reigne, gave commandement to his Iuſtice of Ireland, that calling together the Archbiſhops, Biſhops, C Barons, and Knights, he ſhould cauſe there before them to be read the Charter of King John; which he cauſed to be read accordingly, and the Nobles of Ireland to be ſworn, as touching the obſervation of the lawes and cuſtomes of England, and that they ſhould hold and keepe the ſame. Nevertheleſſe the meere Iriſh did not admit them, but retained their owne Brehon lawes and leud cuſtomes. And the Kings of England uſed a connivence therein upon ſome deepe conſideration, not vouchſafing to communicate the benefit of the Engliſh lawes, but upon eſpeciall grace to eſpeciall families or ſects; namely, the O Neales, O Conors, O Brien, O Maloghlins, and Mac Murough, which were reputed of the blood roiall among them. The Parliamentary or Statute lawes alſo of England being tranſmitted, were uſually in force in Ireland unto the time of K. Henrie the ſeventh. For in the tenth yeere of his reign, thoſe were ratified & confirmed by authoritie of Parliament in Ireland, in the time of Sir Edw. Poinings government, but ever ſince they have had their Statutes enacted in their owne Parliaments. Beſides theſe civill Magiſtrates, they have alſo one militarie officer, named the Mareſhal, who ſtandeth here in great ſtead, to reſtrain as well the inſolencie of ſouldiers, as of rebels, who otherwhiles commit many & great inſolencies. This office the Barons de Morley of England bare in times paſt by inheritance, as appeareth by Records: for King John gave it to bee held by right of inheritance, in theſe very expreſſe words, We have given and granted unto John Mareſchal for his homage and ſervice, our Mareſhalſhip of Ireland, with all appurtenances. We have given alſo unto him for his homage and ſervice, the Cantred in which ſtandeth the towne of Kilbunny, to have and to hold unto him and his heires of us and our heires. From whom it deſcended in the right line to the Barons of Morley. This Mareſhall hath under him his Provoſt Marſhall, and ſometime more than one, according to the occaſions and troubles of the time, who exerciſe their authoritie by limitation under the great ſeale of Ireland, with inſtructions. But theſe, and ſuch like matters, I will leave to the curious diligence of others. Touching the order of iuſtice and government among thoſe more uncivill and wilde Iriſh, I will write ſomewhat in place convenient, when I ſhall treat of their manners.

THE DIVISION OF IRELAND.

Diviſion of Ireland.

IRELAND, according to the maners of the inhabitants, is divided into F two parts: for they that refuſe to be under lawes, and do live without civilitie, are termed the Iriſhry, and commonly the Wild Iriſh: but ſuch as being more civill do reverence the authoritie of lawes, and are willing to appeare in Court, and judicially to be tried, are named Engliſh-Iriſh,

A Iriſh, and their country goeth under the tearm of The Engliſh Pale, becauſe the firſt Engliſhmen that came thither did empale for themſelves certaine limits in the Eaſt part of the Iland, and that which was moſt fruitfull: Within which there bee even at this day, thoſe alſo that live uncivilly enough, and are not very obedient unto the lawes: like as others without the pale are as courteous and civill as a man would deſire. But if we look into higher times, according to the ſituation of the country, or the number rather of governors in old time, it containeth five portions (for it was ſometimes a Pentarchie) namely, Mounſter Southward: Leinſter Eaſtward: Connacht in the Weſt: Ulſter in the North: and Meth, well neere in the very middeſt.

Eccleſiaſticall Juriſdiction.

The Eccleſiaſticall State of Ireland was ordered anciently by Biſhops, whom either the Archbiſhop of Canterburie conſecrated, or they themſelves one another. But in the yeere 1152. as we read in Philip Flatesburie, Chriſtianus Biſhop of Liſmore Legate of all Ireland, held a moſt frequent and honourable Councell at Mell, whereat were preſent the Biſhops, Abbats, Kings, Captaines, and Elders of Ireland. In which, by authoritie Apoſtolicall, and by the counſell of Cardinals, with the conſent of Biſhops, Abbats, and others, there in Conſiſtorie he ordained foure Archbi-
F ſhopricks in Ireland, Armach, Dublin, Caſsile, and Tuem or Toam.

The Biſhopricks which were Dioceſſans under theſe, ſeeing that now ſome of them are by the covetous iniquitie of the times aboliſhed, others confounded, and conjoined, others againe tranſlated another way, I am diſpoſed here to put downe (according as they were in old time) out of an ancient Roman PROVINCIALL, faithfully exemplified out of the originall.

MOMONIA, or MOUNSTER.

MOMONIA, in Iriſh Mown, and in ordinarie conſtruction of ſpeech Wown, in Engliſh Mounſter, lieth Southward open to the Vergivian ſea; ſeparated in ſome place from Connaght by the river Siney or Shanon, and elſewhere from Lemſter by the river Neor. In times paſt it was divided into many parts, as Towoun, that is, North Mounſter, Deſwoun, that is, South Mounſter; Hier woun, that is, Weſt Mounſter; Mean woun, that is, Middle Mounſter; and Urwoun, that is, The Front of Mounſter: but at this day into two parts, that is, into Weſt Mounſter, and South Mounſter. In the Weſt Mounſter there dwelt in old time the LUCENI, the VELABRI, and UTERINI: in the South, the OUDIÆ or VODIÆ, and the CORIONDI: but at this day it is diſtinguiſhed into ſeven Counties, Kerry, Deſmund, Corke, Limiric, Tipperary, Holy Croſſe, and Waterford.

Where Ireland lieth out moſt Weſtward, and treanding toward the Cantabrian Ocean, looketh afarre off Southweſt, with a large interſpace, to Gallitia in Spaine, there inhabited in old time the VELABRI and LUCENI, as Oroſius writeth. The LUCENI of Ireland (who may ſeeme to have had their name and beginning from the LUCENSII of Gallitia, in the oppoſite coaſt of Spaine, and of whoſe name ſome reliques ſtill remain in the Barony of Lyxnaw) were ſeated as I ſuppoſe in the Countie of Kerry, and in Conoglogh hard by upon the banke of the river Shanon.

THE COUNTIE OF KERRY.

THE Countie of Kerry neere unto the mouth of Shanon, runneth forth like a little tongue into the ſea, beaten on with barking billowes on both ſides: a country mounting aloft with wooddy, wild, and ſolitarie mountaines: between which there lye many vallies, in ſome places garniſhed with corn-fields, in others beſet alſo thicke with woods. This is reputed a Countie Palatine, and the Earles of B Deſmond had in it the dignitie and priviledges of a Count-Palatine, and that by the bountifull gift of K. Edward the third, who granted unto them all Regall liberties, except foure pleas, namely, of Burning, Rape, Forſtall, and Treaſure trouue, with the profit growing de Croccis, reſerved for the Kings of England. But through the licentious iniquitie of the men, who neither would nor knew how to uſe this libertie, it became of late a very ſinke of miſchiefes, and a common receptacle for rebels. In the entrance into this countrie there is a territorie called Clan-Moris, of one Moris deſcended from the ſtocke of Raimund le Groſſe, whoſe heires ſucceſſively were called the Barons of Lixnaw. A little river now nameleſſe (which the ſituation in ſome ſort implieth to be DUR in Ptolomee) cutteth through the midſt of this, run-
C ning by Trayley a ſmall towne, laid now in manner deſolate, (where the Earles of Deſmund had an houſe.) Hard by ſtandeth Ardart, where the Biſhop called of Ardefert, a poore one God wot, hath his poore See. In the fartheſt point well neere of this, where it maketh a promontorie, there ſheweth it ſelfe on the one ſide Dingle, a commodious port, on the other ſide Smerwic Sound a road for ſhips, for ſo they tearme it ſhort in ſteed of S. Mary-wic: at which of late, when Girald Earle of Deſmund, a man notorious for deep treacherie to his Prince and countrey, wickedly waſted Mounſter with continuall harrying and raiſing booties out of the fields, there arrived certaine companies of Italians and Spaniards, ſent under-hand to aide him from Pope Gregorie the thirteenth, and the King of Spaine; who here fortifying a place which they
D called Fort del Ore, made their bragging bravadoes, and thundred out many a terrible threat. But the moſt noble and martiall Baron, Arthur Lord Grey, Lord Deputie, with his very comming and firſt onſet that he made upon them, decided the matter, and ended the quarrell. For immediatly they yeelded themſelves, and the moſt part of them were put to the ſword, which was in policie thought the wiſeſt and ſafeſt courſe, conſidering in what tickliſh tearmes the ſtate of this Realme then ſtood, and how the rebels in every place were up in armes. And the Earle of Deſmund himſelfe at length in his fearefull flight being forced to take the woods hard by for his refuge, was ſoone after in a poore cottage by a ſouldier or two ruſhing in upon him, firſt 1583.
E wounded, and afterwards being knowne, cut ſhorter by the head, and ſo paid worthily for his perfidious treaſon, and the waſting of his countrey.

Here ſome man happily would thinke it not correſpondent to the gravity of this worke, if I ſhould but relate what a ridiculous opinion hath fully poſſeſſed the minds of a number of the Iriſhry, yea and perſwaded them verily to beleeve that he who in that barbarous Pharoh and out cry of the Souldiers, which with great ſtraining of their voice they uſe to ſet up when they joine battaile, doth not cry and hout as the reſt doe, is ſuddenly caught up from the ground, and carried as it were flying in the aire, into theſe deſert vallies, out of any country of Ireland whatſoever: where he eateth graſſe, lappeth water, knoweth not in what ſtate he is, good or bad, hath ſome uſe of reaſon but not of ſpeech, but ſhall be caught at length with the help
F of hounds and the hunters, and brought home to their owne homes.

A ridiculous conceit.

DESMONIA, or DESMOND.

A

BEneath thoſe ancient Luceni lieth Desmond, ſtretched out farre and wide toward the South, called in Iriſh Deſwown, in Latine Deſmonia, inhabited in ancient times by the Vellabri and Iberni, which in ſome copies are written Uterini. As for theſe Velabri, they may ſeeme ſo named of Aber, that is, ſalt water waſhes, for that they dwelt upon ſuch Friths, divided one from another by many and thoſe notable armes of the ſea running betweene: whence alſo the Arcabri and Cantabri in Spaine had their denomination. Among theſe armes of the ſea, three promontories, beſide Kerry aforeſaid, with crooked and winding ſhoares run out into the Southweſt, and thoſe the inhabitants tearmed in old time Hierwoun, that is, weſt-Mounſter. The firſt of them betweene Dingle bay and the river Mair, is named Clan-Car, and hath a caſtle built at Dunkeran by the Carews of England. In this dwelt Donald Mac Carty More, a Lord of the Iriſh blood, who in the yeere 1566. reſigned up unto Queen Elizabeths hands his poſſeſſions and lands, and tooke them againe of her, to hold the ſame after the Engliſh manner by fee, doing homage and fealtie. And at the ſame time he was created Baron of Valentia (an Iſland adjoining) and Earle of Clan-car. A man in this tract of great name and power, a moſt deadly foe in times paſt of the Fitz-Giralds, who diſſeized his anceſtours, Kings (as hee ſtifly avoucheth) of Deſmond, of their ancient ſeat and habitation. But long enjoied not hee this honour: and having but one onely daughter legitimate, he matched her in marriage with Florence Mac Carty, and departed out of this life an aged man.

The ſecond promontorie encloſed within two baies, Maire and Bantre, is named Beare, ſtanding for the moſt part upon hungry gravell, and a leane ſtony ſoile: In which live O Swillivant Beare, and O Swillivam Bantre, deſcended both of one and the ſame ſtocke, men of great nobility in their country.

Beare.

O Swilivant.

The third is called Eraugh, lying betweene Bantre and Balatimore or Balimore, a Bay or Creeke paſſing well knowne by reaſon of the abundance of Herrings taken there: whereunto reſorteth every yeere a great fleet of Spaniards and Portugals, even in the mids of winter, to fiſh for Cods. In this the O Mahons by the beneficiall gift of M. Carew received faire lands and Lordſhips. This is that Ptolomee calleth Notium, that is, the South-Promontorie, at this day named Miſſen-head, under which (as we may read in him) the river Iernus is diſgorged into the Ocean. But what name the ſaid river now hath, in ſo great obſcurity I hardly dare divine, unleſſe it be that which they call Maire, and runneth hard under Dunk-eran aforeſaid. Neither wot I how to gheſſe at thoſe people, whom the ſame Ptolomee placeth upon theſe promontories, ſeeing that according to the varietie of copies they have ſundry names, as Iberni, Outerni, Iberi, and Ivernı, unleſſe peradventure, like as their neighbours the Luceni and Concani did, they flitted hither from among the Iberi of Spaine. Well, this name of Deſmond in the foregoing ages ſtretched farre and wide in this tract, even from the ſea unto the river Shanon, and was called alſo South-Mounſter. The Fitz-Giralds deſcended out of the houſe of Kildare, having ſubdued the Iriſh, became Lords here of very large and goodly poſſeſſions: and of them Maurice Fitz-Thomas (unto whom T. Carew heire unto the Seigniory of Deſmond, had before paſſed away his right of Deſmond) was in the third yeere of King Edward the third created the firſt Earle of Deſmond. Among whoſe poſterity many there were, great men for their valour and wealth, whoſe credit alſo and reputation reached farre. But a bad name there went, and ſtill doth, of James; who having excluded his nephew from the inheritance, entred himſelfe by force upon it, and impoſed upon the people thoſe moſt grievous tributes of Coyne, Livery, Cocherings, Bonaghty, &c. for the maintenance of Galloglaſſes and Souldiers to ſpoile and harry the countrey. Which when his ſonne Thomas exacted and gathered of the poore people, hee was by the commandement of John Tiptoft Deputy Lievtenant beheaded

Howbeit when his children were reſtored againe, in their offſpring this honour continued, and deſcended in right of inheritance unto Girald that rebell, whom erewhile I named, who wilfully overthrew a moſt noble and potent family. And when hee was attainted by Parliamentary authority, Deſmond was adjudged and annexed to the Crowne land, reduced into the ranke of counties, and a Sheriffe was ordained to governe it from yeere to yeere. Nevertheleſſe in the laſt rebellion the rebells erected a titularie Earle; and againſt him Queene Elizabeth granted the title of Earle of Deſmond unto James Fitz-Girald, ſonne to the foreſaid

VODIÆ, and CORIONDI.

AFter the Iberi, there dwelt farre in the countrey the OTAIAI, who are tearmed alſo VODIÆ, and UDIÆ: the footing of which name doth more expreſly ſhew it ſelfe in Idou and Idouth, two ſmall territories: like COMITATUS CORCAGIENSIS, commonly called THE COUNTY OF CORK.

D THe County of Corke, which in old time was reputed a Kingdome, compriſed the whole tract along the ſea from Liſmore unto Saint Brend, where it affronteth Deſmond Weſtward, hath in the midland parts thereof Muskeray, a wild and woody country; wherein Cormac Mac-Teg is of great name: and toward the ſea coaſt Carbray, in which the Mac-Carties beare the moſt ſway. By the ſea ſide, the firſt place that we meet with is Roſſe, a road and port in times paſt well frequented, but now leſſe reſorted unto by reaſon of a bar of ſand. From thence with a narrow neck runneth out a biland, called the Old head of Kinſale, neere unto which the family of the Curcies flouriſhed in ancient times, famous for their wealth; deſcended from a brother of John Curcy the Engliſhman that ſubdued Ulſter; and out of which there remaineth here ſtill Curcy
E Baron of Ringrom; but at this day (this is the world) of weak and meane eſtate. After it, at the mouth of the river Bany, in a fertile ſoile and well woodded, ſtandeth Kinſale, a very commodious port, and a towne fortified with old walls: under which in the yeere 1601. the kingdome of Ireland lay a bleeding, and put it was upon the hazzard, as it were, of one caſt of a die, whether it ſhould be ſubject to England or Spaine: what time as the Iland was endangered both with forraine and domeſticall warre, and eight thouſand old trained ſouldiers under the conduct of Don John D'Aquila, had of a ſudden ſurprized and fortified it, confident upon the cenſures and excommunications of Pius the fifth, Gregorie the thirteenth, and Clement the eighth, Popes of Rome, diſcharged like thunderbolts upon Queene Elizabeth, and preſu-
F ming confidently upon the aides of rebells, who had ſent for them, under a goodly ſhew of reſtoring religion (which in this age and variance about religion, is every where pretended for to maske and cloak moſt ungracious and wicked deſignes.) But Sir Charles Blunt Baron Mountjoy, L. Deputy, preſently belaied it round about both by ſea and land, albeit his ſouldiers were tired, toiled out, and the ſeaſon of the yeere moſt incommodious, as being midwinter: and withall, made head alſo againſt a rabble of rebels, whom the Earle of Tir-Oen, O-Donel, Mac-Gwyre, and Mac-Mahound had raiſed and gotten thither; and with ſuch valour and fortitude ſo fortunately daunted and repreſſed their malapert boldneſſe, that with one victory hee both had the towne with the Spaniards in it yeelded unto him, and alſo wreſted, as it were, out of the hands of all Ireland throughout, now at the point of revolt, (for they that deliberate are revolted already) both ſword and fire. On the other ſide of the river from Kinſale lieth Kerry-Wherry, a little territorie of late belonging to the Earles of Deſmond. Juſt before which runneth the river that Ptolomee calleth DAURONA, Giraldus Cambrenſis, by changing onely one letter, Sauranus and Saveranus, which iſſuing out of Mukerey mountaines, paſſeth along by that principall Citie of the countie, graced with an Epiſcopall dignitie (whereunto is annexed the Biſhops See of Clon) which Giraldus nameth Corragia, Engliſhmen Corke, and the naturall inhabitants of the country Coreach: encloſed within a circuit of walls in forme of an egge, with the river flowing round about it and running betweene, not paſſable through but by bridges, lying out in length, as it were, in one direct broad ſtreet, and the ſame having a bridge over it: Howbeit a pretty towne of merchandiſe it is, well peopled, and much reſorted unto; but ſo beſet on every ſide with rebels neighbouring upon it, that they are faine to keepe alwaies a ſet watch and ward, as if they had continuall ſiege laid unto their Citie, and dare not marrie their daughters forth into the country, but make marriages one with another among themſelves; whereby all the Citizens are linked together in ſome degree or other of kinred and affinity. The report goeth that Brioc that moſt devout and holy man (who in that fruitfull age of Saints flouriſhed among the Gauls, and from whom the Dioceſſe of Sanbrioch in Britaine Armorica, commonly called S. Brieu tooke the name) was borne and bred here.

Kerry-wherry.

Beneath Corke the river parting in twaine, environeth a large and very pleaſant Iland, over againſt the principall dwelling houſe of that moſt ancient and noble family of the Barries, which thereupon is called Barry Court. For that family is derived from Robert de Barry an Engliſhman, a perſonage of great worth, and renowned: who notwithſtanding choſe rather among the firſt to be chiefe indeed, than to ſeeme chiefe; who in the winning of Ireland received wounds and hurt, and the firſt man he was in Ireland that manned and brought the Hawk to hand. His poſterity by their long approved loyaltie and martiall proweſſe, deſerved to receive of the Kings of England, firſt the title of Baron Barry, afterwards of Vicount Butiphant, & for their great lands and wealth, gat among the people the ſirname Barry more, that is, Barry the great. Below Barry-court, the river Saveren, hard by Imokelly a faire poſſeſſion long ſince of the Earle of Deſmond, loſeth it ſelfe in the Ocean, affording at the very mouth commodious harbours and havens.

Vicount Butiphant.

As Saveren watereth the neather part of this countrey, ſo Broodwater, called in times paſt Aven-more, that is, The great River, moiſteneth the upper: upon which inhabiteth the Noble family of Roch, which being tranſplanted out of England hath growne up and proſpered here very well, and now enjoieth the title of Vicount Fermoy. Certaine it is, that in the reigne of Edward the ſecond, they were entituled with the honour of Parliament-Barons, conſidering that George Roch was fined in two hundred Markes, becauſe upon ſummons given, hee came not to the Parliament at Dublin: where Broodwater (which for a good while runneth as a bound between this county and the county of Waterford) entring into the ſea maketh an haven, ſtandeth Yoghall; no great towne, but walled round about, built in faſhion ſomewhat long, and divided into two parts: the upper, which is the greater part, ſtretching out Northward, hath a Church in it, and without the wall a little Abbey which they call North Abbey: the neather part reaching Southward, called the Baſe-towne, had alſo an Abbey called South Abbey; and the commodiouſneſſe of the haven, which hath a well fenſed Kay belonging unto it, and the fruitfulneſſe withall of the country adjoining, draweth Merchants unto it, ſo as it is well frequented and inhabited, yea and hath a Mayor for the head Magiſtrate.

Thus

A Thus farre in these daies reacheth the countie of Corke, which in times past, as I said even now, was counted a kingdome, and went farther, as which contained within it Desmond also. This kingdome King Henry the second gave and granted unto Sir Robert Fitz-Stephen, and to Sir Miles de Cogan in these words: Know yee that I have granted the whole kingdome of Corke, excepting the City and Cantred of the Ousmans, to hold for them and their heires, of mee and John my sonne, by the service of 60. knights. And the Carews of England were heires to that Fitz-Stephen, from whom Sir George Carew, now Baron Carew of Clopton, lineally and directly deriveth his descent, who not long since was the Lord President of Mounster, and in some of these obscure B Irish matters (which I willingly acknowledge) hath directed me by the light of his knowledge. The kingdome of Corke.

THE COUNTY OF WATERFORD.

ON the East coast of Ireland the county of WATERFORD extendeth it selfe between the rivers Broodwater West, Shour East, the Ocean from the South, and the county of Tipperary Northward: a goodly country, as well for pleasant site as fertile soile. Upon Broodwater, so soone as it hath left Corke county behinde it, Lismore sheweth it selfe, Lismor. C well knowne for an Episcopall See in it, where Christian sate sometime the Bishop, and Legate of Ireland about the yeere 1148. a Prelate that deserved passing well of the Irish Church, trained in his youth at Clarevall in the same cloister with St. Bernard and Pope Eugenius. Christian a Bishop.

But now, since that the possessions in manner all have beene alienated, it is united unto the Bishopricke of Waterford. But neere unto the mouth of the said river, standeth Ardmor a little towne, so called because it standeth neere the sea, of which, and of this river Necham long since versified thus.

Urbem Lismor pertransit flumen Avenmor, Ardmor cernit ubi concitus æquor adit. Ard-mor.

D The river named Aven-Mor through Lismor towne doth runne, Ardnor him sees, and there apace to sea he speeds anon.

The little territory adjoining unto it is called Dessee, the Lord whereof, one of the family of Desmond, received in our remembrance the honourable title of Vicount Dessee: but for that he had no issue male, it vanished with him in a short time. Not farre from hence standeth Dungarvan upon the sea, a towne well fortified with a castle, and as commodious by reason of the roade for ships: which together with the Baronie of Dungarvan King Henry the sixth bountifully granted unto John Talbot Earle of Shrewsbury: but afterward, seeing it stood handsomely to that part of Mounster which was to be brought under and reduced to order, it was by authority E of Parliament annexed to the Imperiall Crowne of the Kings of England for ever. Dessee. Dungarvan.

Neer unto it flourished the Poers of ancient nobility (from the very first time that Ireland was conquered by the English) and afterward advanced to the honourable title of the Barons of Curraghmore. But upon the banke of the river Suyr, Waterford the chiefe and principall city of this county maketh a goodly shew. Concerning which old Necham writeth in this wise. Poers Barons of Curraghmore. Waterford.

Suirius insignem gaudet ditare Waterford, Æquoreis undis associatur ibi.
The river Suyr hath great desire,
Faire Waterford rich to make:
F For in this place he hies apace,
His course with sea to take.

This city which the Irish and Britans call Porthlargy, the English Waterford, was built by certaine Pirates of Norway; and although it standeth in an aire somewhat grosse, and upon a soile not very fruitfull, and the streets therein bee with the narrowest, thrust close and pent together; yet such is the convenience and commodiousnesse of the haven, that for wealth, freſh trading, and frequent reſort it is the ſecond City A in all Ireland, and hath alwaies ſhewed a ſingular loialty, fidelitie, and obedience to the Imperiall Crowne of England. For ever ſince that Richard Earle of Pembrok wanne it, it hath continued ſo faithfull and quietly diſpoſed, that it performed at all times ſafe and ſecure peace unto the Engliſh on their backes, whiles they went on in the conquering of Ireland. Whence it is that the Kings of England have granted unto it very many, and thoſe right large Franchiſes, which King Henry the ſeventh augmented, and confirmed, becauſe the Citizens had demeaned themſelves moſt valiantly and wiſely againſt that Mock-Prince Perkin Warbeck, who being a young man of baſe condition, by hoiſing up the full ſailes of impudence went about B to mount up aloft unto the Imperiall diadem, whiles he a meer ſuborned counterfeit tooke upon him to be Richard Duke of Yorke, the ſecond ſonne of King Edward the fourth.

Earle of Waterford.

This countie of Waterford together with the city, King Henry the ſixth gave unto John Talbot Earle of Shrewsbury aforeſaid, by theſe words, which becauſe they teſtifie the valerous vertue of that moſt martiall Knight, to the end that vertue might have the due honour thereto belonging, I thinke it worth my labour, and haply any man elſe would deeme no leſſe, to put downe out of the Record; which may be Engliſhed thus. We therefore, ſaith the King, (after other eloquent termes penned by the Secretaries of that age, when there was but ſimple Latin) weighing with due conſideration C

THE COUNTY OF LIMERICK.

HItherto have wee gone over the Maritime counties of Mounſter: two there remaine yet behind that bee in-lands, Limericke and Tipperary, which wee are now to goe unto. The county of LIMERICK lieth behinde that of Corke Northward, betweene Kerry, the river Shanon, and the county of Tipperary. A fertile countrey, and well peo-
C pled, but able to ſhew very few places of any good account and importance. The more Weſtern part of it is called Conilagh; wherein among the hills, Knock-Patric, Conilagh. Knoc-Patric.
that is Patricks hill, mounteth up of a mighty height, and yeelding a pleaſant proſpect into the ſea, beholdeth afarre off the river Shanon, falling with a wide and waſt mouth into the Vergivian or Ocean. Under which hill a ſept of Fitz-Giralds, or Giraldines, lived honourably a long time, untill that Thomas, called the Knight of the Valley, or of the Glin, when his graceleſſe ſonne that wicked firebrand ſuffered death (for to ſet villages and houſes a fire is by the lawes of Ireland high treaſon) becauſe him- Knight of the Valley. ſelfe adviſed his ſonne, and ſet him on to enter into theſe lewd actions, by authority
D of the Parliament was diſſeized of his goodly and large poſſeſſions. The head City of this county is Limerick, which Shanon, a moſt famous river, by parting his chanell compaſſeth round about.

The Iriſh call it Loumeag, and the Engliſh Limirick. A Biſhops See this is, and Limirick.
a very famous mart towne of Mounſter; firſt forcibly won by Reimundo the Groſſe, an Engliſhman, the ſonne of William Girald, afterwards burnt by Donenald an Iriſh petty King of Thuetmond: and then in proceſſe of time Philip Breos an Engliſhman was enfeoffed in it, & King John fortified it with a caſtle. At this day it is counted two townes. The upper (for ſo they call it) wherein ſtand the Cathedrall Church and the caſtle, hath two gates opening into it, and each of them a faire bridge unto it of ſtone, E with bulwarkes and little draw bridges: the one leading into the Weſt, the other into the Eaſt, unto which the nether towne joineth, fenſed with a wall, with a caſtle alſo thereto, and a foregate at the entrance into it. More into the Eaſt ſtandeth Clan-William, ſo named of the ſept or kinred of William, who came out of the family Clan-William.
de Burgo (the Iriſh call it Burke) which dwelleth therein: and out of which houſe Queene Elizabeth conferred upon William, who ſlew James Fitz-Moris that tempeſtuous troubler of his country, the title and honour of Baron of Caſtle-Conel, (where Baron of Caſtle Conell.
Richard the Red Earle of Ulſter, had ſtrengthened a caſtle) together with a yeerly penſion, as a reward of his valour, and to his comfort and meed for the loſſe of his ſonnes, ſlaine in that encounter.

F In the South part of this county is Kil-Mallo, the ſecond towne next to Limirick both for wealth and for number of inhabitants, encloſed alſo with a wall about it: likewiſe Adar, a little towne in old time fortified, ſtanding upon the ſame river; which ſtreightwaies emptieth it ſelfe into Shanon: hard unto which lieth Clan-Gib- Clan-Gibbon.
bon, the Lord whereof John Fitz-Girald, called John Oge Fitz-John Fitz-Gibbon, and for the gray haires of his head, The white Knight, was attainted by Parliament for for his wicked acts: but his ſonne through the clemency of Queene Elizabeth was restored to his full eſtate. Of great note and name above the reſt in this tract, beſides thoſe Bourks, Giraldines, and Fitz-Giralds, are the Laceys, Browns, Hurleys, Chaceys, Sapells, and Pourcels, all of the Engliſh race: alſo the Mac-Shees, Mac-Brien O-Brian, &c. of Iriſh breed. THE COUNTY OF TIPPERARY.

THE county Tipperary Weſtward is bounded with Limirick-ſhire aforeſaid and the river Shanon, Eaſtward with the county of Kilkenny, toward the South with the counties of Corke and Waterford, and North with the territorie of the O-Carolls. The South part is an exceeding fertile country, and yeeldeth corne abundantly, furniſhed alſo ſufficiently with good and frequent buildings. The Weſt part of it the river Glaſon paſſeth through, and watereth with a long courſe: not farre from the banke whereof ſtandeth Emely, or Awne, a Biſhops See, which hath beene in times paſt, by report, a City very populous and of great reſort. Through the midſt of it runneth the noble river Shower, or Swire, which ſtreaming out of Bladin hill, ſpeeding through the lower Oſſery (which by the bountifull favour of King Henry the eighth entituled the Butlers Earles of Oſſery) and through Thurles, which honoureth them with the dignity of Vicounts, firſt goeth unto Holy Croſſe, a right famous Abbey in times paſt (whence the country alſo adjoining is commonly termed the Countie of the Holy Croſſe of Tipperary) and enjoieth certaine peculiar freedomes, granted in honour of a piece of Chriſts croſſe there ſometimes preſerved. The whole world (ſaith Saint Cyrill) is full of peeces of this wood, and yet by a continuall miracle (as Paulinus ſaith) it hath never beene impaired. B C D

Thus were Chriſtians perſwaded in ancient times. And incredible it is what a confluence there is even yet of people continually upon devotion hither, as unto an holy place. So firmely doth this nation perſevere in the old Religion of their forefathers, which the careleſſe negligence of their Prelates, and ignorance together, hath beyond all meaſure encreaſed, when as there be none to inſtruct and teach them otherwiſe. Then Shour paſſeth beſide Caſſile, beautified with an Archiepiſcopall dignity by Engenius the third Biſhop of Rome, which had under it in times paſt many Biſhops as Suffragans. From thence runneth the river downe, ſprinkling Iſlands here and there in the way, and fetcheth a compaſſe about Cahir Caſtle: which out of the family of the Butlers hath a Baron advanced to that dignity by Queene Elizabeth: but his ſonne ſtained himſelfe with perfidious diſloialty, and ſuffered for it, when as the Caſtle was by the Earle of Eſſex taken in the yeere 1599. and himſelfe caſt into priſon. Then holding on his courſe by Clomell, a mercate towne well frequented and fenſed, as alſo by Carick Mac-Griffin, ſituate upon a rock, whereof alſo it tooke name (the habitation of the Earles of Ormond, which together with the honour of Earle of Carrick King Edward the ſecond granted unto Edmund Boteler or Butler) it leaveth Tipperary behinde it, and ſerveth in ſteed of a limit to confine the Counties of Waterford and Kilkenny. As for that which lieth Northward, leane it is and very barren, peaking up with high tops of mountaines, and twelve above the reſt, as it were, hudled up together, which they terme Phelemge Modona. This part in Latin is called Ormondia, in Iriſh Orwowon, that is, the Front of Mounſter, in Engliſh Ormond, and moſt men name it very corruptly Wormewood. Earle of Tipperary.

The

A The anceſters of this James were in old time the Butlers (an honourable office) of Ireland; and from thence came this firname Le Boteler or Butler impoſed upon them: and certaine it is that they were linked in moſt neere alliance unto St. Thomas Becket Archbiſhop of Canterbury (as who derive their deſcent from his ſiſter): and that after hee was murdered, they were by King Henry the ſecond removed into Ireland, who ſuppoſed that hee ſhould disburden himſelfe of the worlds hatred for that fact, in caſe he advanced the kinsfolkes and allies of the ſaid Thomas to rich revenues and high honours.

The firſt Earle of Ormond in this family, was James ſonne to Edmund Earle of B Carricke, who wedded the daughter of Humfrey Bohun Earle of Hereford, whom he had by a daughter of King Edward the firſt: and here was his firſt ſtep unto this honour. Hereupon James his ſonne by this marriage came to be commonly named among the people, The noble Earle. The fifth Earle of theſe named James (that I may not ſtand particularly upon every one) received at the hands of King Henry the ſixth the title and honour of Earle of Wiltſhire, to him and to the heires of his body: who being Lord Deputy of Ireland, as divers others of this race, and Lord Treaſurer of England, ſtanding attainted by King Edward the fourth, was ſtraightwaies apprehended and beheaded: but his brethren John and Thomas, likewiſe proclaimed traytors, kept themſelves cloſe out of the way: John died at Jeruſalem without iſſue. C Thomas, through the ſpeciall favour of King Henry the ſeventh, was in the end reſtored to his blood: who departed this life in the yeere 1515. leaving behinde him two daughters, Anne married to Sir James de ſancto Leodegano, called commonly Sellenger; and Margaret unto Sir William Bollein, who bare unto him Sir Tho. Bollein: whom King Henry the eighth created firſt Viſcount Rochfort, afterwards Earle of Wiltſhire and of Ormond, and afterward took Anne Bollein his daughter to wife; who brought forth for England Queene Elizabeth, a Prince of moſt happy memory, and with all thankfulneſſe to be alwaies remembred by the Engliſh and Iriſh. When Thomas Bollein was dead leaving no iſſue male, Sir Pierce Butler, a man of great power in Ireland, deſcended of the Earles race, whom Henry the eighth had before time D created Earle of Oſſerie, attained alſo to the title of Ormond, and left the ſame unto his ſonne James, who had iſſue by the daughter and heire of James Earle of Deſmond a ſonne named Thomas Earle of Ormond now living; whoſe faith and loyaltie hath been paſſing well tried and approved in many troubles and dangerous affaires: who alſo hath joined in marriage his only daughter unto Theobald Butler his brothers ſon, whom King James hath advanced lately to the title of Vicount Tullo.

Whereas ſome of the Iriſh, and ſuch as would be thought worthy of credit, doe af- Wolf-men.
firme, that certaine men in this tract are yeerely turned into Wolves: ſurely I ſuppoſe it be a meere fable: unleſſe haply through that malicious humour of predominant unkind Melancholy, they be poſſeſſed with the malady that the Phyſicians call E λυκανθρωπία, which raiſeth and engendereth ſuch like phantaſies, as that they imagine The diſeaſe Lycanthropia.
themſelves to bee transformed into Wolves. Neither dare I otherwiſe affirme of thoſe metamorphoſed Lycaones in Liveland, concerning whom many Writers deliver many and marvellous reports.

Thus farre as touching the Province of Mounſter, for the government whereof Queene Elizabeth, when ſhee bethought herſelfe moſt wiſely, politickly, and princely, which way ſhe might procure the good and wealth of Ireland, ordained a Lord Preſident to be the reformer and puniſher of inconſiderate raſhneſſe, the director alſo and moderator of duty, together with one Aſſiſtant, two learned Lawyers, and a Secretary: and the firſt Preſident that ſhee made was Sir Warham S. Leger F Knight, a man of great experience in Iriſh affaires.

LAGENIA, or LEINSTER.

THe ſecond part of Ireland, which the inhabitants call Leighnigh, the Britans Lein, the Engliſh Leinſter, and Latine writers Lagenia, and in the ancient lives of the Saints, Lagen, lieth all of it on the Sea-ſide Eaſtward, bounded toward Mounſter with the river Neor (which notwithſtanding in many places it paſſeth beyond) on Connaght ſide for a good ſpace with Shanon, and toward Meath with the peculiar knowne limits. The Countrey is fertile and fruitfull, the aire moſt milde and temperate, and the people there inhabiting come neereſt of all other B to the gentle diſpoſition and civill converſation of England their neighbour Iland, from whence they are for the moſt part deſcended. In Ptolomees dayes therein were ſeated the BRIGANTES, MENAPII, CAUCI, and BLANI: and peradventure from theſe Blani are derived and contracted theſe later and moderne names, Lein, Leinigh, and Leinſter. But now it is divided into the Counties of Kilkenny, Caterlogh, Queenes County, Kings County, Kildare, Weisford, and Dublin: to ſay nothing of Wicklo and Fernes, which either be already, or elſe are to be laid thereto.

BRIGANTES, or BIRGANTES.

C

THe BRIGANTES ſeeme to have planted themſelves betweene the mouth of the river and the confluence of Neor and Barrow, which in Ptolomee is called BRIGUS. Now becauſe there was an ancient City of the Brigantes in Spaine, named BRIGANTIA, Florianus del Campo laboureth tooth and naile to fetch theſe BRIGANTES out of his owne countrey Spaine. But if ſuch a conjecture may take place, others might with as great probality derive them from the Brigantes of Britaine, a nation both neere and alſo exceeding populous. But if that be true which I finde in certaine copies, that this people were called BIRGANTES, both hee and the other have miſſed the marke: For, that theſe tooke their denomination of the ri- D ver BIRGUS, about which they doe inhabite, the very name is almoſt ſufficient to perſwade us. Theſe BRIGANTES, or BIRGANTES, whether you will, dwelt in the Counties of Kilkenny, Oſſery, and Caterlogh, watered all with the river BIRGUS.

THE COUNTIE OF KILKENNY.

County of Kilkenny.

THe Countie of Kilkenny is bounded Weſt with the countie of Tipperary, Eaſt with the counties of Weisford and Caterlogh, South with the coun- E tie of Waterford, North with Queenes Countie, and Northweſt with upper Oſſerie. A countrey that with townes and caſtles on every ſide maketh a very goodly ſhew, and for plenty of all things ſurpaſſeth the reſt. Neere unto Oſſerie the mighty and huge mountaines Sleiew Bloemy, which Giraldus calleth Bladinæ Montes, with their riſing toppes mount up to a wonderfull heigth: out of the bowels whereof, as from their mothers wombe, iſſue the rivers Shour aforenamed, Neor, and Barrow: which running downe in ſeverall chanels, before they enter into the Ocean joine hand in hand all together, whereupon they in old time tearmed them The three ſiſters.

Upper Oſſery. Baron of upper Oſſery.

The Neor, commonly called alſo Neure, runneth in manner through the midſt of F Kilkenny county: and when it is paſſed with a forward courſe by the upper Oſſerie, the firſt Baron whereof was Barnabas Fitz-Patrick, promoted to that honor by King Edward the ſixth, and hath watered many fortreſſes on both ſides, floweth beſide Kilkenny, which is as much to ſay, as the Cell or Church of Canic; which for the ſanctimony of his ſolitary life in this country, was highly renowned: a proper, faire, and wealthy

A wealthy Burrough towne this is, and far excelling all other midland Boroughs in this Iland: divided into the Iriſh towne and the Engliſh towne. The Iriſh towne is, as it were, the Suburbs, and hath in it the ſaid Canicks Church, which both gave name unto it, and now alſo affordeth a See unto the Biſhop of Oſſerie. But the Engliſh towne is nothing ſo ancient, built, as I have read, by Ranulph the third Earle of Cheſter, and fortified with a wall on the Weſt ſide by Robert Talboi a Nobleman, and with a caſtle by the Butlers. And ſure it is that in the diviſion of lands between the daughters of William Mareſchal Earle of Penbroch, it fell unto the third daughter, whom Gilbert Clare Earle of Gloceſter married.

B Somewhat beneath the ſame Neore, ſtandeth a little walled towne, named in Engliſh Thomas Towne: in Iriſh, Bala-Mac-Andan, that is, The towne of Antonies ſonne: For it tooke both names of the founder Thomas Fitz-Anthonie, an Engliſhman, who flouriſhed under King Henry the third, whoſe heires are yet acknowledged the Lords thereof. Beneath this towne the river Callan voideth his ſtreame into Neore: upon which ſtandeth the third Burrough or incorporate towne of this county, bearing the ſame name Callan. Like as Iniſe-Teog, which is the fourth. Thomas Towne. Callan. Inis Teog.

The family of Butlers hath ſpread and branched farre and wide throughout this County, men that with much honour bare a great port, and for their worth and vertues were adorned with the titles of Earles of Carick, Ormond, Wiltſhire in England C and of Oſſorie, as is before ſaid: and at this day there remaine of their line, beſide the Earle of Ormond, Vicount Thurles, and Knight of the Order of Saint George, Vicount Monigarret, Vicount Tullo, the Barons of Dunboyn and of Cahir, a goodly race alſo and progenie of Noble Gentlemen. The reſt of the Gentry in this Tract that are of better birth and parentage be likewiſe of Engliſh deſcent, as the Graces, Walſhes, Lovells, Foreſters, Shortels, Blanch-felds, or Blanchevelſtons, Drilands, Comerfords, &c.

THE COUNTY OF CATERLOGH.

D THe County of Caterlogh, by contraction Carlogh, toward the Sunne riſing adjoineth to the County of Kilkenny, wholly, in manner, ſituate betweene the rivers Barrow and Slane; of a fertile ſoile and ſhaded well with woods; hath two townes in it of better note and importance than the reſt, both ſtanding upon the Weſt banke of Barrow: namely, Caterlogh, which Leonel Duke of Clarence began to wall; and Bellingham a moſt renowned Lord Deputy fortified with a caſtle; Alſo Leighlin, called in Latine Lechlinia, where there was an Epiſcopall Chaire, now united to the See of Fernes. Theſe townes have both of them their wards or garriſons, and Conſtables over them. And whereas the greateſt part of this County belonged in right of inheritance unto the Howards Dukes of Norfolke (who by the Earles of Warren drew their deſcent from the eldeſt E daughter of William Mareſchall Earle of Penbroch) King Henry the eighth by a generall conſent of the States of the Realme tooke unto himſelfe, both from them and alſo from other Noblemen, yea and from Monaſteries in England, all their lands and poſſeſſions in Ireland; for that the Lords thereof by neglecting in their abſence their owne private eſtates careleſly, brought therewith the publike ſtate into danger, as is already ſhewed. The Statute of Abſenties.

From hence Barrow paſſeth through the Baronie Ydron, which by right belonged to the Carews: for Sir John Carew an Engliſh Knight, died ſeiſed thereof in the time of King Edward the third: and which Peter Carew within our memorie recovered, as it were by a writ of remitter, after it had been unlawfully uſurped, and a long time F in the occupation of unjuſt detainers. Barony Ydron.

Upon the river Slane appeareth Tullo, memorable in this regard, that King James hath lately honoured Theobald Butler, the Earle of Ormonds brothers ſonne, with the title of Vicount Tullo. The Cavanaghs dwell a great many of them every way hereabouts, who being deſcended from Dovenald a younger ſonne, as they ſay, the Baſtard of Dermot the laſt King of Leinſter, are ſpred and branched out into a Cavanaghs.

very very great ſept or linage, a warlike generation renowned for their good horſe-manſhip, and who as yet, though they bee exceeding poore, beare themſelves in ſpirit anſwerable to their ancient nobilitie. But being at deadly feud amongſt themſelves, for I wot not what man-ſlaughters, which many yeeres agoe they committed one upon another, they daily work their owne miſchiefe by mutuall wrongs and hurts. When as the Engliſh had ſet ſome of theſe to overſee and mannage the poſſeſſions they had in this part of Ireland, about King Edward the ſeconds time, they by little and little uſurped the whole country unto themſelves, and aſſumed the name of O-Mores, and taking into their ſocietie the Toles and Brenes, by little and little diſſeized the Engliſh of all the territorie betweene Caterlogh and the Iriſh ſea.

O More. Out of a pamphlet of Patrick Finglas.

Among theſe is the confluence of Neore and Barrow, which after they have travailed in a joint ſtreame ſome few miles from hence in one channell, preſent both their name and their waters unto their eldeſt ſiſter the Shour, which ſtraightwaies is ſwallowed up at a mouth full of rockes within the gulfe of the Ocean: where on the left hand there ſhooteth out a little promontorie with a narrow necke, that ſheweth a prettie high tower unto the ſailers, erected by the merchants of Roſſe, what time they were in their proſperity, for their direction and ſafer arrivall at the rivers mouth.

QUEENES COUNTIE.

ABove Caterlogh, toward the North-weſt there ſpreadeth out a little country full of woods and bogs, named in Iriſh Leaſe, and QUEENES Countie in Engliſh: which Queene Mary ordained to be a Countie, by Commiſſion given unto Thomas Ratcliffe Earle of Suſſex, then Lord Deputie, who reduced it into the tearmes of civill order and governement: whence it is that the chiefe towne thereof is called Mary-Burgh: where certaine garriſon ſouldiers with their Seneſchall keep ward, and have much adoe to defend themſelves againſt the O-Mores (who beare themſelves as the ancient Lords thereof) againſt Mac-Gilpatric, the O-Dempſies, and others, a miſchievous and tumultuous kind of people, who daily practiſe and plot all they can to annoy the Engliſh, and to ſhake off the yoke of lawes. For to ſubdue this wilde and hoſtile part of the countrey, at the firſt entrie of the Engliſh thither, Meilere was ſent: For whom Hugh Lacie governour of Ireland erected one Caſtle at Tahmelio, like as a ſecond at Obowy, a third likewiſe upon the river Barrow, and a fourth at Norrach. But among the reſt, he fortified Donemaws, an ancient Caſtle ſtanding in the moſt plentifull part of the territorie, which came hereditarily unto the Breoſes Lords of Brecknocke, by Ewa the younger daughter of William Mareſchall Earle of Pembroch, and what way as Barrow, which riſing out of Slew Blomey hills Weſtward, runneth ſolitarie alone amongſt the woods, he viſiteth that ancient RHEBA, mentioned by Ptolomee, which keeping the name ſtill intire is called at this day Rheban: but inſteed of a citie it is altogether, as one ſaith, πόλις ἄπολις, that is, A citie citileſſe, or, The remaines of that which was a citie; even a few little cottages with a fortreſſe. Notwithſtanding it giveth the title of a Baronet unto that Nobleman Nicholas of Saint Michael, the Lord thereof, who is commonly called the Baronet of Rheban.

KINGS COUNTIE.

LIke as the Queenes Countie aforeſaid was ſo named in honour of Queene Marie, ſo the territorie bordering next unto it Northward, divided with Barrow running betweene, and called in times paſt Offalie, was in honour of Philip King of Spaine her husband, tearmed Kings Countie, and the principall towne in it Philips Towne; where is placed a Seneſchall with a ward: and divers Gentlemen of Engliſh blood are here planted, namely, the Warrens, Her-berts, Colbies, Mores, and Leiceſters: amongſt the Iriſh ſepts of O-Conor, unto whom a great part hereof in old time belonged; Mac-Coghlan, Offaly.

Philips towne.

A Coghlan, O-Maily, Fox, and others ſtand ſtoutly in defence of the lands wonne by their anceſtors, and left unto them. Now theſe naturall Iriſh inhabitants grumble and complaine that their livings and patrimonies have beene taken from them, and no other lands aſſigned and ſet out for them to live in: Hence it is that taking hold of every occaſion to make uprores, they put the Engliſh dwelling among them to much trouble ever and anon: yea and oftentimes in revengefull minds feſtered and poiſoned with hoſtile hatred, they breake out furiouſly into open and actuall rebellions.

THE COUNTY OF KILDAR.

OVer againſt theſe all along Eaſtward, affronteth the county of Kildar a moſt rich and plentifull country: concerning the paſtures whereof Giraldus Cambrenſis uſeth theſe verſes of Virgill.

Et quantum longis carpunt armenta diebus,
Exiguâ tantum gelidus ros nocte reponit.
And looke how much when daies are long the beaſts by graſing eat,
So much cold dewes make good againe by night when 'tis not great.

C

The chiefe and head towne of the ſhire is Kildar, much honoured and graced in the firſt infancy of the Iriſh Church, by reaſon of Saint Brigid a Virgin right venerable and highly eſteemed of for her devotion and virginity (I meane not that Brigid which about 240. yeeres agoe erected that order of the ſiſters or Nunnes of Saint Brigid: namely, that within one Monaſtery both Monkes and Maidens ſhould live, divided aſunder by walls, and ſuffered onely one to ſee another) but another Brigid of greater antiquity by farre, as who was a Diſciple of Saint Patricke, of great fame and renowne throughout Ireland, England, and Scotland. Whoſe miracles and fire never going out, but kept by Nunnes, as it were, in that ſecret Sanctuary of D Veſta, and of the aſhes that never encreaſe, are mentioned by writers. This Kildar is adorned with an Epiſcopall See, named in the Popes letters in old time, Epiſcopatus Darenſis. After the entrance of the Engliſh into Ireland, it was the habitation of Richard Earle of Pembroch, then of William Mareſchall his ſonne in law, that married his daughter, Earle of Penbroch likewiſe: by whoſe fourth daughter Sibyll it came to William Ferrars Earle of Derby, and by his daughter likewiſe begotten of her, unto William Lord Veſcy: whoſe ſonne William Veſcy, Lord chiefe Juſtice of Ireland, ſtanding in termes of diſfavour and diſgrace with King Edward the Firſt, for certain quarrels ariſing between him and John the ſonne of Thomas Fitz-Girald, and being bereft of his only ſonne lawfully begotten, granted and ſurrendred Kildare E and other his lands in Ireland unto the King, ſo that he might enfeoffe his baſe ſonne ſurnamed De Kildare, in his other lands in England. And a little while after, the ſaid John ſonne of Thomas Fitz-Girald, whoſe anceſters (deſcended from Girald Windeſor, Caſtellan of Pembroch) had with paſſing great valour performed moſt painefull ſervice in the conqueſt of this Iland, was by Edward the ſecond King of England endowed with the caſtle and towne of Kildar, together with the title and name of Earle of Kildar.

Kildar. S. Brigid.

Ch. 9. Ed. 2. N. 12.

Theſe Fitz Giralds, or as they now tearme them, the Giraldines, are a right noble family, and for their exploits highly renowned: by whoſe valour, as one ſaid, The Engliſhmen both kept the ſea coaſts of Wales, and alſo forced and won the walls of Ire- F land. And verily this houſe of Kildare flouriſhed a long time without taint of honour and name (as which never bare armes againſt their Prince) untill that Thomas Fitz-Girald, the ſonne of Girald Fitz-Girald Earle of Kildare, and Lord Deputy of Ireland under King Henry the eighth, hearing that his father ſent for into England, and accuſed for miſgoverning Ireland, was put to death; upon this light and falſe rumour, unadviſedly and raſhly carried away with the heat of youth, put himſelfe into armes againſt Prince and countrey, ſolicited the Emperour Charles the fifth to enter and ſeize upon Ireland, waſted the land farre and neere with fire and ſword, laid ſiege to Dublin, and killed the Archbiſhop thereof: For which outrages ſhortly after he with five of his unkles were hanged, when his father for very ſorrow was dead before. Howbeit Queene Mary reſtored the family unto their blood and full eſtate, when ſhee advanced Girald brother unto the aforeſaid Thomas to bee Earle of Kildare, and Baron of Offaly. He ended this life about the yeere 1558. his eldeſt ſon Girald died before his father, leaving one onely daughter married to Sir Robert Digby: Henry his ſecond ſonne ſucceeded, who when he had by his wife L. Francis daughter to Charles Earle of Nottingham only two daughters, William the third ſon ſucceeded in the Earledome, who was drowned in paſſing into Ireland in the yeere 1599. having no iſſue. And then the title of Earle of Kildare came to Girald Fitz-Girald ſonne to Edward their Unkle, who was reſtored to his blood in linage to make title by deſcent lineall or collaterall from his father and brother, and all his anceſtours, any attaindour or corruption of blood to the contrary notwithſtanding. There be alſo in this County theſe places of better note than the reſt; Naas a mercate towne, Athie upon the river Barrow, Mainoth a caſtle belonging to the Earles of Kildare, and a towne unto which King Edward the firſt, in favour of Girald Fitz-Moris granted a mercate and Faire: Caſtle Martin, the chiefe ſeat of the family of Fitz-Euſtace; which deſcending from the Poers in the County of Waterford, for their valour received the honour of a Parliament-Barons, beſtowed upon Rowland Fitz-Euſtace by King Edward the fourth, together with the Manour of Port-leſter, and the title of Vicount Baltinglas, at the hands of King Henry the eighth: which dignities with a faire patrimony Rowland Fitz-Euſtace, ſeduced by the religious pretext unto rebellion, and flying his countrey loſt by attaindour under Queene Elizabeth. The families here remaining, beſides the Giraldines, that be of higher birth above others, fetch their deſcent alſo out of England, namely the Ougans, De-la-Hides, Ailmers, Waſhes, Boiſels, Whites, Suttons, &c. As for the Giants dance, which they talke of that Merlin by art magick tranſlated out of this territorie unto Saliſbury plaine, as alſo of that moſt bloody battell which ſhall be one day betweene the Engliſh and the Iriſh at Molleaghmaſt, I willingly leave unto the credulous lovers of fabulous antiquity, and the vaine beleevers of propheſies. For my purpoſe is not to give fond tales the telling. Theſe bee the midland counties of Leinſter: now are we to goe unto thoſe by the ſea ſide.

Barons Fitz-Euſtace. Pat. 2. Ed. 4.

THE COUNTY OF WEISFORD.

BEneath that mouth, at which Barrow, Neore, and Shoure, the ſiſter-like rivers, having embraced one another and joyned hands, are laid up in the Ocean, there ſheweth it ſelfe Eaſtward in a Promontorie where the ſhore fetcheth a compaſſe round, the County of Weiſford or Wexford. In Iriſh, County Reogh, where Ptolomee in times paſt placed the MENAPII. That theſe Menapians came hither from the Menapii, a nation in low Germany that dwelt by the ſea coaſts, the name doth after a ſort imply. But whether that Carauſius were of this or that nation, who taking upon him the imperiall purple robe ſeized upon Britaine againſt the Emperour Diocleſian, I leave to others. For Aurelius Victor calleth him a Citizen of Menapia; and the Citie Menapia is placed by the Geographers not in thoſe Low-countries of Germany, but in Ireland. In this county, upon the river Barrow, there flouriſhed ſometimes Roſſe, a great Citie, well traded by merchants and peopled with inhabitants, fenſed with a wall of great compaſſe by Iſabell daughter to the Earle Richard Strongbow: and that is the only monument which now it ſheweth. For by reaſon of diſcord and home broiles betweene the Citizens and the religious orders, it is a good while ſince brought in manner to nothing.

Carauſius.

More Eaſt, Duncannon, a caſtle with a garriſon, ſtandeth over the river, ſo as that it

A it is able to command the river, that no ſhips ſhould paſſe either to Waterford, or to Roſſe: and therefore it was thought good policie, to fortifie this place when the Spaniards hovered and gaped for Ireland, in the yeere 1588. From thence at the very mouth of the river, there runneth out a narrow necke of land, which preſenteth unto the ſailers an high Turret, erected by the Citizens of Roſſe when they were in flouriſhing eſtate, that they might more ſafely enter into the rivers mouth. A little from hence ſtandeth Tintern, upon the ſhore with many winding creekes, where William Mareſchal Earle of Penbroch founded a notable Abbay, and called it de Voto, for that he had vowed to God to erect an Abbay, when hee was toſſed in a ſore and B dangerous tempeſt: and being after ſhipwracke caſt up a land in this place, performed it here according to his vow.

Tintern Monaſtery.

This very Promontory Ptolomee calleth HIERON, that is, Holy: and in the ſame ſignification, I would make no doubt but the inhabitants alſo called it. For the utmoſt towne thereof, at which the Engliſhmen landed, and ſet firſt foot in this Iland, they named in their native language Banna, which ſoundeth all one with Holy.

Hieron a Promontory.

From this Holy point, the ſhore turning full upon the Eaſt, runneth forth along Northward; over againſt which there lye flats and ſhallowes in the ſea, that indanger many a ſhip, which the Mariners call The Grounds. In this place Ptolomee ſetteth the river MODONA, and at the mouth thereof the city MENAPIA, which are ſo ſtript C out of their names, that I am out of all hope in ſo great darkeneſſe to diſcover any twy-light of the truth. But ſeeing there is one onely river that voideth it ſelfe in this place, which cutteth this county as it were juſt in the mids, and is now called Slane: ſeeing alſo at the very mouth thereof, where it maketh a Poole, there is a towne by a German name called Weiſford, the head place of the whole county, I may the more boldly conjecture that Slane was that MODONA, and Weiſford MENAPIA; and ſo much the rather, becauſe this name is of a later date, to wit, a meere German, and given unto it by thoſe Germans, whom the Iriſh tearme Oaſtmans. This towne is for the bigneſſe inferiour to many, but as memorable as any; becauſe it was the firſt in all Ireland that when Fitz-Stephen, a moſt valiant Captaine, aſſaulted it, yeelded D it ſelfe unto the protection of the Engliſh, and became a Colonie of the Engliſh: Whence this whole territorie is paſſing well peopled with Engliſh, who to this very day uſe the ancient Engliſhmens apparell and their language; yet ſo, as that they have a certaine kinde of mungrell ſpeech between Engliſh and Iriſh. Dermot, who firſt drew the Engliſhmen over into Ireland, granted this and the territorie lying to it unto Fitz-Stephen for ever, who beganne a Burgh hard by at Carricke: and albeit the place were ſtrong by naturall ſituation, yet hee helped it by art. But when as the ſaid Fitz-Stephen had ſurrendred up his right into the hands of King Henry the ſecond, he made it over to Richard Earle of Penbroch, that he ſhould hold it in Fee from him and the Kings of England as ſuperiour Lords. From whom by the Earles E Mareſchals, the Valences of the Luſignian line in France, and the Haſtings, it deſcended to the Greies Lords of Ruthin, who commonly in ancient Charters are named Lords of Weiſford; although in the reigne of King Henry the ſixth, John Talbot is once called in the Records Earle of Shrewsbury and of Weiſford. Touching this river, take with you this verſe, ſuch an one as it is, of Nechams making.

Ditat Eniſcortum flumen quod Slana vocatur, Hunc cernit Weisford ſe ſociare ſibi.
The river which is called Slane enricheth Eniſcort,
And this ſaid river Weiſford ſees gladly with him to ſort.

For Eniſcourt, a Burrough or incorporate Towne, is ſeated upon it. More inward F by the ſame rivers ſide, ye have Fernes, known onely for the dignity of an Epiſcopall See in it; which in old time the Giraldines fortified with a Caſtle. Hard by, but beyond the river Slane dwell the Cavenaghs, Donels, Montaghs, & O-Mores, Iriſhmen of a ſtirring and tumultuous ſpirit: and among them the Sinottes, Roches, and Peppards, Engliſhmen. On this ſide Slane the men of greateſt name bee the Viſcounts Mont-Garret: of whom the firſt was Richard Butler, a younger ſon of Pierce Earle of Ormond, adorned with that title by Edward the ſixth, and many more of the ſame ſirname; the Devereuxes, Staffords, Chevers, Whites, Forlongs, Fitz-Harris, Browns, Hores, Haies, Cods, Maylers, all of the Engliſh race and blood, like as be moſt of the common people.

CAUCI.

Cauci.

THe CAUCI, who were likewiſe a people inhabiting the ſea coaſt of Germany, ſeated themſelves next unto the Menapii, but not ſo farre diſtant a ſunder as thoſe in Germany. Their country lying upon the ſea was that which the O Tools and O Birns, families of Iriſhry dwel in, men fed and maintained by wickedneſſe and bloodſhed, impatient of reſt and quietneſſe; and who preſuming upon the ſtrength of their holds and faſtneſſes, carry an obſtinate minde againſt all lawes, and implacable hatred to Engliſh. For the repreſſing of whoſe audacious outrage, and to ſtrengthen the authority of lawes, there hath been ſerious conſultation had by moſt prudent and politicke perſons in the yeere 1578. that theſe ſmall territories ſhould be reduced into the forme of a county: and ſet out they were into ſixe Baronies within certain appointed limits, which ſhould make the county of Wicklo or Arcklo. For a place this is of greateſt name, and the Earle of Ormonds caſtle, who write themſelves among other honourable titles in their ſtile, Lords of Arcklo: under which caſtle that river which Ptolomee calleth OVOCA falleth into the ſea, making a creeke, and as Giraldus Cambrenſis writeth, The nature of this river is ſuch, that as well when the ſea floweth, as when it ebbeth, in this creeke it retaineth ſtill the taſte of the naturall freſhneſſe, ſaving his owne water entire and voide of all brackiſhneſſe, even as far as to the maine ſea.

COMITATUS DUBLINIENSIS,

The Countie of Divelin.

BEyond the CAUCI inhabited the EBLANI, where now lieth the county of DUBLIN or DIVELIN; which on the Eaſt ſide is wholly waſhed with the Iriſh ſea, on the Weſt bounded with the county of Kildare, on the South joyning to the little territories of the O-Tooles and O-Birns, and thoſe which they tearme the Glynnes, and limited Northward with the county of Meth and Nanny a little river: the ſoile thereof bringeth forth corne abundantly, and yeeldeth graſſe and fodder right plenteouſly, beſides it is well ſtored with all ſorts of living creatures that are gotten by hunting and hawking for the table: but ſo deſtitute, for the greateſt part, of woods, that in moſt places they uſe a clammy kind of fat turfe, or Sea-coale out of England for their fewell. In the South part thereof, which is leſſe inhabited and more uncivill, and riſeth up here and there with an hilly ridge, full enough of woods, and under which lye hollow vallies ſhaded with trees, which they call Glynnes; every place is ſore annoied with the two pernicious and miſchievous ſepts or kinreds of the O-Tooles and the O-Birnes. Among theſe Glynnes appeareth the Biſhopricke of Glandilaw, but utterly deſolate, ever ſince it was annexed to the Archbiſhopricke of Divelin. All this county beſides is paſſing well repleniſhed with inhabitants and townes, and for wealthy port, and a certain peculiar fineneſſe and neatneſſe that they uſe, ſurpaſſeth all other parts of Ireland, and is divided into five diſtinct Baronies, namely, Rath down, New caſtle, Caſtle-Knoc, Cowloc, and Bal-rodry, which notwithſtanding I am not able to goe through as I would, for that their bounds are unknown to mee.

Glynnes.

First therefore I will runne along the ſea coaſt only, and from thence, as the courſes of the rivers lead me, ſurvey the more in-land places; for there is no part of this county twenty miles from the ſhore. To beginne then at the South ſide, the firſt place that ſheweth it ſelfe upon this coaſt is Wicklo: where there ſtandeth over the narrow

Wicklo lately made a county, 1606.

A narrow haven a rocke, encloſed within a ſtrong wall in ſtead of a caſtle, over which, as divers other caſtles beſides of this kingdome, there can none by authority of Parliament bee ſet as Conſtable, but an Engliſhman borne, becauſe to the hurt of the State, the Iriſhmen that were Conſtables had both defended the ſame badly, and alſo by a certaine connivencie ſuffered the priſoners to make eſcapes. As touching this haven hearken what Giraldus ſaith, who tearmeth it Winchiligillo. There is an haven at Winchiligillo, on that ſide of Ireland where it lieth neerer unto Wales, that ordinarily and uſually at every ebbe of the ſea receiveth waters flowing into it; and again at every return of tide, diſchargeth and voideth the ſaid water which it entertained:
B and when as the ſea in the ebbe hath now by the going away of the tide forſaken the creeke, yet the river that runneth in by every chinke and winding cranke, becommeth bitter and ſalt with continuall brackiſhneſſe.

Then from the toppe of an hill New-caſtle looketh into the ſea, and ſeeth the ſhelves of ſand, which they call The Grounds, lying oppoſite a great way in length: Howbeit betweene them and the ſhore it is reported to bee ſeven fathom deepe of water. A little higher, where the riveret Bray commeth into the ſea, appeareth Old-Court, the poſſeſſions of the Walſhes of Caryckmain, who as they are of ancient ſtocke and gentry, ſo their family hath ſhot forth many branches in this tract. Next unto it is Powers or Poers-Court, belonging in times paſt, as appeareth by the name,
C unto the Poers; a large and great caſtle, untill that Tirlough O Toole, after hee had revolted and rebelled, undermined and overthrew it. From Bray mouth the ſhore for to let in a creeke bendeth and windeth it ſelfe inward, and at the very bent of the elbow lieth a little Iſland called Saint Benets, belonging to the Archbiſhop of Divelin.

This creeke or Bay is called Dublin Haven, into which Liffy the nobleſt river of this county out-powreth his ſtreame: who albeit his ſpring head where hee riſeth bee but fifteene miles from his mouth, yet with ſo many winding crankes he fetcheth ſuch a compaſſe, that firſt hee turneth into the South by Saint Patrickes land; then Weſtward, afterwards North, watering the county of Kildare, and at length in-D to the Eaſt by Caſtle-Knoc, the Barony in times paſt of the Tirils, whoſe inheritance by the females was devolved upon other about the yeere 1370. and ſo by Kilmainam, an houſe in old time of Saint Johns Knights of Jeruſalem, now converted to a retiring place of the Lords Deputies. This Liffy doubtleſſe is mentioned by Ptolomee, but through careleſneſſe of the tranſcribers baniſhed out of his owne due place. For the river Libnius is ſet downe in the copies of Ptolomee at the very ſame latitude or elevation of the Pole, in the other part of the Iland, where there is no ſuch river at all: but let him, if it pleaſe you, by a writ of recovery returne out of exile now to his owne city Eblana, from whence uniuſtly he hath been for a time alienated: and take withall, if you think good, theſe verſes of Necham as touching this river.

To ſee and viſit Caſtle-Knock Liffy doth not diſdaine,
At Dublin ready is the ſea this ſtreame to entertaine.

* That is, the river Liff.

For ſeated it is ſeven miles from his mouth, which alone fame may celebrate for all the cities of Ireland. This is that very city which Ptolomee called Eblana, we Divelin, the Latine writers Dublinium and Dublinia, the Welſh Britans Dinas Dulin, the Engliſh Saxons in times paſt Duplin, and the Iriſh Bala-cleigh, that is, The towne upon Hurdles: for men ſay when it was built the foundation was laid upon Hurdles, the place was ſo fenniſh and mooriſh: like as Hiſpalis or Sivill in Spaine, F which Iſidore reporteth to have been ſo named, becauſe it ſtood in a mariſh ground, upon piles and ſtakes deepely pitched into the earth. For the antiquity of Dublin I finde no certainty; but that very ancient it is the authority of Ptolomee perſwadeth me to thinke. Saxo Grammaticus writeth, how it was pitifully rent and diſmembred in the Daniſh warres: afterwards it came under the ſubjection of Edgar King of England, which his Charter before mentioned confirmeth, wherein hee calleth it the moſt Noble City of Ireland. Then the Norwegians poſſeſſed themſelves of it: A Whence in the life of Gryffith Ap Cynan Prince of Wales, we read that Harald of Norway when he had ſubdued the greateſt part of Ireland, built Develin. This may ſeeme to be that Harald Harfager, that is, with the faire lockes or treſſes, who was the firſt King of Norway, whoſe line in deſcent goeth thus in the life of Gryffith: Harald begat a ſonne named Auloed: Auloed begat another Auloed; he had a ſonne named Sitric King of Develin: Sitric he begat Auloed, whoſe daughter Racwella was mother to Gryffith Ap Cynan borne at Dublin, whiles Tirlough reigned in Ireland. But this is extravagant. Develin at length when the Engliſh firſt arrived in Ireland, yeelded unto their valour, and by them was manfully defended, when Auſculph Prince B of the Dublinians, and afterwards Gottred King of the Iſles fiercely on every ſide aſſaulted it: within a while after a Colony of Briſtow-men was deduced hither, unto whom King Henry the ſecond granted this City (happely at that time diſpeopled) for to inhabite, with all the Franchiſes and free Cuſtomes, which the men of Briſtow have, and that by thoſe very words which I have alledged. Since which time it hath flouriſhed every day more and more, and in many tumultuous times and hard ſtreights given notable proofe of moſt faithfull loyaltie to the Crowne of England.

Who alſo is named Abloicus. Aulafus and Olavus.

This is the roiall City and ſeat of Ireland, a famous towne for Merchandize, the chiefe Court of Juſtice, in munition ſtrong, in buildings gorgeous, in Citizens populous. An old writer calleth it, a City in regard of the people noble, of the ſite moſt C pleaſant, by reaſon of the ſea and river meeting together, rich and plentifull in fiſh, for trafficke famous, for the green plain delightfull and lovely, beſet with woods of maſt-bearing trees, environed about with Parkes harbouring Deere. And William of Newborrow of it writeth thus: Divelin a maritime citie is the mother citie of all Ireland, having to it a haven paſsing well frequented, for trafficke and entercourſe of Merchants matchable with our London. Seated it is in a right delectable and wholſome place: for to the South yee have hils mounting up aloft, Weſtward an open champion ground, and on the Eaſt the ſea at hand and in ſight; the river Liffy running downe at North-Eaſt affordeth a ſafe rode and harbour for ſhips. By the river ſide are certain wharfes or Kaies, as we terme them, whereby the violent force of the water might be reſtrai- D ned. For this verbe (Caiare) in old writers ſignified to Keep in, to reſtrain and repreſſe: which that moſt learned* Scaliger hath well noted. A very ſtrong wall of rough building ſtone reacheth hence along by the ſides of it (and the ſame toward the South fortified alſo with rampires) which openeth at ſix gates, from whence there runne forth ſuburbs of a great length.

Toward the Eaſt is Dammes gate, and hard by ſtandeth the Kings caſtle on high, moſt ſtrongly fenſed with ditches, towers, and an Armory or Store-houſe built by Henry Loundres the Archbiſhop, about the yeere 1220. In the Eaſt ſuburbs neere unto Saint Andrew the Apoſtles Church, Henry the ſecond King of England, as Hoveden reporteth, cauſed a roiall palace (or rather a banqueting houſe) to be erected for E himſelfe, framed with wonderfull workmanſhip moſt artificially of ſmoothed watles after the manner of this country, wherein himſelfe with the Kings and Princes of Ireland kept a ſolemne feaſt upon Chriſtmas day.

From hence is to bee ſeene juſt over againſt it a beautifull Colledge (in which place there ſtood in old time the Monaſterie of All-Hallowes) conſecrated unto the name of the holy and indiviſible Trinity, which for the exerciſe and poliſhing of good wits with good literature, Queene Elizabeth of moſt happy memory endowed with the priviledges of an Univerſity; and being furniſhed of late with a notable Library, giveth no ſmall hope that both religion, and all the exquiſite and liberall ſciences will return eſtſoones after their long exile to Ireland, as to their ancient home F (unto which, as unto a Mart of Arts and good learning, ſtrangers ſometime uſed to flocke and repaire.) And verily in the reigne of Edward the Second Alexander Bicknor Archbiſhop of Divelin began to recall the profeſſion of learning hither, having obtained from the Pope the priviledges of an Univerſity, and erected alſo publike Lectures: but the troubleſome times that preſently enſued, interrupted the laudable

A dable enterprise of that good man. The North gate openeth at the bridge built with arched work of new hewen stone by King John, and this joineth Oustmanstowne to the City. For here the Oustmans, who came over, as Giraldus writeth, out of Norway and the parts of the Northren Islands, planted themselves, as the Annales beare record, about the yeere of salvation 1050.

In this suburbe stood in times past the goodly Church of Saint Maries of Oustmanby (for so in a Charter of King John it is called) an house also founded for preaching Friers, called of them Black Friers, unto which of late daies have beene translated the Judiciall Courts of the kingdome. In the South quarter of the City stand
B two gates, Ormonds gate and Newgate (which is their common house of correction.) These lead unto the longest suburbe of all, called Saint Thomas street, and a magnificent Abbey of the same name, called Thomas Court, founded and endowed in Thomas Court.
times past with very ample revenues by King Henry the second for the expiation of the murder of Thomas Archbishop of Canterbury. Into the South openeth Pauls gate, and that which taketh the name of Saint Nicolas, making way into Saint Patrickes suburbe, wherein standeth the Archbishops Palace, knowne by the name of Saint Sepulchres, and a most stately Church dedicated unto Saint Patricke, right goodly to bee seene, with faire embowed workes, stone pavements, an arched roofe over head of stone worke, and a very high tower steeple. What time this Church
C was first built, it is, to say truth, uncertaine. That Gregorie King of the Scots came unto it about the yeere 890. the Scottish Historie doth record. The same afterward being much enlarged by John King of England, was ordained first to be a Church of Prebends by John Comyn Archbishop of Dublin in the yeere 1191. and Pope Celestine the third confirmed the same. Then after him, Henry Loundres his successour in the Archbishopricke augmented it with dignities of Personages (for I may be bold to use here the founders words) and framed it conformable to the immunities, orders, and approved customes of the Church of Salisbury. But in our daies it maintaineth a Deane, a Chanter, a Chancellor, a Treasurer, two Arch-Deacons, and two and twenty Prebendaries; The only light and lamp (that I may not conceale the most Statut. Parli. 18. H. 8. c. 15.
D ample testimony which the Parliament of the kingdome giveth unto it) of all godly and Ecclesiasticall discipline and order in Ireland.

There is another Cathedrall Church also standing in the very heart of the City, which being consecrate unto the Holy Trinity, is commonly called Christs Church; touching the building thereof thus we read in the ancient records of the same Church: Sitric King of Dublin, the sonne of Ableb Earle of Dublin, gave unto the blessed Trinity, and to Donatus the first Bishop of Dublin, a place to found a Church in unto the holy Trinity; and not onely so, but gold and silver also hee bestowed sufficiently for the building of the Church and the whole close. This was done in the yeere 1012. in which, as Lancarvanensis avoucheth, Sitric the sonne of Ableie (for so he calleth him) lived
E and flourished in great name. The worke begun by Donatus, Laurence Archbishop of Dublin, Richard Strongbow Earle of Penbroch, commonly called Earle of Strigulia (whose tomb is here to be seen, repaired by Sir Henry Sidney Lord Deputy) Robert Fitz-Stephen, and Reimund Fitz-Girald finished. Hard at the South side of this Church there standeth a stately Towne-hall, built of foure square stone, and called the Tolestale, where causes are tried before the Maior of the City, and where the Tole-stale.
Citizens use to hold their Sessions and publike assemblies, for it enjoyeth many immunities. In times past this Citie had for the chiefe Magistrate a Provost; but in the yeere of our redemption 1409. King Henry the fourth granted them licence to chuse every yeere a Maior and two Baslifs: also that the Maior should have F a gilt sword carried before him for ever. But afterwards, King Edward the sixth changed the Bailiffes into Sheriffes. Neither wanteth any thing here which a man can wish for in a most flourishing City, save only that an heape of sand, which the ebbing and flowing of the sea casteth up into the mouth of Liffy, doth so dam up and bar the haven, that it is not able to bring up any great vessels but at high water. Thus much of Dublin, for the most part of which I acknowledge my selfe beholden unto the diligence and learning of James Usſher Chancellor of S. Patricks Church, whoſe variety of knowledge and judgement are far above his yeeres. A

As touching Robert Vere Earle of Oxford, whom King Richard the ſecond, a Prince too too laviſh in giving honourable titles, made Marqueſſe of Dublin, and afterwards Duke of Ireland, I have ſpoken already, and reaſon I have none to repeat the ſame here. Yet will I note thus much, which I have ſince happened upon in the Records. When as King Richard aforeſaid had advanced that Robert Vere Earle of Oxford to bee Marqueſſe of Dublin, and had given to him the Seigniory of Ireland during his life: hee, deſirous to augment his honour by more ennobliſhing him with honourable Armes, granted alſo that as long as hee ſhould live, and hold the ſaid Seigniory, he ſhould beare theſe Armes, Azure 3. Crownes Or in a Bordur, in his Standards, Pennons, Coat-armours, and other things wherein Armes are to be ſhewed in all Marſhall matters, and elſewhere at his pleaſure. But this grant was ſoone after recalled, and thoſe Armes aboliſhed. B

Where the river Liffy lodgeth himſelfe in the Ocean, Houth ſtandeth, compaſſed in manner round about with the ſea: of which the Noblemen ſirnamed Saint Laurence, and dwelling there, become named Barons of Houth; men of rare felicity, for that in ſo long a deſcent of their line (for they are able to derive their pedegree from the time of King Henry the ſecond) there hath of them, by report, none beene attainted of high treaſon, none left ward in his minority. And within a little of this place is Malchide, or Molachid, ennobled by the Lords thereof the Talbots, Engliſh by their firſt originall. C

More within the country, Northward there adjoineth hard to the county of Dublin, Fingall, that is, if you interpret it out of the Iriſh language, a nation of forreiners, (for they uſe to nominate the Engliſh Gall, as one would ſay, ſtrangers, and Saiſſones, as it were, Saxons) a little country, but very good and paſſing well husbanded; even the garner and barn of this kingdome, ſo great ſtore of corne it yeeldeth every yeere. And here the ſoile ſtriveth after a ſort with the painfull labour of the husbandman, which in other places throughout this Iland lying neglected, without tillage and manuring, ſeemeth to make a very grievous complaint of the inhabitants ſloth and lazineſſe. There are planted every where throughout this county right worſhipfull families, nobly deſcended of Engliſh blood; and namely, beſides thoſe which I have already mentioned, the Plonkets, Barnwels, Ruſſels, Talbots, Dillons, Nettervils, Holywoods, Lutterels, Burnels, Fitz-Williams, Gouldings, Uſſhers, Cadleys, Finglaſes, Sarfelds, Blackneys, Cruceys, Baths, &c. D

Thus farre forth ſummarily of Leinſter, which in old time reached no farther. Now I wot not whether it bee worth the laughing at or the relating, that Thomas Stukely, when hee had in England and Ireland both made ſhipwracke of his good name, credit, and fortunes, having wound himſelfe out of the danger of the lawes, curried ſuch favour with Pope Gregory the thirteenth, what with making many faire promiſes, and what with bragging of great matters, that hee received at his hands theſe titles, Marqueſſe of Leinſter, Earle of Weiſford and Caterlogh, Vicount Murrough, and Baron of Roſſe and Tdron. With which titles hee being puffed up in pride, whiles he thought to conquer Ireland, went aſide into Africk, and there with the three Kings that were ſlaine in one battell, made up the enterlude of his life with an honeſt cloſe and cataſtrophe. MIDIA, OR MEDIAMETH.

THe reſt of the Countrey of the Eblani was in ancient time a kingdome, and the fifth part of Ireland, which in their owne native language they call Mith, the Engliſh Meth, Giraldus nameth it in Latin Midia and Media, perhaps, becauſe it is in the very middle of the Iland. For they ſay that Killair a caſtle in theſe parts, which ſeemeth to be in Ptolomee LABERUS, is as it were the Navill of Ireland. F

A Ard the very name implieth no leſſe: For Lair in the Iriſh tongue ſignifieth The Middle. This Meth lieth ſtretched out from the Iriſh ſea as farre as to the river Shannon: For the ſoile thereof, as ſaith Bartholomæus Anglicus, Fertile it is in corne, paſture ground, and cattell, plentifull in fiſh, fleſh, and other victualls of white meat, as butter cheeſe, and milke, watered alſo with rivers. The ſituation is delectable to the eye, and an wholſome aire. In regard of woods and mariſhes in the skirts and borders, it hath a very hard acceſſe and entry unto it: And therefore, conſidering the multitude of people, the ſtrength of caſtles and townes, is is commonly called for the peace thereof, the CHAMBER OF IRELAND. Within the memorie of our fathers, becauſe the country was
B too large for to be governed by one Sheriffe, and to the end that juſtice might with more facility be miniſtred, it was divided by authority of Parliament in the 38. yeere of King Henry the eighth into two parts, namely, the county of Eaſt Meth, and the county of Weſt-Meth.

THE COUNTY OF EAST-METH.

THE County of EAST-METH is environed round about with the C county of Kildar South, with the county of Dublin and the ſea Eaſt, with the territorie of Louth North, and with the county of Weſt Meth on the Weſt. The whole is divided into 18. Boyn, which Ptolomee calleth BUVINDA, Giraldus BOANDUS, a noble river ſpringing out of the North ſide of the Kings county, runneth through this county. In the hither part on this ſide Boyn, theſe are the places memorable: Galtrim, where the Huſeys have dwelt a long time: Killin Caſtle, which Hugh Lacy Cuſtos of Ireland under King Henry the ſecond built; and Dunſany, which have their Parliament Barons, Noblemen of ancient deſcent out of the family of the Plonkets, which D others fetch out of Denmark: but they beare the very ſame Armes in ſundry colours, which Alan Plonket of Kilpecke in England did: who alſo under King Edward the firſt lived in the dignity and port of a Baron. Now this houſe of the Plonkets in Ireland came up and grew to bee of high eſtimation, ever ſince that Sir Chriſtopher Plonket, a valiant and wiſe man (Deputy, as they terme him, unto Richard Duke of Yorke, Lord Lievtenant in King Henry the ſixth his time) was advanced to the dignity of Baron of Killin, which fell unto him by his wife, heire to the family of the Cuſakes: and his ſecond ſon by his own worth & valour obtained the title of Baron Dunſany. On the farther ſide of Boyn, are Trimleſtoun, which hath his Baron out of the fa- Barnwell. noble ſtock of the Nogents (who came firſt out of England) with the title of a Parliament Baron. Theſe are deſcended from that Sir Gilbert Nogents, whom Hugh Lacy the Conquerer of Meth, for his courageous and valiant ſervice in the wars of Ireland, rewarded both with theſe lands and thoſe alſo of Furry, as that moſt learned Gentleman Richard Staniburſt hath recorded: Fourry aforeſaid, as alſo Corkery, where the Nogents dwell; Moyaſſell, where the Tuts and Nogents; Maghertiernan, where very many of the Petits and the Tuts; Moigoyſy, where the Tuts and Nangles; Rathcomire, where the Daltons; Magirquirk, where the Dillons, all propagated from Engliſh blood do inhabite; Clonlolan, where the O-Malaghlins, of the old roiall line of Meth; Moycaſſell, where the Magohigans, meere Iriſh beare ſway: and others whoſe very E names carry an harſh ſound of more barbarouſneſſe: which notwithſtanding, even as Martiall the Poet when hee had reckoned up certaine barbarous Spaniſh names of places, being himſelfe a Spaniard, ſaid, That he liked them better than Britiſh names, ſo the Iriſh love theſe rather than the Engliſh: in ſo much as one of their Potentates gave it out, that he would in no wiſe learne the Engliſh tongue, for feare he ſhould in ſpeaking Engliſh get a wry mouth. Thus the crow thinkes her owne birds faireſt; and we all are given to like our owne too well, even with the diſdaine and contempt of others.

Lords of Meth.

This Meth had in times paſt Kings, or pety Princes rather to rule it. And, as we read, that Monarch or ſole King of Ireland, Slany, cauſed the revenues of Meth to bee aſ- F ſigned and appropriat to the furniſhing of his royall table. But when the Engliſhmen had once ſet faſt footing in Ireland, Hugh Lacy ſubdued a great part thereof, and King Henry the ſecond enfeoffed him in it, and made him Lord of Meth, who while he was building of a caſtle at Derwarth, and holding his head downe to preſcribe a Carpenter ſomewhat that he would have done, had by him his head ſtricken off with his axe.

This

A This Hugh begat two ſonnes, Hugh Earle of Ulſter, of whom I will ſpeake hereafter: and Walter Lord of Trim, who begat Gilbert that died before his father. By the daughters of this Gilbert, Margaret and Maud, the one part by the Genevils, who were (as they write) of the houſe of Lorrain; and by the Mortimers, came to the Dukes of York, and ſo to the Kings domain or Crowne: for Peter de Genevile, ſonne to that Maud, begat Joan eſpouſed to Roger Mortimer Earle of March: and the other part by Margaret wife to John Lord Verdon, and by his heires who were Conſtables of Ireland, was devolved at length upon divers families in England, as Furnivall, Burgherſh, Crophul, &c. Genevile. Conſtables of Ireland.

THE COUNTY OF LONGFORD.

UNto weſt Meath on the North ſide joyneth the County of LONGFORD (reduced into this ranke of Countries a few yeeres ſince by the provident policy of Sir Henry Sidney Lord Deputy) called before time Anale, inhabited by a numerous Sept of the O-Pharols: of which houſe there be two great men and Potentates; one ruleth in the South part, named O-Pharoll Boy, that is, The yellow: the other in the North, called O-Pharoll Ban, that is, The white. And very few Engliſhmen are there among them, and C thoſe planted there but of late. Anale. O-Pharoll.

Along the ſide of this County paſſeth Shannon, the nobleſt river of all Ireland, which as I have ſaid runneth between Meth and Conaught. Ptolomee nameth it SENUS, Oroſius SENA, and ſome copies SACANA, Giraldus Flumen Senenſe: but the people dwelling there by call it Shanon, that is, as ſome expound it, The ancient river. He ſpringeth out of Thern hils in the county Le Trim, and forthwith cutting through the lands Southward, one while overfloweth the bankes, and enlargeth himſelfe into open Pooles: and otherwhiles drawes backe againe into narrow ſtraights, and after he hath run abroad into one or two Lakes, gathering himſelfe within his bankes, valeth bonnet to MACOLICUM, now called MALC (as the moſt learned Geogra- D pher Gerard Mercator hath obſerved) whereof Ptolomee hath made mention; and then by and by is entertained by another broad Mere (they call it Lough Reguh) the name and ſituation whereof doth after a ſort imply, that the City RIGIA, which Ptolomee placeth there, ſtood not farre from hence. But when hee hath once gotten beyond this Poole, and draweth himſelfe to a narrower channell within the bankes, there ſtandeth hard upon him the towne Athlon, of which I will write in place convenient. River Senus or Sineus. Shannin and Shannon. Macolicum. Malc. Rigia.

From thence Shannon having gotten over the Water-fall at Killolo (whereof I muſt ſpeake anon) being now able to beare the biggeſt ſhips that are, in a divided channell, as it were with two armes claſpeth about the city Limirick, whereof I have E ſpoken already. From hence Shannon paſſing on directly for threeſcore miles or thereabout in length, bearing a great bredth, and making many an Iland by the way, ſpeedeth himſelfe Weſtward; and in what place ſoever he becommeth ſhallow and affordeth fords at an ebbe or low water, there were planted little forts with wards (ſuch was the carefull providence of our forefathers) to reſtraine the inrodes of prey-taking robbers. And ſo at length he runneth and voideth out at an huge mouth into the Weſt Ocean beyond Knoc Patric, that is, Patricks hill: for ſo Necham termeth that place in theſe his verſes of Shannon. Which others call Mare Brednicum.

Fluminibus magnis lætatur Hibernia, Sineus Inter Connatiam, Momomiamque fluit.
F Tranſit per muros Limirici, Knoc Patric illum
Oceani clauſum ſub ditione videt.

Ireland takes joy in rivers great, and Shannon them among,
Betwixt Connaught and Munſter both holds on his courſe along,
He runneth hard by Limrick wayes: Knoc Patric then at laſt Within the gulfe of th'Ocean doth ſee him lodged faſt.

CON-

CONNACHTIA, OR CONAGHT.

THe fourth part of Ireland, which beareth Weſtward, cloſed in with the river Shannon, the out-let of the Lake or Lough Erne, which ſome call Trovis, others Bana, and with the maine Weſtern ſea, is named by Giraldus Cambrenſis Conachtia and Conacia, in Engliſh Conaght, and in Iriſh Conaughty. In ancient times, as we may ſee in Ptolomee, it was inhabited by the GANGANI, who are alſo named CONCANI, AUTERI and NAGNATÆ. Thoſe CONCANI or GANGANI, like as the LUCENI their next neighbours that came from the Lucenſii in Spaine, may ſeeme by the affinity of name and alſo by the vicinity of place to have beene derived from the CONCANI in Spaine, who in Strabo are according to the diverſity of reading named CONIACI and CONISCI: whom Silius teſtifieth in theſe verſes following to have beene at the firſt Scythians, and to have uſually drunke horſes blood (a thing even of later daies nothing ſtrange among the wild Iriſh.)

Nagnatæ. Gangani. Concani. Auteri.

Et qui Maſſagetem monſtrans feritate parentem, Cornipedis fuſa ſatiaris Concane vena.
And Concane though in ſavageneſſe that now reſembling ſtill Thy parents old the Maſſagets, of horſe-blood drinkſt thy fill.

And beſide him Horace,

Et letum equino ſanguine Concanum.
And Concaine, who thinks it ſo good
To make his drinke of horſes blood.

Unleſſe a man would ſuppoſe this Iriſh name Conaughty to be compounded of CONCANI and NAGNATÆ. Well, this Province as it is in ſome place freſh and fruitfull, ſo by reaſon of certaine moiſt places, yet covered over with graſſe, which of their ſoftneſſe they uſually tearme Boghes, like as all the Iland beſides every where is dangerous, and thicke ſet with many and thoſe very ſhady woods. As for the ſea coaſt, lying commodious as it doth with many baies, creekes, and navigable rivers, after a ſort it inviteth and provoketh inhabitants to navigation: but the ſweetneſſe of inbred idleneſſe doth ſo hang upon their lazie limbes, that they had rather get their living from doore to doore, than by their honeſt labours keepe themſelves from beggery. Conaught is at this day divided into theſe counties, Twomond or Clare, Galway, Maio, Slego, Letrim, and Roſcoman.

The ancient CONCANI aboveſaid, held in old time the more Southerly part of this Conaught, where now lye Twomond or Clare, the county Galway, Clan-Richards country, and the Barony of Atterith.

TWOMOND, OR THE COUNTIE CLARE.

TWomon or Twomond, which Giraldus calleth Thuetmonia, the Iriſh Twowoun, that is, The North-Mounſter (which although it lye beyond the river Shannon yet was counted in times paſt part of Mounſter, untill Sir Henry Sidney Lord Deputy laid it unto Conaught) ſhooteth out into the ſea with a very great Promontory growing by little and little thin and narrow. On the Eaſt and South ſides it is ſo encloſed with the winding courſe of the river Shannon, which waxeth bigger and bigger, like as on the Weſt part with the open maine ſea, and on the North ſide confineth ſo cloſe upon the county Galway, that there is no comming unto it by land, but through the Clan-Ricards territory. This is a country wherein a man would wiſh for nothing more, either from ſea or ſoile, were but the induſtry of the inhabitants correſpondent to the reſt; which induſtry

A induſtry Sir Robert Muſcegros an Engliſh Nobleman, Richard Clare and Thomas Clare, younger brethren of the ſtock of the Earles of Gloceſter (unto whom King Edward the firſt had granted this country) ſtirred up long ſince by building townes and caſtles, and by alluring them to the fellowſhip of a civill converſation; of whoſe name the chiefe towne Clare, now the dwelling place of the Earle of Twomond, tooke denomination, as alſo the whole tract, of it called the county of Clare. The places of greater note and name than the reſt, are Kilfennerag and Killaloe or Laon, the Biſhops Killaloe.
ſeat. This in the Roman Provinciall is tearmed Epiſcopatus Ladenſis, where there ſtands a rocke in the mid channell of the river Shannon, from which the water ruſh- Catarracta.
B eth downe a maine with a great fall and noiſe, and by ſtanding thus in the way as a bar, hindreth the river that it can carry veſſels no further; which if it were cut down, or a draine made about it, the river were able to bring up veſſels much higher, to the great commodity of all the neighbour inhabitants.

Not far from the banke of Shannon, is ſeated Bunraty, for which Sir Robert Muſce- Bunraty.
gros obtained from King Henry the third the libertie of a Mercate and Faire, and when he had fortified it with a caſtle, gave it at length unto King Edward the firſt, who granted both this towne and the whole territory unto Richard Clare aforeſaid. And ſeven miles from thence, appeareth Clare the principall towne, at a Creeke Clare.
(flowing up out of Shannon) full of Iſlands: and theſe twaine are the onely mercate
C townes here, and thoſe but ſmall ones. Moſt of the Engliſh who were in times paſt brought hither to inhabite, are either rooted out, or become degenerate and growne Iriſh: but they who carry the whole ſway here at this day, be of the Iriſh blood; as Mac-Nemors, Mac-Mahon, O-loughton, and the mightieſt by far of all other, the O-Briens, deſcended from the ancient Potentates or Kings of Conaght, or as themſelves give it forth, from the Monarchs of Ireland. Of theſe, Morogh O-Brien was the firſt Earles of Twomond.
Earle of Twomond, created by King Henry the eighth for terme of life; and after him to Donough his brothers ſonne, and his heires; who at the ſame time being made Baron of Ibarcan, ſucceeded in the Earldome, and was ſlain by his brother Sir Donel: O-Brien Connagher, O-Brien Donaghs ſon, was the third Earle, and father to Donaugh
D now the fourth Earle, who hath ſhewed ſingular good proofe of his faithfull loialty and courageous valour unto his Prince and countrey in moſt dangerous times, to his ſingular commendation.

THE COUNTY OF GALLWAY.

THe county of Gallway meereth South upon Clare, Weſt upon the Ocean, North upon the county Maio, and Eaſt upon the river Shannon. A land very thankefull unto the induſtrious husbandman, and no leſſe profitable unto the Shepheard. The Weſt ſhore endented in with ſmall
E in-lets and out-lets, or armes of the ſea, hath a border all along of greene Ilands and rugged rockes, ſet orderly, as it were, in a row: among which, foure Ilands called Arran, make a Barony, and many a fooliſh fable goes of them, as if they were the Ilands of Arran.
Ilands of the living, wherein none doe dye: alſo Inis Ceath, well knowne in times paſt by reaſon of the Monaſtery of Colman a devout Saint, founded for Scots and Bed. l. 4. c. 4. Eccleſiaſt. hiſt.
Engliſhmen: and Inis-Bouind, which Bede interpreteth out of the Scottiſh tongue to ſignifie, The Iſle of white Heifers; whereas it is a meere Britiſh word. But the Engliſhmen ſoone forſooke the Monaſtery, when the Scots and they could not well agree together. Further within lieth a Lake, called Logh-Corbes (where Ptolomee Logh-Corbes. placeth the river Auſoba) ſpreading out twenty miles or thereabout in length, and F three or foure in bredth, being navigable, and garniſhed with 300. petty Ilands full of graſſe, and bearing Pine-trees; which Lake when it reacheth neere the ſea, growing narrow into a river, runneth under Gallway, in the Iriſh tongue Gallive; named Gallwey.
ſo (or elſe I cannot tell) of the Gallæci in Spaine, the very principall city of this Province, and which would thinke hardly to be reckoned the third in Ireland. Surely a very proper and faire City it is, built almoſt round, and in manner tower-like, of entry, and ſome ſtone, and hath beſide to ſet it out a Biſhops See: and withall, through the benefit of the haven and rode aboveſaid under it, being well frequented with merchants, hath eaſie and gainfull trafficke, by exchange of rich commodities both by ſea and land. A

The battell of Knoctoe. 1516.

Not full foure miles from hence ſtandeth Knoc-toe, that is, the hill of Axes; under which that noble Girald Fuz-Girald, Earle of Kildare, and by times, for the ſpace of three and thirty yeeres Lord Deputie of Ireland, diſcomfited and put to flight, after a bloody overthrow, the greateſt rabble of rebels that ever was ſeen before in Ireland, raiſed and gathered together by William Burk, O-Bren, Mac-Nomare, and O-Carrall.

Aterith.

Not farre from hence Eaſtward ſtandeth Aterith (in which remaine ſome footings of the name of AUTERI) commonly called Athenry, encloſed round about with a wall of great circuit, but ſlenderly inhabited. It glorieth much of that warlike Baron thereof, John de Birmingham an Engliſhman; out of which family the Earle of Louth deſcended: but theſe Birminghams of Aterith, being now as it were degenerate into barbarous Iriſhry, ſcarce acknowledge themſelves to have beene Engliſh originally. The ſepts or kinreds of the Iriſh here, that be of the better ſort, are O Kelleis, O Maiden, O Flairts, Mac Dervis, &c. B

Birminghams.

Clan-Ricard. Earles of Clan-Ricard.

Clan-Ricard, that is, The ſonnes, kinred, or Tribe of Richard, or the land of Richards ſonnes, confineth upon theſe, and lieth to this county. The name it tooke, after the Iriſh manner, from one Richard of an Engliſh family, called de Burgh, that became afterwards of moſt high renowne and name in this tract, and out of which King Henry the eighth created Ulick Burgh Earle of Clan-Ricard, whoſe eldeſt ſonne carrieth the title of Baron Dun-Kellin. His ſonne Richard was the ſecond Earle, whoſe children, begotten of ſundry wives, ſtirred up many troubles, to the griefe of their father, the overthrow of their owne country, and themſelves. After Richard, who died an old man, ſucceeded his ſonne Ulick the third Earle, and father to Richard the fourth Earle now living, whoſe faſt fidelity and ſingular fortitude hath, to his great praiſe, evidently appeared, when the Engliſh, and their whole eſtates in Ireland, were in greateſt danger. C

Archbiſhoptick of Toam, or Tuen.

In this territory is the Archbiſhops See of Toam, unto which in old time many Biſhops were ſubject; but at this day the Biſhopricks of Anagchony, Duae, and Maio are annexed unto it. The Biſhoprick likewiſe of Kilmacough, which in the old Provinciall, unleſſe the name be corrupt, is not mentioned, as alſo of Clonfert, are ſeated in this part, and, as I haye heard, united to the See of Toam. D

THE COUNTY OF MAIO.

THe county Maio, on which the Weſterne Ocean beateth, lies bounded South with the county of Galway; Eaſt with the county Roſcoman, and North with the county of Slego. A fertile country and a pleaſant, abundantly rich in cattell, Deere, Hawkes, and plenty of hony: taking the name of Maio, a little city with a Biſhops See in it, which in the Roman Provinciall is called Mageo. But that Epiſcopall ſeat is now annexed to the Metropolitane of Toam, and the neighbour inhabitants repaire for Eccleſiaſticall juriſdiction to the Biſhop of Killaley, in the Barony of Tir-Auley. E

Maio.

Killaley. Biſhoprick of Killaley.

In this Maio, if I deceive not my ſelfe, Colman a Biſhop of Ireland built, as Bede writeth, a Monaſtery for thirty men or thereabout of the Engliſh Nation, trained in the profeſſion of the Monaſticall life, whom he brought out of England into Ireland. But heare what Bede ſaith. Colman found a place in the Iſle of Ireland, meet for building of a Monaſtery, named in the old Scottiſh tongue Magio. And he bought a part of it, which was not much, of the Earle, unto whoſe poſſeſſion it belonged, to found a Monaſtery therein: but with this condition annexed unto the ſale, that the Monks reſtant there ſhould pray unto the Lord for him alſo that permitted them to have the place. Now when hee had ſtraightwaies erected this Monaſtery, with the helpe of the ſaid Earle and all the neighbour inhabitants, hee placed the Engliſhmen there, leaving the Scots behinde in the Iſle Bouind. Which very Monaſtery is inhabited at this day by Engliſhmen: for F

About the yeere of our Lord 1115. this monaſterie was re-edified, and flouriſhed in King Johns time, who by his Patent confirmed many farmes and faire lands unto it. Neither verily is there any other place, that I can finde memorable, unleſſe it be Logh-Meſk a good large and fiſhfull Lake, in two ſmall Iſlands whereof ſtand Logh-Meſk.

This county is not ſo famous for the townes therein as the Inhabitants, who are either of the Iriſh race, as O-Mayles, Joies and Mac-vadus; or of the Scotiſh out of the Iſlands Hebrides, and out of the ſept of Donell, whereupon they bee called Clan-Donells, all Galloglaſſes, and as it Galloglaſſes.

But the moſt puiſſant be thoſe Burkes, who after a ſort are beholden both for their firſt beginning, and alſo for their glory unto William a younger bro-
C ther of Walter de Burgo or Burk of Ulſter. This William, highly renowned for his militarie proweſſe, being led away priſoner into Scotland, and leaving his wife behind him for an hoſtage, when he was reſtored to his owne home, by his manhood recovered Conaught (out of which in his abſence all the Engliſh had been expelled by Phelim O Conor) having ſlaine in the field the ſaid Phelim O Conor, Mac Dermond, Tego and Kelly, and was himſelfe at laſt, in revenge, killed by Cormac Mac-Dermond. His grandſon Thomas, by his ſon Edmund ſirnamed Albanach (becauſe he was borne in Scotland) when he ſaw the goodly and rich inheritance of his owne familie, tranſlated by a female unto Leonell Duke of Clarence, tooke it to the heart, and therefore raiſing a power of lewd lawleſſe and deſperate perſons (who will be never wanting D in Ireland nor elſe where) by force and wrong ſeized the Patrimony of the Earles of Ulſter in this County into his owne hands, and after the name of that Grandfather of his, whoſe glorious fame and gracious authority was then freſh in remembrance, called himſelfe Mac-William, that is, the ſonne of William. And his poſterity under Mac-William who alſo is called Mac-William Eughter.
that name and title uſurped a tyrannie in theſe parts, raging upon themſelves other whiles, with mutuall injuries, and oppreſſing the poore people a long time with extorting, pilling and ſpoyling: inſomuch as they left ſcarce one village or houſe in the Country unrazed and unrifled. This powerfull violence of theirs Cuttings, Coyne, Liverey, &c.
Sir Richard Bingham principall Commiſſioner, or Governour of Conaght, a man reſolute, ſevere and valiant, fit for ſuch a fierce and fell Province, thought not to bee Cauſe of Rebellions in Ireland.
E endured. For he well underſtood being prudent and politicke, that theſe injuſt oppreſſions, pollings and pillings were the principall cauſes of the rebellions, of barbarouſneſſe, and baſe beggery of Ireland, yea and that they drew the people away from Richard Bingham.
their due obedience and allegeance to their Prince, ſo as that they would acknowledge no other ſoveraigne than their owne Lords and Captaines: he therefore to eſtabliſh (what hee might) the royall power and authority there, and to overthrow this tyrannicall government of this Mac-William and of others getting head, employed with all diligence his whole care and cogitations to the uttermoſt: and albeit he had from time to time many imputations, ſuggeſtions, and complaints eagerly urged upon him, both before Queene Elizabeth and alſo the Lord Deputy, yet
F proceeded hee in his purpoſe. Contrariwiſe, thoſe of the family of Burke, their followers and dependants, that refuſed to obey the lawes, tooke armes and drew to band and ſide with them, the Septs of the Clan-Donells, Joies and others, who diſtruſted themſelves and their owne power; whom Bingham the Governour ſoone ſcattered: and having forced their forts, drave them into woods and lurking hooles, untill the Lord Deputy taking pittie of them, upon their humble ſupplication, commanded by his Miſſives that they ſhould bee received upon A termes of peace. But they who by warre had troubled the peace, and knowing not how to lay downe warre for ſweetneſſe of peace, were no ſooner relieved and raiſed as it were from death, but they tooke armes againe, entred afreſh into actuall rebellion, drave booties every where, and made foule uprores in all places, crying out, That they would ſet up their Mac-William, or elſe ſend for one out of Spaine: That they would not admit a Sheriffe, nor yeeld obedience to lawes. And herewith they cloſely procured the Scottiſh Ilanders from out of the Hebrides, to come over for to aide them, promi-ſing them faire lands and poſſeſſions: whereupon the Lord Deputy commanded the Governour to repreſſe and bridle this their exceſſive and malapert inſolence. He then B immediately, when they rejected all equall and indifferent conditions offered unto them, aſſembled an army, and purſued them ſo hotly through the woods and foreſts, that after ſix or ſeven weeks being grievouſly hunger-bitten, they moſt humbly ſubmitted themſelves. At which very time the auxiliary forces of the Scots aforeſaid, came ſeeking through deſert by-waies, and untravelled out waies, as cloſely as they could, to come into the county of Maio: but the Governour with continuall journies affronted them by night and day ſo neere, and followed upon them ſo hard, that in the end he intercepted them at Ardnary, & valiantly giving the charge, put them to flight, after he had killed and drowned in the river Moin about three thouſand of them. A happy victory this was, and of great conſequence both for the preſent & future times: C whereby the rebellion, together with the title of Mac-William, was extinguiſhed. Do- nell Gormy, and Alexander Carrough, the ſons of James Mac-Conel, and thoſe Ilanders who moſt of all had plagued Ireland were ſlaine. Theſe occurrents have I briefly ſet down ont of my Annales (impertinent though they be to my intended purpoſe) which for their worthineſſe ought more at large to be penned by ſome Hiſtoriographer.

THE COUNTY OF SLEGO.

SOmewhat higher lieth the county of Slego, a plenteous and battle coun-

Betweene it and Ulſter Northward runneth the river TROBIS, which Ptolomee calleth RAVIUS, as an out-let of the Lake Erne: it is ſevered from the neighbour counties, Le Trim and Roſcoman, by the comberous Curlew hills; and the river Suc divideth it in twaine. In ſome place hereabout Ptolo-

He hath placed alſo the river LIBNIUS in this tract, which through the retchleſty. But that place which Ptolomee here pointeth out, is now called THE BAY OF SLEGO, a rode full of harbours under Slego the principall place of this county: where

O-Conor Dun, who being a great man and of much puiſſance, bare himſelfe as Monarch of Ireland, what time as the Engliſh entred firſt into Ireland, & hardly yeelded himſelfe unto King Henry the ſecond, although in words he profeſſed ſubmiſſion, and oftentimes raiſing tumults (as an author without name of that age writeth) uſed ever and anon to cry out and ſay, That theſe words following of Adrian the Pope, in his Patent or Charter made unto the King of England, were prejudiciall unto him:

ſalvation of that land: and let the people of the ſaid land receive you and honour you as their Lord: untill ſuch time as Pope Alexander the third by a new Bull or Charter F of his, had confirmed in like manner unto the Kings of England their right to Ireland:
for then became he more tractable, and condeſcended unto more equall conditions, as I ſhall ſhew anon. After theſe O Conors, the greateſt men of name in this territory

THE COUNTY OF LE-TRIM.

THe County of Slego Eaſtward is encloſed with Breany, the poſſeſſion of the ancient family of O-Rorck, which drew their deſcent from Rotherick Monarch of Ireland, whom they by contraction (which they take pleaſure in) terme Rorck, untill that Brien O Rorck, Lord of Breany and Minteroliſe, fed with vaine hopes by Pope Sixtus Quintus and the King of Spaine, had perfidiouſly caſt off his allegeance to Queene Elizabeth, and
B taken armes: who being ſtreightwaies chaſed into Scotland, and ſent backe into England, ſuffered for his inconſiderate raſhneſſe due puniſhment upon the gallowes, and his lands were adjudged to the Crown. This Breany, by John Perot Lord Deputie was made a county, and of the chiefe towne called Le-Trim, which riſeth up throughout with hills, full of ranke graſſe; yet not ſo, as that it ſhould be altogether true which Solinus reporteth of Ireland: namely, that it is ſo full of forage, that unleſſe cattell were kept other whiles from graſing, their fulneſſe would endanger them. And ſo much cattell it feedeth, that within the little circuit which it hath, it may reckon at one time above a hundred and twenty thouſand head of beaſts. In this ſtandeth Achonry Biſhopricke, united now to the See of Elphin. And Shannon, the So-
C veraigne of all rivers in Ireland, hath here his ſpring-head; which being one while narrower, and another while broader, with divers turning and winding reaches that he makes, waſheth and watereth of either ſide, as I have ſaid, many a country. The principall families be O Rorck, O Murreies, Mac Lochleims, Mac Glanchies, and Mac Granelles, all meere and ſtark Iriſh. Whereas John Burgh, ſonne to Richard the Earle of Clan-Ricards, was created by Queene Elizabeth Baron Le-Trim, who was afterward ſlaine by his envious concurrents, I cannot ſay whether he had that title of this Le-Trim, or of ſome other place in this kingdome.

THE COUNTY OF ROSCOMAN.

UNder the county of Letrim Southward lieth ROSCOMAN, ordained to be a county by Henry Sidney Lord Deputy; lying out a good length, but narrow; cloſed up between the two rivers Suc Weſtward, and Shanon Eaſtward, and on the North ſide bounded with Curlew mountaines. A territory it is for the moſt part plaine, fruitfull, feeding many herds of cattell, and with meane husbandry and tillage yeeldeth plenty of corne. Where it beareth Northward, the ſteepe mountaines of Curlew perke up aloft, and thoſe impaſſable untill by the carefull induſtry of George Bingham there was a way cut out: which Curlews not long ſince became more notorious, for the diſaſtrous death of Sir Coni-
E ers Clifford, and (by his default) for the ſlaughter with him of moſt valiant and experienced ſouldiers. In this county are reckoned foure Baronies. Under Curlew hills, by the river Shanon, the Baronie of Boyle firſt commeth in view: where was founded in times paſt a famous Abbey, in the yeere 1152. together with the Abbey of Beatitude, and Mac Dermot ruleth all there as Lord; then by the river Suc lieth the Baronie Balin Tober, where O Conor Dun is of the greateſt command: and upon it joineth Elphen an Epiſcopall See. Somewhat lower is Roſcoman, the Baronie of O Conor Roo, that is, Conor the red, wherein is ſeated the chiefe towne of the whole countie, fenſed in times paſt with a caſtle by Robert Ufford Lord Juſtice of Ireland; but all the houſes are mean and thatched; and more Southward, Athlone the Baronie of the F O Kellies, ſo named of the head towne, which hath a caſtle and ward in it; alſo a moſt beautifull bridge of hewen ſtone, which to the great terrour of ſeditious rebels, Queen Elizabeth in our memory appointing Henry Sidney Lord Deputy of Ireland overſeer thereof, cauſed to be built, with a purpoſe to conſtitute in that place (as moſt fit of all others in Ireland to repreſſe ſeditions) the ſeat of reſidence for the Lords Deputies: and thus much for the Counties of Conaght.

LORDS OF CONAGHT.

AS for the Lords of Conaght, wee finde it recorded in the Iriſh hiſtories, that Turlogh O Mor O Conor ruled abſolutely in old time this countrey, and divided it wholly betweene his two ſonnes, Cahel and Brien. But at the Engliſhmens firſt arrivall into Ireland, Rothericke bare rule, who ſtiled himſelfe Monarch of Ireland, yet being put in feare with the great preparation for the Engliſh warre hanging ſo neere over his head, he betooke himſelfe into the protection of King Henry the ſecond, without trying the hazzard of battell. But when as forthwith he brake his allegeance, and revolted, Miles Cogan was the firſt Engliſhman that gave the attempt upon Conaght, yet ſped hee not in his enterpriſe. Howbeit that King of Conaght aboveſaid, was driven to this exigent, as to acknowledge himſelfe the King of Englands Liegeman, to ſerve him faithfully as his man, and to pay unto him yeerely of every tenth beaſt, one hide merchantable, &c. And King John granted that the third part of Conaght ſhould remaine unto him ſtill, to bee held hereditarily for an hundred Markes. But William Fitz-Adelme, whoſe poſterity are called in Latin de Burgo, and Burke or Bourke in Iriſh, Robert Muſcegros, Gilbert Clare Earle of Gloſter, and William de Birmingham were the firſt Engliſh that fully ſubdued this country, and laboured to bring it to civill government. And William Bourk and his lineall poſterity, being called Lords of all Conaght, governed that province, together with Ulſter, for a long time in great peace and tranquillity, yea and raiſed thereout rich revenues, untill the onely daughter of William Burke, ſole heire in groſſe of Conaght and Ulſter both, was matched in marriage with Leonell Duke of Clarence, King Edward the thirds ſonne. But when as he abode for the moſt part in England, and the Mortimers his heires and ſucceſſours looked but negligently to their patrimony and inheritance in Ireland, the Bourkes there allies, whom they had appointed as overſeers of their lands, taking the advantage of their Lords abſence, and preſuming upon the troubles in England, deſpiſing the authority of lawes, entring into alliance with the Iriſh, and contracting marriage with them, ſeized upon all Conaght to their owne behoofe, and degenerating by little and little, have laid downe Engliſh civility, and taken up Iriſh behaviour. Whereof ſome, who fetched their pedegree from Richard Burke, were called Clan-Ricard; others, Mac William Oughter, that is, The upper; others, Mac William Eughter, that is, The lower; even as they who in the countie of Maio were of greateſt power and authority, affected to be tearmed ſimply Mac-William, as being a name full of honour, glory, and authority, becauſe they deſcended from William de Burgo, or Burke, whom I mentioned erewhile: under countenance of which name, they for a long time tyrannized over the poore inhabitants with moſt grievous exactions.

ULTONIA, OR ULSTER.

ALL the land beyond the mouth of the river Boyn, Meath, the County Longford, and the mouth of the river Kavie that ſtretcheth Northward, is counted the fifth part of Ireland, called in Latin Ultonia, and Ulidia, in Engliſh Ulſter, in Iriſh Cui Guilly, that is, The Province Guilly, and of our Welſh Britans Ulw. Which Province was wholly inhabited in Ptolomees time by the VOLUNTII, DARNI, ROBOGDII, and ERDINI: A large country, beſpred with many, and thoſe very large loghes and lakes, ſhaded with many and thicke woods, in ſome places fruitfull, in others barren, howbeit freſh and green to ſee to in every place, and repleniſhed with cattell. But as the countrey for want of manuring is growne to be rough,

A rough, ſo the naturall diſpoſitions of the people, wanting civill diſcipline, are become moſt wild and barbarous. Yet to the end that they might be kept within the bounds of their duty, who were wont to breake in ſunder all bands of equity, of honeſty, and of duty, the hether part of it was in times paſt divided into three counties, Louth, Downe, and Antrim: and now the reſt is laid out into ſeven new counties, that is to ſay, Cavon, Fermanagh, Monaghan, Armagh, Colran, Tir-Oen, and Donegall or Tir-Conell, by the provident care of Sir John Perot L. Deputy: who being a notable and worthy man, well acquainted with the humours and haughty ſpirits of the Province, foreſeeing that no policy would ſerve better to appeaſe the tumults of Ireland, than B to reduce theſe parts of Ulſter into order, and to keepe them downe; going thither in a dangerous and tickliſh time, when the King of Spaine hovered and gaped both for Ireland and England; with his gravitie and authority, whiles by barring all wrongs, hee did cut off the cauſes and quarrells of warre, brought all the Potentates or Captaines of Ulſter to this paſſe, that willingly they ſuffered their Seigniories to bee divided into Counties, and Sheriffes to bee appointed for the government thereof. But he being within a while after recalled home, and climbing ſtill higher unto honours, the heavie diſpleaſure and envie of ſome, whom hee was not able to counterpoiſe, and his owne laviſh tongue together (for unadviſedly he had let flye ſomewhat againſt the Princes Majeſtie, which to impaire in word is a capitall matC ter) plunged him headlong ere he was aware upon his owne deſtruction, as I have declared elſewhere more amply.

John Perot Lord Deputy. 1585.

THE COUNTIE OF LOUTH.

D THE county of LOUTH, in ancient bookes written Luva and Luda, called in the Iriſh tongue Iriel or Uriel (if that be not rather a part of this territory) ſituate beyond Meth and the mouth of the river Boyn, turning full upon the Iriſh ſea, runneth out with a ſhore much winding into the North; the ſoile whereof is ſo full of forage and ſo fruitfull, that it ſoone anſwereth and recompenſeth the husband mans toile and charges.

Uriel, in Latin Urgalia.

Neere unto Boynes mouth is ſeated Drogheda, or Droghda, in Engliſh Tredagh, a fine towne, well peopled and frequented, ſo called of the bridge, and divided by the river Boyne running through it. Unto which King Edward the ſecond, for Theobald Verdons ſake, granted licence for a mercate and Faire; the Kings confirmed many and great liberties, and among other a Mint. Neere unto this ſtandeth Mellifont Abbey founded by Donald a King of Uriel, and much praiſed by Saint Bernard: which Queene Elizabeth (when as the religious Monkes were before thruſt out) gave unto Sir Edward More of Kent, for his good deſerts both at home, and abroad E in the warres.

Ardeth ſeven miles from hence is a dry in-land towne well knowne: and above it Dundalk, with a commodious haven, and in times paſt ſtrongly walled; which Edward Brus, brother to the King of Scots, who had proclaimed himſelfe King of Ireland, burnt: but hee within a while after was with eight thouſand two hundred of his men ſlaine neere thereabout. And in our remembrance Shan O Neale laied ſiege unto it, but ſtraightwaies hee was forced with ſhame enough to diſlodge. Eight miles from hence ſtandeth Carlingford, a port alſo of good requeſt and reſort: neither be there, to my knowledge, any other places in this county worth the naming.

F This Louth had for Earle Sir John Birmingham an Engliſhman, whom in reward of his martiall valour, when hee had diſcomfited and in a pitcht field ſlaine that Edward Brus, who aſſuming the title of King of Ireland for a time, had made foule work with fire and ſword in Ireland, King Edward the ſecond advanced to the honour of Earle of Louth, to have unto him and his heires males, and withall, the dignity of Baron of Athenry, to him and his heires. But this honourable title, as it began, ſo it ended in in him; for he that in warre vanquiſhed his enemies, was ſoone after in a tumult of rebellious people vanquiſhed and ſlaine by his owne men in this territory, with many other of his firname, leaving no iſſue behinde him. But in our fathers remembrance King Henry the eighth honoured Sir Oliver Plonket with the title of Baron of Louth. There remaine in this county, the Verdons, Tates, Clintons, Bellews, Dowdals, Gernons, Hadſors, Wottons, Brandons, Mores, Warrens, Chamberlanes, and very many beſides of Engliſh blood; and of the Iriſh the Mac-Mathons, &c.

THE COUNTY OF CAVON.

THe county of CAVON lieth next unto Louth to the Weſt, called in times paſt Eaſt Breanny, the habitation of the O-Reilyes, who vaunt themſelves to have had their beginning of the Ridleys in England, whereas in their whole courſe and maner of life they be meere Iriſh. Theſe O-Reileys not long ſince were of great power in horſemen: but to the end they might be that way leſſe powerfull, Sir Henry Sidney in his policy divided their county into ſeven Baronies; whereof the Lords out of that family ſhould immediately hold the ſame by ſervice, in fee from the Crowne of England. They dwell ſcattering in piles and forts, not in towns. A Biſhop they have of their own, and him a poore one, God he knoweth, whoſe See is at Kilmore: and yet is not he ſo poore as thoſe Iriſh Biſhops were, who had no other rents and revenues than three milch kine, which the pariſhioners exchanged for others new milch when they went dry, according as Adam Bremenſis from their owne relation, when they returned by Germany out of Italy, learned and put downe in writing.

THE COUNTY OF FERMANAGH.

BEyond Cavan Weſt and North FERMANAGH preſenteth it ſelfe, where ſometimes the ERDINI dwelt, a country full of woods, and very boggiſh. In the midſt whereof is that moſt famous and the greateſt Meere of all Ireland, Logh Erne, ſtretching out 40. miles, bordred about with ſhady woods, and paſſing full of inhabited Ilands: whereof ſome containe an hundred, two hundred, and three hundred Acres of ground: having beſides ſuch ſtore of Pikes, Trouts, and Salmons, that the fiſhermen complain oftner of too great plenty of fiſhes, and of the breaking of their nets, than they doe for want of draught. This Lake ſpreadeth not from Eaſt to Weſt (as it is deſcribed in the common Maps) but as I have heard thoſe ſay who have taken a long and good ſurvey thereof, firſt at Bal-Tarbet, which is a little towne fartheſt North of any in this county of Cavon; it ſtretcheth from South to North foureteene miles in length, and foure in bredth. Anon it draweth in narrow, to the bigneſſe of a good river, for ſix miles; in the chanell whereof ſtandeth Inis Killin, the principall caſtle in this tract, which in the yeere 1593. was defended by the rebels, and by Dowdall a moſt valiant Captaine won. Then turning Weſtward, it enlargeth it ſelfe moſt of all, twenty miles long, and ten broad, as far as to Belek: neere unto which is a great downefall of water, and as they terme it, that moſt renowned Salmons Leape. A common ſpeech is currant among the inhabitants there by, that this Lake was once firme ground, paſſing well husbanded with tillage, and repleniſhed with inhabitants; but ſuddenly, for their abominable buggery committed with beaſts, overflowne with waters, and turned into a Lake. The Almighty God (ſaith Giraldus) Creator of Nature, judged this land privie to ſo filthy acts againſt Nature, unworthy to hold not only the firſt inhabitants, but any others for the time to come. Howbeit this wickedneſſe the Iriſh Annales lay upon certaine Ilanders out of the Hebrides, who being fled out of their owne Countrey lurked there. Among the Lords in this tract, Mac-Gwir was moſt noble and powerfull, untill he overthrew himſelfe and his ſtate in the late rebellion. And they that be of that Sept dwell on both ſides, yet ſo as that thoſe beyond the Lake are reckoned of Ulſter, and they on this ſide of Conaght.

THE COUNTY MONAGHAN.

ALong the Lough-Erne, on the East ſide, ſtretcheth out the Countie Monaghan, mounting aloft with hills well attired with woods, but knowne by no towne at all (unleſſe it be Monaghan, which imparted the name unto the whole country.) It is divided into five Baronies, & containeth Iriel, Dartre, Ferey, Loughty (which by authority of Parliament were for rebellion, given away from the Mac-Mahons) with the little territory Donemain, B which Queen Elizabeth beſtowed upon Walter D'Evereux Earle of Eſſex.

Thoſe Mac-Mahons, that is, if we interpret it out of the Iriſh language, The Sons of Urſus, or the Beare, ruled here as tyrannicall Lords a long time, and derive their Genealogy from Walter Fitz-Urſe, who imbrued his hands with the bloody murdering of Thomas Archbiſhop of Canterbury. The moſt puiſſant of theſe, after the manner of that nation, tooke upon him to Lord it over the reſt, and by way of excellency was termed Mac-Mahon. About which preheminence, when as of late daies they of that Sept or Family were at moſt bitter debate, by way of hard words, open armes, foule practiſes, yea and cloſe corruptions, Sir William Fitz-William the Lord Deputy came hither among them, and judicially convented Hugh-Roe, Mac-Mahon, 1590.
C whom he by his authority had ſet up in this Seigniory, and being upon his triall condemned of treaſon, cauſed him to be hanged: and to the end that he might ſuppreſſe for ever both the name and ſoveraignty of Mac-Mahon, he divided the territory betweene the kinred of the ſaid Hugh, and certaine Engliſhmen, to have and to hold after the Engliſh tenure, to them and theirs.

THE COUNTY ARMAGH.

DON the East ſide again lieth out in length the county of Armagh, ſo as that it is compaſſed as it were about with the river Neury by East, with the county
D of Louth by South, and with the Black-water by North. A County, as I have ſundry times heard the Earle of Denſhire Lord Lievtenant Generall ſay, that for a moſt rich and battle ſoile paſſeth all other parts of Ireland, inſomuch as if any compoſt be laid upon it to make it more fruitfull, it ſcorneth and diſdaineth, as one would ſay, the ſame, and becommeth barren. The firſt place in it that we meet with, is Fewes, a little territory belonging to Turlogh Mac-Henry, one of the family of O-Neale, thicke ſet with woods, and by reaſon of loughs and bogs unpaſſable. Then have you Orry, as ſcarce of woods, where dwelleth O-Hanlan, and the fort Mont-Norris, built by Charles Baron Mont-joy when he was Lord Deputy, and ſo named in honour of Sir John Norris, under whom he had ſerved firſt, and was
E trained in military diſcipline. Eight miles from hence, neere unto the river Kalin, Armach maketh a poore ſhew, albeit it is the Archiepiſcopall See, and Metropolitane of the whole Iland. The Iriſh talke much, that it was ſo called of Queen Armacha: but in mine opinion it is the very ſame that Bede nameth Dearmach, and out of the Scottiſh or Iriſh language interpreteth it, The field of Okes. But it was named Drumſailich, before that Saint Patricke had built there a proper faire City, for ſite, forme, quantity, and compaſſe, modelled out, as hee ſaith, by the appointment and direction of Angels. That Patricke I ſay, who being a Britan borne, and Saint Martins ſiſters ſonne, named at his Baptiſme Sucat, was ſold into Ireland, where he became Heardman to King Miluc, afterwards was named by Saint German, whoſe diſciple hee
F was, Magonius, as a Nurſe-Father, out of a Britiſh word: and by Pope Cæleſtine, Patricius, as a Father of the Citizens, and by him ſent over to catechize Ireland in the Chriſtian faith: which notwithſtanding ſome had received there before, as wee may gather out of an old Synodall, wherein is urged the teſtimony of Patricke himſelfe, againſt that tonſure or ſhaving of Prieſts which had beene uſed before his time in Ireland; whereby they were ſhaven onely on the fore part of the head, and

and not on the Crowne. Which manner of ſhaving he ſeemeth by way of contempt to father upon a certaine Swineherd of King Lagerius the ſonne of Nell: and the writers of that age cried out, that it was Simon Magus his ſhaving, and not S. Peters. In this place about the yeere of our ſalvation 610. Columbane built a moſt famous Monaſtery, out of which very many Monaſteries afterwards were propagated by his diſciples, both in Britain and in Ireland. Of this Armach S. Bernard thus writeth. In honour of S. Patrick the Apoſtle of Ireland, who here by his life time ruled, and after death reſted; it is the Archiepiſcopall ſeat and Metropolitan City of all Ireland, and of ſo venerable eſtimation in old time, that not only Biſhops and Prieſts, but Kings alſo and Princes in generall, were ſubject to the Metropolitane thereof in all obedience, and he alone governed them all. But through the divelliſh ambition of ſome mighty Potentates, there was taken up a very bad cuſtome, that this holy See ſhould be obtained and held in hereditary ſucceſsion; neither ſuffered they any to be Biſhops, but ſuch as were of their owne Clan, Tribe, and Family. Neither prevailed this execrable ſucceſsion a little, but continued this wicked manner for the ſpace well neere of fifteen generations.

S. Bernard in the life of Malachy.

When in proceſſe of time the Eccleſiaſticall diſcipline in this Iland was growne looſe, ſo as in townes and cities, there were tranſlations and plurality of Biſhops, according to the will and pleaſure of the Metropolitane; for reformation of this abuſe, John Papyrio a Cardinall was ſent hither from Pope Eugenius the fourth, as a nameleſſe writer then living wrote in theſe words. In the yeere of our Lord 1142. John Papyrio, a Cardinall ſent from Eugenius the fourth Biſhop of Rome, together with Chriſtian Biſhop of Liſmore Legate of all Ireland, came into Ireland. The ſame Chriſtian held a ſolemne Counſell in Mell, at which were preſent all the Biſhops, Abbats, Kings, Dukes, and Elders of Ireland: By whoſe conſent there were eſtabliſhed foure Archbiſhopricks, namely, of Armach, of Dublin, of Caſſile, and Toam. Wherein ſate and ruled at the ſame time, Gelaſius, Gregorius, Donatus, and Edanus: and ſo the Cardinall, beſtowing his bleſsing upon the Clergie, returned to Rome. For before that time, the Biſhops of Ireland were wont to be conſecrated by the Archbiſhops of Canterbury, in regard of the Primacy which they had in Ireland. This did the Citizens of Dublin acknowledge, when they ſent Gregory elect Biſhop of Dublin, unto Ralph Archbiſhop of Canterbury for to be conſecrated, by theſe words, Anteceſſorum veſtrorum Magiſterio, &c. that is, Unto the Magiſtracy of your Predeceſſors we willingly ſubmitted our (Prelats) from which we remember that our Prelats have received their dignity Eccleſiaſticall, &c. which appeareth for certain out of letters alſo bearing date of greater antiquity, namely, of Murchertach King of Ireland, written unto Anſelm Archbiſhop of Canterbury, for the ordaining and enſtalling of the Biſhops of Dublin and of Waterford: likewiſe of King Gothrich unto Lanfrank his predeceſſor, in the behalfe of one Patrick a Biſhop: of Lanfrank alſo unto Therdeluac a King of Ireland, unto whom he complaineth, That the Iriſhmen forſake and leave at their pleaſure their wedded wives, without any canonicall cauſe, and match with any others, even ſuch as be neere of kinne, either to themſelves or the ſaid forſaken wives; and if another man with like wickedneſſe hath caſt off any wife, her alſo raſhly and hand over head they joine with, by law of marriage, or fornication rather: an abuſe worthy to be puniſhed. With which vices if this nation had not bin corrupted even unto theſe daies of ours, both the right of lineall ſucceſſion among them had been more certain, and as well the gentry as the communalty had not embrued themſelves ſo wickedly with the effuſion of ſo much blood of their owne kinred, about their inheritances and legitimation, neither had they become ſo infamous in theſe reſpects among forraine nations. But theſe matters are exorbitant of themſelves, and from my purpoſe.

Long had not that Archiepiſcopall dignity and Primacy beene eſtabliſhed, when Vivian the Popes Legate confirmed the ſame againe; ſo that their opinion may ſeeme to be worthy of diſcredit and reſutation, who affirme that the Archbiſhop of Armach had in regard of antiquity the priority and ſuperiour place of the Archbiſhop of Canterbury in the Generall or Oecumenicall Councells; whereas by the firſt inſtitution hee is by many ages the latter. Neither according to the antiquitie of

A of places are the ſeats in Councels appointed. But all Prelates, of what degree ſoever they be, ſit among their Colleagues, according to their owne ordination, enſtalling, and promotion. Lib. 1. Ceremoniar. ſacrar. Sect. 14.

What time as that Vivian was Legate in Ireland, Sir John Curcy ſubdued Armath, and made it ſubject to the Engliſh: and yet did he no harme then, but is reported to have beene very good and bountifull unto the Churchmen that ſerved God there, and he re-edified their Church, which in our memory was fired and foulely defaced by the rebell Shan O Neale, and the city withall, ſo that they loſt all the ancient beauty and glory, and nothing remaineth at this day but very few ſmall watled cot-
B tages, with the ruinous walls of the Monaſtery, Priory, and Primates palace. Among the Archbiſhops of this place, there goes the greateſt fame and name of S. Malachy, the firſt that prohibited Prieſts marriage in Ireland, a man in his time learned and devout, and who tooke no leſſe of the native barbarouſneſſe of that country, than ſea fiſhes ſaltneſſe of the ſeas, as ſaith S. Bernard, who wrote his life at large: alſo Richard Fitz-Ralfe, commonly called Armachanus, is of famous memory, who turned the edge of his ſtile about the yeere 1355. againſt the mendicant Friers, as deteſting in Chriſtians ſuch voluntary begging. Neere to Armach, upon a riſing hill, remain the reliques of an old caſtle (Owen-Maugh they call it) which was, as they ſay, the ancient habitation of the Kings of Ulſter. More Eaſt glideth the Black-water (in the Iriſh
C tongue More, that is, Great) which is the limit betweene this ſhire and Tir-Oen, whereof I am to ſpeak in due place. In this country and about it Mac-Genis, O Hanlan, O Hagan, and many of the ſept of O-Neal, aſſuming unto them ſundry additions and by-names, carry all the ſway after a ſort, and over-rule the reſt.

THE COUNTY OF DOWNE.

D EAſtward now followeth the county of DOWNE, and that very large and fertile in ſoile, ſtretched out even as farre as to the Iriſh ſea, reaching on the North ſide to the Lake Eaugh, by a new name called Lough Sidney, and on the South to the county of Louth, from which the river Newry ſevereth it. Upon this river, in the very firſt entrance into this ſhire, within our remembrance Sir Nicolas Bagnall Mareſchall of Ireland, who by his conduct atchieved here divers exploits, and reduced the country to more civility, built and fortified a towne of the ſame name. Hard by it, the river called Banthelleſſe, iſſuing out of the deſert mountaines of Mourne, paſſeth through the country of Eaugh, which belongeth to the family of Mac Gynnis: Betweene whom and the O Neals, who tyrannized in Ulſter, there fell in times paſt a controverſie, whether they were vaſſals to O Neal, and whether they ſhould find their followers and ſouldiers victuals, &c. (this kind of ſervice they call Bonoghty.) This hath unto it an Epi-
E ſcopall See at Dromore, above which at the edge of Logh Eaugh; are the tracts of Kilwlto and Kilwarny, much encombred with woods and bogges. Theſe lye inwardly: but by the maritime coaſt the ſea doth ſo wind it ſelfe in, and with ſundry Creeks and Bayes encroach within the land, yea and the Logh and Lake dilateth it ſelfe beſide Dyffrin, a valley full of woods, the inheritance in old time of the Mandevils, afterwards of the Whites, in ſuch ſort that it maketh two bilands; Lecall Southward, and Ardes Northward. Lecall, a rich and battle ground, beareth out fartheſt into the Eaſt of any part of Ireland, and is the utmoſt Promontory or cape thereof, which the Mariners now terme Saint Johns Foreland, Ptolomee calleth it ISANIUM, perhaps of the Britiſh word Iſa, which ſignifieth Loweſt. In the very ſtreight whereof flou-
F riſhed DUNUM, whereof Ptolomee alſo made mention (though not in the right place) now named Down, a towne of very great antiquity, and a Biſhops See, renowned by the tombe of Saint Patricke, Saint Brigid, and Saint Columb, upon which was written this rude riming diſtichon:

Iſanium the Promontory.

At Doun theſe three lie buried in one tombe, A Brigid, Patricke, and that devout Columb.

Which monument of theirs, as the bruit runneth, was demoliſhed by the Lord Leonard Grey, Deputy under King Henrie the eighth: and ſure it is, that when he was arraigned for miſgoverning, and condemned therefore to death, among other imputations he was charged, that he had profaned this Cathedrall Church of Saint Patricke. But as touching the Sepulcher of Saint Patricke, the religious Prieſts were at variance, like as the Cities of Greece in times paſt ſtrove about the native country of the Poet Homer: Theſe of Downe challenge it to themſelves, and that upon the B authoritie of the verſes aforeſaid: Thoſe of Armagh put in their claime out of the words of Saint Bernard, which erewhile I alledged: The Monkes of Glaſtenbury in England averred it to be with them, and that out of the old Records and Evidences of their Abbey: and ſome Scots have likewiſe avouched, that as he was borne neere unto Glaſco, ſo likewiſe he was enterred there at Kirk-Patrick. Into this Down, Sir John Curcy, that Martiall Engliſhman, and (for a Warrior) extraordinarily devout to Godward, after hee had brought this country in ſubjection unto him, was the firſt that brought in the Benedictine Monkes: and he tranſlated the Monaſterie of Cariche, which Mac Neal, Mac Eulef King of Ulſter had founded in Erinaich neere unto S. Finins Fountaine, into the Iſle called after his name Ynis-Curcy, and endowed the C ſame with lands aſsigned for it. For before time the Monkes of Ireland, as thoſe of ancient times in Egypt, whoſe maner and order that devout man Congell, that is by interpretation, A faire pledge, brought over into Ireland, being wholly given to prayer, earned for themſelves and the poore their living, with the labour of their own hands. Howbeit, theſe Monaſticall orders and cuſtomes (as all humane things) continued not long, when their maners and carriage grew to be worſe, and riches had by little and little polluted piety, which as a mother, had formerly bred them. Robert Abbat of Moliſme in Burgundie ſtudied and endevoured earneſtly in times paſt to reduce and ſet on foot againe the ſaid ancient Diſcipline: and perſwaded his owne Diſciples to live with their handy labour, to leave Tithes and Oblations unto the Prieſts D that ſerved in the Dioceſſe, to forbeare wearing of Breeches made of woven cloth, or of leather. But they labouring to the contrary, refuſed flatly to goe from the cuſtomes obſerved in the Monaſteries of the Weſt parts of the world, which were knowne for certaine, to have been inſtituted and ordained by Saint Maure ſcholar to Saint Benet, and by Saint Columban. But I have digreſſed too farre, now will I returne againe. By the ſea-ſide ſtand Arglas, where Saint Patrick, by report, founded a Church: and Strangford, called in old time Strandford, a ſafe harbour, where the river Coyn with a great and violent ſtreame breaketh into the Sea. Neere unto which, in the Biland Lecale, Queene Mary in her great bounty unto Noblemen liberally gave lands unto the Earle of Kildare. And here, of the Engliſh race the Ruſſells, Audleys, Whites, and E the Bagnells who came thither laſt, ſtoutly defend, among the wild and fierce Iriſh, not without danger, what they and their anceſtours won in theſe parts.

Ardes, the other Biland called The Ardes, lieth over againſt it to the North, ſevered with a ſmall chanell out of the Logh-Coin, which on the Weſt ſide encloſeth it, like as the ſea on the Eaſt ſide, and the Bay of Knoc-Fergus on the North. You may reſemble it to the bent of the arme, which by a very narrow Iſthim or necke of land groweth to the reſt of the Iland, like as an arme to the ſhoulder. The ſoile is every where paſsing good and bountifull, but only in the mids, where lieth out for twelve miles or thereabout in length, a moiſt, flat, and boggy plaine. The ſhore is ſufficiently beſpred with ſmall villages, and in times paſt had a moſt renowned Monaſterie F at the Bay of Knoc-Fergus, of the ſame inſtitution, order, and name, as was that right ancient and famous Abbey in England neere unto Cheſter, I meane, Banchor. Out of whether of theſe twaine that Arch-hereticke Pelagius came, it is uncertaine, whiles ſome will needs have him to ſpring from hence, others from that in Britaine: but neither of them grounding upon any certaine warrant of authority. Howbeit, certaine

Banchor Abbay.

A certaine it is that he was of Britaine, as may appeare by other teſtimonies, as alſo by this diſtichon of Proſper Aquitanus, inveying againſt his impiety. Pelagius the Arch-heretick.

I procul inſana impietas, arteſque malignas

But touching this place, heare what S. Bernard ſaith: A rich and mighty man gave In the life of B a place called Banchor unto Malachy, to build, or rather to re-edifie there a Monaſtery. Malachias.
It had been ywis a moſt noble houſe before time, under the firſt founder and father Congel, breeding many thouſand Monkes, and the head likewiſe of many Monaſteries. A holy place in truth, and a breeder of many Saints, moſt plenteouſly fructifying unto God: ſo that one of the ſons of that holy congregation, named Luan, is reported to have been the founder of an hundred Monaſteries. Which I have beene more willing to relate, that by this one the reader may give a gheſſe what a mighty multitude there was beſide. Thus at length the ſprouts thereof repleniſhed Ireland and Scotland. From out of which S. Columbane comming up to theſe parts of ours here in France, built the Monaſtery of Luxovium, which grew to a mighty multitude. And ſo great an Abbey by report this was, that the ſo-
C lemnity of divine ſervice held out continually in one quire after another: ſo that there was not one moment of time, night or day, without ſinging praiſes. Take all this to be ſpoken of the ancient glory of Banchor Monaſtery. Malachia both in regard of the noble name that it bare, and of the ancient dignity, eſpecially liked this place, although it was deſtroied; as minding to replant it, like unto a certain garden or Paradiſe; as alſo becauſe many bodies of Saints ſlept there. For, to ſay nothing of thoſe that were buried in peace, it is reported that 900. in one day were ſlaine by Pirats. Verily the poſſeſſions belonging to that place were great: But Malachias contenting himſelfe only with the ſite of the holy place, ſurrendred the poſſeſſions and lands wholly to another: for from the time that the Mo-
D naſtery was deſtroied, there wanted not one to hold it with the livings thereto belonging: For they were ordained by election alſo, and called Abbats, keeping ſtill in name, though it were not ſo in deed, as it had been in old time. And when many gave advice not to alienate the poſſeſſions, but to retaine the whole together unto themſelves, this profeſſor of poverty agreed not thereto, but cauſed, according to the cuſtome, one to bee choſen for to hold the ſame, reſerving onely to himſelfe and his the place, as I have before ſaid. Moreover, within a few daies there was the Oratory or Church finiſhed, of timber peeces made ſmooth but fitly and firmely knit together (a Scottiſh kind of work, faire and beautifull enough.) Afterwards Malachy thought it good to have a Church built of ſtone, proportioned like to thoſe which he had ſeene built in other countries. And when hee had begun to lay the E foundation, the native inhabitants of the countrey began to make a wonder thereat, be-cauſe there were not found in that land as yet ſuch maner of buildings: and thereupon one cried out, O good Sir, what meane you to bring in this new faſhion into our countries? Scots we are and not French. What vanity is this? what need was there of ſuch worke, ſo ſuperfluous, ſo proud, and ſo glorious?

More inward, hard by the Lake is the Biſhops See of Conereth or Coner, where ſat Biſhoprick of Coner.
the ſaid Malachy as Biſhop. But what manner of flock this ſo holy a Paſtor fed, liſten unto S. Bernard. Malachy in the thirtieth yeere almoſt of his age, was brought in and preſented a conſecrated Biſhop of Conereth, for this was the cities name. Now when as he began to execute his function according to his office, then perceived this man of God, that it was his lot to come not unto men, but unto beaſts. No where had he to that time experi-
F ence of ſuch, in the moſt barbarous parts that ever he came unto: No where had he found for manners ſo froward, for rites ſo divelliſh, for faith ſo impious, for lawes ſo barbarous, for diſcipline ſo ſtiffe necked, and for life ſo filthy. Chriſtians they were in name, and Pagans in deed. Tithes and firſt fruits they gave none, lawfull marriage they contracted none, confeſſions they made none, to crave or to give pennance there could be found juſt none: And Miniſters of the Altar there were very few or none: But what needs many words? where the very paucity and fewneſſe among the lay Perſons, was in maner idle and imploied about nothing, no fruit was to be expected by their duties and functions among ſo leud a people. For in the Churches there was heard neither voice of Preacher, nor ſound of ſinging. What ſhould the Lords champion doe in this caſe? either hee muſt yeeld with ſhame, or bicker in jeopardy. But he who acknowledged himſelfe to be a Shepherd, and not an hireling, choſe rather to ſtand to it than to flye, ready to give his life for his ſheep if it ſo behoved. And albeit they were all wolves and no ſheepe, in the midſt of wolves he ſtood as a fearleſſe Shepherd, by all meanes caſting about how to make of wolves ſheepe. Thus wrote Saint Bernard; and little better can he that is Biſhop there at this day ſay, as I heare, of his wilde flocke hereabout.

Savage. This Ardes, the Savages, an Engliſh family in times paſt held in poſſeſſion: amongſt whom there goeth a great name of him, who ſaid no leſſe ſtoutly than pleaſantly, when he was moved to build a caſtle for his defence, That he would not truſt to a caſtle of ſtones, but rather to a caſtle of bones, meaning thereby his owne bodie. Afterward the O-Neals wreſted it out of their hands: who being attainted of high treaſon, by permiſſion of Queene Elizabeth, Sir Thomas Smith Knight, and the Queenes Secretary planted a Colonie there not long ſince: a worthy adventure, but it ſped unhappily. For after great expences defraied, the Iriſh by a traine caught his baſe ſonne, whom hee had made Captaine and ruler thereof, and cruelly caſt him to hungry dogges: for which barbarous cruelty, thoſe moſt wicked wretches ſuffered afterward moſt grievous puniſhment accordingly, being killed and given unto Wolves to bee devoured. Above Ardes Weſtward the more Southerne

Upper Clane-Boy. Clan-boy, that is, the Yellow Nation or Sept, or the kinred of Hugh the Yellow, a country very full of woods, reacheth as farre as to the bay of Knock fergus, inhabited by the Sept of the O-Neales, and is counted the fartheſt territorie of this county of Downe.

THE COUNTY OF ANTRIM.

THe next County in order unto Louth Northward, is that of Antrim, ſo called of Antrim a baſe townelet of ſmall reckoning at all, had it not imparted the name unto the whole countrey, which lieth betweene the Bay of Knoc-Fergus, Logh Eaugh, and the river Ban. This Bay of Knoc-Fergus. Knoc-Fergus which Ptolomee tearmeth Vinderius, took name of a towne ſituate upon it, which the Engliſh call Knoc-Fergus, the Iriſh Carig-Fergus, that is, the Rock of Fergus, of that moſt renowned Fergus, who firſt brought the Scottiſh out of Ireland into Britaine, there drowned. This is well inhabited and more frequented than the reſt in this coaſt, by reaſon of the commodious haven, although the block-houſes thereto be unfiniſhed, having a fortreſſe pitched upon an high rocke, a ward of garriſon ſouldiers to keepe the countrey in awe and good order, with an ancient

Nether Clane-Boy. palace converted now into Magazin. Hard by it lieth the Nether Clane-Boy, which alſo was the habitation of O-Neales, notable for the death of that moſt leud rebell, Shan or John O-Neal, who after many robberies and ſacriledges committed, being in one or two skirmiſhes under the leading of Sir Henry Sidney Lord Deputy, vanquiſhed and weakened, was brought to that exigent, that hee was reſolved to goe unto the Deputy with an halter about his neck and ſubmiſſely to crave pardon: but being perſwaded by his Scribe to ſeeke firſt for aide of certaine Scots of the Iſlands, who under the conduct of Alexander Oge had encamped themſelves here, and preyed in the countrey, hee came unto them, who gave him friendly entertainment, and preſently maſſacred him and all his company in revenge of their kinsfolke whom hee had before ſlaine. By whoſe death the warre being ended, and himſelfe with all thoſe that went with him into the field attainted, Queene Elizabeth granted this Claneboy unto Walter D'Eureux Earle of Eſſex, who croſſed over the ſeas hither, and, I wot not, whether under a goodly colour of honour (for choſen he was Governour of Ulſter and Mareſchal of Ireland) hee was by the politicke practice of ſome

Courtiers

A Courtiers finely packed away into a Country alwaies rebellious and untamed. But whiles with the expence of a mighty maſſe of money hee went about to reduce it to good order, after hee had beene croſſed and toſſed with many troubles both at home and abroad in the warres, hee was by untimely death taken out of this world, leaving unto all good men a wonderfull miſſe of himſelfe, and this Country unto the O-Neales and Brian Carragh, of the Mac-Conells race, who ſince that time have gone together by the eares, and committed many murders one upon another, about the ſoveraignty of this Seigniory.

Neere unto Knoc-Fergus there is a By-land, with a narrow necke (as it were) an- Iſle of Magie.
B nexed to the maine, which notwithſtanding is called the Iſle of Magie, taking up foure miles in length and one in bredth: wherein, as ſome ſuppoſe, flouriſhed that Monaſterie of Magio ſo highly praiſed by Bede: whereof I have made mention before in the County of Majo.

Then the Glinnes, that is, the Valleys, begin at Older-Fleet, a bad road for ſhips, Glinnes.
and run out a great length upon the ſea. This country belonged in ancient times Biſſets.
to the Biſſets Noblemen of Scotland, who when upon private grudges and quarrels they had made away Patricke Earle of Athol, were baniſhed hither, and through the beneficiall favour of Henry the Third King of England, received Lands here. For John Biſſet, who died in the beginning of Edward the Firſt his reigne, had
C large poſſeſſions heere, and under King Edward the Second, Hugh Biſſet for rebellion loſt ſome of them. But in our fathers daies, the Highland Iriſh Scots, out of Cantire and the Hebrides, under the leading of James Mac-Conell Lord of Cantire in Scotland, made an entry upon the ſame, and he laying claime thereto challenged it as deſcended from the Biſſets. Howbeit Shan O-Neale having ſlaine their Captaine eaſily chaſed them away. Yet returned they, and in this tract committed continually robberies and outrages in cruell manner, yea and maintained ſeditious commotions, untill that even of late Sir John Perot Lord Deputy of Ireland brought firſt Donell Goran (who together with his brother Alexander was ſlaine by Sr. Richard Bingham in Conaght) and afterward Agnus Mac-Conel, the ſonnes of James James Mac-Conell.
D Mac-Conel, to that paſſe, that they betooke themſelves to the Queene of Englands protection, and upon their humble ſuite received at her hands this county to bee held of her by ſervice under certaine conditions, namely, to beare armes within Ireland under none other but the Kings of England, and to pay yeerely a certain number of cowes and hawkes, &c.

Above this, as farre as to the river Bann, all the tract is called Rowte, the ſeat of the The Rowt.

them into a narrow corner. For, Surley Boy, that is, Charles the Yellow, brother unto Chairly Boy.
James Mac-Conel, who poſſeſſed himſelfe of the Glines, became alſo in ſome ſort E Lord hereof; untill that Sir John Perot Lord Deputy, having won Donluſe Caſtle, Donluſe, a very ſtrong pile, ſeated upon a rocke that hangeth over the ſea, and ſevered from the Land with a deepe ditch, diſpoſſeſſed him and all his. Which for all that, hee recovered the next yeere following by treaſon, after he had ſlaine Carie the Captaine thereof, who manfully defended himſelfe. But the Lord Deputy ſending againſt him Captaine Meriman an approved warrior, who ſlew the two ſonnes of James Mac-Conell, and Alexander this Surley Boys ſon, ſo courſed him from place to place, and drave away his cattell the onely riches he had (for hee was able to number of his owne ſtocke 50000. cowes) ſo that Surley Boy rendred Donluſe, came to Dublin, and in the Cathedrall Church openly made his ſubmiſſion, exhibited a ſupplication cra-F ving mercy, and afterwards being admitted into the Lord Deputies Great Chamber, ſo ſoone as he ſaw the Picture of Queene Elizabeth upon a table, once or twice flung away his ſword, fell downe at her feet, and devoted himſelfe unto her Majeſty. Whereupon being received into favour, and ranged among the ſubjects of Ireland, he abjured and renounced openly in the Courts of Chancery and Kings Bench all ſervice and allegeance to any forraine Kings whatſoever: and he had given unto him by the bounteous liberality of Queene Elizabeth, foure territories (Toughes they call them) lying from the river Boys unto the Bay, Don ſeverig, Loghill, and Balla-monyn, with the Conſtableſhip of Donluſe Caſtle, to him and the heires males of his body, to hold of the Kings of England, with theſe conditions, That neither hee nor his, nor yet his poſterity ſerve in the warres under any forraine Prince without Licence; That they keepe their people from all depredations; That they furniſh and finde twelve horſemen, and fortie footmen, at their owne charges for fortie daies in time of warre; and preſent unto the Kings of England a certaine number of cowes and hawkes yeerely, &c.

THE COUNTIE OF COLRAN.

BEyond the Glynnes Weſt, ſtandeth Krine, which now they call the county COLRAN, of the principall towne therein. It lieth between the river Ban and Lough-foile, and confineth South upon the county of Tir-Oen. This Ban, a paſſing faire river, as Giraldus ſaith (which the name alſo witneſſeth) riſing out of the mountaines of Mourn in the county of Downe, carrieth himſelfe and his name into Lough Eaugh, or Lough-Sidney, a large Lake: which name for all that, after thirty miles or thereabout (for of ſo great length that Lake is eſteemed to be) at his going forth in the end he reſumeth againe at Tome caſtle, and being beſet and ſhadowed along the ſides with woods, by Glancolkein, where by reaſon of thick woods, and unpaſſable bogges there is the ſafeſt place of refuge for the Scottiſh Ilanders and the rebels (and which the Engliſh felt, who purſued Surley Boy whiles hee lurked here) carrying a proud ſtreame, entreth into the ſea, breeding Salmons in abundance above any other river in all Europe: becauſe, as ſome think, it paſſeth all the reſt for cleereneſſe, in the which kinde of water Salmons take ſpeciall delight. In this part the O Cahans were of greateſt authoritie; the principall perſon of which family O Cahan is thought to be one of the greateſt of thoſe Potentates, or Uraights as they terme them, that ought ſervice unto O Neal the Tyrant of Ulſter: as who in that barbarous election of O Neal, which with as barbarous ceremonies is ſolemnized in the open aire upon an high hill, performeth this honourable ſervice forſooth, as to fling a ſhooe over the head of the elected O Neal. Howbeit he is not of power ſufficient to reſtrain the Scottiſh Ilanders, who to ſave charges at home, every yeere in Summer time flocke hither out of thoſe hungry and barren Ilands (where is nothing but beggery) to get their living; ready upon every occaſion and opportunity to maintain rebellions; inſomuch as provided it hath been by law, under paine of high treaſon, that no perſon call them into Ireland, nor give them lodging or entertainment.

THE COUNTIE OF TIR-OEN.

BEneath Colran lieth Southward the county of TIR-OEN, in old books named alſo Tir-Eogain, that is, if a man interpret it, The land of Eugenius, which name the Iriſh have contracted into Eogain and Oen. This is altogether upland from the ſea, divided towards the ſunnes ſetting by the river Liffer from Tir-Conell, toward the riſing with the Logh Eaugh from the county of Antrim, and Southward with the Blackwater, which in Iriſh they call Aven More, that

A that is, The great water, from the county of Armagh. A country though rough and rugged, yet fruitfull and very large, as which lieth out threescore miles in length, and thirty in bredth; divided by the mountaines called Slew Gallen, into the Upper Tir-Oen Northward, and the Nether Southward. Upper Tir-Oen.

In it are first Cloghar, a Bishopricke, and that a slender one; then Dunganon, the chiefe habitation of the Earles; which through the favour of King Henry the eighth gave the title of Baron unto Matthew sonne to the first Earle of Tir-Oen. And verily this is an house fairer built than commonly they bee in this county, but hath beene oftentimes by the Lords themselves defaced with fire, because it should not be burnt Bishopricke of Cloghter. Dunganon. Baron of Dunganon.

B by the enemy: also Ublogahell, where O-Neal that most proudly ruleth and oppresseth Ulster was wont to be inaugurated after that barbarous manner and tradition of the countrey: and the fort at Black-water on the river More, which hath sustained the variable changes and chances of warre, whiles there was no other way into this countrey, being the place of refuge for the rebels: but now it is neglect, ever since there was found another Ford more below, at which on both sides of the river Charles Lord Mount-joy Deputy erected new Sconces, when with hot warre hee pursued the rebels in these parts. Who likewise at the same time raised another garrison fort, called by his owne name Mont-joy, at the Lake Eaugh (Logh Sidney in honour of Henry Sidney souldiers now terme it) which encloseth the West side of this Fort of Blackwater.

C shire, and is made, or much encreased by the river Bann, as I have said. Surely this is a goodly and beautifull Lake, passing fishfull, and very large, as stretching out thirty miles or thereabout, as the Poet saith.

——Dulci mentitur Nerea fluctu.
Fresh water though it bee,
A sea folke thinke they see.

And considering the variety of shew upon the bankes, the shady groves, the meadowes alwaies greene, the fertile corne fields, if they be well manured; the bending

D and hanging hills, and the rills running into it, fashioned and shaped for pleasure and profit even by Nature her selfe, who seemeth as it were to be very angry with the inhabitants there by, for suffering all to grow wild and barbarous through their lazie lithernesse. In the upper Tir-Oen stands Straban, a Castle well knowne, wherein dwelt in our daies Turlogh Leinigh of the sept of O-Neals, who after the death of Shan O-Neal, as I shall shew anon, by election of the people attained to the dignity of O-Neal: also some other Piles and fortresses of smaller reckoning, the which (like as else where in this Iland) be no more but towers with narrow loope-holes rather than windowes, unto which adjoine Hauls made of turfes, and roofed over head with thatch, having unto them belonging large Courts or yards fenced round about with

E ditches and hedges of rough bushes for defence of their cattell against Cow-stealers. But if this county have any name or glory at all, it is wholly from the Lords thereof, who have ruled here as Kings, or Tyrants rather: of whom there were two Earles of Tir-Oen, namely, Con O-Neale, and Hugh his nephew by his son Matthew. But of these I will speake more at large by and by, when I am to treat of the Earles and Lords of Ulster.

THE COUNTIE OF DONEGALL OR TIR-CONELL.

F

ALL that remaineth now behind in Ulster toward the North and South, was possessed in ancient times by the Robogdii and Vennicnii: but at this day it is called the County of Donegall or Tirconell, that is, as some interpret it, The land of Cornelius, or as others, The Land of Conall, and in truth, Marianus plainly nameth it, Conallea.

Conallea. The county is all in a maner champian and full of havens, as bounded with the ſea on the North and Weſt ſides beating upon it, and diſ-joined on the Eaſt from Tir-Oen with the river Liffer, and from Conaght with the Lake Erne. Liffer neere unto his ſpring head, enlargeth his ſtream, and ſpreadeth abroad into a Lake, wherein appeareth above the water an Iſland, and in it hard by a little Monaſtery, a very narrow vault within the ground, much ſpoken of by reaſon of I wot not what fearefull walking ſpirits, and dreadfull apparitions, or rather ſome religious horrour: which cave, as ſome dreame ridiculouſly, was digged by Ulyſſes when hee went downe to parley with thoſe in hell.

Patricks Purgatory.

The inhabitants terme it in theſe daies Ellan u' Frugadory, that is, The Iſle of Purgatory, and Saint Patricks Purgatory. For ſome perſons devoutly credulous, affirme that Patrick the Iriſhmens Apoſtle, or elſe ſome Abbat of the ſame name, obtained by moſt earneſt praier at the hands of God, that the puniſhments and torments which the godleſſe are to ſuffer after this life, might here bee preſented to the eye: that ſo he might more eaſily root out the ſinnes which ſtucke ſo faſt to his Countrimen the Iriſh; and withall their heatheniſh errours. But ſeeing that this place is named in Saint Patricks life, Reglis, I would deeme it to be the other REGIA, that Ptolomee mentioneth: and the very ſituation of it in the Geographer implieth no leſſe. Beſides this Patrickes Purgatory, there was another Purgatorie alſo of Sir Brendan in this Iſland; but ſince I could not finde out the place, take here with you that only which I found, namely, Nechams Tetraſtichon of it.

There is, and often times cleere lights doe ſhine within the ſame.
The ſoules have licence here to paſſe through Purgatory fire,
That worthily before that Judge, they may at length appeare.

Where this river Liffer augmented by other waters comming unto it, approacheth neerer to the ſea, it ſpreadeth out againe into a Lake, which Ptolomee called LOGIA, and now they uſually terme it Logh Foile and Logh Der, whereupon Necham hath theſe verſes.

Logh Der aquis dives Lacus eſt, Ulconia novit,
Commodus indigenis utilitate placet.

Logh Der a Lake in waters rich, this Ulſter knoweth well, Commodious, and pleaſing much thoſe that about it dwell.

Derry.

Hard by this, there flouriſhed ſometime Derry a Monaſterie and Epiſcopall See; where in the yeere 1566. Edward Randolph, renowned for his long ſervice in the warres, ſpent his life in the behalfe of his countrey to his everlaſting fame, and gave Shan O-Neal (who had then aſſembled and armed all the power he could poſſibly againſt the Engliſh) ſuch an overthrow, as that he could never after recover the loſſe he then ſuſtained. But now of late Sir Henry Docwra knight, who in the warres of Ireland quit him ſo well, that with great praiſe he hath approved his ſingular valour and martiall skill, brought hither firſt a gariſon, and afterward planted here a Colony, to bridle the Earle of Tir-Oens inſolent pride: and eſtabliſhed and ſettled the ſame with ſo good orders, that it both ſtandeth in good ſteed for helpe againſt the rebells, and alſo traineth the barbarous people to their duties. The ROBOGDII placed above LOGIA held all that Northren ſea coaſt of Ireland, where O-Dogherty an obſcure Potentate had great ſway. Amongſt theſe, Robogh a little Epiſcopall towne retaineth the expreſſe footings of the old name Robogdii. Which ſhould be that promontory ROBOGDIUM, unleſſe it be Faire Foreland, I know not. Upon the ſhore as it twineth backe from hence Southerly, Calebeg affordeth an Haven and commodious harbour for ſailers: then appeare the ruins and rubbiſh of B Sligah Caſtle, which Maurice Fitz-Girald Lord Juſtice of Ireland built about the yeere 1242. when he had made himſelfe Lord of this country. But John Fitz-Girald the firſt Earle of Kildare was diſpoſſeſſed of this caſtle and a goodly inheritance in this tract, fined alſo in a great ſum of money, for that hee had raiſed a civill and dangerous war againſt the Earle of Ulſter. Lower yet, and not far from the mouth of Logh Earne, Donegal, that is, the towne of the Gallicians of Spaine, with an Abby ſheweth it ſelfe, whence this county when it was made a county tooke the name. Donegall.

There have beene rulers over this territory for theſe many ages they of the houſe of O-Donel, and thoſe extracted from the ſame ſtock that the family of O-Neals, nei-
C ther had they any other title than O-Donel, and Lords of Tir-Conell. For the getting of which title, and that they might be by a certaine election of the people inaugurated with their due complements at a ſtone beſide Kilmacrenan, they were at deadly diſcord, and committed outrages one upon another, untill that King James not long ſince by his honourable Letters Patents conferred the honour, title, and ſtile of Earle Tir-Conell upon Rory O-Donell, the brother of that Hugh the rebell, who being fled out of his countrey died in Spaine; and this Rory his ſucceſſour practiſing new treaſon againſt King James his advancer, upon the terrour of a guilty conſcience fled the realme in the yeere 1607. and died at Rome. O-donell.

The ancient inhabitants of this Ulſter, like as the reſt of all Ireland throughout,
D were by one name in times paſt cleped SCOTI, and from hence carried they over with them the name of Scots into the North parts of Britain. For as Giraldus writeth, about the yeere of ſalvation foure hundred, ſix ſons of Mured King of Ulſter ſeized upon the North parts of Britain, whereupon it was by a ſpeciall and peculiar name called SCOTIA. And yet it appeareth by the Scottiſh Annales that this happened long before. Alſo Ferguſe the ſecond, who re-eſtabliſhed the kingdome of Scots in Britain, came from hence, unto whom Patrick had propheſied by way of divination or Soothſaying, in theſe words: Although thou ſeemeſt at this day baſe and contemptible in the eies of thy brethren, thou ſhalt ſhortly be the Prince and Lord of them all. And to avow the credit and authority of this prediction, the ſaid writer addeth moreover and ſaith: Scoti. In the life of S. Patrick.
E No long ſpace of time after this, Fergus, according to the Holy mans propheſie, obtained the ſoveraignty in all that land, and his ſeed reigned for many generations together. From his ſtemme proceeded that moſt valerous King Edan, the ſonne of Gabran, who ſubdued Scotland that is called Albanach, whoſe poſterity in lineall deſcent and ſucceſſion reigneth there ſtill.

The firſt Engliſhman that in the reigne of King Henry the ſecond attempted this countrey was Sir John Curcy, who having by force won Downe and Armach, either by dint of ſword conquered, or by ſurrender gat the whole into his owne hands, and was the firſt that was ſtiled Earle of Ulſter: but when his great exploits and fortunate atchievements had wrought him ſuch envie, that through his owne vertues and o-F ther mens vices he was baniſhed out of the Realme, Hugh Lacy, the ſecond ſonne of Hugh Lacy Lord of Meth, who had commandement to purſue him by force and armes, was by King John appointed his ſucceſſour, being created Earle of Ulſter, by the ſword, of which honour notwithſtanding the ſame King afterward deprived him for his tumultuous inſolency: and hee was in the end received into favour againe. But for the ſounder teſtimony hereof, it were good to exemplifie the ſame word Earles of Ulſter. An. 7. Joannis.

for

for word out of the records of Ireland. Hugh de Lacy ſometime Earle of Ulſter, held all A Ulſter (exempt and ſeparate from all other counties whatſoever) of the Kings of England in chiefe by ſervice of three Knights ſo often as the Kings ſervice was proclaimed:
and he held all Pleas in his owne Court, that pertaine to a Juſtice and Sheriffe, and held a Court of Chancery of his own, &c. And afterward all Ulſter came into the hands of our Soveraigne Lord K. John, by the forfeiture of the foreſaid Hugh: unto whom after that K. Henry the third demiſed it for terme of the ſaid Hughs life. And when Hugh was de-ceaſed, Walter de Burgo did that ſervice unto Lord Edward K. Henries ſon, Lord of Ireland before he was King. And the ſame Lord Edward feoffed the aforeſaid Walter in the ſaid land of Ulſter, to have and to hold unto the ſame Walter and to his heires, by the ſer- B vice aforeſaid, as freely and wholly as the above named Hugh de Lacy held it, excepting the advowſons of Cathedrall Churches and the demeſne of the ſame, alſo the Pleas of the Crowne, to wit, Rape, Forſtall, Firing, and Treaſure Trowve, which our ſoveraigne Lord K. Edward retained to himſelfe and his heires. This Walter de Burgo, who was Lord of Conaght, and Earle of Ulſter, begat of the only daughter of Hugh de Lacy, Richard Earle of Ulſter, who after hee had endured many troubles and calamities died in the yeere 1326. Richard had iſſue John de Burgo, who departed this life before his father, having begotten upon Elizabeth, ſiſter and one of the heires of Gilbert Clare Earle of Gloceſter, William, who ſucceeded after his grandfather. This William being ſlain by his own men when he was young, left behind him a little daughter See pag. 624. and 725. his only child, who being married unto Leonell Duke of Clarence bare one daughter C likewiſe, the wife of Edmund Mortimer Earle of March, by whom the Earledome of Ulſter and Seigniory of Conaght came unto the Mortimers, and from them together with the kingdome of England unto the houſe of Yorke: and afterward Edward the fourth King of England adjoined it unto the Kings Domaine or Crowne land.

And when as at the ſame time England was divided into ſides and factions, whiles the civill warre grew hot, and the Engliſh that abode here returned out of Ulſter into England to follow the factions, O-Neal and others of Iriſh blood ſeized theſe countries into their own hands, and brought them to ſuch wildneſſe and ſavage barbariſme, as it exceeded: In ſo much as this province which in times paſt paied a mighty maſſe D of money unto their Earles, ſcarcely ever ſince yeelded any coin at all unto the Kings of England.

Ireland neglected. And verily in no one thing whatſoever (pardon this my over-boldneſſe) have the Kings of England beene more defective in piety and policie, than that they have for theſe ſo many ages ſeen ſo ſlightly to this Province, yea and to all Ireland, in the propagation of religion, eſtabliſhing the weale publike, and reducing the life of the inhabitants to civility: whether it was for careleſſe neglect, ſparing, or a fore-caſt of dammage, or ſome reaſon of ſtate, I am not able to ſay. But that the ſame may be no longer thus neglected, it ſeemeth of it ſelfe by good right to importune moſt earneſtly, being an Iland ſo great, ſo neere a neigbour, ſo fruitfull in ſoile, ſo rich in paſtures E more than credible, beſet with ſo many woods, enriched with ſo many mineralls (if they were ſearched) watered with ſo many rivers, environed with ſo many havens, lying ſo fit and commodious for ſailing into moſt wealthy countries, and thereby like to bee for impoſt and cuſtome very profitable: and to conclude, breeding and rearing men ſo abundantly as it doth, who conſidering either their mindes or their bodies might be of ſingular emploiment for all duties and functions as well of warre as of peace, if they were wrought and conformed to orderly civility.

A I Intimated even now, that I would ſpeak touching the O-Neals, who carried themſelves as Lords of Ulſter; and I promiſed not long ſince a friend of mine, that I would write of their rebellions raiſed in our age. And verily I will performe my promiſe to his Manes, whom whiles he lived I obſerved with all reſpect, and being now in heaven I will not forget. Thus much onely I will promiſe by way of Preface, that I have compendiouſly collected theſe matters out of my Annales, and here conjoined them, which there are ſevered and divided according to their ſeverall times: and withall, that whatſoever I ſhall
B write, is not upon uncertaine rumours, but gathered ſummarily from out o their owne hand writings who managed thoſe affaires, and were preſent in the actions: And this will I doe with ſo ſincere an affection to the truth, and ſo uncorrupt fidelity, that I doubt not but I ſhall have thanks at their hands who love the truth, and deſire to underſtand the late affaires of Ireland, and not incurre the blame of any, unleſſe they be ſuch as having done ill, take it not well if themſelves be accordingly cenſured.

THE O-NEALES, AND THEIR REBELLIONS IN OUR TIME.

D

TO ſay nothing of that GREAT NEALE, who ruled by force and armes in Ulſter, and a great part of Ireland, before the comming of Saint Patricke; nor of thoſe in the middle times, who were but of meane note and memoriall to ſpeake of; this family, after the arrivall of the Engliſh in Ireland, lay cloſe and obſcure in remote lurking corners, unleſſe it were when Edward Brus brother to Robert King of Scotland, named himſelfe King of Ireland. For then in a troubleſome time Dovenald O-Neale ſtarted and rowſed himſelfe out of his lurking holes, and in E his miſſives unto the Pope uſed this title in his ſtile, Dovenald O-Neale King of Ulſter, and in right of inheritance the undoubted heire of all Ireland. But after theſe ſtirres and troubles were laid, this new King ſoone vaniſhed away; and Dovenalds poſterity pluckt in their hornes and hid their heads, untill that, whiles England was all in a combuſtion, kindled by the furious firebrands of civill warres betweene the houſes of Yorke and Lancaſter for the Imperiall Crowne, thoſe Engliſh that ſerved and lived here, abandoning Ulſter, and committing it to the keeping of the O-Neals, returned home to follow the factions. For then Henry O-Neal, the ſonne of Oen or Eugenius O-Neal, eſpouſed the daughter of Thomas Earle of Kildare: and his ſon Con-More, that is, Con the great, married the daughter of Girald Earle of Kildare his F mothers brother.

Scoto-Chronicon lib. 12. cap. 26.

Theſe ſupported by the powerfull authority of the Earles of Kildare (who verily for many yeeres were Deputies of Ireland) carried their heads aloft, tyrannizing cruelly upon the people, & tranſported with the inſolent ſpirit of pride, diſdained all the titles of Prince, Duke, Marqueſſe, and Earles, in compariſon of the name of O-Neal. Con the ſonne of Con, ſurnamed Bacco, becauſe hee halted, ſucceeded his father in the the dignity of O-Neale, who curſed all his poſterity, in caſe they either learned to A ſpeake Engliſh, or ſowed wheat, or built houſes: being ſore affraid, leſt by theſe inducements the Engliſh might bee allured to enter againe into their Lands and poſ-ſeſſions: often ſaying that language bred converſation, and conſequenly their con-fuſion; that wheat gave ſuſtenance with like effect: and by building they ſhould doe but as the crow doth, make her neſt, to be beaten out by the hawke.

When as the greatneſſe of this Con O-Neale became very much ſuſpected of King Henry the Eight, and the Kings power having now troden under foot the familie of Kildare, in whoſe rebellion O-Neale had engaged himſelfe deepe, grew dreadfull to O-Neale alſo: into England he comes, and there renouncing the name B of O-Neale, put his whole eſtate into the Kings hands: which within a while after was granted againe by letters Patent under the great ſeale of England, to hold as in fee, together with the title of the Earle of Tir-Oen, to him and to Matthew his falſe reputed ſonne, and to the heires of their bodies lawfully begotten. And Matthew at the ſame time was created Baron of Dunganon. This Matthew being taken untill he was fifteene yeeres old for the ſonne of a blackſmith in Dundalk, was by the ſaid Shan or John O Neale. Smiths wife, whom Con had ſometime kept as his concubine, tendred unto Con as his owne ſonne, and hee accepting him for his owne ſonne in deed, rejected John (Shan they call him) with the reſt, whom he had begotten on his owne lawfull wife.
Hereupon Shan, ſeeing a baſtard preferred before him, ſo much made of, and C highly honoured, ſuddenly ſet his heart wholly againſt his father, and withall burned in ſuch hatred with moſt bitter malice againſt Matthew, that hee murdered him out of the way, and ſo plagued and vexed his father with injurious indignities, whiles he went about to deprive him of his Seigniorie, diſſeized him of his dwelling houſe, and ſtript him out of all he had, that the old man for very thought and griefe of heart pined away, and died. Straightwayes Shan being choſen, proclaimed and inau-gured O-Neal, by an old ſhooe caſt over his head, ſeized upon his fathers inheritance, and with all diligence ſought after the ſonnes of Matthew, that he might be ſecured from them; but they were fled and gone. Howbeit Brian the eldeſt ſonne not long after was ſlaine by Mac-Donel Totan one of the O-Neals race, ſuborned as D ſome give it out, by Shan to doe that feat. Hugh and Cormack by the meanes and helpe of the Engliſh eſcaped, and yet remaine alive. Shan having thus gotten all into his owne hands (as hee was a man cruell and barbarous) began to exerciſe exceſſive cruelty over the great men of Ulſter, and made his vaunt, that Mac-Gen-nys, Mac-Guyr, Mac-Mahon, O Reali, O-Hanlon, O Cahan, Mac-Brien, O Hagan, O Quin, Mac-Canna, Mac-Carton, and all the Mac-Donels, the Galloglaſſes, were his ſubjects and vaſſels.

And when as Sir Henry Sidney Juſtice for the time being, in the abſence of the Earle of Suſſex Lord Deputy, expoſtulated with him about theſe points, he anſwe-red, that hee, the undoubted and lawfull ſonne and heire of Con O-Neale, as being E borne of his lawfull wife, had entred upon his fathers inheritance: that Matthew was a Blacke-Smiths ſonne of Dundalke, and by the ſaid Smith begotten, and borne after his mariage with Aliſon his Wife, yet craftily obtruded upon Con as his ſon, thereby to intervert another way, and to alienate the inheritance and honour of O-Neale:
which howſoever he would endure, yet none beſides of the Sept of O-Neals would ever beare and digeſt. As for the letters Patent of King Henry the eighth, they were of no validity, conſidering that Con had no right in that hee ſurrendred into the Kings hands, longer than his owne life: neither could he ſurrender up the ſame without the conſent of the Nobles and people of Ulſter by whom hee had beene elected O-Neale: Neither were ſuch Patents of any force, unleſſe there were an F undoubted heire apparent of the family authentically ſignified before by inquiſition and the oath of twelve men, which in this matter was never certified. Alſo, that himſelfe was by law both of God and man the true heire, as being the firſt begotten ſonne of his father, lawfully borne in wedlocke; that with the generall aſſent and conſent of Peeres and people he was choſen, declared, and proclaimed O-Neal,

A O-Neale according to the ancient law of Taniſtry, whereby a man at his full yeeres is to be preferred before a boy, and an uncle before that nephew, whoſe grandfather ſurvived the father: neither had he arrogated unto himſelfe any authority over the Peeres or Nobles of Ulſter, other than his anceſters (as hee was able to prove by plaine proofes produced) had exerciſed in times paſt out of minde moſt rightfully.

Howbeit, ſoone after he outraged and overthrew O-Raily in the field, tooke Callagh O-Donell Lord of Tir-Conell priſoner, and caſt him with his children into priſon, carried away his wife, on whom hee begat children in adultery, ſeized upon his for-
B treſſes, lands, and goods, and bare himſelfe as abſolute King of all Ulſter.

But ſo ſoone as Thomas Earle of Suſſex the Lord Deputy came with a power into the field for to abate this inſolency of his, hee was ſtrangely terrified, and by the perſwaſion of Girald Earle of Kildare, whom Queene Mary had reſtored to his former eſtate, came into England unto Queene Elizabeth, caſt himſelfe proſtrate at her feet in all ſubmiſſive and humble maner, and being received with all curteſie, after he had promiſed his allegeance, returned home, and for a while in his feeding and apparell conformed himſelf to all kind of civility: he aſſailed the Scottiſh and drave them quite out of Ulſter, ſlew James Mac-Conell their leader, kept himſelf and all his people in good order, and the poorer ſort he carefully protected from wrongs: Howbeit he
C tyrannized moſt cruelly and inſolently over the Nobility: who when they had craved aid of the L. Deputy for to repreſſe his intolerable violence; he thereupon growing more outrageous, in furious maner with fire and ſword drave Mac-Guir Lord of Fermanagh (who underhand had accuſed him) out of houſe and home, ſet fire upon the Metropolitane Church of Armach, and burnt it, yea and laied ſiege unto Dundalik on every ſide: but his enterpriſe was made fruſtrate through the valour of the ſouldiers there in garriſon, and William Sarfield Maior of Dublin, who went forth againſt him with the very floure of choice Citizens. Howbeit the neighbour Countries round about he harried and ſpoiled in all manner of hoſtility.

Thomas Earle of Suſſex Lord Deputy.

Then Sir Henry Sidney the Deputy, to reſtraine and bridle the boldneſſe of the D man, came himſelfe in perſon with an army into the field againſt him, and by politicke forecaſt ſent before Edward Randolph, an old approved and renowned Coronell, with ſeven enſignes of foot-men, and a cornet of horſemen, by ſea into the North ſide of Ireland; who encamped at Derry by Logh-foil, that he might charge upon the backe of the Rebels. Which hee fearing, came thither ſpeedily with all the power and forces that hee had, to remove him: But Randolph in a pitcht field gave him battell, and there manfully fighting, with honour loſt his life in his Countries ſervice, but gave him withall ſuch an overthrow, that never after he was able to make head againe: and being elſewhere in light skirmiſhes foiled, and by little and little forſaken of his owne followers, hee was minded with an E halter tyed about his necke humbly to beſeech the Lord Deputy his protection and mercy. But being by his Secretarie perſwaded firſt to try the friendſhip of the Scots, who under the conduct of Alexander Oge, that is, the younger, held their ſtanding Summer Campe in Claneboy, having ſent before hand Surley Boy Alexanders brother, whom hee had kept priſoner a long time, to prepare the way, hee came unto them with the wife of O-Donell whom hee kept, was kindely welcommed, and admitted with ſome few into a tent: where after they had beene in their cups, they brake out into a brawle about James Mac-Conell Alexanders brother, whom Shan had ſlaine, and alſo about the honeſty of James his ſiſter, whom Shan had married and caſt off: by which time Alexander Oge, and his brother Mac-
F Gillaſpic being hot ſet upon revenge, after a ſignall given, with their drawn ſwords ſet upon Shan, and with many a wound hacked and hewed him to death: whereby the Province recovered, after grievous oppreſſions and warre, the benefits of wiſhed peace.

Sir Henry Sidney Lord Deputy. 1565.

Within a while after a Parliament was holden at Dublin, where by the authority of all the States of the Realme there aſſembled, Shan was attainted, and all the Seig-

Seigniories, lands, and goods which hee and his followers had, were inveſted in Queene Elizabeth, her heires and ſucceſſours. And a law was enacted, that from that day forward no man ſhould aſſume unto him the name and title of O-Neale. And yet ſhortly after Turlogh Leinigh, a brothers ſonne of Con-Mor O-Neale aforeſaid, tooke it upon him by a popular election, being a man farre ſtept in yeeres, and therefore more calme and quiet, and ſo much the rather, becauſe hee ſtood in feare of Shan O-Neals ſonnes, and Hugh Baron of Dunganon, the ſonne of Matthew, although he had given unto the ſaid Hugh his daughter in marriage; whom hee notwithſtanding quickly after did caſt off and repudiate, taking another wife. This Turlegh being moſt obſequious and dutifull unto the Queene of England, put the Engliſh to no trouble at all; but hee moleſted O-Donell his neighbour and the Scots of the Ilands, and in an encounter ſlew Alexander Oge, who had killed Shan O-Neale.

Hugh O-Neal Earle of Tir-Oen.

Hugh the ſonne of Matthew, commonly called Baron of Dunganon, who had lived a long time one while concealed in his owne countrey, other whiles in England in the retinue of Noble men, began now to put himſelfe forth, and to raiſe himſelf out of that obſcure condition, when Elizabeth had given him command of a company of horſemen in the warre againſt the Earle of Deſmond, then in rebellion, and aſſigned to him a penſion of a thouſand Markes by the yeere. In that warre hee acquitted himſelfe valiantly in all places againſt the rebells; and at length exhibited a ſupplication in the Parliament houſe; That by vertue of letters patents, granted unto his Grandfather by King Henry the eighth, he might be admitted to the title and place of the Earle of Tir-Oen, and ſettled in his anceſtours inheritance. The title and place of Earle of Tir-Oen was preſently granted: but as touching the inheritance, conſidering that upon the forfaiture and attainture of Shan O-Neale the Kings of England were inveſted therein, the matter was referred unto Queene Elizabeth: who moſt bountifully granted the ſame to him, for his faithfull ſervice performed, and to be performed. Yet ſo, as that the country ſhould be firſt ſurveied, and laied out into ſeverall diviſions, one or two places fit for gariſons reſerved, and namely, the fort at Blackwater, that good order might be taken for the maintenance of the ſons of Shan and Turlogh, and that he ſhould not be permitted to have any authority at all againſt the noblemen his neighbours without the county of Tir-Oen. Theſe conditions he moſt willingly accepted, and rendred very great thanks, accordingly promiſing to perform whatſoever he was able, with diligence, authority, ſtudy, and endevour, in regard of ſo great benefits received: and verily he failed not in his promiſe, nor omitted any duty that might be expected from a moſt loiall ſubject. A body he had able to endure travell, watching and faſting: his induſtry was ſingular, his courage in warre great, and anſwerable to the moſt important affaires: good skill he had in martiall feats, and a profound wit and deep reach to diſſemble and carry his buſineſſe cloſely: in ſo much as even then ſome there were who gave this prediction of him, That he was born either to the exceeding good, or as great hurt of Ireland. And ſuch proofes he made of his valour and fidelity, that Turlogh Leinigh at the Queenes interceſſion reſigned up unto him his government upon certaine conditions. After whoſe deceaſe he uſurped unto himſelfe the title of O-Neal, which by law was a capitall crime; but excuſed himſelfe colourably, becauſe others ſhould not enter upon the ſame: and promiſed ſolemnely to renounce it quite, yet laboured hee moſt earneſtly, that hee might not be urged thereunto by any oath.

1588. Not long after, when that moſt puiſſant Armada of Spaine, which had in vaine given the attempt upon England, was put to flight, many ſhips in their returne homeward were caſt away and loſt in the Vergivian ſea, and many of the Spaniards after ſhipwracke were caſt on ſhore; ſome of whom Tir-Oen is reported to have entertained and lodged, yea and to have conſulted and complotted with them about entring into a ſecret confederacy with the King of Spaine. For which practice Hugh Ne Gaveloc, that is to ſay, Hugh in the fetters (ſirnamed ſo becauſe he had been kept ſo long in fetters) a baſe ſonne of Shan O-Neal informed againſt him, and that upon

no

A no light but pregnant preſumptions: whom the Earle afterward intercepted, and commanded to bee ſtrangled, but hardly could he finde any one, that for the reverent regard of the O-Neals blood, would lay hands upon him. For which barbarous and inhumane murdering of his couſin german, he was charged in England; but the Queene of her royall clemency, and for the hope that ſhe had conceived of the Earle, craving with repentance forgiveneſſe of this fault, and ſubmitting himſelfe to divers good orders, for his obedience, pardoned him, to the great griefe of ſome good men. But this ſoone after more grieved him, yea pricked (as it were) and ſore galled him, that the Deputy had ſuppreſſed the name of Mac Mahon in the B country next adjoyning unto him; and withall to abate and weaken the power of that mighty family, had divided the country among many. He I ſay hereupon conceived a feare, leſt the ſame would befall unto him, and other Chieftanes of Ulſter. At which very time, there began ſome ſecret grudges, and heart burnings to ariſe between the Earle and Sir Henrie Bagnall the Marſhall, whoſe ſiſter the Earle had carried away and married. The Earle complained, that whatſoever he had with the loſſe of his blood and painfull travell reduced to the obedience of the Prince, the Marſhall, and not he, reaped the fruit and gaine thereof: that the Marſhall by ſuborning moſt baſe and vile perſons as witneſſes, had falſely brought him into queſtion for high treaſon, had incited Sir William Fitz-Williams, then Lord Deputy, his dead-
C ly enemy, by corruptions and bribery to worke his deſtruction; and that he lay in waite to take away his life. And in very truth the Deputies information againſt the Earle found credit in the Court of England, untill the ſaid Earle wrote his letters, and offred judicially to be tried either in England or in Ireland. This is for certain known, that much about this time, he together with the chiefery, or greateſt men of Ulſter, by ſecret parlees combined in an aſſociation, that they would defend the Romiſh religion (for Religion now a daies is made the mantle for all rebellion) that they would in no wiſe admit Sheriffes or Garriſon ſouldiers in their Territories, and mutually maintain one anothers right, yea and withſtand all wrongs offered by the Engliſh. The firſt Champion thruſt forward to ſound the alarum, was Mac-Gwyr, a man of a turbulent
D ſpirit: he by way of preying all before him maketh a road into Conaght, accompanied with Gauran a Prieſt, who being ordeined by the Pope Primate of Ireland, commanded him in the name, and with the helpe of God to try his fortune, and to fight the Lords battell, aſſuring him of moſt happy ſucceſſe: yet fell it out otherwiſe; for Mac-Gwyr, through the valour of Sir Richard Bingham, was diſcomfited and put to flight, and the Primate with others ſlaine. Soone after, Mac-Gwyr brake out into open rebellion; whom the Earle himſelfe (together with the Marſhall) in a ſhew of dutifull attendance purſued; and in this ſervice, with great commendation of his forwardneſſe, was wounded in the thigh. Howbeit wholly intentive to provide for his own ſecurity, he intercepteth the ſons of Shan O-Neale, and makes them ſure for do-
E ing any harme: neither would he by any meanes (being requeſted thereto) ſet them at liberty, but minding another matter, maketh moſt grievous complaints of the injuries offered unto him by the Deputy, the Marſhall, and the garriſon ſouldiers: which notwithſtanding, within a while after he carried ſo covertly, that as if he had forgotten all quarels, he came under ſafe conduct unto the Deputy, ſubmitted himſelfe, and after hee had profeſſed all manner of dutifull obedience, returned home with great commendation. When as now Sir William Fitz Williams, the Lord Deputy was revoked home out of Ireland, Sir William Ruſſell ſucceeded in that office. Unto him repaired the Earle of his own accord, exhibited an humble ſubmiſſion, upon his knees to the Lord Deputy, wherein he dolefully expreſſed his great griefe that the Queen
F had conceived indignation againſt him, as of one undutifull and diſloyall. Hee acknowledged that the late abſenting himſelfe from the ſtate was diſagreable to his obedience; albeit it was occaſioned by ſome hard meaſures of the late Lord Deputie, as though he and the Marſhall had combined for his deſtruction.

He acknowledged that the Queene advanced him to high title, and great livings, that ſhe ever upheld him, and enabled him, that ſhee, who by grace had advanced him, was able by her force to ſubvert him, and therefore if he were voide of grati- A tude, yet he could not be ſo voide of reaſon, as to worke his owne ruine. Furthermore, he made liberall promiſes that he would moſt willingly do whatſoever ſhould be enjoyned him, (which hee alſo had promiſed in his letters ſent unto the Lords of the Councell in England) and earneſtly beſought that he might be received into favour againe with the Queene, as before time, which he had loſt, not by any deſert of his owne, but through the forged informations and ſuggeſtions of his adverſaries.

At the ſame time, Bagnall the Marſhall was preſent in the place, who exhibited articles againſt the Earle, and accuſed him, that hee had underhand ſuborned and ſent Mac-Guir, with the Primate above named into Conaght, that hee had complotted ſe- B cretly with Mac-Guir, O-Donel and other conſpirators, and had aided them by Cor- mac-Mac-Baron the Earles brother, and Con the Earles baſe ſon, and ſome of his ſer-vants, in the waſting of Monaghan, and beſieging of Inis-Kellin, and by means drawn away the Captaines of Kilulto and Kilwarny, from their loialty and obedience to the Queen. Hereupon it was ſeriouſly debated among the Councellors of the kingdome, whether the Earle ſhould be ſtaied to make his anſwer or no? The Deputy thought good that he ſhould be detained. But when it was put to queſtion generally, the more part, either upon a vaine feare, or forward inclination to favour the Earle, were inſtant to have him diſmiſſed, & the matter to be put off unto a further day of hearing, pretending certaine waighty conſiderations, and that the Articles exhibited were C without proofe or time. Thus the Deputie in a ſort was forced to yeeld to the experience of the Councell, and the Earle was permitted to depart, and his accuſers there preſent had no audience. Which troubled and diſquieted the Queen not a little, conſidering that his wicked deſignements and acts were now apparent to every one, and the Queene her ſelfe had given warning afore hand, that he ſhould be detained untill he had cleered himſelfe of thoſe imputations.

The Earle being now returned home, when he heard that a new ſupply of ſouldiers was comming out of England, and thirteene hundred beſides of old ſervitors out of the Low-countries, who had ſerved in little Britaine under Sir John Norris, and that the Engliſh entended now to poſſeſſe themſelves of Balaſhanon and Belik, Caſtles up- D on the mouth of Logh-Earn, he being privie to himſelf of his own evill purpoſes, and carrying a guilty conſcience, on a ſudden aſſaileth the fort at Blackwater, by which the entry lay into Tir-Oen his owne country, and had it ſurrendred up unto him. And at the very ſame inſtant in maner, hee (wavering in his minde) with one breath (as it were) by his letters offereth unto the Earle of Kildare, his helpe againſt the wrongs done by the Deputy, and withall, promiſeth the Earle of Ormond, & Sir Henry Wallop 1595. Treaſurer of the kingdome, to continue firme in his allegeance, yea and beſeecheth Die 12. Junii. in his letters Sir John Norris appointed Lord Generall, that he might be more mildly dealt with, nor againſt his will be driven headlong upon the dangerous rockes of diſ-loialty. But theſe letters unto Norris Bagnall the Marſhall intercepted, and (as the E Earle complained afterward) ſuppreſſed, to his greateſt prejudice and hurt. For im-mediatly he and his confederates were proclaimed traitors, both in Iriſh and Engliſh, and pardon offered to all ſuch as had been ſeduced by falſe perſwaſions to take their parts, & would now relinquiſh them and ſubmit themſelves to the Queen. At which time there were accounted to be with the Rebell in Ulſter, about a thouſand horſemen, and 6280. footmen: and in Conaght 2300. who were all at the Earles command, very many of them trained ſouldiers: as who had been exerciſed in armes, ever ſince that Sir John Perot Lord Deputy had appointed to every Lord and Chieftain of Ul-ſter, a certain number to be exerciſed in their weapons, for to reſiſt the Iriſh Scots of the Iſlands: or elſe had been employed in the warres of the Low-countries, whom F he in no provident policie for the future time, had cauſed to be tranſported thither.

And verily the Engliſh forces were equivalent in numbers, which were commanded by Sir John Norris: for the Queene had ſelected him as a man of eſpeciall truſt and reputation, to be uſed martially in ſuch journeyes as the Deputie himſelfe in perſon could not undertake, in conſideration that hee had performed divers honourable

A honourable ſervices was now Preſident of Mounſter, and had formerly commanded the Britain companies, which were to ſerve principally in this action. Yet atchieved he no memorable exploit, by reaſon of private miſconſtruction, ſuſpicious ſurmiſes, and diſlikes conceived betweene him and the Deputy. Onely the time was ſpent in preying, truce-making, and frivolous parlies. And without doubt the martiall men on both ſides were well content to have the war drawne out in length, and the Earle fed himſelfe every day with hope of ſuccour out of Spaine.

But among all theſe parlies, that was moſt memorable, which the two Commiſſioners, Sir Henry Wallop Treaſurer of that Realme, and Sir Robert Gardener chiefe
B Juſtice, moſt grave perſonages and of approved wiſdome, had with the Earle of Tir-Oen and O-Donell: at which they and others of the rebels both laied open their grievances, and exhibited alſo their petitions.

The Earle complained, that Sir Henry Bagnall the Mareſchall had cunningly withdrawne unto himſelfe the fruit of his labours; that with lyes and indirect meanes and ſubtle ſerches, he had thruſt him out of the Queenes favour, and after a ſort brought him into diſgrace: that to his great hinderance and prejudice, he had intercepted his letters written unto the Lord Deputy, unto Norris, and others; and ſtill detained and withheld from him his wives portion: and herewith he proteſted, that he never negotiated with forrain Princes, before he was proclaimed Traitour.

C Now he exhibited his petitions in moſt humble manner, That hee and all his followers might be pardoned for their crimes, That they might be reſtored to their former eſtates, That they might exerciſe freely their own religion (and yet that had been alwaies tolerated) That the Mareſchall ſhould pay unto him a thouſand pounds of lawfull mony of England for the dowry of his wife now deceaſed, That no garriſon ſouldiers, Sheriffe, or other officer ſhould be appointed within his county and Earledome, That the company of fifty horſemen which he had led, with the Queenes pay thereunto, might be reſtored unto him, and that thoſe who had robbed and ſpoiled his people might be puniſhed accordingly.

O-Donell for his part, when he had rehearſed his fathers and anceſtours fidelity to D the Kings of England, complained nevertheleſſe, that Captaine Boin was ſent from Perot the Lord Deputy, with a band of ſouldiers into his Province, under a colour of teaching his people civility, who being kindly entertained by his father, and having certain townes aſſigned unto him, offered all maner of injurious indignity and rigour unto his father, and advanced a certaine baſtard to the dignity of O-Donell: Alſo that the ſaid Deputy by ſending a Barke ſecretly intercepted him, thruſt him (innocent man) into priſon, and there unjuſtly kept him in dureſſe, untill that by the Almighties goodneſſe he was delivered: Item that the Deputy Fitz-Williams laid up faſt in cloſe priſon for ſeven yeeres together Sir Owen O-Toole, the ſecond man next to O-Donell in this tract, notwithſtanding he was guiltleſſe, and ſent for upon promiſe
E of his ſafe conduct: and that he oppreſſed his neighbours in Fermanaugh with intolerable wrongs: neither could himſelfe deviſe any other meanes for his owne ſafety and ſecurity, than to releeve his next neighbours thus vexed and moleſted. Hee likewiſe made the ſame requeſt that the Earle did, and moreover demanded certaine fortreſſes and lands in the county of Slego, which he challenged in right to be his inheritance. Shan Mac Brian Mac Phelim O-Neal laid downe his complaints, That Walter Earle of Eſſex had wrongfully taken from him the Iſle of Magy, and Sir Henry Bagnall the Barony of Maughery-Mourn, both of them his ancient inheritance: That he was himſelfe impriſoned, untill that by enforcement he had reſigned his right unto Bagnall; beſide other infinite injuries done unto him by the Garriſon
F ſouldiers of Knoc-Fergus. Hugh Mac-Guir made a great matter of the inſolent outrages committed by the Garriſon ſouldiers next unto him, in driving away his cattell as booties, and withall that the Sheriffe who was ſent into his Territories, had cut off the head of his next kinſman, and ſpurned it under foot.

Brian Mac-Hugh-Oge, Mac Mahon and Ever Mac-Cowley came in with theſe their complaints, That over and above other wrongs Sir William Fitz Williams the Deputy for great gifts and preſents, had ſettled Hugh Roe in the dignity of Mac-Mahon: and ſoone after, for that with banner diſplaied after the manner of the country he demanded a mulct or fine which hee had impoſed, hanged him up, and granted his inheritance unto ſtrangers, thereby to extinguiſh the name of Mac-Mahon. In a word, they were petitioners every one ſeverally for the ſame things that I have above reherſed. When ſome of theſe their demands were thought reaſonable, and others againe to be referred unto the Queenes conſideration; the Commiſſioners alſo on the other ſide propoſed certaine Articles unto the Rebells, that they ſhould lay downe their armes, diſperſe their forces, acknowledge ſubmiſſively their diſloyalties, admit Sheriffes in their governments, re-edifie the Forts they had defaced, ſuffer the garriſons to live without diſturbance, make reſtitution of ſpoiles taken, confeſſe upon their oath how farre they have dealt with forrain Princes, and renounce all forraine aide, &c.

But theſe ſeemed ſo unreaſonable to them in their conceit, being now growne inſolent, that after agreement of a ceſſation from armes for a ſhort time, they departed on all hands; whereas the Queene both then and afterwards, as well to ſpare the effuſion of blood, as to ſave expence of money, was willing enough to condeſcend unto any conditions of peace, that might have ſtood with the honour of her Majeſtie.

Lord Generall of the Army.

The time of ceſſation once expired, Norris (unto whom alone by the Queenes commandement, the command of the military forces was conferred in the Deputies abſence) marched with his armie againſt the Earle. Howbeit the Deputie joyned with him, and ſo with great terrour to the rebels, went forward as farre as Armach: ſo that the Earle leaving the fort at Blackwater, ſet fire upon the villages all round about, and the towne of Dungannon; yea and plucked downe a great part of his owne houſe there, who bewailing now his owne eſtate, as quite undone and paſt all recovery, he thought of nothing but how to hide his head: when as they had marched ſo farre, they ſtayed there for default of victuals; and having proclaimed the Earle traitour within his owne territorie, and placed a garriſon in the Church of Armach, returned backe. In their returne, the Earle diligently attendeth and accoſteth them a farre off (yet they ſtrengthened the garriſon at Monaghan) and when they were come neere unto Dundalke, the Deputy, according to the purport of her Majeſties Commiſſion, rendred the proſecution of the warre unto Norris, and after many words paſſed too and fro betweene them, with all the complements of kindneſſe and curteſie that might be, he retireth to Dublin, and providently looketh to the ſtate of Leinſter, Conaght, and Mounſter.

Norris ſtaied in Ulſter, but atchieved no exploit anſwerable to the expectation raiſed of ſo worthy a Warriour: whether it were upon emulation to the Deputy, or that Fortune altered and went backward (as who in the end is wont to croſſe great Commanders) or in favour of the Earle, unto whom he was as forward in kind affection, as the Deputy was eſtranged from him. For Norris ſeemed to blame the Deputy in ſome meaſure, for that entertaining an hard opinion of the Earle, his reſolution was to make no peace with him: for he in no wiſe would be otherwiſe perſwaded, but that hee trifled out the time, and made delaies for the nonce, expecting aide and ſuccour ſtill out of Spaine: whereas Norris in the meane while more favourable to him, and credulous withall, had conceived very good hope to bring the Earle to conditions of peace: which hope he working under hand ſo fed and fomented ſtill in Norris, as that he alſo preſented unto him a fained ſubmiſſion, ſubſcribed with his owne hand and ſigned, yea and humbly upon his knees craved pardon. Yet for all this in the meane time he dealt by his ſpying Agents and Curreours earneſtly and ſecretly with the King of Spaine, what with writing, and what with praying to have aide from him; ſo farre forth, as that there were ſecretly ſent one or two meſſengers from the Spaniards to the Rebels, with whom it was agreed, that in caſe the King of Spaine ſent at the prefixed time a competent Armie, able to vanquiſh the Engliſh, they would joine their owne forces, and if in the meane time he furniſhed them

A them with munition and proviſion for warre, they would reject all conditions of peace whatſoever. To theſe covenants, O Rorke, Mac-William, and others ſet to their hands, but not the Earle himſelfe, being providently cautelous, and yet no man doubts but his conſent was thereto. And the letters which the King of Spaine wrote backe full of great promiſes, hee in outward ſhew of dutifull ſervice, ſent unto the Deputy, and withall relying himſelfe upon aſſured hope of helpe from Spaine, ſtarted backe from that written ſubmiſſion aforeſaid, and faithfull promiſe made to Norris: for which, Norris through his owne credulity thus deluded and engaged, taketh him up in hot and bitter termes, as if he had gulled him. But he knowing well
B enough how to temporize and ſerve the time, entreth againe into a parlie with Norris and Fenton the Secretary: and ſo by giving hoſtages, a peace ſuch as it was (or rather covenants of agreement) was concluded: which ſoone after with the like levitie as before, he brake; alledging for his reaſon and excuſe, that he could not otherwiſe thinke, but hee was deceitfully dealt with, becauſe the Deputie and Norris agreed ſo badly; becauſe alſo the Deputie was diſcontented with them that in his behalfe travelled with him about peace, as though the Deputie deſired nothing but warre, conſidering that the troupes of horſemen were ſupplied out of England, the King of Spaines letter aboveſaid detained, and the Mareſchall his moſt heavie enemie, even then was returned with new commiſſion out of England.

C Hereupon therefore hee falleth to harrie and waſte the countries confining, to burne townes and villages, to rouſe and drive away booties: but within a while pricked with ſome remorſe of conſcience for ſuch outrages committed, and hearing beſides, that there was a peace like to be treated between England and Spaine, hee ſued once againe for a parlie, and conditions of peace: it yrkes mee to run through all the cloakes of his diſſimulation in particular. But to be ſhort, when he was in any danger of the Engliſh, in ſemblance, countenance, and words from teeth outward he ſo masked himſelfe under the vizard of ſubmiſſion, and pretended ſuch repentance for his former miſdemeanors, that he ſhifted off and dallied with them ſtill, untill they had forſlipt the opportunitie of purſuing him, and untill of neceſſity the for-D ces were to be diſſolved and withdrawn. Againe, ſuch was the ſloathfull negligence of the Captaines in Ireland, the thrifty ſparing in England, the inbred lenitie of the Queene, who wiſhed that theſe flames of rebellion (for warre it was not to be called) might be quenched without blood, that his faire words and pretences were beleeved, yea and hope otherwhiles was offered unto him of pardon, leſt his peeviſh pervicacie ſhould be more and more enkindled.

In the yeere 1597. when as by this time all Ulſter throughout beyond Dundalke, except ſeven Caſtles with wards, (namely, Newry, Knoc-Fergus, Carlingford, Greene Caſtle, Armach, Dondrom, and Olderfleet) yea and in manner all Conaght, was revolted; Thomas Lord Burrough, a man full of courage and politicke withall, was ſent
E Lord Deputie into Ireland. And about that time Sir John Norris diſtaſting himſelfe and the new Deputie, ended his life. Baron Burough, Lord Deputie, 1597.

At which time the Earle beſeeched by his letters a Ceſſation of armes; and verily it ſeemed good policie to grant it for a moneth. After the moneth expired, the Deputie brought his forces together, and which was thought to ſtand with his profit and honour both, at his firſt entry into government, aranged them in order of battell againſt the Earle: and albeit hee was welcomed by the Earle with a doubtfull and dangerous peece of ſervice within the ſpace of the Moiry, yet made hee way through by his valor, and moſt valiantly won the Fort at Blackewater, repaired and re-enforced by the Rebels, by which the way lieth into the Countie of Tir-Oen,
F and which beſides woods and marſhes, was the onely ſtrength that the Rebels had: and by this firſt attempt gave good proofe, that if the warre were well proſecuted, they might eaſily be vanquiſhed. The very ſame day whereon this Fort was taken, whiles the Deputie together with his armie were giving thankes unto God for this victorie, ſuddenly an allarum was given, and the enemie ſhewed himſelfe from an hill hard by: againſt whom, Henrie Earle of Kildare preſently marched, with a cornet of horſe and certaine of the better ſort of Gentlemen voluntaries, and ſetting upon them, put them to flight. Yet were there ſlaine of the Engliſh part, Francis Vagham brother to the Lord Deputies wife, R. Turner Serjeant Major a doughty and approved ſervitour, two of the Earle of Kildares foſter brethren: whoſe death he tooke ſo heavily, that himſelfe within few daies after for griefe of heart ended his life. For there is no love in the world comparable by many degrees to that of foſter-brethren in Ireland. A

But many more were wounded, and among the reſt Sir Thomas Waler, highly commended for his Martiall forwardneſſe. After that this Fort was with new munitions re-enforced, no ſooner had the L. Deputy withdrawne his army from thence, but the Rebels waving now betweene hope, feare, and ſhame, thought it their beſt and ſafeſt courſe ſtraightly to beſiege it: For the Earle ſuppoſed it was the moſt important place to offend and annoy them, as that both his honour and fortunes were for ever at their down-ſet if he might not recover it. With a ſtrong power therefore he beleaguered it round about. Againſt whom the Deputy ſtraightway ſetteth forward and marched without intermiſſion: but alas, marching on thus in his full pace to victory, hee was arreſted by violence of ſickneſſe, and cut off by untimely death, leaving a great miſſe of him to the State, and ſecurity to the ranging Rebels. Certes, if he had lived longer, by the judgement of wiſemen, he had abated their inſolencies, and the State had not beene plunged into ſo great perils. B

The Rebels underſtanding of the Deputies death, became exceeding ſtout and bold, and ſo eft-ſoones with mighty out-cries and furious violence aſſaulted the Fort, but repulſed alwaies they were with the greater loſſe: they that gave the Scallado were thrown down headlong, and moſt of them, by the Garriſon ſouldiers ſallying reſolutely upon them borne downe and troden under foot, in ſo much as diſtruſting now to maine force, they changed their copy and determined to protract the ſiege, being perſwaded that they within had victuals but for few daies; and beſides, they conceived good hope that the Garriſon ſouldiers for very want would bee wavering in their alleageance and turne traitours. But through the ſingular valour of Thomas Williams the Captaine, and of the band within, the place was manfully defended: who having ſuffered hunger, ſharp fights, and all extremities, after they had eaten up their horſes, were driven to pluck up the weeds growing among the ſtones for their food, and endured all the miſeries that might be. C D

Now by this time the government was by authority from the Queene committed unto the Earle of Ormond, under the title of Lievtenant Generall of the Armie, unto the Chancellor, and Sir Robert Gardiner. Then Tir-Oen recapitulateth in a long letter unto the ſaid Lievtenant all his greivances afore ſpecified: and not leaving out the leaſt inſolencie either of ſouldiers, or of Sheriffes, coldly excuſeth his breach of Covenants with Sir John Norris. But principally he complaines, that Feogh Mac-Hugh, a neere aſſociate and kinſman of his, had been perſecuted and executed: and in the end, That his letters unto the Queen were in England intercepted and ſuppreſſed: as alſo, that thoſe impoſitions and compoſitions laid both upon the Nobles and Commons were intolerable. He addeth moreover and ſaith, he ſaw full well, that all the Territories of the Nobility and Gentry of Ireland, would ſhortly bee parted and ſhared among the Councellors, Lawyers, Souldiers, and Notaries. And herewith he cloſely ſendeth ſuccour unto the ſonnes of Feogh Mach-Hugh, that they might kindle new coales in Leinſter. So that now, every man might ſee that this war was begun to no other end (whatſoever was pretended) but to extirpate the Engliſh quite out of Ireland. E 1598. All this while the Earle continued his ſiege about the Fort at Black-water; for the raiſing whereof, the Lievtenant Generall of the Armie (for there was no Deputy as yet ſubſtituted) ſent the moſt choice troupes, fourteene Enſignes, under the conduct of Sir Henry Bagnall, the Mareſchall, and the bittereſt adverſary the Earle had: upon whom as he marched with divided troupes, the Earle, edged with fretfull malice, aſſailed moſt furiouſly neere unto Armagh, and forthwith (the Mareſchall againſt F whom

A whom he had bent all his force, being ſlaine amongſt the thickeſt of his enemies) as he obtained a moſt joyous triumph over his private adverſarie, ſo he went away with a glorious victory over the Engliſh.

And verily, ſince the time that they ſet firſt footing in Ireland, they never had a greater overthrow; wherein thirteene valiant Captaines loſt their lives, and fifteene hundred of the common ſouldiers; who being routed and put to ſhamefull flight, as they were diſparkled all over the fields were cut in pieces: and ſuch as remained alive, laid the fault reproachfully, not upon their owne cowardice, but their chiefe leaders unskilfulneſſe (a thing now a daies ordinary.) Immediately upon this, followed the
B yeelding up of the Fort at Black-water: when as the garriſon ſouldiers having held out with loyaltie in heart, and weapon in hand, unto extreme famine, being now driven to exceeding great diſtreſſe, ſaw all hopeleſſe of ſuccour and reliefe. A notable victory this was, and of great conſequence to the Rebels, who furniſhed themſelves hereby with armour and victuals: and now the Earle renowned all Ireland over, and magnified in every place as the founder of their freedome, above all meaſure ſwelled with haughty arrogancy: and ſent into Mounſter, Ouny-Mac-Rory-Og-O-More, and Tirell (who although by his firſt originall he were of Engliſh blood, yet none ſo maliciouſly bent againſt the Engliſh name as hee) with 4000. preying rogues: againſt whom Sir Thomas Norris, Preſident of that Province, advanced forward with a ſtrong
C power as far as to Kilmalock: but before hee ſaw the enemy he diſperſed his forces, and retired backe to Corcke.

Which when the Rebels underſtood, having a great rabble of moſt lewd raſcals flocking from all parts unto them, they fell to waſte the country, to drive booties before them, to ranſack and burne where ever they went, the caſtles, houſes, and farme places of the Engliſh, and moſt cruelly in all places to kill them: James Fitz-Thomas, one of the family of the Earles of Deſmond, they ſet up as Earle of Deſmond; yet ſo, as he ſhould hold as tenant in fee of the O-Neal, or Earle of Tir-Oen. And thus after a month, when they had kindled this fire, and ſet all in a flame in Mounſter, they returned backe loaden with rich booties. The Earle by this time in his letters to the King
D of Spaine faileth not to reſound his owne victories with full mouth; and therewith beſeecheth him not to give eare and beleeve, if happily hee ſhould heare any Engliſhmen report that he deſired peace: for why? hee had hardened his heart againſt all conditions of peace were they never ſo indifferent, and would moſt firmely keep his faithfull promiſe made unto the ſaid King. Yet in this while wrought he meanes of interceſſion, by letters and meſſengers eft-ſoones ſent unto the Earle of Ormond, (but all colourably) about a ſubmiſſion, and his demands withall were moſt unreaſonable.

In this deſperate eſtate ſtood Ireland when Queene Elizabeth choſe Robert Earle of Eſſex (then glorious for the winning of Cadis in Spaine) in regard of his approved
E wiſedome, fortitude, and fidelity, Lievtenant and Governour generall of Ireland, to repaire the detriments and loſſes there ſuſtained, with moſt large and ample authority added in his Commiſſion, To make an end of the war; and that which by importunity, as it were, hee wreſted from her, To remit and pardon all crimes, even of high treaſon: which alwaies in the Patents of every Lord Deputy were thus in theſe very words before time reſtrained (All treaſons and treacheries touching our own perſon, our heires and ſucceſſours excepted.) And verily with good and provident forecaſt he obtained the authority to pardon crimes of this kinde, conſidering that Lawyers doe reſolve and ſet downe, That all Rebellions whatſoever touch the Princes perſon. There was committed to his charge as great an army as he required, roially furni-
F ſhed and provided, and ſuch as Ireland had never ſeen the like before: that is, ſixteene thouſand footmen, and thirteene hundred horſemen: which number was made up after twenty thouſand compleat. And he had ſpeciall charge given him, without regard of all other Rebells whatſoever, to bend the whole puiſſance and force of the war upon the Arch-Rebell the Earle of Tir-Oen, as the head of all the reſt, and with all ſpeed to preſſe hard upon him with garriſons planted at Lough-Foile, and Bala-

Robert Earle of Eſſex Lord Lievtenant.] 1599.

Shanon;

Shanon: a thing that himſelfe had alwaies thought moſt important, and in accuſatory A tearms charged and challenged the former Deputies for their neglect in that behalfe.

Thus he, honourably accompanied with the flower of Noble gallants, and well wiſhing acclamations of the common people, yet with a ſtrange thunder-clap in a cleare ſun-ſhine day, hee ſetteth forward from London, toward the end of March: and being ſore toſſed and rejected with an adverſe tempeſt, at length arrived in Ireland. Where having, after the manner, received the ſword, preſently contrary to his charge and commiſſion, by the advice of ſome of the Councell of State there (who too much regarded their owne particular) he, neglecting the Arch-rebell, advanced forward with all his power againſt petty Rebels in Mounſter; and having taken Cahir, B a caſtle of Thomas Butlers Baron of Cahir (into which, being environed about with the river Showr, certaine ſeditious perſons had betaken themſelves) and driven away a number of cattell, he made himſelfe terrible to all the country farre and wide, and diſperſed the Rebels every way into woods and forreſts. Yet in this while he received no ſmall foile and overthrow by the cowardiſe of ſome who ſerved under Sir Henry Harrington, whom he puniſhed very ſeverely by martiall diſcipline. Neither returned he before the latter end of July, with his ſouldiers wearied, ſickly, and their number more than a man would beleeve, diminiſhed.

When upon his returne he underſtood that the Queene was diſpleaſed at this expedition of his, ſo coſtly, and yet damageable, and that ſhe urged ſtill a journey into C
Ulſter againſt the Earle, and no other; in his miſſives unto her Majeſty he transferred all the fault from himſelfe upon the Councell of Ireland, unto whom for their manifold experience in the affaires of Ireland, he could not chooſe but condeſcend: promiſing and proteſting moſt faithfully, to ſet forward with all ſpeed into Ulſter. Scarce were theſe letters delivered, when he diſpatcheth others after them, wherein he ſignifieth, that upon neceſſity he muſt turne his journey aſide into Ophaly, neere to Dublin, againſt the O-Conors, and the O-Moils, who were there riſen and in armes; whom he quickly and fortunately vanquiſhed with light skirmiſhes.

Now returning, and having taken a review of his army, he found it ſo weakened and impaired, that by his letters ſubſcribed with the hands of the Councellers of Ireland, hee craved a new ſupply of a thouſand ſouldiers for his expedition into Ulſter, D which he promiſed to undertake ſpeedily with ſolemne proteſtations.

Being now fully reſolved to turne the whole warre upon Ulſter, hee commanded Sir Coniers Clifford Governour of Conaght, to goe with certain bands lightly appointed toward Bellike, to the end that the Earles forces might bee diſtracted one way, whiles he himſelfe ſet upon him another way. Clifford forthwith putting himſelfe on his journy with a power of 1500. commanded his ſouldiers out-toiled with travelling ſo farre, and having but ſmall ſtore of gun-powder, to paſſe over the mountaines of Curlew. And when they had gotten over the moſt part of them, the Rebels under the leading of O-Rorke aſſailed them on the ſudden. The Engliſh eaſily at the firſt E cauſed them to recule, and marched on forward in their journey: but when the enemies perceived once that they were at a default already for gun-powder, they charged them afreſh, and for that they were tired with ſo long a march, and not able to make reſiſtance, put them to flight, ſlew many of them, and among the reſt Clifford himſelfe, together with Sir Alexander Ratcliffe of Ordſall. Mean while, that ſupply which the Lord Lievtenant required was levied in England, and tranſported: ſome few daies after, hee gave the Queene to underſtand by other letters, that hee could for this yeere performe no more, than with a thouſand and three hundred footmen, and three hundred horſe goe to the frontiers of Ulſter. Thither came hee about the thirteenth day of September; before whom the Earle with his forces two daies to- F gether from the hills made a Bravado, and ſhewed himſelfe: and in the end ſending Hagan before, he requeſted the Lievtenant that they might parlie together: which hee refuſed to doe, anſwering, that if the Earle would talke with him, he ſhould finde him the next morrow in the head of his troopes. On which day, after a light skirmiſh made, a horſeman from out of the Earles troopes with a loud voice delivered as

as a meſſage, that the Earle was not willing to fight, but to parly with the L. Lievtenant: yet in no wiſe at that inſtant. The day following as the Lord Leivtenant was marching forward, Hagan meeteth him, who declareth that the Earle humbly deſired to have the Queenes mercy and peace, and beſought withall, that he might have but audience for a while: which if he would grant, then would he with all reverence and obſervance expect him at the Foord of the river hard by (Balla-Clinch they call it.)

This Foord is not far from Louth, the head towne of the County, and neere unto the Caſtle of Gerard Fleming. Thither ſent the L. Lievtenant before ſome of purpoſe to diſcover the place; who found the Earle at the ſaid Foord, and he told them, that
B although the river was riſen, yet might a man be eaſily heard from one ſide to the other. Hereupon the Lord Lievtenant having beſtowed a troupe of horſemen in the next hill there by came downe alone; the Earle riding his horſe into the water up to the belly, in dutifull and reverent ſort ſaluteth the Lievtenant being on the banke ſide, and ſo with many words paſſing to and fro betweene them, without any witneſſes by to heare them, they ſpent almoſt an houre. Then both of them retire unto their companies: and Con a baſe ſonne of the Earles following hard after the L. Leivtenant, beſought him in his fathers name that certaine principall perſons of his traine might bee admitted to a conference. The L. Lievtenant aſſented thereto, ſo they were not above ſix. Then forthwith the Earle taking with him his brother Cormoc, C Mac Gennys, Mac Guir, Ever Mac Cowley, Henry Ovington and O-Quin, ſheweth himſelfe at the Foord. Unto them the L. Lievtenant came down, accompanied with the Earle of Southampton, Sir George Bourchier, Sir Warrham St. Leger, Sir Henry Danvers, Sir Edward Wingfeld, and Sir William Conſtable Knights. The Earle ſaluteth 8 September them every one with great courteſie; and after ſome few words between them paſſed, 1599.
thought good that certaine Commiſſioners ſhould the next day following treat of peace: between whom it was agreed, that there ſhould be a truce from that very day for ſix weeks, and ſo forward from ſix weeks to ſix weeks unto the firſt of May: yet ſo, as it might be free for both ſides, after fourteen daies warning given aforehand, to begin warre afreſh. And if that any Confederate of the Earles would not yeeld his
D aſſent hereto, he left him unto the L. Lievtenant to proſecute him at his pleaſure.

Whiles theſe things were a doing, thoſe letters of the Lord Lievtenant which I ſpake of erewhile, were delivered to the Queen by Henrie Cuffe (a man very learned, but as unfortunate.) Which when ſhe had peruſed through, and underſtood thereby, that her Lievtenant, with ſo great an armie, in ſo long time, and with the expence of ſo much money, had effected juſt nothing, nor would doe ought that yeere; ſhee being highly offended thereat, writeth backe againe to himſelfe, and to the Councellers of Ireland in theſe termes: That his proceeding anſwered neither her direction, nor the worlds expectation; that ſhee could not but marvell much, why the Lievtenant by prolonging thus from time to time, and by finding meanes ſtill of fur-
E ther delay, had loſt thoſe excellent opportunities which he had of proſecuting war upon that Arch-rebell: conſidering that himſelfe, whiles he was in England, adviſed nothing elſe, but to proſecute the Earle himſelfe, and none but him; yea and in his letters otherwhiles ſeriouſly promiſed to doe the ſame. She expoſtulated, wherefore hee had made thoſe unprofitable journeyes (even againſt his owne judgement when it was found) into Mounſter and Ophaly, whereof he had not certified her, nor given ſo much as any notice before they were undertaken? which otherwiſe ſhee would expreſſely have countermanded. If his armie were now broken, weake, and much empaired, why undertooke hee not the action upon the enemie whiles it was entire, ſtrong, and complete? If the ſpring had not been a fit ſeaſon for to make war in F Ulſter, wherefore was the ſummer, wherefore was the autumne neglected? what, was there no time of the yeere meet for that war? Well, ſhee now foreſaw that her Kingdome of England muſt be impoveriſhed beyond all meaſure by ſuch expences, her honour blemiſhed among forrain Princes, and the Rebels encouraged by this unfortunate ſucceſſe: yea they that ſhall pen the Story of this time, will deliver unto poſterity, that ſhe for her part was at great charge to hazzard her Kingdome of Ireland, land, and that he had taken great paines, and had left nothing undone, to prepare for many purpoſes which periſhed without undertaking, if now at length he tooke not a courſe for the maine proſecution of the war. In tart termes therefore ſhe admoniſheth both him, and the Councellers of the Kingdome, to look more conſiderately to the good of the State, and not from thence forward to be tranſported contrary waies by indirect counſell; commanding them withall, to write into what caſe they had brought the Kingdome of Ireland; and carefully to foreſee, that all inconveniences from thenceforth might be diligently prevented.

28. Septemb. 1599. The Lord Lievtenant ſtartled, or rather galled with theſe letters, ſpeedeth in all haſt, and ſooner than any man would have thought, into England, accompanied with ſome men of quality, and well and early in a morning comming upon the Queene at unwares, while ſhe was moſt private and in her bed chamber, preſents himſelfe upon his knees unto her; who after ſhe had welcomed him with a ſhort ſpeech (and not with that countenance as heretofore) commanded him to withdraw himſelfe unto his owne chamber, and there to keepe. For the Queene was highly offended with him, both becauſe hee, contrary to her commandement, had left his charge ſo ſuddenly without her leave, and before he had ſetled the State; and alſo had treated with the Rebels to her diſhonour privately, and upon equall termes, with condition of toleration of Religion, and to her diſervice, when as the Rebels made profit of all ceſſations: and moreover, that hee had agreed upon ſuch a ceſſation as might every fourteenth night be broken, whereas it was in his power by the authoritie that he had, to make a finall end with the Rebels, and to pardon their treaſon and rebellion.

What befell him afterwards in England, and how it appeared by pregnant preſumptions, and ſome evidence, that he aimed at other matters than war againſt Rebels, whiles hee could not finde in his heart to remit private diſtaſtes for the publike good, and relied too much upon popularitie (which is alwaies momentany, and never fortunate) it is impertinent to this place, neither take I pleaſure ſo much as to remember the ſame.

The ſaid ceſſation was ſcarcely once or twice expired, when the Earle of Tir-Oen drew his forces together, and addreſſeth himſelfe againe to war. Unto whom there was ſent from the State Sir William Warren, to know of him wherefore he brake the Ceſſation that was made? Unto whom in the ſwelling pride of his heart he haughtily anſwered, That he had not broken the Ceſſation, conſidering he had given fourteene daies warning before, that he ment to renew the warre; and that he had juſt cauſe to war a freſh: for why? he underſtood that the Lord Lievtenant, in whom he had repoſed all his hope and whole eſtate, was committed in England: Neither would he have any thing to doe from thence forth with the Councellours of the Kingdome, that had dealt before time ſo craftily and deceitfully with him. And as for the Ceſſation, would he never ſo faine, he could not revoke it, becauſe he had already entred another courſe, and appointed O-Donel to goe into Conaught, and other of his confederates into other parts.

In this meane ſpace, there ran among the Rebells rumours very rife (and the Earle of Tir-Oen queſtionleſſe was the authour) that there ſhould be within a while the greateſt and ſtrangeſt alteration that ever was in England; and lewd perſons began daily to encreaſe both in number and in courage. For they that were of the Iriſhry, aſpired now to their ancient freedome and Nobility; contrariwiſe good and honeſt men of the Engliſh blood were much dejected and diſcouraged, ſeeing ſo great expences of the Prince came to nothing: who alſo complained one unto another, that they had been of late excluded as meere ſtrangers from bearing offices in the common-Weale. But the Earle, all in a glorious jollity giveth it out every where, and that with open mouth, That he would recover the liberty both of Religion and of his Country; he receiveth in every place buſie and tumultuous perſons into his protection, he ſends them ſuccour and aide, ſtrengthneth and comforteth the diſtruſtfull, ſtoutly ſtreineth and ſetteth to his helping hand to ſubvert the Engliſh government in Ireland, being drawne on and fed with hope which the King of Spaine, by ſending

A ding now and then munition, and ſome money made ſhew of, and the Pope by promiſes and indulgences maintained, as having ſent unto him before the plume of a Phœnix, haply becauſe Pope Urban the third had ſent in times paſt a little Coronet, platted with peacocks feathers, unto John, King Henries the ſecond his ſonne, when he was inveſted Lord of Ireland.

And now triumphantly glorying of his victories, to the end that he might make a goodly ſhew of his greatneſſe in every place, and by his perſonall preſence ſet that fire to burne out light, which in his abſence hee had kindled in Mounſter; under a faire and religious pretence of viſiting a little peece of wood of Chriſts Croſſe (which is
B thought to be kept in the Monaſtery of the Holy Croſſe in Tipperary) in mid-winter thither hee goes on Pilgrimage, and ſent out into the grounds of true and faithfull ſubjects a number of preying robbers, under the conduct of Mac-Guir: he by chance hapned upon Sir Warrham Saint Leger, who runne him through with his lance, and was withall at the ſame inſtant himſelfe runne through by him. Whoſe funeralls when the Earle had performed, he haſteneth home ſooner than all men looked for, as having heard, that the Earle of Ormond, appointed Generall of the Army, was raiſing of a power from all parts, and that Sir Charles Blunt Baron Montjoy, appointed the Lord Deputy, was comming; unto whom the Queene before time had purpoſed in her minde this government: but Robert Earle of Eſſex (who for to plea-
C ſure military men, and to deſerve the better of them, into whoſe love he ſtudiouſly inſinuated himſelfe, ſought, though covertly, to compaſſe the ſame himſelfe) wholly oppoſed againſt him, as if he, the ſaid Lord Montjoy, had ſeene no ſervice, nor beene experienced in the warres, more than in the Netherlands, had no followers and dependants, nor much aforehand with the world, and overmuch bookiſh. He arriveth in Ireland in the moneth of February, without any great noiſe and ſtirre, accompanied with a ſmall traine, and ſo entred upon the Government. Now hee found the ſtate of Ireland very diſtreſſed, or rather deſperately ſick, and paſt all hope of recovery, yea at the point, as it were, to give up the ghoſt: for every good and honeſt meaning minde was diſmaied to ſee ſuch a confluence of calamities, without all
D hope of remedy, or any allevation at all: but the worſt ſort ſeeing all to goe well on their ſide, and proſper ſtill to their deſire, rejoiced and applauded one the other; and the Earle himſelfe without any reſiſtance had paſſed through the whole length of the Iland in triumphant manner, even from the utmoſt part of Ulſter, into Mounſter. The Rebells moreover, to terrifie the Deputy now at his firſt comming, ſtrucke up an Al'arme in the very ſuburbs of Dublin. But he, full of good courage, deſired nothing more than to ſet upon the Earle himſelfe, who, as hee had intelligence given him, was to returne out of Mounſter. Muſtering up therefore in all haſte ſuch a power as hee could (for the companies of choice ſouldiers were in Mounſter already with the Earle of Ormond) he haſtened to ſtop the Earles paſſage in Fereal, and there
E to give him battell. But the Earle by celerity and quicke ſpeed prevented him, being privily enformed of the Deputies deſignes: for certaine there were even of the Queenes Councell there, who alwaies highly favoured and tendered his proceedings.

Charles Blunt Lord Deputy. 1600.

The Deputy being returned to Dublin, was wholly buſied in muſtering of the old ſouldiers, that ſhould be ſent by ſhipping to Logh-Foile and Bala-ſhanon neere unto the mouth of Logh-Earn, that by placing garriſons there, they might make ſallies upon the Earle both on backe and ſides; as alſo about ſending aide unto the garriſon ſouldiers in Leaſe and Ophaly, a matter by reaſon of ſo many enemies round about, of great danger and difficulty.

F In the beginning of May, the Deputy put himſelfe on his march toward Ulſter, with this purpoſe, to divert the Earle another way, whiles Sir Henry Docwra at Logh-foile, and Sir Matthew Morgan at Bala ſhanon planted the garriſons: which they with ſmall adoe effected; for Sir Henry Docwra tooke Logh-foile, and Sir John Bolle who accompanied him, tooke Don-a-long and Lhiffer caſtles, ſuppreſſing the rebells with divers overthrowes.

Whiles

Whiles the Earle was every day kept occupied by the Deputy with light skirmiſhes, wherein he evermore had ſo bad ſucceſſe, that hee perceived now the fortune of warre was turned, and himſelfe driven back into his owne corners. The Lord Deputy being returned in Mid-June, when as the garriſons aforeſaid were placed accordingly, required out of England certaine companies of ſouldiers and victuals, for to beſtow and plant a garriſon alſo in theſe parts at Armagh, thereby to bring the Rebels within a ſtraighter compaſſe.

Meane while hee tooke a journey into Leaſe, which was the place of refuge and receipt of all the Rebels in Leinſter: where he ſlew Ony-Mac-Rory-Og, the chiefe of the O-Mores family, a bloody, bold, and moſt deſperate young man; who of late had made ſo foule a ſtirre in Mounſter; him I ſay he ſlew, with other moſt wicked and miſchievous Rebells: and after he had layed their fields waſte, hee chaſed them into woods and forreſts, ſo as that in thoſe parts they were ſcarcely ever after ſeene. When as now new ſuccours were come out of England, although he wanted both corne and money, the Equinoxe was paſt, and winter weather began already in that climate, yet marched hee forward to the very entrance of Moyery, three miles beyond Dondalk. This paſſage is naturally the moſt comberſome of all others well neere in Ireland, which the Rebells had fortified and blocked up with palliſadoes and fences, with ſtakes pitched into the ground, with hurdles joyned together, and ſtones in the midſt, and turfes of earth, betwixt the hills, woods, and bogges quite overthwart on both ſides, with great skill and greater induſtry, yea and manned the place with a number of ſouldiers. Beſides theſe difficulties in his way, the weather alſo was paſſing rigorous, by reaſon of much raine that fell continually for certaine daies together, whereby the rivers ſwelling high and overflowing their banks, were altogether unpaſſable.

But when the waters were fallen, the Engliſh courageouſly brake through thoſe palliſadoes or fenſes aforeſaid, and having beaten backe their enemies, and overcome all difficulties, the Lord Deputy placed a garriſon eight miles from Armagh (for at Armagh the Rebells had eaten up and conſumed all) which in memory of Sir John Norris, under whom he had his firſt rudiments in the profeſſion of Armes, he commanded to be called Mount-Norris; over which he made Captaine E. Blany, a ſtout and valiant Gentleman, who afterwards in this part, like as Sir Henry Docwra in the other, troubled the Rebells ſore, and withall kept them forcibly in awe. In his returne (that I may paſſe over with ſilence the skuffling skirmiſhes which happened every day) the Rebells in the paſſe neere unto Carlingford, where they had ſtopped up the way, in a memorable overthrow were diſcomfited, and put to fearefull flight.

Some few daies after, the Lord Deputy, becauſe hee would loſe no time, entred in the very middeſt of winter the Glynnes, that is, the vallies in Leinſter, a ſecure receptacle of Rebells; where having waſted the countrey, he brought Donell Spanioh, Phelim Mac-Feogh, and that tumultuous and pernicious Sept of the O Tools unto ſubmiſſion, and tooke hoſtages of them. Afterward hee went as farre as Fereall, and drave Tirell, the moſt approved warriour of all the Rebells, out of his own holds, or as they call it, Faſtneſſes (a place full of bogges, and beſet thicke with buſhes) into Ulſter. Now by this time by fetching many a compaſſe was he come victorious in every place, as farre as to the frontier of Ulſter: which he entred, and firſt having ſlaine the two ſonnes of Ever Mac Cowley, he laied the territory of Fernes waſt, and ſent out Sir Richard Moriſon to ſpoile the Fues. In Breany he placed a garriſon, by the conduct of Sir Oliver Lambard: and turning downe to Tredagh, hee received into his protection and mercy ſuch of the principall Rebels as ſubmitted themſelves; namely, Turlogh Mac-Henry, a great man and Potentate in Fues, Ever Mac Cowly, O-Hanlan, who glorieth in this, that by inheritance hee is Standard-bearer to the Kings of Ulſter, and many of the Mac-Mahons, and O-Realies, who delivered up for hoſtages their deareſt friends and kinsfolke. The ſpring now approaching, before all the forces were aſſembled and come together, the Lord Deputy marcheth

A to Moyery, where by cutting down the woods, he made the way paſſable, and there erected a fort: out of Lecall he expelled the Mac-Geniſſes, who uſurped lands there, and reduced all the Rebels fortreſſes and holds about Armagh to his obedience: Armagh alſo he fortified with a garriſon. And ſo farre went he forward, that hee removed the Earle from Black-water (who had very artificially encamped himſelfe there) and purpoſed ſomewhat lower to ſet up a fort.

About which time many ſignified unto him by letters for certainty, that which he had heard before bruited by a common rumour ſtill more and more encreaſed, namely, that the Sparniards were arrived in Mounſter. So that now he was of neceſſity B to deſiſt and give over this proſecution in Ulſter, and Ireland was to be defended, not ſo much from inward rebellion, as from forraine enemies. And yet, leſt what he had already recovered ſhould be loſt againe, after he had ſtrengthened the garriſons, he ſpeedily poſteth into Mounſter, journeying continually with one or two companies of horſe, commanding the Captaines of the footmen to follow hard after.

For whiles he was earneſtly buſied about the warre in Ulſter, the Earle, and his aſſociates the Rebels of Mounſters by their Agents, a certaine Spaniard elect Archbiſhop of Dublin by the Pope, the Biſhop of Clonfort, the Biſhop of Killaloe, and Archer a Jeſuite, had obtained at length, with praying, intreating, and earneſt beſeeching at the King of Spaines hand, that ſuccour ſhould bee ſent into Mounſter to the C Rebels, under the conduct of Don John D' Aquila, upon aſſured hope conceived, that all Mounſter would ſhortly revolt, and the titular Earle of Deſmond, and Florens Mac-Carty joyne great aides unto them. But Sir George Carew the Lord Preſident of Mounſter, had providently before intercepted them, and ſent them over into England.

Thus D' Aquila arrived at Kinſale in Mounſter with two thouſand Spaniards, old ſouldiers, and certaine Iriſh fugitives, the laſt day of October: and ſtraightwaies having publiſhed a writing, wherein hee glorioufly ſtileth himſelfe with this title, [MASTER Generall and Captaine of the Catholick King in the warre of God, for holding and keeping the Faith in Ireland] endevoureth to make the world beleeve, That D Queene Elizabeth by the definitive ſentences of the Popes was deprived of her kingdomes, and her ſubjects abſolved and freed from their oath of allegeance, and that hee and his men were come to deliver them out of the devils clawes, and the Engliſh tyrannie. And verily with this goodly pretence, he drew a number of lewd and wicked perſons to band and ſide with him.

The Lord Deputie, having gathered together all the Companies of ſouldiers that he could, prepareth himſelfe to the ſiege: and Sir Richard Leviſon the Vice-Admirall, ſent out of England with one or two of the Queenes ſhips to impeach all acceſſe, fore-cloſeth the haven. The Engliſh, when they had now encamped themſelves, began from land and ſea to thunder with their ordnance upon the E towne, and more ſtraightly to beleaguer it round about: which ſiege notwithſtanding was by and by not ſo forcibly urged; for that, on the one ſide, Leviſon with the ſea ſouldiers was ſent before againſt two thouſand Spaniards newly landed, at Bere-haven, Baltimor, and Caſtle Haven, of whoſe ſhips hee ſunke five: on the other ſide the Preſident of Mounſter, at the ſame time was diſpatched with certaine troupes to get the ſtart of O-Donell, who was now approaching, that hee ſhould not joyne with that new ſupplie of the Spaniards. But hee, when as now all the Country was over frozen, had by ſpeedie journeyes in the night, through blind by-waies, gotten to thoſe Spaniards newly arrived, and was not ſo much as once ſeene.

F Some few daies after, the Earle of Tir-Oen alſo himſelfe came with O-Rork, Raimund Burk, Mac-Mahon, Randall Mac-Surley, Tirell, the Baron of Lixnaw, and the moſt ſelect and choice of all the Rebels, unto whom when Alphonſo O Campo, the leader of the new-come Spaniards, had joyned his forces, they muſtered themſelves ſixe thouſand footmen, and five hundred horſe ſtrong, in a confident hope of victory, becauſe they were more in number, freſh and better furniſhed with all kinde of meanes : whereas contrariwiſe the Engliſh were out-wearied with the inconveniences that follow a winter-ſiege, excluded from victuals ; and their horſes beſides, with travell and hunger together, altogether unſerviceable. A

In theſe difficulties and diſtreſſes, the Deputie conſulteth with the Captaines what was to be done : Some thought the beſt way was to break up the ſiege, to retire into Corke, and not to hazzard the whole Realme upon the fortune of one battell. Contrariwiſe, the Deputy adviſeth and perſwadeth to perſiſt, and not to degenerate from the approved vertue of their anceſtors : adding, that valiant men could not have a more wiſhed opportunity preſented unto them, than that which was now fallen into their laps; namely, either to ſpend their lives with glory, or to vanquiſh their enemies with honour. He urgeth therefore and plieth the ſiege with all the power he had, with raiſing platformes, and continuall battering he plaied upon the towne, and withall, fortifieth his Campe with new trenches. B

Upon the one and twentieth day of December, the Earle of Tir-Oen ſheweth himſelfe with his horſe upon an hill about a mile from the campe : and there encamping himſelfe, maketh a bravado likewiſe the next day in the ſame place : the night following, both the Spaniards ſallied forth of the towne, and the Iriſh alſo aſſayed to ſteale into the towne, but both were forced to retire. On the three and twentieth day, the Engliſhmen diſcharge their greater peeces upon the towne, as if they had not cared for the Earle now ſo neere at hand, and the very ſame day were the letters of D' Aquila unto the Earle intercepted : wherein he importuned Tir-Oen, that the Spaniards newly arrived might bee put into the towne, and that they might aſſaile the campe on both ſides. When the Moone was ready to riſe over the horizon, the Deputy commanded Sir Henry Poer to leade forth into the field eight enſignes of old ſouldiers, and to make a ſtand on the Weſt ſide of the campe. Sir Henry Greame, who that night had the charge of the horſemen that watched, very earely in the morning advertiſed the Deputy, that the enemies for certaine would advance forward, for that a great number of their matches were lighted. Hereupon the al'arme was given throughout the campe, and companies placed whereſoever there was any way to the towne. C D

The Lord Deputy himſelfe, with the Preſident of Mounſter, and Sir Richard Wingfeld Marſhall, marched toward the watch, and withall by the adviſe of Sir Olivar Lambart, chooſeth out a plot, wherein he might give battell to the enemies : Thither were brought the Enſignes and Regiments of Sir Henry Folliot, and Sir Olivar Saint John, with ſixe hundred ſea ſouldiers under the conduct of Sir Richard Leviſon. But the Earle of Tir-Oen, who reſolved (as afterwards it was knowne) to have brought into Kinſale by darke night the new ſupplie of Spaniards, and eight hundred Iriſhmen, when hee ſaw now the day to breake, and beheld withall the Marſhall and Sir Henrie Danvers with the power of horſemen, and Poer with the Companies of old ſouldiers at the foot of the hill, being diſappointed of his hope, ſtood ſtill, and ſoone after by his bag-pipers ſounded the retreat. No ſooner was the Deputy certified of this retreat of his, ſo confuſed and diſordered, but hee commanded the purſuit, and himſelfe advanced before the vantgard, to marke the manner of their retreat, and according to the preſent occaſion to reſolve what to doe : but ſo thicke a miſt with a ſtorme beſide fell upon the earth, that for a time they could not ſee before them. E

Within a while after, the weather cleering up againe, hee obſerved that they retired haſtily for feare in three great battalions, and with the horſemen placed behind at their backes : hee fully determined therefore to charge upon them, having ſent backe the Preſident of Mounſter with three companies of horſemen into the campe, to reſtraine the Spaniards, if haply out of the towne they ſhould ſallie and breake out upon them. And the Lord Deputie himſelfe followed after the Rebels, with ſuch ſpeed in their retreat, that hee forced them to ſtand in the brinke of a bogge, whereunto there was no acceſſe but at a foord : but when thoſe horſemen that kept the foord were by the valour of the Marſhall F

A and the Earle of Clan-Ricard diſcomfited, and put to rout the other, and courageouſly gave the onſet upon the maine troupes of the enemies horſmen; which charge when Sir William Godolphin, who had the leading of the Deputies horſe, Sir Henry Danvers, Minſhaw, Taff, Fleming, and Sir John Barkly Sergeant Major of the Camp, who joyned with them, redoubled with ſo great alacrity, that the Rebels preſently brake, and fell in diſorder. But it was not thought good to follow the chaſe, but gathering their forces and power together, they charged upon the maine battell now in feare and wavering; which they alſo brake. Tirell with his company and the Spaniards all this while kept their ſtanding, and made their ground good: againſt whom the B Deputy putteth forward his rereward; and that he might accompliſh not onely the part of a leader in commanding, but alſo of a ſouldier in fighting, with three companies of Oliver S. Johns, whereof Captaine Roe had the conduct, chargeth violently upon them, and ſo brake their arraies, that in great diſorder and confuſion they reculed backe and betooke themſelves to the Iriſh, by whom they were preſently left unto the edge of the ſword, and routed by the troupe of the Duputies horſemen, whereof Sir William Godolphin had the leading. Then Ter-Oen, O-Donel and the reſt on all ſides put to flight, flung away their weapons, and made what ſhift they could to ſave themſelves. Alphonſo O Campo was taken priſoner with three other Captaines of the Spaniards, and ſix enſigne bearers; ſlaine there were one thouſand and two hun-
C dred, nine enſignes taken, whereof ſix were Spaniſh. Of the Engliſh part ſcarce two men loſt their lives, many were wounded, and among them Sir Henry Danvers, Sir William Godolphin, and Croſs: ſo little coſt this ſo great a victory. The Lord Deputy after he had founded the retreat, and rendred thankes unto almighty God for this victory among the dead bodies of the enemies lying thicke in heapes, gave the order of Knight-hood to the Earle of Clan-Ricard for his right valiant ſervice in this battell: and thus with lucky acclamations returned victor into his Campe, which he found ſafe and ſound from all dangers. For the Spaniards within the towne, ſeeing all places every way made ſure with guardes, and having experience before time, that all ſallies were to their loſſe, kept themſelves at home in carefull expectation of D the event.

A noble victory this was, and in many regards important, whereby Ireland moſt miſerably diſtreſſed and ready to revolt, was retained, the Spaniards ejected, the Arch-rebell Tir-Oen repulſed into his ſtarting holes in Ulſter, O Donell driven into Spaine, the reſt of the rebellious rable ſcattered into ſundry parts, the Princes regall authority by daunting the lawleſſe inſolency recovered, and within a while after a ſecure peace throughout the Iland firmely eſtabliſhed.

The morrow after, the Lord Deputy commanded Captaine Bodley the Trench-maſter, who both in the fortifications and alſo in the battell had manfully borne himſelfe, to finiſh the Mount begun, and to raiſe bankes and rampires neerer unto the E enemy: about which when there had beene ſix dayes ſpent, D' Aquila in his letters ſent by his Drum Major to the Deputy, craved that ſome Gentleman of credit might be ſent into the towne, with whom he might parly.

For this purpoſe was Sir William Godolphin choſen: Unto whom D' Aquila ſignifieth, that he had found the Lord Deputy, although he were his moſt eager enemy, yet an honourable perſon, the Iriſh of no valour, rude and uncivill, yea and (that which he ſore feared) perfidious and falſe: That he was ſent from the King of Spaine his Maſter, to aide two Earles, and now he doubted whether there were any ſuch in Rerum Natura, conſidering that one tempeſtuous puffe of warre had blown the one of them into Spaine, the other into the North, ſo as they were no more to be ſeene.
F Willing therefore he was to treat about a peace, that might be good for Engliſh, and not hurtfull to Spaniards: albeit he wanted nothing requiſite to the holding out of a ſiege, and expected every day out of Spaine freſh ſupplies to finde the Engliſh worke and trouble enough. To bee briefe, being as they were on both ſides diſtreſſed, and weary of ſiege, they grew to this agreement upon the ſecond day of January, That the Spaniards ſhould yeeld up Kinſale, the Forts, and Caſtle at Baltimore, Berehaven, and Caſtle Haven, unto the Lord Deputy, and ſo depart with life, with goods, and A their Banners diſplaied; that the Engliſhmen ſhould allow them ſhipping, paying the full price therefore, wherein they might at two ſeverall paſſages ſaile over into Spaine: Alſo if they hapned in their returne homeward to arrive at any Port in England, that they might be kindly entertained: and in the meane time whiles they remained in Ireland waiting for windes, have all neceſſaries for ſuſtenance miniſtred unto them, for their ready mony.

Theſe things thus concluded, the Spaniards after certaine daies fitted with a good gale of winde ſet ſaile from the coaſt of Ireland with diſhonour, as having their companies much impaired, and weake. Meane while the Earle of Tir-Oen in feare- B full flight got him away, making as great journeyes as poſſibly he could, through unknown by-waies, and recovered his lurking holes in Ulſter, after he had loſt moſt of his men, whom the rivers riſen and running violently by reaſon of Winter flouds had ſwallowed up. And afterwards hee could not take his reſt without care, no not ſo much as breath without feare; whiles carrying an evill and burthened conſcience he dreaded the due reward of his deſerts, and diſtruſted every one; inſomuch as hee ſought from day to day new blind corners, and the ſame ſtraightwaies he abandoned.
The Deputy to refreſh his wearied ſouldiers, beſtoweth them abroad in garriſons, and after he had ſetled the State in Mounſter, returneth to Dublin. And when the winter ſeaſon was paſt, hee by a gentle and eaſie march (thereby to ſpread a greater C terrour all abroad) returneth into Ulſter with an army well appointed, that he might with Forts and garriſons planted round about, belay the Rebels on every ſide, as it were, within net and toile. When he was come as far as to Black-water, hee tranſ-ported his army upon floats; and having found a Foord unknowne before, beneath the old Fort, he erected a Fort upon the very banke, which after his owne Chriſtian name he called Charle-mont. At which time the Earle of Tir-Oen being affrighted, ſet fire on his owne houſe at Dunganon. Then marcheth the Deputy forward from thence to Dunganon: and after hee had encamped himſelfe, ſo ſoone as Sir Henry Docwra was come unto him from Legh-foile with his company, he ſent out his ſouldiers every way. Then might you have ſeene the corn-fields ſpoiled, the villages on D every ſide and houſes, ſo many as they could deſcry, ſet on fire and burned, and booties out of all parts harried. The Forts in Legh-Crew, Legh-Reogh, and Mogher Le- cowe (where Sir John Barkley, a moſt valiant martiall man was ſhot through with a bullet) were yeelded up, hee planted a garriſon at Legh-Eaugh, or Legh-Sidney, which after the title of his owne honour he named Mont-joy, and gave unto Sir Ar- thur Chicheſter (who by the demerit of his vertue is now Lord Deputy of Ireland) the charge and command thereof; another likewiſe at Monaghan, which hee committed unto Sir Chriſtopher St. Laurence: who being leaders of great experience, and greater courage, what with often ſallies, and what with traverſe journies made too and fro, ſo courſed and croſſed the rebels, that they ſeeing themſelves environed with E garriſons planted round about them, and every day hemmed in and penned in more ſtreightly, that now like wilde beaſts of a raſcall kinde they muſt ſeeke holes and lurk among the thickets, in forreſts and woods; moſt of them changed their copie, and as their fortune, ſo their fidelity altered, and every one of them began ſecretly to ſub-mit themſelves to the Deputy, ſtriving a vie who ſhould be firſt; muttering and complaining cloſely of Tir-Oen, that he had engaged the ruine of the whole nation for his own private diſcontentments; that this war was only neceſſary to him, but moſt pernicious to them: neither was the Earle ignorant that both the force and fidelity alſo of his people and followers was now ſore ſhaken: he determined therefore to prevent the worſt, as being weary of miſery and calamity, and yet in ſome hope alſo of life, F which ſometimes overmatch the ſtouteſt. By moſt ſubmiſſive letters therefore ſent now and then to the Queen, wherein with earneſt praiers and teares he beſought pardon for his fault, caſting himſelfe downe in humble and lowly wiſe; and ſhe obſerved in him ſuch tokens of true repentance, that (as ſhe was a moſt milde and mercifull Prince) ſhee gave authority unto the L. Deputy to take him to mercy and favour, in

caſe

A caſe he earneſtly craved it. And crave it he did (when hee had heard ſo much from thoſe that affected and loved him) continually by the moſt earneſt mediation of Arth Mac Baron his brother, and others: and being often rejected, at length in the moneth of February, after he had promiſed abſolutely, and without any condition, to ſubmit his life and all that he had unto the Queene, the Deputy, who had ſome intelligence out of the Court in England from his inward friends, that the Queene, now farre ſtept in yeeres, was dangerouſly ſicke, condeſcended that the Earle might repaire unto Melliſont: and thither forthwith came he out of his lurking holes in all ſpeed, accompanied with one or two, and no more. Being admitted into the chamber of B preſence (where the L. Deputy with a number of martiall men about him was ſet in a chaire of eſtate, in the very entry of the place) he in poore and foule array, with a dejected countenance, bewraying his forlorne eſtate, falleth downe upon his knees, and when hee had ſo kneeled a while, the Lord Deputy ſignified unto him that hee ſhould approach neerer: whereupon he roſe up, and after he had ſtepped in lowly maner ſome few paces forward, he kneeled downe againe, and caſt himſelfe proſtrate like a moſt humble ſuppliant. He acknowledgeth his ſinne to God, and fault unto his moſt gracious Prince and ſoveraigne Lady Queene Elizabeth, in whoſe royall clemency and mercy lay the onely hope that he had now remaining, to whoſe pleaſure he ſubmitteth wholly and abſolutely his life and whole eſtate. He moſt demiſely beſeecheth, that whoſe boun- C tifull favour in times paſt, and mighty power now of late he had felt and found, he might now have experience of her mercifull lenity, and that he might be for ever the example of her Princely clemency. For neither was his age as yet ſo unſerviceable, nor his body ſo much diſabled, ne yet his courage ſo daunted, but that by his valiant and faithfull ſervice in her behalf, he could expiate and make ſatisfaction for this moſt diſloiall rebellion. And yet, to extenuate his crime, he began to ſay, that through the malicious envy of ſome, he had bin very hardly and unreaſonably dealt with. As he was enforcing this point further, the Deputy interrupted him, and cut off his ſpeech; and after a few words, delivered with great authority (which in a martiall man doth ſtand in ſtead of eloquence) to this effect, that there was no excuſe to be made for ſo grievous and hainous a crime, with D few other words, he commanded him to withdraw himſelfe: and the next day carried him away with him toward Dublin, purpoſing to bring him from thence into England before Queene Eliſabeth, that ſhee might determine at her pleaſure what to doe with him. But in this meane time, that moſt excellent Princeſſe, a little after that ſhe had intelligence (that nothing might be wanting to the accompliſhment of her glory) how this rebellion was extinguiſhed, which had not a little diſquieted her, departed godly and peaceably out of this tranſitory life into the eternall.

Thus the warre of Ireland, or the rebellion rather of the Earle of Tir-Oen, begun upon private grudges and quarrels intermedled with ambition, cheriſhed at firſt by contempt, and ſparing of charges out of England, ſpred over all Ireland (under E the colourable pretence of reſtoring libertie and Romiſh Religion) continued by untoward emulation of the Engliſh, and covetouſneſſe of the old ſouldiers, protracted by the ſubtill wiles and fained ſubmiſſions of the Earle, by the moſt cumbrous and diſadvantageous difficulty of the countrey, and by a deſperate kinde of people, ſaving themſelves more by good footmanſhip than their valour, confirmed through the light credulity of ſome, and the ſecret favour of others that were in place of authority, heartned with one or two fortunate encounters, fed and fomented with Spaniſh money and Spaniſh ſupplies, in the eighth yeere after it firſt brake out, under the happy direction of Queen Eliſabeth of ſacred memorie, and the fortunate conduct of the Lord Deputy Sir Charles Blunt Baron of Mont-joy (whom afterwards in regard F hereof King James created Earle of Devonſhire) was moſt happily diſpatched, and firme peace, as we hope, for ever eſtabliſhed.

THE MANERS OF THE IRISHRY, BOTH OF OLD AND OF LATER TIMES.

The manners of the Irishry, or wild Irish.

THe place requireth now, that I should adde somewhat of the manners of this people: and that verily will I doe, as touching their ancient behaviour, out of ancient Historiographers: and concerning the latter, out of a moderne writer both learned and diligent, who hath set downe these matters most exactly.

As concerning the Irish of ancient times, when as they were, as all other nations beside in this tract, barbarous and savage, thus much have old authors recorded.

Strabo in his fourth booke of Ireland, saith, I can deliver nothing for certaine, but that the inhabitants thereof are more rude than the Britans, as who both feed upon mans flesh, and also devoure exceeding much meat; yea and they thinke it a point of honesty to eat the bodies of their dead parents, and wantonly to have company not onely with other mens wives, but even with their owne mothers and sisters. Which things verily we relate so, as having no witnesses hereof that be of sufficient credit. Certes the report goes, that the manner of the Scythians is to eat mans flesh; and it is recorded of the Gaules, Spaniards, and many more besides, that by occasion of urgent necessity and extremities of siege, that they have done the same.

πολυφάγοι, but in the Epitome πανφάγοι, that is, feeding upon herbes and weeds.

Pomponius Mela in his third book writeth thus: The inhabitants are uncivill, ignorant of all vertues, and utterly voide of religion. – [illegible]

Solinus in the 24. chapter, When they have atchieved any victory, the blood of those that are slaine they first drinke, and then besmeare their faces with it. Right and wrong is all one with them. A woman lying in childbed, if she have at any time brought forth a man childe, laieth the first meat she gives it upon her husbands sword, and with the very point thereof putteth it softly into the infants mouth, in hansell as it were of the nourishment it shall have hereafter; and with certaine heathenish vowes wisheth, That it may dye no otherwise than in warre and by the sword. They that endevour to be more handsome and civill than the rest, make their sword handles gay with the teeth of great Whales, and such sea monsters, for they be as white as Ivory. And why? the men take a principall pride and glory in the keeping of their weapons faire and bright.

But these fashions savour of greater antiquity. Their conditions of the middle time Giraldus Cambrensis hath here and there treated of, and out of him others. But now for their later demeanour, take them here with you out of that foresaid Moderne writer, a studious and painefull man, and that in his owne words: who, as I collect, was named I. Good, brought up in Oxford, by profession and calling a Priest, and who about the yeere of our Lord 1566. taught the Schoole at Limiricke. But first I will briefely premise, according to my promise made even now, somewhat as touching the manner of the jurisdiction that is used among the meere Irish, out of others.

O prefixed to the names of the Noblest men in Ireland, by way of excellency.

Their great men and Potentates, whose names have the fourth vowell (O) put before them, as a mark of preheminence & excellency, as O-Neal, O-Rork, O-Donel, &c. and many of the rest, to whose name (Mac) is prefixed, have peculiar rights and priviledges of their owne, whereby they domineere and Lord it most proudly, and what with tributes, exactions, paiments, and impositions upon their subjects, for their souldiers, Galloglasses, Kernes, and horsemen, whom they are to finde and maintaine, they so prey upon their goods and estates, and oppresse them at their owne pleasure, that the condition of all those which live under them is most miserable: and so often as there be any civill wars risen among them, they sucke out of them their very marrow and heart blood.

Brehons.

These Nobles or Potentates aforesaid have their Lawyers belonging unto them, whom they terme Brehons, like as the Gothes named theirs Bellagines: who being

A ing a ſort of moſt unlearned men, upon certaine ſet daies, on the top of ſome exceeding high hill, ſit to miniſter juſtice unto the neighbour inhabitants, betweene ſuch as are at variance and goe to law. Before which Judges, the Plaintiffes with a pitifull voice make moane, and complaine of the wrongs offered unto them: the defendants ſtand firmely upon their deniall. If any bee convict evidently of theft, they give ſentence either to make reſtitution of the ſame, or recompence by a fine impoſed upon them. Theſe Potentates alſo have their Hiſtorians about them, who write downe their acts and deeds; they have their Phyſitians alſo, and Rimers, whom they call Bards; yea and their Harpers, who have every one of them their ſeverall livelods and
B lands ſet out for them: and of theſe, there be in each territorie, ſeverall profeſſours and thoſe liable to ſome certaine and ſeverall families: that is to ſay, the Brehons bee of one ſtocke and name, the Hiſtorians of another, and ſo of the reſt, who inſtruct their owne children or kinſmen every one in their owne art, and have ſome of them alwaies to be their ſucceſſors. Now, among theſe great Lords and Nobles, there is no hereditarie right of ſucceſſion obſerved, but whoſoever of any principall houſe is of greater puiſſance in regard of ſtrength, retinewes of followers, and boldneſſe, he by a certaine faction or election of the people in that province, uſurpeth the Lordſhip and ſoveraigntie over the reſt, quite excluding the ſonnes, nephewes, and next in blood of the party deceaſed: and ſo with certaine complements of barbarous cere-
C monies is enthronized in the open aire, upon a little hill for that purpoſe appointed, upon a Stone for a chaire of eſtate. At which time alſo, by a certaine law called Taniſtry, there is ſometime nominated and declared a ſucceſſour, who is termed Taniſt, I wote not whether by a word borrowed from the Danes, among whom, as among the Northren inhabitants of Britaine, Thane was a long time uſed for a noble man, and the Kings eſpeciall officer.

Profeſſions hereditary.

Taniſtry.

But whereas I have incidently hapned of better obſervations concerning this Brehon law and Taniſtry, diligently collected by Sir John Davis, his Majeſties Atturney generall in Ireland, I hope I may, with his good leave, impart ſome of them to publicke knowledge in his owne words.

D The ſeverall countries or territories poſſeſſed by the Iriſhrie were in number 60. » and upwards, and ſome being greater and ſome leſſe, did in extent and ſcope of land » contain two parts of the Kingdome at leaſt: in every one of theſe countries there was » a chiefe Lord or Captaine, and under him a Taniſt, which was his ſucceſſor apparent: » both theſe were elected of the country, who commonly made choice of ſuch as were » moſt active, and had moſt ſwordmen and followers depending upon him. The chiefe » Lord had certaine lands in Demeſne, which were called his Loghtii, or menſall lands » in Demeſne, where he placed his principall officers, namely, his Brehon, his Marſhall, » his Cupbearer, his Phyſitian, his Surgeon, his Chronicler, his Rimer, and others: » which offices and profeſſions were hereditarie and peculiar to certaine ſepts and fa-
E milies. »

Hee had alſo ſmall rents of money, and Cowes, and cuſtomarie duties of Oate-» meale, Butter, and the like, out of the lands in the Countrie, except the lands of the » Church, and ſuch of his kinſmen and followers to whom he granted a ſpeciall diſ-» charge or freedome. Beſides he had a generall tallage or cutting high or low, at his » pleaſure upon all the inheritance, which hee tooke commonly when he made warre » either with his neighbours, or againſt the Crowne of England, or made a journey » to the State, or gave any entertainment; ſo as the whole profits of the countrie » were at his diſpoſition when hee liſted: and ſo made the inhabitants like the vil-» laines of England, upon whom their Lords had power Tallier Haut and Bas, as the » F phraſe of our law is, whereupon the Engliſh call this kind of exaction by the name of » cutting. This chiefe Lord had his Coſharies upon his tenants, that is, he and his would » lie upon them untill they had eate up all their proviſions; he would likewiſe imploy » upon them his horſemen, his kernes, his horſe boyes, his dogges boyes, and the like, » to be fed and maintained by them, which kept the poore people in continuall ſlave-» rie and beggerie. »

The Taniſt had alſo a ſpeciall portion of land, and certaine Chiefrie proper to the Taniſt, and within the limits of his portion he had alſo his cuttings and his Coſhiries: the reſt of the land being diſtributed among ſeverall ſepts, every ſept had a Chiefe or Canſinie, as they called him, with a Taniſt of that ſept, both which were choſen by the chiefe Lord or Captaine of the countrie, and had likewiſe their ſeverall portions and Chiefries. Theſe Captainſhips or Chiefries were not partable, but were entirely enjoyed by ſuch as were elected thereunto. A

All the reſt of the lands, except the portions of the Cheifes and Taniſts, deſcended in courſe of Gavelkind, and were partable among the Males onely; in which diviſion the Baſtards had their portions as well as the Legitimate. B

For offences and matters criminall, none was ſo hainous or of ſo high a nature as that it was capitall, for treaſon againſt the chiefe Lord, and murder were fineable, the fine they called an Ericke, which was aſſeſſed by the Lord and his Brehons.

In caſe of treaſon the Lord had all the fine, in caſe of murder the Lord had one moitie, and the kindred of the partie ſlaine the other moitie: ſo as they never forfeited their poſſeſſions or their lands for any offence. Howbeit their lands were ſeiſed by the Lord for their fines, untill the ſame were levied thereupon, and then reſtored. Rape was finable in like ſort, but theft deſerved praiſe and reward, if the ſtealth were brought into the countrie; becauſe the Lord had a ſhare, and the countrie thereby became the richer.

But the theft committed in the countrie and carried out, if the thiefe were apprehended before his friend made offer of his fine, hee was commonly puniſhed with death. But the Lord in that caſe might take an Erick if he would.

Upon the ſtealth of any cattell, if the owner followed the tract (wherein the Iriſh are incredible cunning, inſomuch as they will find the ſame by the bruiſing of a graſſe in the ſummer time) if the party unto whoſe land the tract is brought cannot make it off to ſome other land, he is to anſwer the ſtealth to the owner. And this being an Iriſh law or cuſtome, is at this day obſerved both by the Engliſh and Iriſh, the ſame being ratified by an act of Counſell in the Earle of Suſſex his government, as fit and neceſſarie for that Kingdome. D

The Brehons, aſſiſted by certaine Scholars, who had learned many rules of the civill and Canon law, rather by tradition then by reading, gave judgement in all cauſes, and had the eleventh part of the thing adjudged for their fee, and the chiefe Lords Marſhall did execution.

Theſe are the principall rules and grounds of the Brehon law, which the makers of the Statutes of Kilkenny did not without cauſe call a lewd cuſtome; for it was the cauſe of much lewdneſſe and barbariſme. It gave countenance and encouragement to theft, rape, and murther, it made all poſſeſſions uncertaine, whereby it came to paſſe that there was no building of houſes, and townes, nor education of children in learning or civility, no exerciſe of trades, or handicrafts, no improvement or manuring of lands, no induſtry or vertue in uſe among them, but the people were bred in looſeneſſe and idleneſſe, which hath beene the true cauſe of all the miſcheifes and miſeries in that Kingdome. E

Now forward, take with you the obſervations of the ſaid Good: and thus much will I ſpeake before hand for the man, that in nothing he ſhooteth at reproach, but aimeth all at truth, and ſpeaketh onely of thoſe uncivill and meere Iriſh, that lie ſhrowded in the utmoſt coaſts, and have not as yet ſuited themſelves with civill qualities and conditions.

And to ſpeake in generall of them all, this Nation is ſtrong of bodie, and paſſing nimble, ſtout and haughty in heart, for wit quicke, martiall, prodigall, and careleſſe of their lives, enduring travell, cold and hunger, given to fleſhly luſt, kind and curteous to ſtrangers, conſtant in love, in enmitie implacable, light of beliefe, greedie of glorie, impatient of abuſe and injurie, and as hee ſaid in old time, in all affections moſt vehement and paſſionate: If they be bad, you ſhall no where meet with worſe: if they be good, you can hardly find better. F

Girald. Cambren.

Generally

A Generally, they give unto their children when they come to holy baptiſme profane names, adding alwaies ſomewhat to the name, taken either from ſome event, or an old wife, or elſe ſome colour, as red, white, blacke: or elſe from a diſeaſe, ſcab, and peeldneſſe, or from one vice or other, as theefe, proud, &c. and albeit they be of all men moſt impatient of reproach, yet theſe noble men of theirs, even they that have the letter [O] prefixed to their names, diſdaine not thoſe additions. The name of the Parent, or any of the ſame kinred then living, it is not lawfull to give unto children: for they are perſwaded that their death is haſtened thereby. But when the father is dead, then the ſonne aſſumeth his name, leſt the name ſhould be loſt: and if any Anceſtour of that name were a redoubted B warriour, the like proweſſe and valour is expected from him. This opinion is encreaſed by their Poets, Bardes, or Rimers, who keepe the exploits of thoſe ancient Progenitours recorded in writing, which they peece out with many high praiſes and fables deviſed of their owne braine; whereby theſe Rimers or Bards grow rich. For new wedded brides, and women in childbed thinke themſelves diſcredited, if they beſtow not upon one of theſe Praiſe-praters, the beſt garments they have. Mothers, after ſix daies that they be brought a bed, companie with their husbands afreſh, and put forth their young babes to nource.

They that be of the more noble parentage ſhall have a number of nources repaire unto them ſtreight waies from far, which make ſuit for the nourcing of the infant; and of theſe foſter children they make more account than of their own which they beare. And although C they are moſt intemperate, by reaſon of the diſtemperature of the aire, and the moiſture both of the ground, and of their meates; in regard alſo that all law is exiled; and albeit they thinke it is a ſhame for themſelves to give their owne children the breaſt, yet for this their nurcelings ſake, both man and wife abſtaine from carnall company together. And if they doe otherwiſe, they entertaine another nource under them at their owne charges. And nources there be among them as many well neere as there are young wenches for their ſervants: and to have the ſuckling of the little child, they count a ſufficient reward for being naught of their bodies. Now if this infant fortune to bee ſicke, they all to beſprinckle it with the ſtaleſt urine they can get; and for a preſervative againſt all misfortunes, they hang about the childrens neckes, not onely the beginning of Saint Johns Goſpell, but alſo a D crooked naile taken out of an horſes ſhooe, or elſe a piece of a Wolves skin. And for that purpoſe, as well nources as infants, weare girdles platted of womens haire. To their lovers alſo, it is knowne, they ſend bracelets finely wrought of theſe haires: whether their minde is herein of Venus girdle called Ceſtos, I wote not: The Foſter-fathers take much more paines, beſtow more goods by farre, and ſhew greater love unto their foſter children than they doe to their owne children: From them, theſe children not ſo much by due claime of right receive, as by force wreſt, even with taking ſtreſſes, and driving away booties, apparell, maintenance for their pleaſures, mony wherwith to buy them armour, yea and to ſpend in all kind of their lewdneſſe; their dowries alſo and ſtockes of cattell. All thoſe that have been nourced by the ſame woman, love one another more deerely, repoſe greater truſt in E them, than if they were their naturall whole brethren and ſiſters; inſomuch as in compariſon of theſe and fo. their ſakes, they even hate their naturall brethren and ſiſters.

Be they reproved at any time by their own parents, they flie to theſe their foſter-fathers, and being heartened by them, breake out oftentimes even unto open war againſt their ſaid parents; taking inſtructions from them to all lewd and villanous prankes, they become moſt ungracious and deſperate. Semblably, the nources traine up thoſe maidens which they reare, to all obſcenity and filthineſſe. If any of theſe foſter children chance to fall ſicke, a man would not beleeve how quickly their nources heare of it, yea though they dwell many a mile off, how penſively they attend and watch by the ſicke body night and day. To conclude, the greateſt corruptions of Ireland, are thought to ſpring from theſe foſter-fathers and F nources, and from nought elſe.

That theſe Iriſh people are both of an hotter and moiſture nature than other nations, we may well conjecture. And this we gather by their wonderfull ſoft skin: which doubtleſſe commeth as well by the nature of the ſoile, as by certaine artificiall bathings and exerciſe that they uſe. By reaſon alſo of the ſame tenderneſſe of their muſcles, they ſo excell in nimbleneſſe and flexibility of all parts of the body, as it is incredible. Given they are to idlenes

above all things: they reckon it the greatest riches to take no paine, and count it the most A pleasure to enjoy liberty. Delighted they are above measure in musick, but especially in the harpe with wire-strings, which they warble upon with their nimble fingers most melodiously. Doe any of them betake themselves to religion, a wonder it is to see how they mortifie and keepe their bodies under, with a devout kind of austerity, watching, praying, and making themselves leane with much fasting: so that it is no marvell which is written of their monkes in the age afore going. Yea the very women and young maidens fast duely upon every Wednesday and Saturday throughout the whole yeere. Some of them also fast upon Saint Katharines festivall day: and thus they faile not to doe upon Christmas day, if it so fall out, even when they be most grievously sicke. Some make this to bee the cause for B maidens, that they may be sped with good husbands; for wives, that they may change for a better marriage, either by the death of their husbands, or by forsaking them, or at leastwise by alteration of their conditions. But they that have once given themselves over to lewdnesse, are more lewd than lewdnesse it selfe. Their garments they die with the barkes of trees, that English men name Alders: they use also Elder-berries to colour their woll yellow. With the boughes, barke and leaves of the poplar tree bruised and stamped, they staine their large wide shirts with a saffran colour, which now are almost out of use, and adding thereunto the rine of the wild Arbut tree, salt, together with saffran. And whatsoever they die, they doe not so much boile it long over the fire, as drench and steepe the same for certaine daies together among other things in cold urine of man or woman, that the C yellow colour may be more durable.

They account it no shame or infamie to commit robberies, which they practise every where with exceeding cruelty. When they goe to rob, they poure out their prayers to God, That they may meet with a booty: and they suppose, that a cheat or booty is sent unto them from God as his gift: neither are they perswaded, that either violence, or rapine, or manslaughter displeaseth God: for in no wise would he present unto them this opportunitie, if it were a sinne; nay a sin it were if they did not lay hold upon the said opportunitie. You shall heare these Cut-throats and Incendiaries come out with these words, God is mercifull, and will not suffer the price of his blood to be of no effect in me. Moreover, they say, that they walke in their fathers steps; that this maner of life was left unto D them: also, that it were a disparagement of their nobility, if they would get their living by handie labour, and forbeare committing such facts. As they are setting forth to a boothaling, or to doe any other businesse, they marke whom they meet first in the morning: if they speed well, they lay for to meet with him oft: if otherwise, they heedfully avoid him. To sleepe and snore in a most stormie night, and not to dispatch a very long way by night on foot, nor to adventure upon any danger whatsoever in spoiling and robbing, they take to be tokens of a base and abject minde.

Of late daies, they spare neither Churches nor hallowed places, but thence also they fill their hands with spoile: yea and sometimes they set them on fire, and kill the men that there lie hidden: And the cause hereof, is the most filthy life of their Priests, who of E
Churches make profane houses, and keepe harlots, who follow them whithersoever they goe; but when they are cast off, seeke cunning devises to doe mischiefe by poisons. The Priests Lemans and their bastards abide within the circuit of a Church, drinke untill they be drunke, lie together, shed blood, and keepe up their cattell there.

Among those wild Irish, there is neither divine service, nor any forme of Chappell but outwardly: no Altars at all, or else they be filthily polluted: the image of the Rood or Crosse defaced, if there be any at all. The sacred vestiments are so foule and nasty that they would make one to cast up his stomacke: The alter portable, without any crosses emprinted upon it, and by some abuse or other polluted: The Missal or Masse booke all torne, and bereft of the Canon: yet the same is tendred to all oathes and perjuries; the Chalice of lead, with- F out a cover to it, the small vessels for wine made of a horne. The Priests mind nothing but gathering of goods and getting of children.

The Parsons play the Vicars, and that of many Parishes together: they make a great shew of the Canon-Law, but have never a jot of learning.

They have their children to succeed them in their Churches, for whose illegitimation they are

A are dispenced with. These will not take the order of Priest-hood, but commit the charge to the Curates without any stipend, that they may live by the booke, that is, upon some small gift or oblation at the baptisme, inunction, and buriall, wherewith God wot, they live most bare and miserable.

These Priests sonnes that follow not their studies, prove for the most part notorious theeves. For they that carry the name of Mac-Decan, Mac-Pherson, Mac-Olpac, that is, the Deanes or Deacons son, the Parsons son, and the Bishops sonne, are the strongest theeves that be, and the more able by their Parents liberality to raise a power of unruly rebels; and the rather, because following their fathers steps, they maintaine hospitality.

B As for the daughters of these Priests, if their fathers be living, they are set forth with good portions, in case they wed: but if their fathers be dead, either they begge or prostitute their bodies.

At every third word tis ordinary with them to lash out an oath, namely, by the Trinity, by God, by S. Patrick, by S. Brigid, by their Baptism, by Faith, by the Church, by my God-fathers hand, and by thy hand. And albeit by these they sweare, with the sacred Bible or Missal laid most religiously upon their bare heads, yea and be forsworne, yet if one say they stand in danger of damnation for perjury, you shall heare them straightwaies cry aloud, The Lord is mercifull, and will not suffer the price of his blood shed for me, to be of no effect in me. Never shall I goe to hell, repent I or repent I not. But for the C performance of promise, and that a man may beleeve them, these three points with them be of greatest weight to bind them. First, if one sweare at the altar, touching the booke lying open, and the same laid on the crown of his head. Secondly, if he take to record some Saint, whose crooked staffe or bell he toucheth and kisseth. Thirdly, if he sweare by the hand of an Earle, or of his owne Lord, or some mighty person: for then, if he be convict of perjury by the two former, he incurreth infamy; but in case hee be forsworne by the third, the said mighty man will wring from him perforce a great summe of mony, and a number of Cowes; as if by that perjury the greatest abuse and injury that might be were offered unto his name. For cowes are their only wealth, and of greatest esteeme. Touching which cattell, this seemeth not unworthy the observation.

D Most certain it is (as hee writeth) that cowes in Ireland give no milke, unlesse their own calfe be set by their side alive, or else the skin of the dead calfe stuffed with straw, so as it may carry the resemblance of a live one, for in that skin they acknowledge the sent, as it were, of their owne wombe. If a cow goe dry or hold up their milke, they send for a witch, who by herbes may cause her to cast her love upon another cowes calfe, that so she may give downe her milke.

Town-dwellers seldome make any contract of marriage with them of the country, and these passe their promise not for present, but for the future time: or else give assent without any deliberation. Whence it is, that for every light falling out they part asunder, the husband to another woman, the wife to another husband; neither is it ever knowne for cer-

E tainty whether their contracts have been true or false, before they give up their last gaspe. Hence rise contentions about the possession of lands, hence grow robberies, depredations, manslaughters, and deadly hatred. The women that are cast off goe to witches for counsell, who are thought verily to bring upon the former husband, or his new married wife, either barrennesse or impotency in the act of generation, or else most dangerous diseases. For all of them are marvellously prone to incest, and nothing is there so common as divorces under pretence of conscience. The women as well as the men make great account of the haire or glibbes of their heads, especially if they be of a golden colour, and long withall: for they shew and lay them out platted to the full length in a bravery, and suffer them when they are finely and trimly curled to hang downe: when in the meane time they wrap in foldes and

F rolls about their head many ells of the finest linnen or sendall. This kinde of coronet or head-tire they all weare that are able to get it, after their child-birth, whether it bee in wedlocke, or by playing the whores.

To these may be added a number of superstitions. I cannot tell whether the wilder sort of the Irishry yeeld divine honour unto the Moone; for when they see her first after the change, change, commonly they bow the knee, and ſay over the Lords prayer, and ſo ſoone as they A have made an end, they ſpeake unto the Moone with a loud voice in this manner: Leave us as whole and ſound as thou haſt found us. They take unto them wolves to be their Godſibs, whom they tearme Chari Chriſt, praying for them and wiſhing them well, and ſo they are not afraid to be hurt by them. The ſhoulder blade bone of a ſheep, when the fleſh is cleane taken from it, they uſe to looke through, and thereby foretell of ſome corſe ſhortly to be carried out of that houſe, if they ſpie any darke or dukiſh ſpot in it. They take her for a wicked woman and a witch, what ever ſhe be, that commeth to fetch fire from them on May day (neither will they give any fire then, but unto a ſicke body, and that with a curſe): for becauſe they thinke the ſame woman will the next Summer ſteale away all B their butter. If they finde an hare amongſt their heards of cattell on the ſaid May day, they kill her, for they ſuppoſe ſhee is ſome old trot that would filch away their butter.

They are of opinion, that their butter if it be ſtollen will ſoone after bee reſtored againe, in caſe they take away ſome of the thatch that hangeth over the doore of the houſe, and caſt it into the fire. And upon theſe Calends, or firſt day of May, they fully beleeve that to ſet a greene bough of a tree before their houſes, will cauſe them to have great abundance of milke all ſummer long.

In their townes, when any Magiſtrate entreth firſt upon his office, the Wives along the ſtreets, and the Maidens out of windowes, beſtrew them and their followers with wheat and ſalt. And before they ſow their ſeed in the corne field, the Goodwife or Miſtreſſe of the C houſe ſendeth ſalt to the ſaid field. That the Kites may not ſwoupe away their chickens, they hang up in ſome place of the houſe-roofe the egge-ſhels out of which the ſaid chickens were hatched. To rubbe their horſe heeles, or to curry their bodies with a curry-combe, or to gather graſſe to meat them with, it is not lawfull upon a Saturday; whereas they will not ſticke to doe all this upon other dayes, be they never ſo high and feſtivall.

If they never give fire out of the houſe unto their neighbours, they are perſwaded their horſes ſhall live the longer, and continue ſound.

If the owners of horſes eat egges, they muſt looke unto it that they be even in number, o-therwiſe their horſes will be in danger. Horſe-breakers and horſe-keepers are forbidden D to eat egges. A cuſtome there is alſo among them, that horſemen after they have eaten egges doe waſh their hands. When an horſe is dead, they hang up his feet and legges in the houſe, yea their very hoofes are eſteemed as an hallowed and ſacred relique.

In no caſe muſt you praiſe an horſe or any other beaſt, untill you ſay, God ſave him, or unleſſe you ſpit upon him. If any harme befall the horſe within three dayes after, they ſeeke him out that praiſed him, that he may mumble the Lords Prayer in his right eare.
They thinke there bee ſome that bewitch their horſes with looking upon them: and then they uſe the helpe of ſome old hagges, who ſaying a few Prayers with a loud voice, make them well againe. There is a certaine ſmall worme breeding in their horſes feet, which creeping on ſtill by little and little, breedeth a great many of the ſame kinde, and cor- E rupteth the body: Againſt this worme they ſend for a wiſe woman, who is brought to the horſe on two ſeverall Mondaies, and one Thurſday. She breatheth upon the place where the worme lieth; and after ſhee hath rehearſed a charme, the horſe recovereth. This charme they teach many for a piece of money, making them to ſweare that they will not reveale it to any body.

Againſt all maladies and miſchiefes whatſoever, the women have effectuall enchantments or charmes, as they ſuppoſe, divided and parted amongſt them, each one her ſeverall enchantment, and the ſame of divers forces; unto whom every man, according as his miſ-chance requireth, ſpeedeth himſelfe for helpe. They ſay alwaies both before and after their charmes, a Pater Noſter and an Ave Maria. F

When any man hath caught a fall upon the ground, forthwith hee ſtarteth up againe on his feet, and turneth himſelfe round three times toward his right hand, with his ſword, skeine, or knife hee diggeth into the earth, and fetcheth up a turfe, for that, they ſay, the earth doth yeeld a ſpirit: and if within ſome two or three daies

A daies he fell ſick, there is ſent a woman skilfull in that kind unto the ſaid place, and there ſhe ſaith on this wiſe. I call thee P. from the Eaſt and Weſt, South and North, from the forreſts, woods, rivers, meeres, the wilde wood-fayries, white, red, black, &c. and withall, bolteth out certaine ſhort praiers: then returneth ſhe home unto the ſicke party, to try whether it be the diſeaſe called Eſane, which they are of opinion is ſent by the Fairies: and whiſtereth a certaine odde praier with a Pater Noſter into his eare, putteth ſome coals into a pot full of fair water, and ſo giveth more certain judgment of the diſeaſe, than many of our Phyſicians can.

Their warre-fare conſiſteth of horſemen, of ſouldiours ſet in the rere-guard, whom they
B terme Galloglaſſes, who fight with moſt keen hatchets, and of light armed footmen called Kernes, whoſe ſervice is with darts and skeanes. To give an acclamation and ſhout unto every footman or horſeman as he goeth out of the gate, is counted lucky and fortunate: he who hath no ſuch applauſe is thought to have ſome miſcheife portended unto him. In war they uſe the bagpipe in ſtead of a trumpet; they carry about them Amulets, they recite certain praiers, & in joining battel they crie as loud as poſſible they can, Pharroh (I ſuppoſe this to be that military Barritus which Ammianus ſpeaketh of) with this perſwaſion, that he who crieth not as loud as the reſt, ſhall have this accident befall unto him, ſuddenly to bee taken up from the ground, and carried, as it were, flying in the aire (avoiding ever after the ſight of men) into a certaine vale in Kerry, as I have ſaid before.

C Such as viſite and ſit by one that lieth ſicke in bed, never ſpeake word of God, nor of the ſalvation of his ſoul, ne yet of making his will, but all to put him in hope of his recovering: If any one call for the ſacrament, him they count paſt hope and recovery. The wives paſſe not for any will-making, becauſe it is grown now to be a common cuſtome, that a third part of the goods ſhall bee given unto them, and the reſt to bee divided by even portions among the children; ſaving that when they come to enter upon the inheritance, he that is mightieſt carrieth away the beſt ſhare. For he that is ſtrongeſt, be he unkle or nephew, moſt times ſeizeth upon the inheritance, and ſhutteth the children out of all. When one lieth ready to die, before he is quite gone, certaine women, hired of purpoſe to lament, ſtanding in the meeting of croſſe high-wayes, and holding their hands all abroad, call unto him with certain out-cries fitted for the nonce, and goe about to ſtay his ſoule, as it laboureth to get forth
D of the bodie, by reckoning up the commodities that he enjoyeth of wordly goods, of wives, of beauty, fame, kinsfolke, friends, and horſes; and demanding of him why he will depart? and whither? and to whom? yea they expoſtulate with his ſoule, objecting that ſhe is unthankfull. At length they piteouſly make moane, and ſay, that the ſoule now ready to leave the body is going away to theſe kinde of haggiſh women that appeare by night and in darkneſſe: but after it is departed once out of the body, they keepe a mourning and wailing for it, with loud howling and clapping of their hands together. Now they follow the corps when it goes to buriall with ſuch a peale of out-cries, that a man would thinke the quicke as well as the dead paſt all recoverie. In theſe wailings and lamentations the nurſes, daughters and concubines make the greateſt adoe, and are moſt vehement. Nei-
E ther doe they mourne with leſſe ſorrow and heavineſſe for thoſe that are ſlaine in battaile, than ſuch as die of ſickneſſe: although they affirme, that they have an eaſier death who loſe their lives in fighting in the field, or in robbing. Yet notwithſtanding they raile upon their enemies with moſt ſpitefull words, and continue for a long time deadly hatred againſt all of that ſept and kinred.

They ſuppoſe that the ſoules of ſuch as are deceaſed goe into the company of certaine men, famous in thoſe places, touching whom they retaine ſtill fables and ſongs, as of Giants, Fin-Mac-Huyle, Osker Mac-Oſhin, and they ſay that by illuſion they often times doe ſee ſuch.

As for their meats, they feed willingly upon herbs, and watercreſſes eſpecially, up-F on muſhromes, ſhamroots, and roots: ſo that Strabo not without good cauſe ſaid they were πολυφάγοι, i. Eaters of herbes, for which in ſome copies is falſly read πολυφάγοι, i. Great Eaters. They delight alſo in butter tempered with oate-meale, in milke, whey, beefe-broth, and fleſh oftentimes without any bread at all. As for the corne that they have, they lay it up for their horſes provender, for whom verily they are eſ- A pecially carefull. When they be hunger bitten in time of dearth, they diſdaine not to devoure raw fleſh, after they have preſſed out the blood thereof: and for to concoct and digeſt it, they ſwill in and poure down the throat Uskebah draught after draught. They let their kine blood alſo, which when it is growne to a gelly, and ſtrewed over with butter, they eat with good appetite.

They goe for the moſt part bare headed, unleſſe it bee when they put on an head-piece. The haire of their head they weare long, and nothing ſet they greater ſtore by than the glibbes or treſſes of their haires; and to have the ſame plucked or twitched, they take it for a contumelious indignitie. They uſe linnen ſhirts, and thoſe verily B exceeding large, with wide ſleeves, and hanging ſide downe to their very knees, which they were wont to ſtaine with ſaffron. Little Jackets they have of woollen, and thoſe very ſhort: breeches moſt plaine and cloſe to their thighes. But they caſt over theſe their mantles or ſhagge rugges, which Iſidore ſeemeth to call Heteromallæ, with a deepe fringed purfle, and the ſame daintily ſet out with ſundrie colours; within which they lappe themſelves in the night, and ſweetly ſleepe on the very ground. Such alſo doe the women caſt over the ſide garment that they weare downe to the foot, and with elnes (as I ſaid) of Sendall rolled up in wreathes, they rather load than adorne their heads; like as they doe their neckes with chaines and carkaneth, their armes alſo with bracelets. Theſe are the manners of the C wild Iriſh, out of our Author: In the reſt, for the moſt part all that inhabite the Engliſh Pale (as they tearme it) there is no point of curteſie and civilitie wanting: for which they are beholden to the Engliſh conqueſt: and for much more might the whole Iſland bee beholden unto it, in caſe upon a certaine peeviſh and obſtinate love they beare unto their owne country faſhions, they had not ſtopped up their eares and ſhut up their hearts againſt better governance. For the Iriſhry are ſo ſtifly ſettled in obſerving of the old rites of their country, that not onely they cannot be withdrawne from them, but alſo are able eaſily to draw the Engliſh unto the ſame (ſo prone is mans nature to entertain the worſt) that one would not beleeve in how ſhort a time ſome Engliſh among them degenerate and grow out of kinde. A PRAEFACE TO THE ANNALES OF IRELAND.

THus far forward was the Printers presse a going when the Honourable Lord William Howard of Naworth, for the love that he beareth unto the studies of Antiquity, willingly imparted unto me the Manuscript Annales of Ireland, from the yeere of our Salvation MCLII. unto the yeere MCCCLXX. Which I thought good to publish; considering that after Giraldus Cambrensis, there is nothing, to my knowledge, extant better in this kind; and because so noble and worthy a person, whose they were by right in private before, permitted so much. Unto whom, the very same thankes in manner are duly to bee yeelded for bringing them to light, that were to be given unto the authour himselfe, who first recorded them in writing. And albeit they are penned in a stile somewhat rude and barrain (as those times required) yet much matter is therein contained, that may illustrate the Irish Historie, and would have given good light unto mee, if they had not come to my hands so late. Take them here therefore truly and faithfully exemplified, even as I found them, with all their imperfections and faults; and if you have any better, impart them with semblable courtesie unto us; if not, make use of these with us, untill some one come forth and shew himselfe, that will helpe us to a fuller Chronicle, and happilie continue the same in length even unto our daies with more elegancie of phrase, which verily would be no painfull work to be performed.

THE ANNALES OF IRELAND.

ANno Domini MCLXII. Gregorie the first Archbishop of Dublin, a man praise worthy every way, slept in the Lord: after whom succeeded holy Laurence O-Thothil, who was Abbat of St. Kemnus de Glindelagh. Thomas is made Archbishop of Canterburie.

MCLXVI. Rothericke O-Conghir, Prince of Connaght was made King and Monarch of Ireland.

MCLXVII. Died Maud the Empresse. The same yeere Almaricke King of Jerusalem tooke Babylon. And in the same yeere Dermoc Mac-Murrogh Prince of Leinster, whiles O-Rorke King of Meth was in a certaine expedition, carried away his wife, who was willing enough to be ravished. For her selfe made meanes to be taken as a prey, as we find in Cambrensis.

The same yeere the said Earle Richard, accompanied with two hundred Knights or thereabout, and others to the number as one would say of a thousand, arrived on the even of S. Bartholmew the Apostle. Which Richard verily, was the sonne of Gilbert Earle of Stroghul, that is, Chippestow, sometime Strogull. This Richard also was the sonne of Isabell, Aunt by the mothers side of K. Malcome, and William King of Scotland, and of David the Earle, a Gentleman of good hope: and the morrow after the same Apostles day they tooke the said Citie; and there Eva, Dermots daughter, was lawfully joined in marriage unto Earle Richard, and her father gave her.

MCLXXIV. Gelasius Archbishop of Armagh, the first Primate of Ireland, an holy man, aged and full of daies, rested in Christ. This Gelasius is said to bee the first Archbishop that wore the first pale; but others before him were in name onely called Archbishops and Primates, for the reverend regard and honour of St. Patricke, as being the Apostle of that nation: whose See was from the beginning had of all men in so great reverence, that not onely Bishops and Priests and those of the Cleargie, but Kings and Princes universally were subject to the Bishop thereof in all obedience. After whom succeeded in the Archbishopricke Gilbert a Prelate of good memorie.

A MCLXXVIII. The ninth day before the Calends of December, the Abbey de Samaria was founded. The ſame yeere was founded Roſe Vale, that is, Roßeglaſſe.

MCLXXIX. Miles Cogan, and Ralph the ſonne of Fitz-Stephen, his daughters husband, were ſlaine betweene Waterford and Liſmore, &c. as we read in Cambrenſis. MCLXXX. The Abbey of the Quire of Benet was founded. The ſame yeere was founded the Abbey of Geripount. The ſame yeere Laurence Archbiſhop of Dub-
B lin, upon the 18. day before the Calends of December happily ſlept in the Lord within the Church of Saint Marie of Aux. After whom ſucceeded John Cumin, an Engliſhman borne in England at Eveſham, choſen with good agreement and accord by the Cleargie of Dublin (the King by his induſtry procuring the ſame) and confirmed by the Pope: which John afterwards founded the Church of Saint Patricke in Dublin.

MCLXXXIII. The order of the Templars and Hoſpitallers is confirmed. The ſame yeere is founded the Abbey de Lege Dei, that is, Gods Law.

MCLXXXV. John the Kings ſonne, Lord of Ireland by his fathers gift, came into Ireland in the 12. yeere of his age, in the thirteenth yeere after his fathers comming,
C after the comming of Fitz-Stephen the fifteenth, in the 14. yeere from the comming of Earle Richard, and in the ſame fifteenth yeere returned.

MCLXXXVI. The order of the Cartuſians and of the Grandians is confirmed. In the ſame yeere Hugh Lacie was killed at Dervath treacherouſly by an Iriſhman; becauſe the foreſaid Hugh would build a caſtle there: and as he was teaching of an Iriſhman how to labour with an iron toole, to wit, a Pykax; when Hugh bowed himſelfe forward, he ſtroke him to the ground with both hands, and as he held down his head, the ſaid Iriſhman with an axe chopt off Hugh Lacie his head, and there was an end of the conqueſt. In the ſame yeere Chriſtian Biſhop of Liſmore, ſometime Legate of Ireland, an earneſt follower of the vertues which he had ſeen and heard of his
D devout father Saint Bernard, and Pope Eugenius, a venerable man, with whom hee was in the Probatorie at Clarevall, who alſo ordained him to be the Legate in Ireland, after his obedience performed, within the monaſterie of Kyrieleyſon, happily departed to Chriſt. Jeruſalem was taken with the Lords Croſſe, by the Soldan and the Saracens, after many Chriſtians ſlaine.

MCLXXXVII. Upon the Calends, or firſt day of July, was the Abbey of Ynes in Ulſter founded.

MCLXXXIX. Henry Fitz-Empreſſe departed this life, after whom ſucceeded his ſonne Richard, and is buried in Font-Ebrard. In the ſame yeere was founded the Abbey de Colle victoriæ, that is, of Cnokmoy.

E MCXC. King Richard and King Philip make a voiage into the holy land.

MCXCI. In the Monaſterie of Clarevall, the tranſlation of Malachie Biſhop of Armagh was honourably celebrated.

MCXCII. The Citie of Dublin was burnt.

MCXCIII. Richard King of England in his return from the holy land, was taken priſoner by the Duke of Auſtrich, and he made an end by compoſition with the Emperour, to pay for his ranſome one hundred thouſand markes, and with the Empreſſe, to pay thirtie thouſand: alſo with the foreſaid Duke 20. thouſand markes, in regard of an obligation which he had made unto them for Henrie Duke of Saxonie. Now hee remained in the Emperours priſon a yeere, ſixe moneths, and three daies: For F whoſe ranſome all the Chalices in manner throughout England were ſold. In the ſame yeere was founded the Abbey de Jugo Dei, that is, of Gods yoke.

MCXCIIII. The reliques of S. Malachie Biſhop of Clareval, were brought into Ireland, and with all honour that might be, received in the Monaſterie of Melliſont, and the reſt of the Monaſteries of the Ciſtertian order.

MCXCV. Matthew Archbiſhop of Caſſile Legate of Ireland, & John Archbiſhop of Dublin carried away the corps of Hugh Lacie, the conquerour of Meth, from the I- A riſh, and ſolemnely enterred it in the Monaſterie of Bleſſedneſſe, that is, Bella. But the head of the ſaid Hugh was beſtowed in the Monaſtery of Saint Thomas in Dublin.

MCXCVIII. The order of Friers Preachers began in the parts about Tolouſe, by Dominicke the ſecond.

MCXCIX. Richard King of England died: after whom ſucceeded John his brother, who was Lord of Ireland and Earle of Mortaigne: which John ſlew Arthur the lawfull heire, ſonne of Geffrey his whole brother.

And in this manner died Richard. When K. Kichard beſieged the Caſtle of Cha- B luz in little Britaine, wounded he was to death with an arrow by one of thoſe in the ſaid Caſtle, named Bertram Gurdon. And when he diſpaired of his life, hee demiſed the Kingdome of England, and all his other lands unto his brother to keep. All his Jewels, and one fourth part of his Treaſure he gave unto his Nephew Otho, and another fourth part of his Treaſure he gave, and commanded to be dealt among his ſervants and the poore. Now when the ſaid Bertram was apprehended and brought before the King, the K. demanded of him in theſe termes: what harme have I done thee that thou haſt ſlaine me? Unto whom without any manner of feare he anſwered thus. Thou killedſt my father, and two of my brethren with thine owne hand, and me alſo thou wouldeſt now have killed: Take therefore what revenge ſo ever C thou wilt of me, for I paſſe not, ſo thou maiſt be ſlaine, that haſt wrought ſo many miſchiefes to the world. Then the King forgave him his death, and commanded that hee ſhould be let goe at libertie, and to give him beſides one hundred ſhillings ſterling. But after the King was dead, ſome of the Kings miniſters ſlayed the ſaid Bertram, and hung him up. And this King yeelded up his vitall breath the eighth day before the Ides of April, which fell out to be the fourth day of the weeke before Palme-Sunday, and the eleventh day after he was wounded: and buried hee was at Font Ebrard, at the feet of his father. Touching whoſe death a certaine verſifier ſaith thus.

Iſtius in morte perimit formica leonem,
Proh dolor! in tanto funere mundus obit.
In this mans death, as is well ſeene, the Ant a Lion ſlaies,
And in ſo great a death (alas) the world doth end her daies.

The Corps of which King Richard is divided into three parts. Whence was this verſe made.

Viſcera Carceolum, Corpus Fons ſervat Ebrardi, Et Cor Rhothomagum magne Richarde tuum.
Thy bowels onely Carceol keeps, thy Corps Font-Everard, E
And Roan hath keeping of thy heart O puiſſant Richard.

When King Richard was departed this life, his brother John was girt with the ſword of the Duchy of Normandie by the Archbiſhop of Rhoan, the ſeventh day before the Calends of May next enſuing after the death of the aforeſaid King: which Archbiſhop did ſet upon the head of the ſaid Duke a Circle flower with golden roſes in the top round about. Alſo upon the ſixth day before the Calends of June hee was anointed and crowned King of England, all the Lords and Nobles of England being preſent, within the Church of Saint Peter in Weſtminſter upon the day of the Lords Aſcenſion: and afterwards was John King of England called to a Parliament F in France by the King of France, to anſwer as touching the death of his Nephew Arthur, and becauſe he came not, he deprived him of Normandy. The ſame yeere was the Abbey of Commerer founded.

MCC. Cathol Cronerg King of Conaght founder of the Monaſtery de Colle Victoriæ, that is, of the Hill of Victorie, is expelled out of Conaght. The ſame yeere

was

A was founded, the Monaſterie de Voto, that is, Tynterne, by William Marſhall, Earle Marſhall and of Pembroch, who was Lord of Leinſter, to wit, of Weisford, Oſſory, Caterlagh, and Kildare, in regard and right of his wife: who eſpouſed the daughter of Richard Earle of Stroghul, and of Eve the daughter of Dermot-Mac-Murogh. But becauſe the foreſaid William Earle Marſhall was in exceeding great jeopardie both day and night in the ſea, he vowed a vow unto our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, that if he might be delivered from the tempeſt, and come to land, hee would make a Monaſterie unto Chriſt and Marie his mother: and ſo it came to paſſe when hee was come ſafe to Weisford, he made I ſay the Monaſterie of Tyntern, according to his vow, and called
B it the Monaſterie De voto, that is, Of the vow. In the ſame yeere was founded the Monaſterie de Flumine Dei, that is, Of Gods river.

MCCII. Gathol Cronerg or Crorobdyr, King of Conaght, was ſet againe in his kingdome. The ſame yeere is founded the houſe of Canons or Regular Prieſts of St. Marie, by Sir Meiler Fitz-Henrie.

MCCIII. The Abbey of S. Saviour, that is, Domůky, being founded, was in this yeere and the next following built.

MCCIV. There was a field fought betweene John Curcie Earle of Ulſter, and Hugh Lacie at Doune: in which battell many on both ſides loſt their lives. But John Curcie had the upper hand in fight. Afterwards, upon the ſixth day of the weeke,
C being Good-friday, when the foreſaid John was unarmed, and went by way of pilgrimage bare foot and in his linnen veſture a viſiting the Churches, as the manner is, treacherouſly he was taken priſoner by his owne people for a piece of money given in hand, and for a greater reward to be given afterward for a recompence; and ſo was delivered unto Hugh Lacie. But hee bringeth him unto the King of England, who gave unto Hugh Lacie the Earldom of Ulſter, and the Seigniorie of Conaught, which belonged unto John Curcie. Then Hugh Lacie being Earle, rewarded all the foreſaid Traitours that had betraied John Curcie, and gave unto them gold and ſilver, more or leſſe: but ſtraightwayes hung up all the Traitours aforeſaid, and tooke away all their goods: and ſo Hugh Lacie ruleth over all Ulſter, and John Curcie is condem-
D ned to perpetuall priſon, becauſe he had before time beene a Rebell to John King of England, and would not doe him homage, and beſides, blamed him about the death of Arthur the rightfull heire unto the Crowne. But whiles hee was in priſon and in extreme povertie, having but little allowance, and the ſame courſe and ſimple, for to eat and drinke, he ſaid, O God, wherefore dealeſt thou thus by me, who have built and re-edified ſo many Monaſteries for thee and thy Saints? Now when he had many times wailed and made loud moane in this wiſe, and therewith fell aſleep, the holy Trinitie appeared unto him, ſaying: Why haſt thou caſt me out of mine owne ſeat, and out of the Church of Doun, and placed there my S. Patrick the Patron of Ireland?
(Becauſe indeed John Curcie had expelled the Secular Canons or Prieſts out of the E Cathedrall Church of Doune, and brought the blacke Monks of Cheſter, and placed them in the ſaid Church: And the holy Trinitie ſtood there in a ſtately ſhrine or ſeat, and John himſelfe tooke it downe out of the Church, and ordained a Chappell for that Image, and in the great Church ſet up the image of S. Patrick, which diſpleaſed the moſt High God:) therefore thus ſaid God, Know thou well that thou ſhalt never enter into thy Seigniorie in Ireland.

Howbeit, in regard of other good deeds that thou haſt done, thou ſhalt with honour be delivered forth of priſon: which alſo came to paſſe. And now by this time there aroſe a contention betweene John King of England, and the King of France, about a Seigniory and certain Caſtles: and this ſuit or controverſie ſtill depending,
F the King of France offered unto him a Giant or Champion to fight for his right. Then the King of England called to remembrance his moſt valiant Knight John Curcie, whom upon the information of others he had before caſt into priſon. The King therefore ſent for John Curcie, and asked him if he were able to help and ſtand him in ſtead in a combat: then John anſwered and ſaid, I will not fight for thee, but for the right of the Kingdome: for which afterward hee undertooke to doe his endevour

« deavour in ſingle fight: and ſo refreſhed himſelfe with meat, drink, and bathing, and A « tooke the vertue of his owne fortitude and ſtrength: and a day was appointed be« tweene theſe Giants or Champions, namely, betweene John Curcie and the other.
« But when the Champion of France heard of his exceeding great feeding, and of his « ſtrength, hee refuſed the combat, and then was the ſaid Seigniorie given unto the « King of England. Then the King of France requeſted to ſee a ſtroake given by the « hand of John Curcie: and he ſet a ſtrong and doughtie good morion full of maile up« on a great blocke or log of wood: and the foreſaid John taking his skeine or ſword,
« and looking back round about him with a ſtern and grim countenance, ſmote the mo-
« rion through, from the very creſt downeward into the blocke, and the ſword ſtucke B « in the wood ſo faſt, that no other man but himſelfe was able to plucke out the « ſword: then John at the requeſt of the Kings eaſily pluckt it forth. And the Kings de« manded of the foreſaid John, wherefore he looked behind him with ſo grim a coun« tenance before he gave the ſtroke; who anſwered, that if he had failed in giving that « ſtroke, he would have ſlaine them all, as well Kings as others. And the Kings gave « unto him great gifts, yea and the King of England rendred unto him alſo his Seignio« rie of Ulſter. But John Curcie attempted 15. times to ſaile over ſea into Ireland, but « was alwaies in danger, and the wind evermore againſt him: wherefore hee waited a « while among the Monkes of Cheſter. At length he returned into France, and there « reſted in the Lord. C

« and Hugh his brother, exerciſed tyrannie upon the Commons, and eſpecially becauſe
« they ſlew Sir John Curſon, Lord of Rathenny and Kilbarrocke (for they heard that « the foreſaid John accuſed them unto the King) therefore I ſay the King drave the « foreſaid ſonnes of Hugh Lacie out of the land: and they fled into France, and ſerved
« in the Monaſterie of Saint Taurin as unknowne, working about clay and bricke, « and ſometime in gardens as Gardiners: but at length they were knowne by the « Abbat of the ſaid Monaſterie: and the ſaid Abbat entreated the King for them, « becauſe he had baptized his ſonnes, and was Godſib unto him as a Godfather many « times: and Walter Lacie paid two thouſand and five hundred markes: and Hugh « Lacie payed a great ſumme of money unto the King for his ranſome; and at the re- E « queſt of the ſaid Abbat reſtored they were againe unto their former degree and « Seigniorie. And Walter Lacie brought with him John the ſonne of Alured, that is, « Fitz-Acory, ſonne to the foreſaid Abbats whole brother, and he made him Knight,
« and gave unto him the Seigniorie of Dengle, and many other Lordſhips. Item, hee « brought Monkes with him out of the ſame Monaſterie, and gave unto them many « fermes, and the Cell called Fourie, in regard of charitie, thankfulneſſe, and counſell:
« and Hugh Lacie Earle of Ulſter made a Cell for Monkes, and endowed them in Ul-

« by the ſaid Juſtice and the Engliſh; firſt he came to Sleigagh, thence to Hohoſſero-

In re-
F gard of which ſight that thus happened, men ſtrucken with feare gave out theſe ſpeeches: Surely this man hath beene the Agent and Procurator, that the Tenths of Eccleſiaſticall benefices ſhould bee paied to the King, and another author and procurer of a ſcrutinie made into the fold and flocke of Chriſt, as alſo of a contribution granted afterward to the King crying againſt William. Item, the Citie of Burdeaux with the land of Gaſcoigne adjoining, was occupied or held by the miniſters of the King of France conditionally: but unjustly and perfidiously detained by the King of France: for which cause John Archbishop of Dublin and certaine other Lords of the Nobilitie were sent into Almaine to the King thereof: and after they had their dispatch and answer in Tordran, the Lord Archbishop being returned into England, ended his life upon S. Leodegaries day. « Which done, the Earle of Ulſter, with the foreſaid Juſtice and other great Lords,

« the ſaid Brus perceiving, warily paſſed over the ſaid water, and followed him: whom

« the ſame time, Cathil Roge razed three Caſtles of the Earles of Ulſter in Connaught,
« and many townes in the ſame Connaught he burnt and ſacked. And at the ſame time
« the ſaid mariners went to the ſaid Caſtle, and the Lords there skirmiſhed, and in the « Item, afterwards upon St. Nicolas day the ſaid Brus departed out of Cragfergus, « unto whom the Earle of Moreff preſented himſelfe with 500. men unto the parts a-

« their right hands: and from thence they paſſe on to Nobee, where they left many of « their men about the feaſt of S. Andrew the Apoſtle: and Brus himſelfe burnt Kenlys, « goods in it: Alſo Finnagh and New-caſtle he burnt, and all that countrey: and they « kept their Chriſtmas at Loghſudy, and then burnt it. And after this they marched « forward by Totmoy unto Rathymegan and Kildare, and the parts about Triſteldermot, « and Athy and Reban, not without loſſe of their men. And then came Brus to Skethy, F

« neere Arſcoll in Leinſter: where there encountred him in fight the Lord Edmund « Botiller Juſtice of Ireland, and Sir John Fitz-Thomas, and Thomas Arnald Power, and « other Noble-men of Leinſter and of Mounſter: inſomuch as one of thoſe Lords, with « his army, was ſufficient to vanquiſh the ſaid Edw. and his forces. But there aroſe a diſ-« cord among them, and ſo being diſordered and in confuſion, they leave the field unto
the

A the ſaid Edward, according to that which is written, Every kingdome divided in it ſelfe ſhalbe made deſolate. There alſo was ſlaine a noble eſquire, and faithfull to the King and the Realme, Haymund Grace, and with him Sir William Prendregeſt, Knight. On the Scots part were ſlaine Sir Fergus Andreſſan, Sir Walter Morrey, and many others, whoſe bodies were buried at Athy, in the Covent of the Friers Preachers.

Afterwards, the ſaid Brus in his returne toward Meth burnt the caſtle de Loy: and then the ſaid Scots depart away from Kenlis in Meth, againſt whom the Lord Roger Mortimer came with a great armie, well neere 15000. but, as it is thought, not true
B and faithfull among themſelves, but now confederate with the Lord Roger, who about three of the clock began to flie, and turned their backs: and principally the Lacies, leaving the Lord Roger alone with a few: whom it behoved then to flie toward Dublin, and to Sir Walter Cuſake at the Caſtle of Trim, leaving with the Scots that countrey, and the towne of Kenlis.

Alſo, at the ſame time the Iriſh of the South, to wit, the O-Tothiles and the O-brynnes, burnt all the South-country, namely, Arclo, Newcaſtle, Bree, and all the villages adjoining. C Item, in the ſame yeere about the feaſt of the purification of the bleſſed Virgin Marie, certain Lords of Ireland, and the Lord Fitz-Thomas, the Lord Richard Clare, Lord John Pover, and the Lord Arnald Pover, for to eſtabliſh peace & greater ſecuritie with the King of England, came to Sir John Hothom, aſſigned there by the ſaid King of England, which ſaid Lords and Nobles ſware to hold with the King of England come life come death, and to their power to quiet the countrey and make peace, and to kill the Scots. For the performance whereof by the leave and helpe of God, they gave hoſtages and ſo returned: which forme if other Nobles of the land of Ireland would not keepe, they were generally held for the Kings enemies.

D Item, there died Sir John Biſſet. And the Church of the new towne of Leys with the ſteeple and belfray was by the Scots burnt. The Scots won the Caſtle of Northburgh in Ulſter.

Alſo Fidelmic O-Conghir King of Connaght ſlew Rorke the ſonne of Cathol O-Conghir.

More, Sir William Maundevile died: and the Biſhop of Conere fled to the Caſtle of Crag-fergus, and his Biſhoprick was liable to an interdiction: and Sir Hugh Antonie is killed in Connaght.

Item, in the ſame yeere, on Saint Valentines day, the Scots abode neere Geſhil and Offaly: and the armie of the Engliſh about the parts of Kildare: and the Scots en-
E dured ſo great famine, that many of them were ſtarved to death: and for the ſame cauſe they tooke their way cloſely toward Fowier in Meth. The Sunday following ſo feeble they were, what with hunger, and what with travaile, that moſt of them died.

And afterwards the Nobles came unto the Parliament, and did nothing there; but as they returned, ſpoiled all the countrey: and the Lord Walter Lacie came to Dublin, for to cleere himſelfe of an imputation (touching his credit) laied upon him, and to tender hoſtages unto the Lord the King, as other Nobles had done: and the ſame time Edward Brus peaceably abode in Ulſter.

Item, the O-Tothiles and O-Brynnes, the Archibaulds and Harolds conſpired and F banded together: the towne of Wicklo, and the whole countrey they laied waſt.

And in the firſt weeke of Lent the Earle of Moreff ſailed over into Scotland, and Brus held plees in Ulſter, and cauſed many to be hanged.

Alſo in the midſt of Lent Brus held Plees, and ſlew the Logans, and took Sir Alan Fitz-Warin, and carried him into Scotland.

Alſo in the ſame yeere Fennyngher O-Conghir ſlew Cale-Rothe, and with him of A Galloglaghes and others about three hundred. The ſame yeere in Mid-Lent wheat was ſold for 18. ſhillings, and at Eaſter following for 11. ſhillings.

MCCCXVI. Lord Thomas Mandevile, with many others, came from Tredagh to Crag-fergus upon Maunday Thurſday, and joyned battaile with the Scots, put them to flight, and ſlew thirtie of the Scots: and afterward on Eaſter even the ſaid Lord Thomas with his men charged upon the Scots, and ſlew many of them about the Calends: and there was ſlain the ſaid Lord Thomas Maundevile in his own country, in defence of his right.

Item, in the parts of Connaght many Iriſh were ſlaine by Lord Richard Clare, and B Lord Richard Bermingham.

Item, on Saturday after the Lords Aſcenſion, Donnyger O-Brynne a ſtrong thiefe, Item, at Whitſontide the ſame yeere Richard Bermingham ſlew of the Iriſh in Mounſter about three hundred or more: and afterwards at the feaſt of the Nativitie of S. John Baptiſt came Brus to the Caſtle of Crag-fergus, and commanded the keepers to render up the Caſtle unto him, according to the covenant between them made, C as he ſaid: who anſwered, that they ought indeed ſo to doe, and willed him to ſend thirtie of his men about him, and required that he would grant them within life and limbe; who did ſo: but after they had received thirtie Scots into the Caſtle, they ſhut them up and kept them in priſon.

At the ſame time the Iriſh of O-mayl went toward the parts of Tullogh, & fought a battell: whereupon of the Iriſh were ſlaine about foure hundred, whoſe heads were ſent to Dublin: and wonders were afterwards ſeene there. The dead, as it were, aroſe and fought one with another, and cried out Fennokabo, which was their ſignal. And afterward, about the feaſt of the tranſlation of S. Thomas, there were rigged and made ready eight ſhips, and ſet out from Tredagh to Crag-fergus with victuals. Which D were by the Earle of Ulſter much troubled for the delivery of William Burk, who had been taken with the Scots: and the Saturday following there were made friends and united at Dublin the Earle of Ulſter and the Lord John Fitz-Thomas, and many of the Nobles ſworne and confederate to live and die for the maintenance of the peace of Ireland.

The ſame yeere newes came out of Connaght, that O-Conghir ſlew many of the Engliſh, to wit, Lord Stephen of Exceſter, Miles Cogan, and many of the Barries and of the Lawlies, about foureſcore.

Item, the weeke after Saint Laurence feaſt, there aroſe in Connaght foure Iriſh Princes to make warre againſt the Engliſh: againſt whom came the Lord William Burk, E the Lord Richard Bermingham, the Lord of Anry with his retinue of the country, and of the ſame Iriſh about eleven thouſand fell upon the edge of the ſword neere unto Anry; which town was walled afterwards with the mony raiſed of armor and ſpoile gotten from the Iriſh: becauſe every one of the Engliſh that had double armours of the Iriſh, gave the one halfe deale toward the walls of the towne Anry. Slaine were there Fidelmic O-Conghir, a petty King or Prince of Connaght, & O-Kelley, and many other Princes or Potentates. John Huſee a butcher of Anry fought there, who the ſame night at the requeſt of his Lord of Anry ſtood among the dead to ſeek out and diſcover O-Kelley: which O-Kelley with his Coſtrell or eſquire roſe out of their lurking holes, and cried unto the foreſaid man, to wit Huſee, come with mee and I will F make thee a great Lord in my countrey. And Huſee anſwered, I will not goe with thee, but thou ſhalt goe to my Lord Richard Bermingham. Then ſaid O-Kelley, Thou haſt but one ſervant with thee, and I have a doughtie eſquire, therefore come with mee that thou maiſt bee ſafe: unto whom his owne man alſo ſaid, Agree and goe away with O-Kelley, that wee may be ſaved and inriched, becauſe they

A they are stronger than we. But the said John Husee first killed his owne servant, and O-Kelley and his Esquire: and cut off all their three heads, and carried them to his Lord Richard Bermingham: and that Bermingham gave unto the said John Hussee faire lands, and dubbed him Knight, as he well deserved.

The same yeere about the feast of S. Laurence came O-Hanlan to Dundalk, for to destreine, and the Dundalkers with their men killed a number.

Item, on Monday next before the feast of the nativitie of Saint Mary, came David O-Tothill with foure more, and hid himselfe secretly all night long in Coleyn wood: which the Dublinians and Sir William Comyn perceiving, went forth and manfully
B pursued them for sixe leagues, and slew of them about seventeen, and wounded many to death.

Also, there ran rumors to Dublin that the Lord Robert Brus King of Scotland entred Ireland to aid Edward Brus his brother, and the Castle of Crag-fergus in Ulster was besieged by the foresaid Scots. The Monasteries of St. Patrick of Dune, and of Seball, and many other houses as well of Monkes as of regular preaching Friers and Minors, were spoiled in Ulster by the Scots.

Item, the Lord William Burk, leaving his son for an hostage in Scotland, is set free. The Church of Brught in Ulster being in manner full of folke of both sexes, is burnt by the Scots and Irish of Ulster.

C At the same time newes came from Crag-fergus, that those which kept the Castle, for default of victuals, did eat hides and leather, yea and eight Scots who before were taken prisoners: great pity and griefe that no man relieved such.

And the Friday following newes were brought that Thomas the sonne of the Earle of Ulster was dead.

Also the Sunday following the feast of the nativitie of the blessed Virgin, died Lord John Fitz-Thomas at Laraghbrine neere unto Mayneth, and he was buried at Kildare among the Friers Minors. Of which Lord John Fitz-Thomas, it is said, that a little before his death he was created Earle of Kildare: after whom succeeded his sonne and heire the Lord Thomas Fitz-John, a prudent and wise personage.

D And afterwards newes came that the Castle of Crag-fergus was rendred to the Scots, and granted there was to the keepers of it life and limbe.

Also upon the day of the exaltation of the holy Crosse, Conghar and Mac-keley were slaine, with five hundred of the Irish, by the Lord William Burke and Richard Bermingham in Connaght.

Item, on Munday before Holloughmas happened a great slaughter of the Scots in Ulster, by John Loggan, and Hugh Bisset; to wit, one hundred with double armour, and two hundred with single armour.

The number of those men of armes that were slaine in all, was three hundred beside footmen.

E And afterward, in the Vigill of Saint Edmund King there fell a great tempest of winde and raine, which overthrew many houses, and the Steeple of Saint Trinitie Church in Dublin, and did much harme on land and sea. Also in the Vigill of S. Nicholas, Sir Alan Stewart, taken prisoner in Ulster by John Loggan and Sir John Sandale, was brought unto the Castle of Dublin.

In the same yeere newes arrived out of England, that the Lord King of England and the Earle of Lancaster were at variance, and that they were desirous one to surprize the other: for which cause the whole land was in great trouble.

Item, in the same yeere, about the feast of St. Andrew the Apostle, sent there were to the Court of Rome the Lord Hugh Despencer, & the Lord Bartholmew Baldesmere, F the Bishop of Worcester, and the Bishop of Ely about important affaires of the Lord King of England, for Scotland: who returned into England about the feast of the purification of the blessed Virgin Mary.

Also, after the said feast the Lacies came to Dublin, and procured an inquisition to prove that the Scots by their meanes came not into Ireland: which inquisition acquitted them. Whereupon they had a charter of the Lord the King, of peace

« and upon the Sacrament given unto them, they tooke an oath to keepe the peace of A
« the Lord King of England, and to their power to deſtroy the Scots.
« And afterwards, even in the ſame yeere after the feaſt of Shrovetide, the Scots
« came ſecretly as farre as to Slane, with twenty thouſand armed men; and the armie
« of Ulſter joyned with them, who ſpoiled the whole countrey before them.
« And after this, on munday next before the feaſt of S. Matthias the Apoſtle, the Earle
« of Ulſter was taken in the Abbey of St. Mary, by the Maior of the Citie of Dublin, « to wit, Robert Notingham, and brought to the caſtle of Dublin, where he was kept « in hold a long time, and the chamber wherein hee lay was burned, and ſeven of the « ſaid Earles men were there killed. B
« In the ſame weeke, and upon the Vigill of St. Matthias, came Brus with his armie « toward Dublin: and becauſe he had quickly intelligence of the ſaid Earles apprehen« ſion, he tooke his journey toward the caſtle of Knocke, and entred the ſaid caſtle, and « tooke the Lord Baron of the ſame, namely, the Lord Hugh Tirell and his wife, who « for a peece of money were delivered.
« And the ſame night, by common conſent, the men of Dublin for feare of the Scots
« burnt St. Thomas ſtreet; and with the ſaid fire the Church of St. John, with the chap« pell of S. Marie Maudlen was by caſualtie burnt: yea and all the ſuburbs of Dublin « were ſet on fire, together with the Monaſterie of S. Mary, and the Church of St. Pa- « tricke in Dublin was by the ſaid villaines ſpoiled. C
« Item, the ſaid Maior with the Communaltie deſtroied the Church of St. Saviour, « which is the place of the Friers Preachers: and carried away the ſtones of the ſame « place toward the building of the Citie wall, which hee then enlarged on the North « ſide above the Key: becauſe the wall at firſt went along by the Church of St. Owen, « where a tower is to be ſeene beyond the gate; and in the Vintners ſtreet appeareth « another gate. But afterwards the King of England commanded the Maior and Com-« munalty to make a covent Church of Friers as before. And after the feaſt of Saint « Matthias, Brus underſtanding that the Citie was ſtrongly walled and fortified, took « his journey toward the Salmon leape, and there they pitched their tents, namely, « Robert Brus King of the Scots, Edward Brus, the Earle of Morrey, John de Men- D
« teth, the Lord John Steward, the Lord Philip Mountbray, and abode there foure « daies, and burnt part of the towne, brake downe the Church and ſpoiled it, and after« wards marched on toward the Naas, and the Lacies againſt their oath conducted « them and gave them counſell: and Sir Hugh Canon appointed Wadin White his « wives brother to be their guide through the countrey, and they came to the Naas,
« and ſacked the towne, brake into the Churches, opened the tombes in the Church« yard to ſeeke for treaſure, and did much miſchiefe while they remained there for two « daies together. And afterwards they went on toward Triſteldermot, in the ſecond « week of Lent, and deſtroied the Friers minors, the books, veſtiments, and other or« naments they had away, and then departed from thence to Baligaveran: and from E « Baligaveran leaving the towne of Kilkenny, they came as far as to Kallan, about the « feaſt of St. Gregorie the Pope.
« At the ſame time there came letters from the Lord Edmund Botiller Juſtice of Ire« land, the Lord Thomas Fitz-John then Earle of Kildare, the Lord Richard Clare, « the Lord Arnald Power, and the Lord Maurice Fitz-Thomas, for the delivery of the « Earle of Ulſter by mainpriſe, and by a writ of the Kings: about which nothing was « then done.
« And afterward the Ulſter men came with an armie, about two thouſand, and craved
« the Kings aide for to deſtroy the Scots, as they ſaid: for which cauſe the Kings ſtan-« dard was delivered unto them: and when they had it, they did more harme than the F « Scots, and fell to eating of fleſh all Lent long, and waſted in manner the whole coun« trey, whereby they purchaſed the curſe of God and man.
« Item, a great overthrow was given unto the Iriſh, neere unto the deſert of Dermot, « that is, Troſtil-Dermot, by Edmund Botiller.
« Alſo the ſame Edmund Botiller Lord Juſtice of Ireland for the time being, gave a great

A great overthrow to O-Morgh at Balilethan. Then Brus with the Scots marched forward as farre as Limericke. But after that the braveſt forces of the Engliſh in Ireland were aſſembled together at Ledyn, they retired privily by night from the caſtle of Conniger.

And about Palme-ſunday there came newes to Dublin, that the Scots were at Kenlys in Oſſory, and the Nobles of Ireland at Kilkenny, and there levied a power to ſet forward againſt Brus: and the munday following the King gave commandement to the men of Ulſter to ſpeed them againſt the Scots, whoſe leader and head the Earle of Kildare, to wit Thomas Fitz-John was appointed to bee: and ſo they put
B themſelves on their journey: and then was Brus at Caſhill, and hee marched from thence to Nanath, and there abode, and all the lands of the Lord Butler hee burnt and deſtroied quite.

MCCCXVII. Upon Mandie thurſday the Lord Edm. Botiller the Lord Juſtice of Ireland, and Sir Thomas Fitz John Earle of Kyldare, becauſe the King gave unto them the juriſdiction and liberty of the countie of Kildare, alſo Richard Clare with the army of Ulſter, Sir Arnold Power Baron of Donnoyll, Maurice Roch-fort, Thomas Fitz-Moris, and the Cauntons with their retinue aſſembled themſelves together about the Scots: and for one whole weeke abode about them, and did nothing: whoſe forces were reckoned to be about 30000. ſtrong. And afterwards upon thurſday in Eaſter
C weeke, arrived Roger Mortimer at Yoghall with the Kings power, becauſe hee was Lord Juſtice, and the munday following ſpeedily took his journy toward the army, and ſent his letters unto Edmund Botiller late (as it hath beene ſaid) Juſtice, that hee ſhould attempt nothing againſt the Scots before his comming. But before that Mortimer came, Brus was forewarned by ſome to depart from thence: who the night following tooke his journey toward Kildare, and afterwards in the weeke following every one of the Engliſh returned hence into their countrey: and the army of Ulſter came to the Naas.

And at the ſame time two meſſengers were diſpatched from the city of Dublin, who paſſed the ſeas toward the King of England to aske advice, and to advertiſe as D touching the State of Ireland, and about the deliverance of the Earle of Ulſter.

Alſo at the ſame time the Lord Roger Mortimer Juſtice of Ireland, and the Nobles of Ireland were at Kilkenny to diſpoſe of Brus, but nothing effected they there at that time.

And about a moneth after Eaſter Brus advanced with his army about 4. leagues neere unto Trim in a certain wood, and there ſtaied a weeke and more to refreſh his men, who with hunger and travaile were almoſt periſhed, and for that many of them died there.

And afterwards on Philip and Jacob the Apoſtles day the ſaid Brus entred on his journy toward Ulſter: and after the ſaid feaſt came the Lord Roger Mortimer Juſtice
E of Ireland to Dublin, accompanied with the Lord John Wogan, and Sir Fulk Warin, with thirtie Knights and their traines: and they held a Parliament with all the Lords and Potentates of the land at Kylmainan; but did nothing there ſave onely treat about the deliverance of the Earle of Ulſter.

And on the ſunday before the feaſt of our Lords aſcenſion, there repaired again unto the Parliament at Dublin the ſaid Nobles of the land, and there they delivered the Earle of Ulſter by mainpriſe and hoſtages, and upon an oath. And the ſaid Earle having an oath tendered unto him, ſwore upon the Sacrament that hee would never worke or procure by himſelfe or by any of his friends and followers, harme or grievance upon the occaſion of his apprehenſion unto the Citizens of Dublin, but that
F which himſelfe might by order of law obtaine or get againſt the offenders or tranſgreſſours in that behalfe, and thereupon hee had time and day untill the feaſt of the Nativitie of S. John Baptiſt: at which day he came not.

Alſo in the ſame yeere Corne and other victuals were exceeding deere. A Cranok of wheat was ſold for three and twenty ſhillings, and wine for eight denires: and the whole land in maner was waſted by the Scots and Ulſter-men: yea many houſeholders, and ſuch as had ſuſtained and relieved a number of folk were driven to begge: A and a number were famiſhed. So great alſo was the death and dearth together, that the poore were pined with famine, and many died.

At the ſame time came meſſengers to Dublin out of England, with grants of pardon which they had at their will and pleaſure: but before their comming, the foreſaid Earle was delivered. And at the feaſt of Pentecoſt, Mortimer the Lord chiefe Juſtice took his journy towards Tredagh, and from thence to Trim, and ſent his letters for the Lacies to repaire unto him, who contemptuouſly refuſed to come.

And afterwards Sir Hugh Crofts Knight was ſent unto the Lacies to treat about a peace, who by them was ſlain, the more the pity. And after that Mortimer L. Juſtice B aſſembled his army againſt the Lacies, who ſeized upon their goods, cattell, and trea-ſure, and brought them to finall deſtruction, ſlew many of their men, and chaſed them into the parts of Connaght.

And it was ſaid, that Sir Walter Lacie went forth as farre as to Ulſter to ſeeke Brw.

Item, in the towne of St. Cinere in Flanders, about the feaſt of Pentecoſt, the Lord Aumar Valence and his ſonne were taken priſoners, and conveied into Almaine.
And the ſame yeere, on Munday after the feaſt of the nativitie of S. John Baptiſt, the Potentates of Ireland aſſembled themſelves to the Parliament at Dublin: and there was the Earle of Ulſter enlarged, who tooke his oath, and found mainpriſers or C ſureties to anſwer the writs of law, and to purſue the Kings enemies, both Iriſh and Scots.

Item, upon the day of the Saints Pnoceſſe and Martinian, Sir John Atly encountred at ſea Thomas Dover a right ſtrong thiefe, and took him, and about forty of his men well armed he ſlew, and his head he brought with him to Dublin.

Alſo upon the day of the tranſlation of S. Thomas, Sir Nicholas Bolſcot came out of England with newes, that two Cardinals were come from the Court of Rome into England, to treat concerning a peace, and they brought a Bull to excommunicate all the troublers of the peace of the Lord the King of England.

Likewiſe, the Thurſday next before the feaſt of St. Margaret, Hugh and Walter D Lacie were proclaimed ſeducers and felons to the King, becauſe they had advanced their banner againſt the peace of the Lord King of England.

More, on the ſunday following, the Lord Roger Mortimer Juſtice of Ireland, took his journey to Tredagh with all his ſouldiers.

At the ſame time the Ulſter-men raiſed a bootie neere unto Tredagh: and the men of Tredagh went out and fetched the bootie backe againe: where was ſlaine Miles Cogan with his brother, and ſixe other great Lords of Ulſter were taken priſoners, and brought to the caſtle of Dublin.

And afterwards Mortimer the Lord Juſtice aſſembled his army againſt O-Fervill, and commanded the Mal-paſſe to be cut downe, and deſtroied all his houſes: and af- E terwards the ſaid O-Fervil rendred himſelfe to the peace, and put in hoſtages.

Alſo the Lord Roger Mortimer Juſtice tooke his journey toward Clony, and made an inquiſition or inqueſt, as touching Sir John Blound (to wit, White) of Rathregan: which inqueſt accuſed the ſaid John; whereupon he was of neceſſity to fine for two hundred marks: and afterward on ſunday after the feaſt of the nativity of bleſſed Marie, the ſaid Mortimer with a great power marched againſt the Iriſh of O-Mayl, and came to Glinſely, where many were ſlaine both of Iriſh and Engliſh, but the Iriſh went away with the worſt: and ſoone after came O-brynn, and rendred him-ſelfe to the peace of the King. And Roger Mortimer with his company came to the caſtle of Dublin. F

And upon the day of Simon and Jude the Apoſtles, the Archbales had peace by mainpriſe of the Earle of Kildare.

And at the feaſt of Saint Hilary following there was a Parliament holden at Lin-colne, about a treaty of peace betweene the Lord King of England, and the Earle of Lancaſter, and between the Scots: and the Scots continued in peace, and by reaſon
of

A of that Parliament, the Archbiſhop of Dublin, and the Earle of Ulſter ſtaied in England by the Kings commandement. And about the feaſt of the Epiphany there came newes to Dublin, that Sir Hugh Canon the Kings Juſtice in his bench, was ſlaine by Andrew Bermingham, betweene Naas and Caſtle-Martin.

Item, at the feaſt of the purification of the bleſſed Virgin Mary, there came the Popes Buls, ſo that Alexander de Bicknor was confirmed and conſecrated Archbiſhop of Dublin: and thoſe Buls were read and publiſhed in the Church of the holy Trinity. And at the ſame time was read another Bull, that the Lord Pope ordained peace between the Lord King of England, and the Lord Robert Brus King of Scotland for B two yeeres: to which time the ſaid Brus refuſed to condeſcend and agree. Theſe things paſſed about the feaſt of St. Valentine.

Item, the ſunday following came the Lord Roger Mortimer to Dublin, and dubbed John Mortimer Knight, with foure of his fellowes: and the ſame day Mortimer kept a great feaſt in the caſtle of Dublin.

Item, at the ſame time a great ſlaughter was made of Iriſhmen in Conaght, through a quarrell betweene two Lords or Princes there: and ſlaine there were of both ſides about foure thouſand men: and afterwards there was taken great revenge upon the men of Ulſter, who in the time that the Scots ſpoiled and preaded in Ireland, had done much harme, and eate fleſh in Lent not of neceſſity: therefore much tribulation
C came upon them, inſomuch that they did eat one another; ſo that of ten thouſand there remained about 300. and no more, who eſcaped in maner all for to be puniſhed. And here appeared the vengeance of God.

Item, it was reported of a truth, that ſome of the foreſaid evill doers were ſo hunger-ſtarved, that in Church-yards they tooke the bodies out of their graves, and in their ſkuls boiled the fleſh and fed thereupon, yea and women did eat their owne children for ſtarke hunger.

MCCCXVIII. In the Quindene of Eaſter newes out of England arrived in Ireland, that the towne of Berwicke was betraied and taken by the Scots: and afterwards in the ſame yeere Maſter Walter Iſlep, the Kings Treaſurer in Ireland, landed, and D brought letters to the Lord Roger Mortimer, that he ſhould addreſſe himſelfe to repaire unto the King; who did ſo, and ſubſtituted the Lord William Archbiſhop of Caſhil Cuſtos of Ireland, who at one and the ſame time was Lord Juſtice of Ireland, Lord Chancellour, and Archbiſhop.

And afterward, at the three weekes end after Eaſter, there came newes to Dublin that the Lord Richard Clare was ſlaine, and with him foure Knights, namely, Sir Henry Capell, Sir Thomas Naas, Sir James Cannon, and Sir John Caunton: alſo Adam Apilgard, with 80. other men, by O-Brene and Mac-Carthy, on the feaſt of Saint Gordian and Epimachus. And it was reported that the ſaid Lord Richard his body was in deſpightfull malice cut into ſmall pieces; but his reliques were enterred in E Limerick among the Friers Minors.

Item, on ſunday in Menſe Paſchæ, that is, a moneth after Eaſter, John Lacy was led forth of the caſtle of Dublin, and brought to Trim, for to be arraigned and to heare and receive his judgment there: who was adjudged to be ſtrait dieted, and ſo he died in priſon.

Item, the ſunday before the Lords Aſcenſion, Lord Roger Mortimer ſailed over into England: but paied nothing for his victuals that he had taken up in Dublin and elſewhere, which amounted to the value of one thouſand pounds.

Alſo, the ſame yeere about the feaſt of S. John Baptiſt the great grace and mercy of God was ſhewed, in that wheat which before was ſold for 15. ſhillings, was now not
F worth above ſeven ſhillings, and oates were bought for five ſhillings: great plentie there was of wine, ſalt, and fiſh: and that in ſuch ſort, that about St. James day there was new bread to be had of new corne, a thing that never or ſeldome had been ſeen afore in Ireland: and this was a ſigne of Gods tender mercy, and all through the praier of the poore, and other faithfull folke.

Item, the Sunday after the feaſt of Saint Michael, newes came to Dublin, that Lord

« Lord Alexander Bykenore then the Kings Juſtice in Ireland and Archbiſhop of Dub- A « lin was arrived at Yoghall. On S. Denis day he came to Dublin, and with great pro« ceſſion and honourable pompe of the religious perſons and of others, as well of the « Clergy as the Laity, he was received.

« Item, on Saturday falling out to be the feaſt of Pope Calixtus, a field was fought « betweene the Scots and Engliſh of Ireland, two leagues from the towne of Dun« dalk: to which battell came of the Scots part, the Lord Edward Brus (who named « himſelfe King of Ireland) the Lord Philip Mowbray, the Lord Walter Soules, the « Lord Alan Stewart, with his three brethren: alſo Sir Walter Lacy, Sir Robert and « Sir Aumar Lacy, John Kermerdyne, and Walter White, and about 3000. others. A- B « gainſt whom came into the field of the Engliſh ſide, the Lord John Bermingham, Sir « Richard Tuit, Sir Miles Verdon, Sir Hugh Tripton, Sir Herbert Sutton, Sir John Cu-
« ſack, Sir Edward and Sir William Bermingham, and the Primate of Armagh, who aſ-« ſoiled them all: Sir Walter Larpulk: and certain came from Tredagh, to the number « of twenty, well appointed and choice ſouldiers, whom John Maupas accompanied:
« and ſo they joined the ſaid battell. The Engliſh were the firſt that entred with great « vigour upon the front and vaward, where the ſaid John Maupas manfully and with « much honour in this conflict ſlew the Lord Edward Brus: which John alſo was found « ſlaine upon the body of the ſaid Edward: and all the Scots in manner were killed up, « even to the number of two thouſand or thereabout: whereby few of the Scots eſca- C
« ped, beſide the Lord Philip Mowbray, who alſo was wounded to death: and Sir « Hugh Lacy, Sir Walter Lacy, with ſome few others that were with them, made ſhift « hardly to ſave themſelves. This fortuned between Dundalk and Faghird. Now the « head of the foreſaid Edward, the ſaid Lord John Bermingham brought unto the ſaid « Lord King of England: upon whom the King beſtowed at the ſame time, the Earle-« dome of Louth to him and to his heires males, and the Barony of Aterith. And one « quarter, with the hands and heart of the foreſaid Edward, were carried to Dublin, and « the other quarters divided and ſent to other places.

« MCCCXIX. The Lord Roger Mortimer returned out of England, and is eftſoones « made Lord Juſtice of Ireland. The ſame yeere at the feaſt of All-Saints came a Bull D
« from the Pope to excommunicate Robert Brus King of Scotland at every Maſſe. Al« ſo the towne of Athiſell, and a great part of the country, was burnt by the Lord John « Fitz-Thomas, whole brother of the Lord Moris Fitz-Thomas. In this yeere the fore-« ſaid John Bermingham was created Earle of Louth. Alſo the Stone bridge of Kil-« Coleyn was built by Maſter Moris Jacke, Canon of the Cathedrall Church of Kil« dare.

« MCCCXX. In the time of Pope John the 22. and of the Lord Edward ſonne to King « Edward, which Edward after the comming of Saint Auſtin into England was the « 25. King; alſo under Alexander Bicknore then Archbiſhop of Dublin beganne the « Univerſitie of the ſaid Citie of Dublin. The firſt that proceeded Maſter in the ſame E « Univerſitie, was Frier William Hardite, of the order of preaching Friers: which « William under the ſaid Archbiſhop ſolemnly commenced Doctor in Divinity. The « ſecond Maſter that proceeded in the ſame faculty, was Frier Henry Cogry, of the or« der of the Friers Minors: the third Maſter that went forth was William Rodyard « Dean of the Cathedrall Church of Saint Patricke in Dublin, who ſolemnely com« menced Doctor in the Canon law. And this William was made the firſt Chancel-« lour of the ſaid Univerſity. The fourth Maſter in ſacred Theologie or Divinity, that « went out, was Frier Edmund Kermerdin. Item, Roger Mortimer Lord Juſtice of Ire« land returned into England, leaving in his place the Lord Thomas Fitz-John then « Earle of Kildare. F

« Item, the Lord Edmund Botiller entred into England, and ſo came to Saint « James.

« Alſo the bridge of the towne of Leghelyn was built by Maſter Moris Jack Canon
« of the Cathedrall Church of Kildare.

« MCCCXXI. A very great overthrow, with much ſlaughter of the O-Conghors, was given

A given at Balibogan the ninth day of May, by the men of Leinſter and of Meth.

Item, the Lord Edmund Botiller died in London, and lieth buried at Balygaveran in Ireland. Alſo John Bermingham Earle of Louth, is made Lord Juſtice in Ireland. Likewiſe John Wogan departed this life.

MCCCXXII. Andrew Bermingham, and Nicolas de La-Lond Knight, and many others are ſlaine by O-Nalan on St. Michaels day.

MCCCXXIII. A truce is taken betweene the King of England, and Robert Brus King of Scotland for 14. yeeres. Alſo John Darcie came chiefe Juſtice of Ireland.

Item, John the firſt begotten ſonne of the Lord Thomas Fitz-John Earle of Kildare,
B in the ninth yeere of his age ended this life.

MCCCXXIV. Nicolas Genevile, ſonne and heire to the Lord Simon Genevile, departed out of this world, and was buried in the Church of the Friers Preachers of Trym.

Item, there hapned a great wind on twelfe day at night.

Item, a generall murrain there was of oxen and kine in Ireland.

MCCCXXV. Richard Lederede Biſhop of Oſſorie cited Dame Alice Ketyll upon her perverſe hereticall opinion, and cauſed her to make perſonall appearance before him: and being examined as touching ſorceries, he found by an enqueſt that ſhe had practiſed ſorceries: among which this was one foule fact of hers, that a certaine ſpirit named Robyn Artyſſon lay with her: and that ſhe offered unto him nine red cockes at a
C ſtone bridge, in a certaine foure croſſe high way.

Item, that ſhe ſwept the ſtreets of Kilkenny with beeſomes, between Complin and Courefew, and in ſweeping the filth toward the houſe of William Utlaw her ſonne, by way of conjuring mumbled theſe words:

Unto the houſe of William my ſonne,
Hie all the wealth of Kilkenny towne.

Now the complices of the ſaid Alice, and thoſe that agreed unto this divelliſh and wretched practiſe of hers, were one Pernill of Meth; and Baſilia the daughter of the ſame Pernil. When the above named Alice was by inquiſition attainted of theſe foreſaid imputations, the Biſhop puniſhed her by the purſe, and cauſed her utterly to ab-
D jure all ſorcerie and witch-craft. But when afterwards ſhee ſtood convict eftſoones of the ſame crime, herſelfe with the foreſaid Baſilia fled, but was never after found. As for the ſaid Pernill, ſhe was burnt at Kilkenny: but at the houre of death ſhee avouched that the foreſaid William deſerved death as well as her ſelfe, affirming that he for a yeere and a day wore the divels girdle upon his bare bodie. Whereupon the Biſhop cauſed the ſaid William to bee apprehended and laid in priſon for eight or nine weekes within the Caſtle of Kilkenny: and by the Biſhops decree and appointment hee had two men to give attendance and to miniſter unto him, with expreſſe commandement, not to ſpeake unto him but once a day, nor to eat or drinke with him. At length the ſaid William, by the helpe of the Lord Arnald Poer Seneſchall
E of the Countie of Kilkenny, was delivered forth of priſon: and the foreſaid William gave a great ſumme of money unto the abovenamed Arnold, to impriſon the Biſhop aforeſaid. The Lord Arnold before named cauſed the Biſhop aforeſaid to lye in priſon about three moneths.

Now among the goods and implements of the ſaid Alice, there was a certaine holy Wafer-cake found, having the name of the Divell imprinted upon it: there was found alſo a boxe, and within it an ointment, wherewith ſhe uſed to beſmear or greaſe a certaine piece of wood called a Coultree: which being thus annointed, the ſaid Alice with her complices could ride and gallop upon the ſaid Coultree whetherſoever they would, all the world over through thick & thin, without either hurt or hin-
F drance. And becauſe the foreſaid things were ſo notorious, Alice was cited againe to appeare at Dublin, before M. Deane of the Church of St. Patricke, there to finde greater favour. Who there made her appearance, and craved a day of anſwer, under a ſufficient mainpriſe and ſuretiſhip, as it was thought. But ſhee was no more to be ſeene: for by the counſell of her ſonne, and others that were not knowne, was ſhe kept hidden in a farme houſe or village, untill the winde ſerved for England, and ſo ſhe

paſſed

« paſſed over: and never was it knowne whither ſhe went. Now becauſe it was found A
« by the inquiſition and recognizance of the ſaid Parnell condemned to be burnt, that « William Utlaw was conſenting to his mother in her ſorcerie and with-craft: the Bi« ſhop cauſed him to be arreſted and taken by the Kings writ, and to be kept in priſon:
« who in the end through the ſupplication of great Lords was ſet free: yet with this « condition, that he ſhould cauſe the Church of S. Maries in Kilkenny to be covered all « over with lead, and to doe other almeſ-deeds by a certaine time; which almeſ-deeds « if he performed not within the ſaid terme, then he ſhould be in the ſame ſtate where-
« in he ſtood when he was taken by vertue of the Kings Proceſſe.

« MCCCXXVI. A Parliament was holden at Whitſontide in Kilkenny: unto which B « Parliament came the Lord Richard Burk the Earle of Ulſter, although he was ſome-
« what weake and crazie: thither repaired alſo all the Lords and Potentates of Ireland:
« and there the ſaid Earle made a great and noble feaſt unto the Lords and the people.
« Afterwards the Lord Earle taking his leave of thoſe Nobles and Lords, went to A- « thiſell, where he ended his life. And a little before the feaſt of S. John Baptiſt he was « there enterred. The Lord William Burk became his heire.

« MCCCXXVII. There aroſe a quarrell and a fray betweene the Lord Moris Fitz-« Thomas and the Lord Arnald Power: and the Lord Moris had in his traine and com« pany, the Lord Botiller, and the Lord William Bermingham: and the Lord Arnald
« had in his retinew the Bourkeins: of whom the ſaid Lord Morrice Fitz-Thomas ſlew C
« many, and ſome he chaſed into Connaght.

« In the ſame yeere after Michaelmas the Lord Arnald came to aide the Bourkeins:
« and by occaſion of certaine rude and uncivill tearmes which the Lord Arnald had « given out, in calling him Rymour, the ſaid Morice raiſed an armie againe, and to« gether with Botiller and the ſaid William Bermingham with a puiſſant hoaſt burnt
« the lands and poſſeſſions of the ſaid Lord Arnald in Ofath. Alſo the ſaid William « Bermingham fired the lands and manour houſes of the Lord Arnald Power in Moun-« ſter; and Kenlys in Oſſerie he burnt: ſo that the Lord Arnald was forced to fly with « the Baron of Donnyl to Waterford, and there they remained a moneth, until that the « Earle of Kildare, then Lord Juſtice of Ireland, and others of the Kings Counſel took D
« a day betweene them: which day the Lord Arnald kept not, but came to Dublin, and « paſſed the ſeas into England about the feaſt of the Purification: and after that Arnald
« had ſailed over, the ſaid Moris Botiller and the Lord William Bermingham with a « great armie came, ſpoiled, harried, and burnt the lands of the ſaid Arnald: and by « reaſon of thoſe puiſſant forces that they had led, and the many miſchiefes which « they had done, the Kings miniſters of his Counſell feared leſt he would beſiege Ci« ties: and therefore the Cities made proviſion with more warding and watching the « while betweene. And when the ſaid Lord Moris Botiler, and William heard that the « Cities made ſuch proviſion and preparation before hand, they gave intelligence un-
« to the Kings Counſell that they would come to Kilkenny, and there cleere himſelves, E
« that they never thought to doe any noiſance to the lands of their ſoveraigne Lord
« the King, but onely to be revenged of their enemies. Unto which Parliament came « the Earle of Kildare then Juſtice of Ireland, the Prior of Kilmaynon, to wit, Roger « Outlaw Chancellour of Ireland, Nicholas Faſtoll Juſtice in the Bench, and others of « the Kings Counſell: and the foreſaid (Moris and William) demanded the Kings Char« ter of peace, but they of the Kings Counſell warily making anſwer, tooke day unto « the moneth after Eaſter, that they might with their fellowes of the Counſell, treat « upon this point.

« In the ſame yeere before Lent the Iriſh of Leinſter gathered themſelves together,
« and ſet up a certain King, namely Donald the ſonne of Arte Mac-Murgh. Who be- F « ing made King, determined to ſet up his banner two miles from Dublin: and after« wards to paſſe through all the lands of Ireland. Whoſe pride and malice God ſeeing, « ſuffered him to fall into the hands of the Lord Henry Traharn; who brought him to « the Salmons leaps, & had of him 200. pound for his lives ranſome, & then led him to « Dublin, to wait there untill the Kings Counſell could provide and take order what

to

A to doe with him: and after his taking many infortunities lighted upon the Iriſh of Leinſter, to wit, the Lord John Welleſley took David O-Thothiel priſoner, and many of the Iriſh were ſlaine.

The ſame yeere Adam Duff the ſonne of Walter Duff of Leinſter, and of the kinred of the O-Tothiles, was convicted; for that againſt the Catholike faith, hee denied the Incarnation of Jeſus Chriſt, and held that there could not bee three perſons and one God: and hee affirmed that the moſt bleſſed Virgin Mary, mother of our Lord, was an harlot: hee denied alſo the reſurrection of the dead, and avouched that the ſacred Scriptures were fables, and nothing elſe: and he imputed falſitie upon the ſacred
B Apoſtolicall See. For which and for every of theſe articles the ſame Adam Duff was pronounced an hereticke and blaſphemer: whereupon the ſame Adam by a decree of the Church was on the Munday after the Outas of Eaſter the yeere 1328. burnt at Hoggis (Greene) by Dublin.

MCCCXXVIII. On Tueſday in Eaſter week Thomas Fitz-John Earle of Kildare and Juſtice of Ireland died: after whom ſucceeded in the office of Juſtice, Frier Roger Outlaw Prior of Kilmaynok. The ſame yeere David O-Tothil, a ſtrong thiefe and enemy to the King, a burner of Churches and deſtroier of people, was brought forth of the Caſtle of Dublin to the Tolſtale of the Citie, before Nicolas Faſtoll and Elias Aſhbourne Juſtices in the (Kings) bench: which Juſtices gave him his judgement,
C that he ſhould firſt be drawne at horſes tailes through the midſt of the Citie unto the gallowes, and afterward be hanged upon a jebbit, which was done accordingly. Item, in the ſame yeere the Lord Moris Fitz-Thomas raiſed a great army to deſtroy the Bourkeins and the Poers. The ſame yeere alſo the Lord William Bourk was knighted at London on Whitſunday, and the King gave unto him his Seignory. Alſo in the ſame yeere James Botiller in England eſpouſed the daughter of the Earle of Hereford, and was created Earle of Ormund, who before was called Earle of Tiperary.

The ſame yeere a Parliament was holden at Northampton, where many of the Lords and Nobles of England aſſembled: and a peace was renewed betweene Scotland, England and Ireland by marriages between them: and it was ordained that the D Earle of Ulſter, with many Nobles of England, ſhould goe to Barwick upon Tweed, to the eſpouſals and aſſurance making.

The ſame yeere after the ſaid eſpouſals and contract made at Barwicke, the Lord Robert Brus King of Scotland, and the Lord William Burk Earle of Ulſter, the Earle of Menteth, and many of the Scottiſh nobility arrived at Cragfergus peaceably, and ſent unto the Juſtices of Ireland and to the Counſell, that they would come to Green Caſtle, to treat about a peace of Scotland and Ireland. Now becauſe the ſaid Juſtices of Counſell failed to come as the ſaid King deſired, he took his leave of the Earle of Ulſter, and returned into his owne country after the feaſt of the aſſumption of the bleſſed Virgin Mary. And the Earle of Ulſter came to Dublin unto the Parliament,
E and there ſtayed ſixe dayes, and made a great feaſt, and after this went into Connaght.

The ſame yeere, about the feaſt of Saint Katherin Virgin, the Biſhop of Oſſerie certified the Kings Counſell there, that Sir Arnald Pover was convicted before him upon divers articles of perverſe hereſie. Whereupon, at the ſuit of the ſaid Biſhop, the ſaid Sir Arnald by vertue of the Kings writ was arreſted and layed up in the Caſtle of Dublin: and a day was given unto the Biſhop for to come unto Dublin, to follow the foreſaid ſuit and action againſt the foreſaid Lord Arnald: who made his excuſe, that hee could not then come, becauſe his enemies lay in wait for his life in the way: whereupon the Kings Counſell knew not how to make an end of this buſineſſe;
F and ſo the Lord Arnald was kept in dureſſe within the Caſtle of Dublin untill the Parliament following, which was in Mid-lent, where all the Nobles of Ireland were preſent.

In the ſame yeere Frier Roger Utlaw, Prior of the Hoſpitall of St. John of Jeruſalem in Ireland, Lord Juſtice and Chancellour of Ireland, was diſfamed by the ſaid Biſhop, and ſlandered to bee a favourer of hereſie, a Counſellour alſo and abetter of

« the ſaid Lord Arnold in his hereticall naughtineſſe. And becauſe his perſon was thus A « villanouſly defamed, the ſaid Prior went to the Counſell of the King, and put up a « petition that hee might purge himſelfe. Whereupon they of the Kings Counſell « tooke advice, and upon conſultation had, granted unto him that he might make his « purgation: And they cauſed it to be proclaimed for three dayes, That if there were « any perſon, who would follow ſuit and give information againſt the ſaid Frier Roger,
« he might come in and put in his purſuit: But no man was found to follow the mat« ter. Whereupon at the procurement of Sir Roger the Frier, there went out the « Kings writ to ſummon the Elders of Ireland, to wit, Biſhops, Abbots, Priors, and « foure Maiors of foure Cities, namely, Dublin, Corke, Limerick and Waterford, and B « of Tredagh: alſo the Sheriffes and Seneſchals, yea and the Knights of the ſhire, with « the Free-holders of the countie that were of the better ſort, for to repaire unto Dub« lin. And there were choſen ſixe examiners in the ſaid cauſe, to wit, M. William Rod- « yard, Deane of the Cathedrall Church of St. Patrick in Dublin, the Abbat of Saint « Thomas, the Abbat of St. Maries, the Prior of holy Trinitie Church in Dublin, M.
« Elias Lawles, and M. Peter Willebey: Theſe Inquiſitours convented thoſe that were « cited, and they examined every one ſeverally by himſelfe: which examinats all up« on their oathes depoſed, that he was honeſt and faithfull, a zealous embracer of the « faith, and readie to die for the faith: and in regard of this great ſolemnity of his pur« gation, the ſaid Frier Roger made a royall feaſt to all that would come. C « Alſo the ſame yeere in Lent died the ſaid L. Arnald Power in the Caſtle of Dublin, « and lay a long time unburied in the houſe of the preaching Friers.
« MCCCXXIX. After the feaſt of the Annuntiation of the bleſſed Virgin Mary, the « Nobles of Ireland came unto the Parliament at Dublin, to wit, the Earle of Ulſter,
« the Lord Thomas Fitz-Moris, the Earle of Louth, William Bermingham, and the reſt « of the Lords: and a peace was renewed there betweene the Earle of Ulſter, and the « Lord Moris Fitz-Thomas: & the ſaid Lords with the Kings Counſel ordained there
« that the Kings peace ſhould be fully kept: ſo that every Nobleman and Chieftaine « ſhould keep in his owne ſept, retinew, and ſervants, and the ſaid Earle of Ulſter made
« a great feaſt in the Caſtle of Dublin: and the Lord Moris Fitz-Thomas the morrow D « after kept a great feaſt within the Church of St. Patrick in Dublin: and Frier Roger « Outlaw Juſtice of Ireland feaſted likewiſe upon the third day at Kylmaynon, and ſo « they departed.
« The ſame yeere on the Vigill of St. Barnabee the Apoſtle, Sir John Bermingham
« Earle of Louth was ſlaine at Balybragan in Urgal, by thoſe of Urgal: and with him « Peter Bermingham the ſaid Earles legitimate and whole brother, alſo Robert Ber- « mingham the ſame Earles putative brother, Sir John Bermingham the ſon of his bro« ther Richard Lord of Anry, William Finne Bermingham, the Unkles ſonne by the « mothers ſide of the foreſaid Lord of Anry, Simon Bermingham the ſame Williams « ſonne, Thomas Bermingham the ſon of Robert of Conaght, Peter Bermingham the E « ſonne of James of Conaght, Henry Bermingham of Conaght, and Richard Talbot of « Malaghide a valiant man at armes, and two hundred with them whoſe names are not « knowne.
« Item, after the foreſaid ſlaughter the Lord Simon Genevile his men invaded the « country of Carbry, for to ſpoile and harry them, in regard of their robberies and man« ſlaughters committed many times in Meth: but before the ſaid invaſion, they of Car- « bry aroſe, and ſlew of the ſaid Simons men threeſcore and ſixteen.
« Alſo the ſame yeere on the morrow after holy Trinitie Sunday there came to Dub- « lin, John Gernon and Roger Gernon his brother in the behalfe of thoſe of Urgal, and « made humble requeſt, that they might ſtand to be tried at the Common Law. And F « on Tueſday, which was the morrow after the feaſt of St. John Baptiſt, John and Ro« ger hearing that the Lord William Bermingham was comming, departed out of Dub- « lin. The ſame yeere on the Vigill of St. Laurence, the Lord Thomas Botiller went « with a great power into the parts of Ardnorwith, and there encountred the ſaid Lord « Thomas Williams Mac-Goghgan with his forces: and there was the ſaid L. Thomas ſlaine

A to the great losse of the land of Ireland, & with him were killed the Lord John Ledewich, Roger Ledewich, Thomas Ledewich, John Nangle, Meiler Petit, Simon Petit, David Nangle, Sir John Waringer, James Terel, Nicholas White, William Freines, Peter Kent, John White, and together with them one hundred and forty men whose names are unknowne. And on the tuesday next before the feast of St. Bartholomew, the body of the said Lord Thomas Botiller was conveied to Dublin, and bestowed in the house of the preaching Friers, but as yet not buried: and the sunday next ensuing the feast of the beheading of St. John Baptist, the said Lord Thomas his corps was very honourably carried through the city, and enterred in the Church of the B preaching Friers, and the wife of the said Lord John that day made a feast.

In the same yeere John Lord Dracy came Justice of Ireland the second time: and the said Lord John espoused the Lady Joan de Burk Countesse of Kildare, the third day of July, at Maynoth.

Item, Philip Stanton is slaine. Also Henry Lord Traharn is treacherously taken in his owne house at Kilbego by Richard the sonne of Philip Onolan.

More, the Lord James Botiller Earle of Ormond burnt Foghird against Onolan, for the foresaid Henries sake brother of Botiller.

The same yeere, on wednesday next after the feast of the Ascension of the blessed Virgin Mary, John Lord Darcy Justice of Ireland went toward the parts of New-
C castle, of Mac-Kingham and Wikelow, against the O-Brynns: and the monday following certain of Lawles were slaine, and many wounded, and namely, Robert Locam was hurt, and of the Irish the better sort were slaine, many likewise wounded, and the rest fled. But Murkad O-Brynne yeelded himselfe an hostage together with his son, unkle, and unkles sonne, and they were brought to the castle of Dublin. But afterwards delivered for other hostages the better sort of their sept and kin.

The same yeere the Lord Justice, namely, the Lord John Darcy and those of the Kings Counsell in Ireland, about the feast of the Circumcision of our Lord, charged the Lord Moris Fitz-Thomas of Desmund, that himselfe should come into the field with his forces for to vanquish the Kings enemies: giving him to understand, that D their soveraigne Lord the King would provide for to defray the charges of him and of his army: and the said Moris came with his power, and Briene O-Brene was in his company: and their army consisted of ten thousand men: and the said Lord Moris advanced with his army first against the O-Nolanes, vanquished them, gat a great bootie, and wasted their lands with fire: and the O-Nolanes fled, and afterwards delivered hostages, who were sent unto the castle of Dublin. And afterwards the said Lord Moris made a journy against the O-Morches, who did put in their hostages for to keepe the Kings peace. The same time the castle of Ley which O-dympcy had won and kept, was rendred up to the said Moris. The same yeere after the Epiphany of our Lord, Donald Arts Mac-Murgh made an escape out of the castle of Dublin by E a cord, which one Adam Nangle had bought for him: which Adam afterwards was drawne and hanged.

MCCCXXX. Mighty winds were up in divers places, about the feast daies of St. Katherine, S. Nicolas, and of the Nativitie of our Lord: by which wind part of the wall of a certain house fell downe, and killed the wife of Sir Miles Verdon with his daughter, on S. Nicolas even, such winds as the like were never seene in Ireland.

Item, there was such an inundation of the water of Boyn, as never had been known before: by which flood all the bridges, as well of stone as of timber, standing over the said water, were utterly cast downe, unlesse it were Babe bridge. The water also carried away divers mills, and did much hurt to the Friers Minors of Trym, and Tre-
F dagh, in breaking down their houses. The same yeere, about the feast of S. John Baptist, there began a great dearth of corne in Ireland, and continued untill Michaelmas. Item, a cranoc of wheat was sold for 20. shillings: also a cranoc of oats for eight shillings, and one cranoc of peason, beanes, and of barly for 8. shillings. And this dearth hapned by occasion of abundance of raine, so that much of the standing corne could not be reaped before the feast of St. Michael.

The ſame yeere, the Engliſh of Meth made a ſlaughter of the Iriſh (to wit, of Mac-Goghigans people) about Lent, neere unto Loghynerthy, whereupon the ſaid Mac-Goghigan in anger burnt in thoſe parts 15. ſmall villages, and ſacked them: which the Engliſh ſeeing, gathered themſelves together againſt him, and of his men ſlew one hundred, and among whom were ſlaine three Lords ſons of the Iriſh. A

Item, the Lord William Burgh Earle of Ulſter led forth an army out of Ulſter into Mounſter againſt Briene O-Brene.

Alſo the Lady Joan Counteſſe of Kildare, was at Maynoth delivered of William her firſt ſonne, that the Lord John Darcy had by her, whiles the Lord John abode in England. B

Item, Reymund Lawles is ſlaine treacherouſly at Wickelow.

More, a Parliament was holden at Kilkenny, by Frier Roger Utlaw the Prior of Kylmainon, then Lievtenant under the Lord Juſtice, at which were preſent Alexander Archbiſhop of Dublin, the Lord William Earle of Ulſter, the Lord James Earle of Ormond, the Lord William Bermingham, and Walter Burk of Conaght: and every of them with a great power ſet forward to expell Briene O-Brene out of Urkiff neere Caſhill.

But the Earle of Deſmond by a wile eſcaped out of the cuſtody of the ſaid Marſhall, and went his way. C MCCCXXXI. The Lord Hugh Lacy with the Kings pardon and peace entred Ireland. Alſo the Earle of Ulſter entred England.

Alſo there was given an overthrow to the Iriſh in Okenſeley by the Engliſh the one and twenty day of April.

Item, the ſame day on the Vigill of Saint Marke the Evangeliſt, the O-Tothely came to Tanelagh, and robbed Alexander Archbiſhop of Dublin, tooke away three hundred ſheepe, and ſlew Richard White and other honeſt men of his company. D Then ran rumours to Dublin of that depredation and ſlaughter: and Sir Philip Bryt knight, and Frier Moris Fitz-Gerald Knight of the order of Knights Hoſpitalers, Hamnud Archdekyn, John Chamberlane, Robert Tyrell, and the two ſons of Reginald Bernewall, and many others, but eſpecially of the retinew of the Lord Archbiſhop of Dublin, were by a traine or ambuſh ſlaine by David O-Tothill in Culiagh.

Alſo the Lord William Bermingham led forth a great army againſt the foreſaid Iriſh, and did much harme unto them, but more would have done, had he not beene empeached by the falſe promiſes of the Iriſh.

Item, thoſe of the Engliſh pale at Thurles gave a great overthrow unto Briene O-Brene, and ſlew many of the Iriſh in the moneth of May. E

Item, at Finnagh in Meth the Engliſh of the ſaid pale defeated the Iriſh upon the eleventh day of June.

Alſo, when famine encreaſed much in Ireland, the mercy of God ſo diſpoſed, that upon the ſeven and twenty day of June there came to land a mighty multitude of great ſea fiſhes, to wit, Thurlhedis, ſuch as in many ages paſt had never beene ſeene, which by the eſtimation of many men amounted to the number of five hundred: and this hapned neere unto Connyng, and the water called Doayz in the haven of Dublin, about evening: and Anthony Lord Lucy then Juſtice of Ireland, with his owne people and certain citizens of Dublin, amongſt whom was Philip Cradock, killed of the foreſaid fiſhes above 200. and no man was forbidden to carry away, the ſame Juſtice giving order therefore. F

Item, Antony Lord Lucy Juſtice of Ireland ordained a common Parliament at Dublin, in the Utas of Saint John Baptiſt: unto which certaine of the Ancients of the land came not. Then the ſaid Juſtice removed to Kilkenny, proroging the

ſaid

A ſaid Parliament, from the foreſaid Octaves unto the feaſt of Saint Peter ad Vincula. Unto which place there repaired the Lord Thomas Fitz-Thomas, and many other Nobles of the land, who came not in before, ſubmitting themſelves to the Kings grace and mercy. And the King for his part as much as concerned himſelfe under a certaine forme of pardon gratiouſly forgave all the miſchiefes committed by the foreſaid perſons in the land.

Item, the Iriſh of Leinſter made ſpoile of the Engliſh, and burnt Churches: and in the Church of Freineſton they burnt about foureſcore men and women, and a certain Chaplain of the ſaid Church, arraied in his ſacred veſtiments and with the body of our Lord, they repelled backe with their javelins when he would have gone forth, and burnt him with the reſt in the Church. Theſe newes came unto the eares of the Lord Pope, who ſent his Bull or briefe unto the Archbiſhop of Dublin, commanding him to excommunicate the ſaid Iriſh, and all their adherents, together with their reti-
D nue and followers, and to interdict their lands. Now the Archbiſhop fulfilled the commandement of the Lord Pope: but the ſaid Iriſh, contemning the ſaid Bull, excommunication, interdiction, and chaſtiſement of the Church, and continuing ſtill in their wickedneſſe, drew themſelves againe together, and invaded all the county of Weisford, as farre as to Carcarne, and ſpoiled the whole country. Whom the Engliſh made head againſt, to wit, Richard White and Richard Fitz-Henry, with the Burgeſſes of Weisford and other Engliſh, ſlew of the Iriſh about 400. and many others of them as they fled were drowned in the river which is called Slane.

E ſaid Sir William was a noble Knight, and among many thouſand knights moſt renowned and excellent for feats of armes: Alas the day! great pity it was of him; for who relating his death can forbeare teares? Alſo the Lord Antony Lucy Juſtice of Ireland is put out of his office, and returneth into England with his wife and children in the month of November. In whoſe place alſo is ſet John Lord Darcy Juſtice of Ireland: and he entred Ireland the Alſo, a certain maladie named Muſſes reigned all over Ireland, as well in old men and women, as in young and little ones.

« Item, the hoſtages abiding in the caſtle of Lymericke ſlew the Conſtable of the A « ſame caſtle, and ſeized the caſtle into their owne hands: but after that the caſtle was « recovered by the citizens, the ſame hoſtages were put to the ſword and killed. Like-« wiſe the hoſtages tooke the caſtle of Nenagh, and when part of it was burnt, recove« red it was againe, and the hoſtages were reſerved.

« of Dublin, after he had beene impriſoned one yeere and a halfe, having gotten many « mainpriſers firſt, even the greateſt and nobleſt perſonages of the land to be bound for « him, in the forfeiture of life, loſſe of all their goods, if then the ſaid Lord Moris attemp« ted ought againſt the King, and if thoſe Nobles aboveſaid preſented not his perſon « unto the King for his demerits.
« Alſo William Burk Earle of Ulſter, betweene the New-towne and Cragfergus in C « Ulſter, was traiterouſly (the more pitty) ſlaine by his owne company, in the twentieth « yeere of his age, and the ſixth day of the month June: Robert the ſonne of Maurice « Maundevil was hee that gave him his firſt wound. Upon the hearing of which ru« mours, the Earles wife being then in the parts of Ulſter with her daughter and heire, « preſently embarked and went over into England. After whoſe murdering, John L.
« Darcy Lord chiefe Juſtice of Ireland, to revenge the Earles death, by advice of all the « States of the land aſſembled in the ſaid Parliament, forthwith with his army took his « journy, and by ſhip arrived at Cragfergus upon the firſt day of July. Now the people « of the country rejoicing at the Lord Juſtice his comming, and thereby taking heart
« unto them againſt the murderers of the ſaid Earle of Ulſter, with one aſſent roſe up to D
« revenge the killing of him, and in a pitched field obtained victory: ſome they tooke « priſoners, others they put to the ſword. The things thus diſpatched, the ſaid Juſtice « with his ſaid army went into Scotland, leaving in his place M. Thomas Burgh Trea« ſurer at that time of Ireland.
« Item, many Nobles of the land and the Earle of Ormond with their retinue and « followers aſſembled together at the houſe of the Carmelite Friers in Dublin, the 11.
« day of June: and during this ſaid Parliament, whereas they were going out of the « Court yard of the ſaid Friers, ſodainly within the preſſe of the people Murchard or « Moris the ſonne of Nicolas O-Tothil was there murdered. At whoſe ſodaine killing
« all the Elders of the land fearing and ſuppoſing there was ſome treaſon, were ſtrucken E « with an extraordinary and ſtrange affright, and much troubled. And he that killed the « ſame Murchard ſtoutly eſcaped all their hands: but neither the party himſelfe nor « pence in Dublin.

« Alſo Sir Reimund Archdekon Knight, and many others of the ſame kinred, were « ſlaine in Leinſter.
« MCCCXXXVII. In the Vigill of S. Kalixt Pope, ſeven partridges (and unknown it « is what ſpirit moved them) leaving the plaine field, made way directly unto the City

of

A of Dublin, and flying moſt ſwiftly over the mercate places, ſetled on the top of the Brew-houſe, belonging to the Canons of holy Trinity in Dublin. To which ſight ſome Citizens came running, and wondered much at ſo ſtrange a prodigie. But the boyes of the city caught two of them alive, a third they killed: and the reſt ſcared therewith mounting up higher took their ſwift flight and eſcaped into the fields over againſt them. Now what this accident (not heard of in the ages before) did portend, I leave to the judgement of thoſe that are cunning and skilfull.

Alſo Sir John Charleton Knight and a Baron, with his wife, ſonnes, and daughters, and his whole family, came at the feaſt of S. Calixtus Pope, as chiefe Juſtice of Ire-
B land: and of his ſonnes and houſhold ſome died.

Alſo Lord Thomas Charleton, Biſhop of Hereford, & brother in the whole blood unto the ſaid Juſtice, came the ſame day with his brother as Chancellour of Ireland, together with Maſter John Rees Treaſurer of Ireland, and Doctor in the Decretals, bringing with them many Welſhmen, to the number of two hundred, and arrived in the haven of Dublin.

Alſo whiles John Charleton was Lord Juſtice and held a Parliament at Dublin, Doctor David O-Hirraghey Archbiſhop of Ardmagh being called to the Parliament made his proviſion for houſekeeping in the Monaſtery of S. Mary neere unto Dublin: but becauſe hee would have had his Croſier before him, hee was impeached by the C Archbiſhop and his Clerkes, and permit him they would not.

D Item, Sir Euſtace Pover, and Sir John Pover his Unkle, are by the ſaid Juſtice brought out of Mounſter to Dublin, and committed to priſon in the caſtle the third day of February.

Alſo, in the parts of Ireland the froſt was ſo vehement, that Aven-Liffie, the river of Dublin, was ſo frozen that very many danced and leaped upon the Ice of the ſaid river, they played at foot-ball, and ran courſes there: yea and they made fires of wood and of turfe upon the ſame Ice, and broyled herrings thereupon. This Ice laſted very many dayes. And as for the ſnow alſo in the parts of Ireland that accompanied the ſame froſt, a man need not ſpeake any more, ſeeing it was knowne to lye on ſuch a wonderfull depth. This hard time of weather continued from the ſecond
E day of December unto the tenth day of February: the like ſeaſon was never heard of before, eſpecially in Ireland.

MCCCXXXIX. All Ireland was generally up in armes. Item, an exceeding great ſlaughter there was of the Iriſh, and a number of them drowned, even 1200. at the leaſt, by the meanes of the Lord Moris Fitz-Thomas Earle of Deſmond, and the reſt of the Geraldines in the parts of Kernige.

Item, the Lord Moris Fitz-Nicolas, Lord of Kernige, was apprehended and impriſoned by the Lord Moris Fitz-Thomas Earle of Deſmond, and died in priſon, being put to ſtrait diet, for that he openly went out and rebelled with the ſaid Iriſh againſt the Lord King of England, and againſt the Lord Earle.

F Item, a number of the O Dymcies and other Iriſh were killed and drowned in the water of Barrow by the Engliſh, and the hot purſuit of the Earle of Kildare.

Alſo a great booty of cattell of ſundry ſorts, and ſuch a booty as had not been ſeen in the parts of Leinſter, by the ſaid Lord Thomas Biſhop of Hereford and Juſtice of Ireland, and with the helpe of the Engliſh of that country, was taken from the Iriſh in the parts of Odrone in the end of February.

MCCCXL. The ſaid Biſhop of Hereford and Juſtice of Ireland, being ſent for by A the King, returned into England the tenth day of Aprill, leaving in his place Frier Roger Outlaw Priour of Kylmaynon. Alſo this Sir Roger Lord Priour of Kylmainon, Juſtice and Chancellour of the ſaid land, died the thirteenth day of February.

Item, the King of England granted by his letters patents unto John Darcy the office of Lord Juſtice of Ireland for terme of life.

MCCCXLI. Sir John Moris Knight came Lord Juſtice of Ireland in the moneth of May, as Lievtenant unto John Darcy in the foreſaid land.

Item, this wondrous prodigie following, and ſuch as in our age had not been heard B of before, hapned in the county of Leinſter: where a certain waifaring man as he travelled in the Kings high way, found a paire of gloves, fit, as he thought, for his owne turne: which as he drew upon his hands, forthwith in ſtead of a mans voice and ſpeech, he kept a ſtrange and marvellous barking like unto a dogge: and from that preſent, the elder folke and full growne, yea and women too throughout the ſame county, barked like bigge dogges; but the children and little ones waughed as ſmall whelpes.
This plague continued with ſome 18. daies, with others a whole moneth, and with ſome for two yeeres. Yea this foreſaid contagious malady entred alſo into the neighbour ſhires, and forced the people in like manner to barke.

Alſo, the King of England revoked all thoſe gifts and grants that by him or his fa- C ther had bin conferred by any meanes upon any perſons whatſoever in Ireland, were they liberties, lands, or other goods: for which revocation great diſpleaſure and diſcontent aroſe in the land: and ſo the land of Ireland was at the point to have beene loſt for ever out of the King of Englands hand.

Item, by the Kings Councell there was ordained a generall Parliament of Ireland in the moneth of October. To the ſame Parliament Moris Fitz-Thomas Earle of Deſmond came not. Before which time there was never knowne ſo notable and manifeſt a diviſion in Ireland, between thoſe that were Engliſh by birth, and Engliſh in blood. The Maiors beſides of the Kings cities in the ſame land, together with all the better ſort of the Nobility and Gentry of the ſaid land, with one conſent upon D mature deliberation and counſell had, among other their concluſions, decreed and appointed a common Parliament at Kilkenny in November, to the utility and profit both of the King and the land before named: without asking any counſell at all of the Lord Juſtice and the Kings officers aforeſaid in this behalfe.

Now the Lord Juſtice, and the reſt of the Kings Miniſters, in no wiſe preſumed to come unto the ſame Parliament at Kilkenny. The Elders therefore of the land a-foreſaid, together with the Ancients and Maiors of the cities, agreed and ordained as touching ſolemne Embaſſadours to be ſent with all ſpeed unto the King of England, about relieving the State of the land, and to complaine of his Miniſters in Ireland, as touching their unequall and unjuſt regiment of the ſame, and that from thenceforth E they neither could nor would endure the realme of Ireland to be ruled by his Miniſters, as it had wont to be. And particularly they make complaint of the foreſaid Miniſters, by way of theſe Queſtions.

Imprimis, How a land full of warres could be governed by him that was unskilfull in warre?

Secondly, how a Miniſter or Officer of the Kings ſhould in a ſhort time grow to ſo great wealth?

Thirdly, how it came to paſſe that the King was never the richer for Ireland?

MCCCXLII. The eleventh day of October, when the moone was eleven dayes old, there were ſeen by many men at Dublin 2. moones in the firmament well and early F before day. The one was according to the courſe of nature in the Weſt, and appeared bright: the other to the quantity of a round loafe appeared in the Eaſt, caſting but a meane and ſlender light.

MCCCXLIII. St. Thomas ſtreet in Dublin was caſually burnt with fire upon the feaſt of S. Valentine Martyr.

Item,

A Item, the 13. day of July, the Lord Ralph Ufford, with his wife the Counteſſe of Ulſter, came Lord chiefe Juſtice of Ireland: Upon whoſe entring, the faire weather changed ſodainly into a diſtemperature of the aire, and from that time there enſued great ſtore of raine, with ſuch abundance of tempeſtuous ſtormes, untill his dying day. None of his predeceſſours in the times paſt, was (with griefe be it ſpoken) comparable unto him. For this Juſticer bearing the office of Juſtice-ſhip, became an oppreſſor of the people of Ireland, a robber of the goods both of Clergy and Laity, of rich and poore alike: a defrauder of many under the colour of doing good: not obſerving the rights of the Church, nor keeping the lawes of the kingdome, offering
B wrongs to the naturall inhabitants, miniſtring juſtice to few or none, and altogether diſtruſting (ſome few onely excepted) the inborne dwellers in the land. Theſe things did hee ſtill, and attempted the like, miſled by the counſell and perſwaſion of his wife.

Item, the ſaid Juſtice entring into Ulſter in the moneth of March through a Pas, called Emerdullan, was fiercely ſet upon by Mac-Carton, the which Mac-Carton verily having encountred with the ſaid Juſtice, ſpoiled him of his clothes, mony, utenſils, ſilver, plate, and horſes, yea and ſlew ſome of his men. But in the end, the foreſaid Juſtice with the helpe of the men of Ergale got the victory, and entred into the parts of Ulſter.

C MCCCXLV. The ſeventh of June a common Parliament was holden at Dublin, unto which the Lord Moris Fitz-Thomas came not.

Item, the Lord Ralph Ufford Juſtice of Ireland, after the feaſt of S. John Baptiſt, with the Kings ſtandard railed (yet without the aſſent of the Elders of the land) againſt the Lord Moris Fitz-Thomas Earle of Deſmond, marcheth forthwith into Mounſter, and there ſeized into the Kings hands the Earles lands: and theſe lands ſo ſeized letteth out to farme unto others for a certain yeerly rent, to be carried unto the King.

Item, the ſaid Juſtice being in the parts of Mounſter, delivered unto Sir William Burton Knight, two writs: the one whereof the ſaid William ſhould deliver unto the D Lord Moris Fitz-Thomas Earle of Kildare: the contents of which was this; That upon paine of forfeiting all his lands, he ſhould with all ſpeed repaire unto him, to aid the King and him with a ſtrong power. Now in the other writ contained it was, that the ſaid Sir William ſhould apprehend the ſaid Earle of Kildare, and ſo apprehended commit him to priſon. But Sir William ſeeing that this could not poſſibly be brought about and effected accordingly by himſelfe, with colourable words framed for the nonce, perſwaded the ſaid Earle, whiles he was preparing himſelfe with his army, and levying a power unto the foreſaid Juſtice, that before his departure out of the countrey, hee ſhould repaire unto the Kings Counſell at Dublin, and that by the unanimity and joint counſell of the ſame ſo deale, as to provide for the ſafe keeping of E his owne lands in his abſence: and if after that any hurt ſhould befall unto his lands whiles he was abſent, it ſhould be imputed unto the Kings counſell, and not to him. The Earle therefore giving credit unto the Knights words, and thinking of no treacherous practice in this behalfe, diſpoſed and addreſſed himſelf to come unto Dublin. When he was come, altogether ignorant of any treachery toward, whiles himſelfe ſat in conſultation with others of the King Councell in the Exchequer-court, ſodainly he was by the ſaid Sir William betraied, attached or arreſted and apprehended, and brought to the caſtle of the ſaid city, and there clapt up in priſon.

Item, the ſaid Juſtice entred with his army the parts of O-Comill in Mounſter, and by a treacherous device taketh two caſtles of the Earle of Deſmonds, to wit, the ca-
F ſtle of Yniskiſty, and the caſtle of the Iland: in which caſtle of the Iland thus taken, the Knights being within the ſaid caſtle, namely, Sir Euſtace le Pore, Sir William Graunt, and Sir John Cotterell, were firſt drawne, and afterward in October openly hanged untill they were dead.

Alſo the ſaid Earle of Deſmond, with ſome other of his Knights, were by the ſaid Juſtice baniſhed. The foreſaid Juſtice having attchieved theſe exploits in Mounſter, returned

« returned in the moneth of November with his company unto his wife then great A
« with child, remaining at Kilmaynon, which is neere to Dublin: over and beſide thoſe « things which had beene done againſt the Laity, by inditing and empriſoning ſome of « them, and turning them out of their goods, he alſo cauſed the Eccleſiaſticall perſons,
« as well Prieſts as Clerkes, to be endited; and ſtanding endited, attached and impriſo« ned them, and fetched no ſmall ſummes of money out of their purſes.

« Item, as touching the grants and demiſes of their lands, to wit, whom before hee « had deprived of their lands, he beſtowed the ſame upon divers tenants (as hath beene « ſaid) as alſo the very writings concerning thoſe grants, ſo ſealed as they were by him
« and with the Kings ſeale, he revoked, tooke the ſame from them, cancelled, defaced, B « and wholly annulled them.

« Item, all the mainpernours of the ſaid Earle of Deſmond, in number twenty ſixe, as « well Earles as Barons, Knights and others of the countrey, whoſe names be theſe,
« to wit, Lord William Burke Earle of Ulſter, Lord James Botiller Earle of Ormond, « Sir Richard Tuit Knight, Sir Euſtace Le Poer Knight, Sir Gerald De Rochfort Knight, « Sir John Fitz-Robert Poer Knight, Sir Robert Barry Knight, Sir Morus Fitz-Gerald
« Knight, Sir John Welleſley Knight, Sir Walter Lenfaunt Knight, Sir Roger de la Rokell
« Knight, Sir Henry Traharn Knight, Sir Roger Pover Knight, Sir John Lenfaunt Knight, « Sir Roger Pover Knight, Sir Matthew Fitz-Henry Knight, Sir Richard Wallis Knight, « Sir Edward Burk Knight, the ſonne of the Earle of Ulſter, David Barry, William Fitz- « Gerald, Fulke Aſh, Robert Fitz-Morus, Henry Barkley, John Fitz-George Roch, and C
« Thomas de Lees de Burgh, their own travels and proper expences, which ſome of them « with the ſaid Juſtice in his warre had beene at, and in purſuing the ſaid Earle of Deſ- « mond notwithſtanding, he by definitive ſentence deprived of their lands, and diſ-inhe« rited, and awarded their bodies to the Kings pleaſure, excepting foure perſons only of « all the foreſaid ſureties, whoſe names be theſe, William Burk Earle of Ulſter, James « Botiller Earle of Ormond, &c.

« MCCCXLVI. Upon Palme-Sunday, which fell out to be the ninth day of Aprill, « the above named Lord Ralph Ufford Juſtice of Ireland went the way of all fleſh: for « whoſe death his owne dependants, together with his wife, ſorrowed not a little: for D « whoſe death alſo the loiall ſubjects of Ireland rejoice no leſſe. The Clergy and peo« ple both of the land, for joy of his departure out of this life, with merry hearts doe « leap, and celebrate a ſolemn feaſt of Eaſter. At whoſe death the floods ceaſed, and the « diſtemperature of the aire had an end, and in one word, the common ſort truely and « heartily praiſe the onely Son of God. Well, when this Juſtice now dead was once « faſt folded within a ſheet and a coffin of lead, the foreſaid Counteſſe (with his trea-« ſure not worthy to be beſtowed among ſuch holy reliques) in horrible griefe of heart « conveied his bowels over into England, there to be enterred.

« And againe, in the month of May, and on the ſecond day of the ſame month, behold
« a prodigious wonder, ſent, no doubt, miraculouſly from God above. For lo, ſhe that E
« before at her comming entred the city of Dublin ſo glorioufly, with the Kings armes
« and enſignes, attended upon with a number of ſouldiers in her guard and traine along « the ſtreets of the ſaid city, and ſo from that time forward (a ſmall while though it « were) living royally with her friends about her, like a Queen in the Iland of Ireland, « now at her going forth of the ſame city privily by a poſterne gate of the caſtle, to a« void the clamour of the common people calling upon her for debts, in her retire « homeward to her owne countrey departed in diſgrace, ſad and mournfull with the « dolefull badges of death, ſorrow and heavineſſe.

« Item, after the death of the ſaid Juſtice of Ireland, the Lord Roger Darcy, with the « aſſent of the Kings Miniſters and others of the ſame land, is placed in the office of Ju- F « ſtice for the time.

« Alſo the caſtles of Ley and Kylmehede are taken by the Iriſh and burnt, in the mo-« neth of April.

« Item, Lord John Morus commeth chiefe Juſtice of Ireland the fifteenth day of « May.

Alſo

A Alſo the Iriſh of Ulſter gave a great overthrow unto the Engliſh of Urgale, wher- » in were ſlaine three hundred at the leaſt, in the moneth of June. Alſo, the ſaid Lord » John Moris, Juſtice of Ireland, is diſcharged by the King of England from that office » of Juſticeſhip, and the Lord Walter Bermingham ſet in the ſame office by the fore- » ſaid King: and a little after the foreſaid ſlaughter committed, entreth with Commiſ- » ſion into Ireland in the month of June. »

Item, unto the Lord Moris Fitz-Thomas Earle of Deſmond the maintenance of » peace for a certain time is granted by the King of England. Which being granted » upon the Vigill of the exaltation of the holy Croſſe, hee together with his wife and » B two ſonnes take ſea at the haven of Yoghal, and croſſeth over into England; where he » followeth the law hard, and requireth inſtantly to have juſtice for the wrongs done » unto him by Raulph Ufford, late Lord Juſtice of Ireland above named. »

Item, unto the ſaid Earle, by commandement and order from the Lord King of » England, there are granted from his entrance into England twenty ſhillings a day, » and ſo day by day ſtill is allowed for his expences. »

Alſo, the Lord Walter Bermingham Juſtice of Ireland, and the Lord Moris Fitz- » Thomas, Earle of Kildare, roſe up in armes againſt O-Merda and his complices, who » burnt the Caſtle of Ley and Kilmehed: and they with their forces valiantly ſet upon » and invade him and his complices, ſpoiling, killing and burning, in ſo much as the ſaid »
C O-Morda and his complices (although at the firſt they had manfully and reſolutely » made reſiſtance there with many thouſands of the Iriſh) after many wounds and a » great ſlaughter committed, were conſtrained in the end to yeeld; and ſo they ſub- » mitted to the Kings grace and mercy, and betake themſelves full and whole unto the » ſaid Earles devotion. »

MCCCXLVII. The Earle of Kildare with his Barons and Knights goeth unto the » King of England in the moneth of May, to aide him lying then at the ſiege of Ca- »
leys. »

Alſo the towne of Caleys was by the inhabitants upon the fourth day of June ren- »
dred up into the King of Englands hands. »

D Item, Walter Bonevile, William Calfe, William Weleſley, and many other noble » Gentlemen and valiant Knights as well of England as of Ireland, died of the ſickneſſe » in Caleys. »

Alſo, Mac-Murgh, to wit, Donald Mac-Murgh the ſonne of Donald Art Mac- » Murgh King of Leinſter, upon the fifth day of June is treacherouſly ſlain by his own » people. »

More, Moris Fitz-Thomas Earle of Kildare is by the King of England made » Knight. »

Alſo the towne called Monaghan, with all the territorie adjoining, is by the Iriſh » burnt on the feaſt day of S. Stephen Martyr. »

E Item, Dame Joane Fitz-Leones, ſometime wife to the Lord Simon Genevile de- » parted this life, and is buried in the Covent Church of the Friers Preachers of Trim, »
the ſecond day of Aprill. »

MCCCXLVIII. And in the 22. yeere of King Edward the third, reigned the firſt » peſtilence, and moſt of all in Ireland, which had begunne afore in other Coun- » tries. »

Item, in this yeere Walter Lord Bermingham, Lord Juſtice of Ireland came into » England, and left John Archer Prior of Kylmainon his Lievtenant in his roome. And » he returneth againe in the ſame yeere Juſtice as before: and the King conferred upon » the ſame Walter, the Barony of Kenlys which is in Oſſerie, becauſe he led a great ar- » F my againſt the Earle of Deſmond, with Raulfe Ufford, as before is ſaid: which Baro- » ny belonged in times paſt unto the Lord Euſtace Pover, who was attainted and hang- » ed at the caſtle of the Iſle. »

MCCCXLIX. Lord Walter Bermingham, the beſt Juſtice of Ireland that ever was, » gave up his office of Juſticeſhip; after whom ſucceeded the Lord Carew Knight and » Baron both. »

MCCCL. And in the 25. yeere of the foreſaid King Edward, Sir Thomas Rokesby A Knight was made Lord Juſtice of Ireland.

Item, Sir Walter Bermingham Knight Lord Bermingham, that right good Juſtice ſometime of Ireland, died in the Even of S. Margaret Virgin in England.

MCCCLI. Kenwrick Sherman ſometime Maior of the Citie of Dublin died, and was buried under the Belfray of the preaching Friers of the ſame City: which Belfray and Steeple himſelfe erected, and glazed a window at the head of the Quire, and cau-ſed the rooſe of the Church to be made, with many more good deeds. In the ſame Covent he departed I ſay the ſixth day of March: and at his end he made his Will or Teſtament, amounting to the value of three thouſand Marks: and bequeathed many B good Legacies unto the Prieſts of the Church, both religious and ſecular, that were within twenty miles about the City.

MCCCLII. Sir Robert Savage Knight began in Ulſter to build new caſtles in divers places, and upon his owne Manours: who while he was a building ſaid unto his ſonne and heire Sir Henry Savage, let us make ſtrong walls about us, leſt happily the Iriſh come and take away our place, deſtroy our kinred and people, and ſo we ſhall be reproached of all Nations. Then anſwered his ſonne, where ever there ſhall be valiant men, there is a Caſtle and Fortreſſe too, according to that ſaying, The ſonnes encamped, that is to ſay, valiant men are ordained for warre, and therefore will I be among ſuch hardy men, and ſo ſhall I be in a caſtle: and therewith ſaid in his vulgar ſpeech, C A caſtle of Bones is better than a caſtle of Stones. Then his father in a fume and chaſe gave over his worke, and ſwore an oath that he would never build with ſtone and morter; but keepe a good houſe, and a very great family and retinew of ſervants about him: but he propheſied withall, that hereafter his ſonnes and poſterity ſhould grieve and waile for it: which indeed came to paſſe; for the Iriſh deſtroyed all that country for default of caſtles.

MCCCLV. And in the thirty yeere of the ſame King, Sir Thomas Rokesby Knight went out of his office of Juſtice the ſixe and twenty day of July: after whom ſucceed-ded Moris Fitz-Thomas Earle of Deſmund, and continued in the office untill his death. D

Item, on the day of Saint Pauls converſion, the ſame Lord Moris Fitz-Thomas died Juſtice of Ireland in the caſtle of Dublin, not without great ſorrow of his friends and kinſfolke, and no leſſe feare and trembling of all other Iriſh that loved peace.
Firſt, he was buried in the quire of the preaching Friers of Dublin: and at laſt enter-red in the Covent Church of the Friers Preachers of Traly. This man was a righteous Juſticer, in that hee ſtucke not to hang up thoſe of his owne blood for theft and rapine, and miſdemeanours, even as ſoone as ſtrangers: and chaſtiſed the Iriſh very well.

MCCCLVI. And in the one and thirty yeere of the foreſaid King, Sir Thomas Rokesby was made the ſecond time Juſtice of Ireland, who tamed the Iriſh very well, E and paied as well for the victuals he tooke, ſaying, I will eat and drinke out of Treen veſſels, and yet pay both gold and ſilver for my food and apparel, yea and for my penſioners about me.

The ſame yeere died that Sir Thomas Juſtice of Ireland, within the Caſtle of Kilka.

MCCCLVII. Alſo in the two and thirty yeere of the ſame Kings raigne, Sir Alma-rick de Saint Aimund was made chiefe Juſtice of Ireland, and entred into it.

At this very time began a great controverſie between Maſter Richard Fitz-Ralfe Archbiſhop of Armagh, and the foure Orders of the begging Friers: but in the end the Friers got the maſtery, and by the Popes meanes cauſed the Archbiſhop of Ar- F magh to hold his peace.

MCCCLVIII. In the 33. yeere of the ſame King Sir Almarick Sir Amund chiefe Juſtice of Ireland paſſed over into England.

MCCCLIX. In the 34. yeere of the ſame King, James Botiller Earle of Ormond was made chiefe Juſtice of Ireland.

Item,

A Item, the Lady Joan Burke Counteſſe of Kildare departed this life on St. Georges day: and was buried in the Church of the Friers Minors of Kildare, neere unto her husband the Lord Thomas Fitz-John Earle of Kildare.

MCCCLX. And in the 35. of the foreſaid King, died Maſter Richard Fitz-Ralfe Archbiſhop of Armagh in Hanault, the fixteenth day of December: whoſe bones were conveied into Ireland by the reverend father Stephen Biſhop of Meth, to be beſtowed in S. Nicolas Church at Dundalk, where he was born: But doubted it is whether they were his bones or ſome other mans.

Item, Sir Robert Savage, a doughty knight dwelling in Ulſter, departed this life:
B who with a few Engliſhmen ſlew of the Iriſh three thouſand neere unto Antrim: but before that he went forth to that battell, he tooke order that there ſhould be given unto every Engliſhman one good draught or pot of wine or ale, whereof hee had a number of hogſheads and barrels full: and the reſt he ſaved againſt the comming of his friends: he cauſed alſo to be killed ſheepe, oxen, tame foule crammed fat, wilde foule, and for veniſon red Deere: that they might bee dreſſed and made ready for ſuch as returned winners out of the field, whoſoever they were. And he was wont to ſay, a ſhame it were if gueſts ſhould come and not finde what to eate and drinke. But when it pleaſed God to give the Engliſh victorie, he invited them all to ſupper, and they rejoiced with thankſgiving: and himſelfe ſaid, I give God thanks: For better it
C is thus to keep it, than to let it run forth upon the ground, as ſome gave me counſell. Buried he was in the covent Church of the preaching Friers of Coulrath, neere to the river of Banne.

Alſo, the Earle of Ormond, Lord Juſtice of Ireland entred England: in whoſe place Moris Fitz-Thomas Earle of Kildare was made Lord Juſtice of Ireland, by this Charter and Commiſſion as appeareth: Omnibus ad quos, &c. that is, To all whom theſe letters ſhall come unto Greeting: Know ye that we have committed to our ſweet and faithfull ſubject, Moris Earle of Kildare, the office of our L. Juſtice of our land of Ireland: and our land of Ireland, with the Caſtle and all pertenances thereto, to keep and governe ſo long as it ſhall pleaſe us: and to receive at our Exchequer in Dublin
D yeerely, ſo long as hee ſhall remaine in that office, five hundred pounds: for which he ſhall keep that office and land, and he ſhall be himſelfe one of the twenty men in armes (whom he ſhall finde) with as many horſes armed continually, during our foreſaid commiſſion. In witneſſe whereof, &c. Given by the hands of our beloved in Chriſt Frier Thomas Burgey, Prior of the Hoſpitall of S. John of Jeruſalem in Ireland, our Chancellour of Ireland, at Dublin the thirtieth day of March, and of our reigne the thirty five yeere. Alſo James Botiller Earle of Ormond came again out of England Lord Juſtice of Ireland, as before, unto whom the Earle of Kildare reſigned up the office of Juſticeſhip.

MCCCLXI. Leonell Earle of Ulſter in right of his wives inheritance, and being the E Kings ſonne of England, came into Ireland as the Kings Lievtenant, and arrived at Dublin the eighth day of September being the feaſt of the bleſſed Virgins nativitie, bringing his ſecond wife Elizabeth, daughter and heire of the Lord William Burke Earle of Ulſter.

In the ſame yeere was the ſecond peſtilence. There died in England Henry Duke of Lancaſter, the Earle of March, the Earle of Northampton.

Alſo on the ſixth day of January, Mons Doncref a Citizen of Dublin was buried in the Churchyard of the Friers Preachers of the ſame City: unto which covent or brotherhood he gave forty pounds, toward the glazing of their Church.

Item, there departed out of this life the Lady Joan Fleming, wife to the Lord Gef-
F fery Trevers, and the Lady Margaret Bermingham, wife to the Lord Robert Preſton, on the Vigill of St. Margaret, and were buried in the Covent Church of the preaching Friers of Tredagh.

Alſo, the Lord Walter Bermingham the younger, died on S. Laurence day, who divided his inheritance between his ſiſters, the one part thereof the foreſaid Preſton had for his ſhare.

Item,

« Item, the foreſaid Lord Leonell, after hee was entred into Ireland and had reſted A « ſome few daies, made warre upon O-Brynne, and proclaimed throughout his army, « that no man borne in Ireland ſhould come neere unto his campe: and an hundred of « his owne Penſioners were ſlaine. Leonell ſeeing this, forthwith reduced the whole « people as well of England as of Ireland into one, and ſo hee proſpered, and ſtrucke « many battailes round about in all places with the Iriſh, by the helpe of God, and the « people of Ireland. Hee made alſo many Knights of Engliſh and Iriſh: and among « them Robert Preſton, Robert Holiwood, Thomas Talbot, Walter Cuſacke, James de La « Hide, John Aſh, or de Fraxius, Patricke and Robert Aſh, or de Fraxius, and many « beſides.
« Alſo, he removed the Exchequer from Dublin to Carlagh, and gave five hundred B « pounds to the walling of that towne.
« Item, on the feaſt of Saint Maur Abbat, there roſe a mighty wind, that ſhooke and « overthrew pinnacles, battlements, chimneys, and other things higher than the reſt, « trees without number, divers Steeples, and namely, the Steeple of the Preaching « Friers.
« MCCCLXII. Alſo in the 36. yeere of the ſame King, the Church of St. Patricke in « Dublin through negligence was ſet on fire and burnt, the eighth of Aprill.
« MCCCLXIV. And in the 38. yeere of the foreſaid King, the Lord Leonel Earle of « Ulſter entred England the 22. of Aprill, and left his Deputy-Juſtice of Ireland, the « Earle of Ormond: and the ſame Leonell Duke of Clarence returned the eighth of C « December.
« MCCCLXV. Alſo in the 39. yeere of the ſaid King, the ſame Leonell Duke of Cla« rence paſſed over into England, leaving behind him Sir Thomas Dale Knight his De« puty-Cuſtos, and Juſtice of Ireland.
« MCCCLXVII. Great warre began between the Berminghams of Carbry and the men « of Meth, becauſe many robberies by the foreſaid were committed in Meth. Then Sir « Robert Preſton Knight, and Lord chiefe Baron of the Exchequer, ſet a ſtrong guard in « the caſtle of Carbry, and laid forth a great deale of money againſt the Kings enemies,
« to defend his owne right, in regard of his wife. D « Item, Gerald Fitz-Moris Earle of Deſmond was made Lord Juſtice of Ireland.

Thus far forth were continued the Annales of Ireland which came to my hands, and upon which I have beſtowed theſe few pages,

A pages, to gratifie them that may delight therein. As for the nice and dainty readers, who would have all writings tried to the touch of Auguſtus his dayes, I know they can yeeld no pleaſing relliſh to them, in regard of the harſh words, and the ſapleſſe dry ſtile, familiar unto that age wherein they were penned. Nevertheleſſe, I would have thoſe to remember, That HISTORIE
B both beareth, brooketh, and requireth the Authors of all ages: Alſo, That they are to look as well for reall and ſubſtantiall knowledge from ſome, as for the verball and literall learning from others.

C

THE SMALLER ILANDS IN THE BRITISH OCEAN.

D NOw will I at length waigh anchor and ſet ſaile out of Ireland, and lanching forth take ſurvey of the Ilands ſcattered here and there along the coaſts of Britaine. If I durſt repoſe any truſt in my ſelfe, or if I were of any ſufficiencie, I would ſhape my courſe to every one. But ſith it is my purpoſe to diſcover and inlighten Antiquity, ſuch as are obſcure and of leſſe account I will lightly coaſt by: and thoſe that carry any ancient name and reckoning above the reſt, I will enter and viſite, yea and make ſome ſhort ſtay in them, that now at laſt in a good and happy houre they may recover their ancienty againe.

And that in this voiage I may at firſt ſet out orderly, and take a ſtraight and direct courſe, I will, to begin, ſaile out of Ireland into the Severn ſea, and by the Iriſh ſea (after I have doubled the utmoſt point of Scotland) follow my courſe down into the E Germain Ocean, and ſo from thence through the Britiſh ſea (which extendeth as far as to Spaine) hold on my race as proſperouſly as I can. But I am afraid leſt this my ſhip of Antiquity, ſteared by me ſo unskilfull a Pilot, either run and be ſplit upon the rockes of errours, or elſe be overwhelmed with the waves of ignorance, yet venter I muſt. Τόλμα, ſaith Antiphilus, πάντων ἄρχειν Θ, that is, Adventure is a good ſea Captain: and he that ſaileth the ſame voiage a ſecond time, may haply ſpeed much better, and finiſh his deſired courſe.

Firſt and formoſt, becauſe it ſeemeth not impertinent to my matter, I will ſet down what Plutarch, out of a fabulous narration of Demetrius (who ſeemeth to have lived in Hadrians time) reporteth generally as touching the Ilands lying neer to Britain. De- F metrius made report, that moſt of thoſe Ilands which coaſt upon Britain, lie deſert, deſolate and ſcattering here and there; whereof ſome were dedicated to the Dæmones, and Heroes: alſo that himſelf by commiſſion from the Emperour, ſailed toward one that was neereſt of thoſe deſert Iles, for to know and diſcover ſomewhat: the which he found to have in it few inhabitants, and thoſe he underſtood were reputed by the Britans ſacred and inviolable. Within a while after he was landed there, the aire and weather (as he ſaid) became came feully troubled, many portenteous ſignes were given by terrible tempeſts, with extra- A ordinary ſtormes, flaſhing and violent lightnings and fiery impreſsions: which after they were appeaſed, the Ilanders certified him that ſome one of great eminency was dead. And a little after: Now he ſaid moreover, that there was a certain Iland there, wherein Saturne was by Briareus cloſed up and kept in priſon ſound aſleep (for ſleep was the means to hold him captive) about whoſe perſon there were many Dæmones at his feet, that ſtood attending as ſervitours. Thus they took pleaſure in old time, as now alſo at this day, boldly to deviſe ſtrange wonders and tales of places far remote, in a certain ſecure veine of lying, as it were by authoritie.

In the narrow ſea of Severn there peep up firſt of all two ſmall Ilands, whereof the B one, becauſe it lieth flat and with an even ground, is by us called Flatholme, in the ſame ſenſe that Planarie is named Italy: the other Step-holme, becauſe it riſeth ſteep, in the Britiſh tongue Reoric: both of them, when the Britans bare rule, were tearmed Echni, like as in our age Holmes, for ſo the Anglo-Saxons called greene plaines encloſed within water: neither were they in ancient times famous for any thing elſe, but for that the Danes lay there at road: and for the tomb of one Gualchus, a Britan of ſingular devoutneſſe, whoſe Diſciple Barruch left his name to the Iland Barry in Wales (as an ancient monument of the Church of Landaff witneſſeth) which Iland in like manner hath given name to a noble houſe of the Barraies in Ireland.

This hath lying hard to it the little Iland Silly, upon the coaſt of the ancient Silu- C res, of whoſe name it ſeemeth to retaine ſtill more than a ſhadow, like as a ſmall town over againſt it in Glancorgan-ſhire: yet dare I not avouch it to be Silura, or Inſula Silurum, the Iland that Solinus mentioneth, ſeeing there be other Ilands bearing the ſame name; yet, farre diſtant from the Silures.

From thence we come to Caldey, in the Britiſh Imis-Pix, lying neer unto the ſhore; and to Londey farther within the ſea, over againſt Caldey, & belonging unto Devon-ſhire; from the promontory or cape whereof, named Hert-neſſe, it lieth 14. miles. Larger this is counted of the twaine, howbeit reported to bee not much more than two miles long, and one mile broad, ſo encircled with rockes and cliffes round about, that there is no avenue unto it but in one or two places. A fort or ſconce it had: the ruines D whereof, like as of S. Helens Chappell, are yet to be ſeene. That it had beene in time paſt eared with the plough, the ridges and furrowes in it doe evidently ſhew: now all the commodity and profit that it yeeldeth doth ariſe from ſea-fowle, whereof it hath great ſtore. Trees it hath none but ſtinking Elders, which the Stares haunt in ſuch multitudes, that uneth for their dung there is any comming unto them. But what meane I to ſtand hereupon? conſidering that Sir Thomas Delamere Knight (in reporting how that ſilly king Edward the ſecond, when his froward and unreaſonable wife, together with the unruly Barons thundred out threats, and denounced terrible menaces, was minded to withdraw himſelfe hither, as to a place of refuge) hath in old time deſcribed it in this wiſe. Londay (ſaith he) is an Iland lying in the mouth of Severn E two miles long over way, full of pleaſant paſtures: it affoordeth Connies in great ſtore: doves and ſtares (which Alexander Necham tearmeth Ganimedes birds) it hath continually from time to time ready to lay: it ſerveth the inhabitants beſides, with freſh water, walming abundantly out of ſprings, though it ſelfe be on all ſides compaſſed with the ſea. One way of entrance it hath into it, wherein two men can hardly goe afront together on foot; on every part beſides the dreadfull rockes bearing out a mighty heighth, hinder all ingreſſe. But ſcarcely doe our Hiſtorians make any mention of it, ſave only how William de Mariſco, a moſt leud and miſchievous rover in the reign of king Henry the third, from hence ſore infeſted theſe coaſts in times paſt: and that in King Edward the third his daies it was part of the Lutterels inheritance. F

Greſholme. Stockholme, and Scalmey. Silimnus.

From thence in the very bent and turning of Pembroch-ſhire, we meet with Greſholme, Stockholme, and Scalmey, in which is plentie of graſſe, and wild thyme groweth very freſh and pleaſant. The day was when I thought Scalmey to have been that SILIMNUS, which Plinie in old time wrote of: but the truth hath now made me change my opinion. For that SILIMNUS of Pliny (as the affinity of the word implieth)

A implieth, ſeemes to be Ptolomee his LIMNI. That this here is the Britans Lymen, the word it ſelfe (if I ſhould ſay nothing) ſheweth evidently, which the Engliſhmen by a new name have now a daies termed Ramſey. This lieth full againſt the Epiſcopall Sea of Saint Davids, whereunto it belongeth, and was in the foregoing ages very famous for the death of one Juſtinian a moſt holy man; who after he had withdrawne himſelfe hither out of little Britaine in France, in that age that brought forth ſo many Saints, and led a long time an Eremits life, wholly devoted to the ſervice of God, being in the end ſlaine by a page, was regiſtred in the roll of Martyrs. In whoſe life we finde it oftentimes written, Lemeneia Inſula. Which denomination
B verily, together with the Britiſh name Limen, by which name it is knowne unto the Britains themſelves, checketh and taxeth his drowſineſſe who maketh this Iland lying next above it to be Ptolomees Limnon: which the Britains now name Enhly, and Engliſh Berdſey, as one would ſay the Iſle of Birds. But that this ſhould be it that Ptolomee calleth EDRI, and Plinie ANDROS or ADROS (as it is in ſome place read) I durſt more boldly gheſſe by the ſignification of the word: for Ader in the Britiſh tongue ſignifieth a Bird, and in the very ſame ſenſe the Engliſhmen afterward called it Berdſey. As for Enhly, it is a name of a later ſtampe, and came by occaſion of a certaine holy and devout man, who here lived as an Eremite.

For this Iland, which toward the Eaſt mounteth aloft with an high promontory,
C but Weſtward lieth plaine, and is of a fertile mould, harboured in old time ſo many holy men, that beſide Dubrith and Merlin the Caledonian, ancient hiſtories record there were twenty thouſand Saints buried here. Next unto this lieth MONA, that is, Angleſey, which the Britans alſo name Mon, Tir-Mon, and Ynis Dowyll, that is, A darke or ſhady Iland, the Saxons Monege, whereof I have treated already in the page 671.

To Mone or Angleſey there adjoine three ſmaller Ilands, Moyl-Rhoniad, that is, The Iſle of Seales, upon the North-weſt; which after it had beene with-held by certaine that unjuſtly ſeized upon it, from the Biſhops of Bangor, unto whom it belonged, Henry Deney Biſhop of Bangor (as we reade in the hiſtory of Canterbury) with a D fleet manned with ſouldiers in King Henry the ſeventh his time, recovered. Eaſtward lieth Ynis Ligod, that is, The Iſle of mice: and more beneath, Preſt-home, that is, The Iſle of Prieſts: and nothing ſaw we in it but the tower ſteeple of Saint Cyriacs chappell, which ſheweth it ſelfe to the beholders afarre off. Incredible it is what the neighbours report of the infinite multitude of ſea fowle that here doe breed: as alſo what they tell of a cauſey or banke which went from hence through the ſea to the foot of that huge mountaine Pen-Maen-Maur, for their uſe who of devotion went on pilgrimage to viſit this place, held in times paſt ſo holy and religious. I paſſe over Lambey a little Iland oppoſite unto this toward the coaſt of Ireland, although our Metall-men have to their great charges ſought there of late for Alum.

E More Northward lieth that Mona whereof Cæſar maketh mention, in the mids of the cut, as he ſaith, betweene Britaine and Ireland.

Ptolomee termeth it MONOEDA, as one would ſay Mon-eitha, that is, if I may be allowed to conjecture, The more remote Mona, to put a difference betweene it and the other Mona, that is, Angleſey: Plinie MONABIA, Oroſius MENAVIA, and Bede Menavia ſecunda, that is, the ſecond Menavia, where he termeth Mona or Angleſey, Menavia prior, that is, the former Menavia, and calleth them both, Ilands of the Britans: in which writers notwithſtanding it is read amiſſe Mevania: Ninius who alſo goeth abroad under the name of Gildas, nameth it Eubonia and Manaw, the Britans Menow, the inhabitants Maning, and we Engliſhmen, The Yle of Man: ſtret-
F ched out juſt in the mid levell (as ſaith Girald Cambrenſis) betweene the Northren coaſts of Ireland and Britaine; about which Iſle, and namely to whether of the two countries it ought of right to appertaine, there aroſe no ſmall doubt among thoſe in ancient times. At length the controverſie was taken up in this manner. For as much as this land foſtered venemous wormes brought over hither for triall, adjudged it was by a common cenſure and doome to lye unto Britain. Howbeit the inhabitants A both in language and manners come nigheſt unto the Iriſh, yet ſo as they therewith ſavour ſomewhat of the qualities of the Norvegians.

It lieth out in length from North to South much about thirty Italian miles: but reacheth in bredth where it is wideſt, ſcarce above fifteene miles, and where it is narroweſt eight. In Bedes dayes it contained in it three hundred familes, like as Angleſey 96. but now it numbreth ſeventeene Pariſh Churches. Flaxe and hempe it beareth abundantly: it hath freſh paſtures, and fields by good manuring plenteous of Barley, and Wheat, but of Oates eſpecially: whence it is that the people there eate moſt of all Oaten bread. Store of cattell every where, and mighty flockes of B ſheepe: but both their ſheepe and other cattell alſo bee ſmaller of body there, like as in Ireland neighbouring upon it, than in England, and nothing ſo faire headed. And conſidering it hath few or no woods at all, they uſe for fewell a kind of clammy turfe, which as they are digging out of the earth, they light many times upon trees buried under the ground.

In the middeſt it riſeth up with hils ſtanding thick, the higheſt whereof is Sceafull, from whence a man may ſee on a cleere and faire day, Scotland, England and Ireland. Their chiefe towne they count Ruſsin, ſituate on the South-ſide, which of a caſtle wherein lieth a Gariſon, is commonly called Caſtle-Towne: where, within a little Iland Pope Gregory the fourteenth inſtituted an Epiſcopall See: the Biſhop where- C of named Sodorenſis (of this very Iland as it is thought) had juriſdiction in times paſt over all the Ilands, Weſt Iriſh Iles or Hebrides, but exerciſeth it now onely upon that Iland, and is himſelfe under the Archbiſhop of Yorke. Howbeit, he hath no place nor voice in the aſſembly of the States of England in Court of Parliament. Duglaſſe is the beſt peopled towne, and of greateſt reſort; becauſe the haven is commodious, and hath a moſt eaſie entrance: unto which the Frenchmen and other forrainers uſe to repaire with their bay-ſalt, having trafficke with the Ilanders, and buying of them againe, leather, courſe wooll, and poudred beefe.

But on the South ſide of the Ile ſtand Bala-Curi (where the Biſhop for the moſt part is reſiant) and the Pyle, a Block-houſe ſtanding in a little Iland; where alſo there D are ſouldiers in gariſon. Alſo before the very South point there lyeth a prety Iland, called the Calfe of Man, wherein are exceeding great ſtore of ſea-foule called Puffins, and of thoſe duckes and drakes which (breeding of rotten-wood, as they ſay) the Engliſhmen call Bernacles, the Scots Clakes and Soland geeſe.

Bernacles.

That which here followeth I will ſet downe out of a letter, which that learned and reverend father in God John Meryk Biſhop of this Ile wrote unto me. This Iland, for cattell, for fiſh, yea and for corne, rather through mens induſtry than by any goodneſſe of the ground, hath not only ſufficient for it ſelfe, but alſo good ſtore to ſend into other countries. Yet happier it was for the government thereof, as being defended from neighbour enemies by ſouldiers preſt and ready, at the expences of the Earle of Darby, upon which E he employed the greateſt part of his yeerely revenue in this Iſle. All controverſies are decided without writings or any charges, by certaine Judges, whom they chuſe from among themſelves, and call Deemſters. For the Magiſtrate taketh up a ſtone, and when he hath given it his mark, delivereth it unto the plaintiffe, who by vertue thereof citeth his adverſary and witneſſes. If there fall out any doubtfull caſe & of greater importance, it is referred to twelve men, whom they terme, The Keyes of the Iland. It hath certain Coroners, and thoſe they call Annos, who ſtand in ſtead of Sheriffes, and execute their office. The Eccleſiaſticall Judge doth cite perſons and determine cauſes, within eight dayes they ſtand to his award, or they are clapt up in priſon.

They had, as I have heard ſay, as a peculiar language of their own, ſo alſo their peculi- F ar lawes, which are ſignes of a peculiar ſeigniory. Their Eccleſiaſticall lawes, next after this Canon Law, come neereſt unto the Civill. Upon any Judge or Clerks of the Court for making of Proceſſe or drawing Inſtruments, the people never beſtow ſo much as one penny. As for that which Engliſh Writers report of miſchiefes done by witchcraft and ſorcery, it is meere falſe. They that are of the wealthier ſort and hold faire poſſeſſions, and for their good

A good housekeeping, and honeſt cariage, are conformable to imitate the people of Lancaſter. The women whitherſoever they go out of their doores, gird themſelves about (as mindfull of their mortality) with the winding ſheet that they purpoſe to be buried in. Such of them as are by law condemned to die, are ſewed within a ſack, & flung from a rock into the ſea. They are all of them in this Iſle as far from the cuſtomary practice of theeving or begging from doore to doore, as may be: wonderfull religious, and moſt ready every one to entertain the forme of the Engliſh Church. The diſorders, as well Civill as Eccleſiaſticall, of their neighbour nations they deteſt: and whereas the whole Iſle is divided into two parts, South and North; this in common ſpeech reſembleth the Scottiſh, the other the Iriſh.

B Haply it were worth my labour, if I ſhould here inſert a little Hiſtory of this Iland, which truth of due demandeth at my hands, that ſo I may keepe alive and in remembrance ſtill, the Acts heretofore atchieved: which if they bee not buried, yet are waxen old, and have as it were one foot in the grave of oblivion. That the Britans held this Iland, as they did all Britaine, it is confeſſed by all. But when the Nations from the North, like violent tempeſts, over flowed theſe South parts, it became ſubject to the Scots. For under the Emperours Honorius and Arcadius (as wee read in Oroſius) it was inhabited as well as Ireland by the Scottiſh Nations: and Ninnius hath written that one Biule a Scot was Lord of it. But (as the ſame writer recordeth) the Scots were driven out of all the Britiſh countries and Ilands by Cuneda, Grandfa-
C ther of Maglocunus, whom Gildas (for the foule work that he made in theſe Ilands) tearmed the Dragon of the Iles. After this, Edwin King of Northumberland brought this Iland, like as the foreſaid Angleſey, under the ſubjection of the Engliſh, if we underſtand them both by the name of Menaviæ, as writers perſwade us: at which time it was reckoned an Iland of the Britans. But when the North had ſent abroad his brood the ſecond time, I meane the Normans, Danes, and Norwegians: theſe Norwegians, who with their manifold robberies and roveries did moſt hurt from the Northren ſea, tooke up their haunt into this Iland and the Hebrides, and therein erected Lords and Petty Kings, whoſe briefe hiſtory I will here put downe word for word out of an old Manuſcript, leſt it ſhould be utterly loſt, which is intituled, The D Chronicle of Man, ſeeming to have been written by the Monks of the Abbey of Ruſſin, which was the principall place of religion in this Iſle.

A CHRONICLE OF THE KINGS OF MAN.

E ANno Domini MLXV. Edward of bleſſed memory King of England departed this life: after whom ſucceeded in the kingdome Harald the ſon of Godwin; againſt whom Harald Harfager King of Norway came into the field, and fought a battell at Stainford-bridge; and the Engliſh obtaining the victory, put them all to flight: out of which chace Godred ſurnamed Crovan, the ſon of Harald the black of Iſeland, came unto Godred the ſonne of Syrric, who then reigned in Man, and by him was honourably received.

The ſame yeere, William the BASTARD conquered England: and Godred the F ſonne of Syrric died, after whom ſucceeded his ſonne Fingal.

MLXVI. Godred Crovan aſſembled a great fleet and came to Man, fought with the people of the land, but was overcome and put to rout. A ſecond time hee rallied his forces and his fleet, ſailed into Man, joined battell with the Manksmen, was vanquiſhed and driven out of the field. A third time he gathered a great multitude together, and by night arrived in the haven called Ramſa, and hid three hundred men within « within a wood, which ſtood upon the hanging hollow brow of an hill called Scacafel. A « Now when the ſunne was riſen, the Manksmen put their people in order of battell,

« and with a violent charge encountred with Godred. And when the fight was hot, « thoſe three hundred men ſtarting out of the ambuſh behind their backes, began to « foile the Manksmen and put them to the worſt, yea and forced them to flye. Now
« when they ſaw themſelves diſcomfited, and no place for them of refuge to eſcape,
« (for the ſea water comming in with the tide had filled the channell of Ramſa river, « and the enemies on the other ſide followed the chace hard) they that then remained « alive tooke up a pitifull cry, and beſought Godred to ſave their lives. And he moved « with compaſſion, pittying their wofull calamity (as who for a certain time had beene B « nurſed and brought up among them) ſounded the retrait, and forbad his hoaſt to « purſue them any longer.

« Godred the morrow after propoſed this choice unto his owne army, whether they « would rather divide Man among themſelves, and therein dwell, or only take the ſub« ſtance and pillage of the countrey, and ſo returne unto their owne homes? But they « choſe rather to waſt and ſpoile the whole Iland, and with the goods thereof to enrich « themſelves, and ſo returne home. But Godred himſelfe, with thoſe few Ilanders that « remained with him, inhabited the South part of the Iland, and granted to the re-« maines of the Manksmen the North part, with this covenant and condition, That « none of them ſhould at any time venture and preſume to challenge any part of the C « land by right of inheritance. Whereby it came to paſſe that even unto this day the « whole Iſle is the Kings domain alone, and all the revenues thereof belonging unto the « crown. Godred then reduced Dublin, and a great part of Leymiſtir under his ſubjection.
« As for the Weſtern Scottiſh, he ſo over-awed them, as that no man who built ſhip or « cog-boat durſt drive into it above three nailes. Now he reigned 16. yeeres, and died « in the Iland that is called Yle. He left behind him verily three ſons, Lagman, Harald, « and Olave.

« Lagman the eldeſt taking upon him the kingdome, reigned ſeven yeeres. And Ha- « rald his brother a great while rebelled againſt him; but at length being taken priſo-
« ner by Lagman, he had his members of generation cut off, and his eyes plucked out D
« of his head. After this Lagman repenting himſelfe that he had pulled out his brothers « eyes, gave over the kingdome of his owne accord, and wearing the badge of the « Lords Croſſe, took a journey to Jeruſalem, in which he died.

« MLXXV. All the Nobles and Lords of the Iſlands, hearing of the death of Lagman, « diſpatched their Embaſſadors to Murecard O-Brien King of Ireland, requeſting that « hee would ſend ſome induſtrious and worthy man of the blood royall to be their « King, untill Olave, Godreds ſonne, came to full age. The King very willingly yeelded « to their requeſts, and ſent unto them one Dopnald the ſonne of Tade, warning and « charging him to govern the kingdome (which by right belonged unto another) with « all gentleneſſe and modeſty. But he after he was come to the Crowne, not weighing E
« of the charge that his Lord and M. gave him, abuſed his place, and lorded with great « tyranny, and ſo committing many outrages and villanies, reigned cruelly three yeers.
« Then all the Princes of the Ilands agreed together in one conſpiracy, roſe up againſt « him, and expelled him out of their coaſts. Who fled into Ireland, and never looked « them in the face after.

« MLXXVII. One Ingemund was ſent from the King of Norway, to take upon him the « dominion of the Ilands: and when he was come to the Iſle Leodus, he ſent meſſengers
« to all the Nobles of the Ilands, with a commandement that they ſhould meet toge« ther and ordain him their King: Mean while, himſelfe with his companions did no« thing elſe but rob, ſpoile, make good cheere and banquet, diſhonour and abuſe marri- F « ed wives, defloure young maidens, yea and give himſelfe over to filthy pleaſures and « fleſhly luſts. But when tidings hereof came to the Nobles of the Ilands, now aſſem-
« bled to make him King, they were ſet on fire with furious wrath, and ſped themſelves
« in all haſt toward him: and ſurpriſing him in the night, burnt the houſe wherein hee « was, and with fire and ſword made a quick diſpatch of him and his company.

MXCVIII.

A Anno MXCVIII. The Abbey of S. Mary at Ciſtertium or Ciſteaux was founded. Antioch was won by the Chriſtians: and a Comet or blazing ſtar appeared. The ſame yeere there was a field fought between thoſe of the Iſle of Man, at Stantwat: and the Northren men got the victorie. In which battell were ſlaine Earle Other and Mac-Maras, Generals of both the ſides. In the ſame yeere Magnus King of Norway, the ſon of Olave, ſon of Harald Harfager, deſirous to try whether the corps of S. Olave King and Martyr remained uncorrupt, commanded that his tombe ſhould be opened: and notwithſtanding the Biſhop and Clergy withſtood it, the King himſelfe came boldly thither, and by force that he brought with him cauſed the coffin to be B opened. Now when he had both ſeene and handled the body uncorrupt and nothing periſhed, ſodainly there was a great feare fell upon him, and in all haſte he departed thence. The next night following Olave King and Martyr appeared unto him in a dreame, ſaying thus: Chuſe thou one of theſe two things, either to loſe thy life and kingdome both within thirty daies, or to depart from Norway and never ſee it againe.
When the King awakened, he called unto him his Princes and Elders, and declared unto them his dreame and viſion: and they being ſore affraid gave him this counſell, to depart with all ſpeed out of Norway. He without delay cauſed a fleet to be rigged and put in readineſſe, of an hundred and threeſcore ſaile, and cutteth over to the Iſles of Orkney, which he forthwith ſubdued; & making way by dint of ſword thorowout
C all the Iles, and bringing them to his ſubjection, went forward ſtill as far as to Man, and when he was arrived and landed he came unto St. Patrickes Iſle, to ſee the place wherein the field had beene fought a little before betweene the Mankſmen, becauſe as yet many of their bodies that were ſlaine lay there unburied. Now when he ſaw this moſt goodly and beautifull Iland, it pleaſed his eye, and he choſe it to ſeat him-ſelfe therein, built fortreſſes in it, which unto this day carry his name. And thoſe of Galway he held in ſo great awe, that he compelled them to cut downe wood for timber, and to bring it unto the ſhore, that therewith he might build his Forts and Bul-warkes. To Angleſey, then called Mona (an Iland in Wales) hee ſailed, and found in it two Earles by the name of Hughes: the one he ſlew, the other he put to flight, D and ſubdued the Iland. But the Welſhmen preſented him with many gifts, and ſo he had them farwell, and returned unto Man. Unto Murcard King of Ireland he ſent his ſhooes, and commanded him to carry them on his ſhoulders through the middeſt of his houſe on Chriſtmas day, that he might thereby underſtand he was ſubject unto King Magnus. Which the Iriſhmen as ſoone as they heard of it took grievouſly, and diſdained exceeding much. But the King following a wiſer courſe, I had rather, ſaith he, not onely carry his ſhooes, but alſo eat them, than King Magnus ſhould deſtroy one Province in Ireland. Hee fulfilled therefore his commandement, and honourably entreated his meſſengers. Many preſents alſo hee ſent over by them unto King Magnus, and entred into league with him. Theſe meſſengers being returned unto E their Lord, related unto him many things touching the ſituation of Ireland, the pleaſantneſſe thereof, the abundance of corne and wholſomneſſe of aire. When Magnus heard this, ſtraightwaies he thought of nothing elſe but to conquer Ireland, and bring it wholly under his dominion. He commanded therefore his men to prepare a navie; and himſelfe in perſon ſetting forward with ſixteene ſhips, deſirous to take a view of the countrey, as he unwarily departed aſide from his ſhipping, was ſuddenly compaſſed about by the Iriſh, and ſo loſt his life, together with all thoſe in manner that were with him. And he was buried hard by S. Patricks Church in Doun. Hee reigned ſixe yeeres: after whoſe death the Princes of the Ilands ſent for Olave the ſon of Godred ſurnamed Crovan, who lived in the Court of Henry King of England, ſon F of King William.

MCII. Olave, the ſonne of Godred Crovan aforeſaid, beganne his reigne and reigned forty yeeres: a peaceable Prince, having all the Kings of Ireland and Scotland to be his confederates. Hee tooke to wife Affrica the daughter of Ferguſe of Gall-way: of whom he begat Gadred. By his concubines he had Regnald, Lagman and Harald, beſide many daughters, whereof one was wedded to Summerled Prince

« of Herergaidel, who was the cauſe of the ruine of the whole Kings of the Ilands. On A
« her he begat foure ſonnes, Dulgall, Raignald, Engus, and Olave.
« MCXXXIII. There hapned ſo great an Eclipſe of the Sun, upon the fourth Nones of « Auguſt, that the day was turned into night.
« MCXXXIV. Olave gave unto Yuo Abbat of Furnes a plot of his land in Man, to build « an Abbay, in a place called Ruſſin: and both enriched with revenues, and endowed « with priviledges the eſtate of the Church in the Ilands.
« MCXLII. Godred, Olaves ſon, ſaileth over ſea to the King of Norway, whoſe name « was Hinge, and did his homage unto him, and ſtaied there being honourably enter« tained of him. The ſame yeere three ſonnes of Harald, Olaves brother (who had been B « brought up in Dublin) raiſing a great number of men together, and all thoſe who « were fled from the King, came to Man, demanding of the ſame King to have the one « moity of the whole kingdome of the Ilands to bee given unto them. But the King,
« when he had heard their demand, being willing to pacifie them, anſwered, That hee « would take counſell of the matter. Now when they had appointed the time and « place where the counſell ſhould bee held, in the meane while thoſe moſt leud and « wicked villaines complotted among themſelves the Kings death. At the day appoin« ted both parts met at the haven which is called Ramſa, and ſat in order by rowes, the « King with his counſell on the one ſide, and they together with their company on the « other, and Reginald (who was to diſpatch him) was in the midſt between, and ſtood C « talking apart with one of the Peeres of the land. But when the King had called him
« and he was come unto him, he turned toward the King as though hee would ſalute « him, and therewith lifting up a glittering axe a great height, at one blow cut off the « Kings head. And forthwith as ſoone as they had committed ſuch a bloody murder, « they divided the land among themſelves: and after ſome few daies, having gathe« red a navie together, ſailed over to Galway, deſirous to bring it alſo under their ſub-« jection: But thoſe of Galway ſticking cloſe and round together, gave a faire onſet,
« and joined battell with them. They by and by turning their backes fled in great diſ-« order to Man: And as for all the Galwaymen that dwelt therein, ſome of them they « ſlew, others they expelled. D « MCXLIII. Godred, Olaves ſon, returning out of Norway was created King of Man,
« and to avenge his fathers death, he cauſed two of Haralds ſons to have their eies pul« led out, and ſlew the third.

The

A The ſame yeere there was a field fought at Ramſa betweene Reginald brother of Godred, and them of Man: and by the deceitfull practice of a certaine Earle, thoſe of Man were put to flight.

Then Reginald began to reigne, and on the fourth day after came Godred upon him out of Norway with a great multitude of armed men, and tooke his brother Reginald, whom he bereft both of his eyes, and of his genitall members. The ſame yeere died Malcolm King of Scotland, and his brother William ſucceeded him in the kingdome.

MCLXVI. Two Comets or blazing ſtars appeared before Sun-riſing in the Mo-B neth of Auguſt, the one in the South, the other in the North.

MCLXXI. Richard Earle of Penbrock ſailed over into Ireland, and ſubdued Develin with a great part of Ireland.

MCLXXVI. John Curcy conquered Ulſter, and Vvian Legate of the Apoſtolicke Sea came into Man, and cauſed King Godred to bee lawfully eſpouſed unto his wife Phingola, daughter of Mac-Lotlen, ſon to Murkartac King of Ireland, to wit, the mother of Olave then three yeers old. Sylvan the Abbat married them: unto whom the very ſame day Godred gave a piece of land at Miriſcoge, where he built a Monaſtery: but at length the ground was together with the Monkes granted to the Abbey of Ruſsin.

C Reginald ſonne to Eac-Marcat, one of the royall blood, comming into Man with a great band of men in the Kings abſence, at the firſt conflict put to flight certain warders that kept the ſhore, and killed about 30. men. Afterwards the Manksmen gathering their forces together, the ſame day ſlew him and almoſt all his company.

MCLXXXIII. O-Fogolt was Sheriffe of Man.

MCLXXXV. There fell out to be an Eclipſe of the Sun on Saint Philip and Jacobs day.

MCLXXXVII. On the fourth Ides of November died Godred King of the Ilands: and the next Summer was his body tranſlated to the Iſle of Hy. He left behind him three ſonnes, Reginald, Olave, and Tvar. In his life he ordained his ſonne Olave to be D his heire, becauſe hee onely was borne in lawfull wedlock. But the people of Man, ſeeing that Olave was now ſcarce ten yeeres old, ſent for Reginald out of the Iles, and ſet him up for their King.

MCLXXXVIII. Reginald Godreds ſon began to raigne over the Ilands: and Murchard, a man of great power throughout all the kingdome of the Iles, was ſlaine.

MCXCII. A battell was fought betweene Reginald and Engus the ſonnes of Sumerled, but Engus won the victory. The ſame yeere was the Abbey of Ruſsin tranſlated to Dufglas: but after foure yeeres the Monks returned to Ruſsin.

MCCIII. Michael Biſhop of the Iſles died at Fontans, after whom ſucceeded Nicolas.

E MCCIV. Hugh Lacy came with an army into Ulſter, and gave John Curcy battell, tooke him priſoner, and conquered Ulſter. Afterward hee ſet John at liberty, who came to King Reginald: and he honourably entertained him, becauſe he was his brother in law: for John Curcy had taken to wife Affrica Godreds daughter, who founded the Abbey of S. Mary de Jugo Domini, and was there buried.

MCCV. John Curcy and Reginald King of the Iles having entred into Ulſter with one hundred ſhips, in the haven which is called Stranford, ſtackly beſieged the fortreſſe of Rath: but Walter Lacy comming upon them with an army, put them to flight: after this Curcy never recovered his land.

MCCX. Engus, Sumerleds ſon, was with three of his ſonnes ſlaine.

F John King of England at the ſame time brought a navie of 500. ſaile to Ireland, & ſubdued it: who ſending a certaine Earle named Fulk unto Man, in one fortnight and a day wholly in a manner waſted it: and taking hoſtages, returned thence into their country. King Reginald and his Nobles were not in Man.

MCCXVII. Nicolas Biſhop of the Ilands departed this life and was buried in Ulſter within the houſe of Benchor, after whom ſucceeded Reginald.

A

Here I thinke good to write ſomewhat againe of Olave and Reginald, Brethren.

REginald gave unto his brother Olave the Ile called Lodhus, which is ſaid to be larger than the reſt of the Ilands, but ſlenderly inhabited, becauſe it ſtands much upon mountaines, is ſtony beſides, and almoſt all unfit for tillage. The inhabitants thereof live for the moſt part by hunting and fiſhing. Olave therfore went to poſſeſſe himſelfe of this Iland, and dwelt in it, leading a poore life. And when he ſaw it would B not ſuffice to maintaine himſelfe and his army, he came boldly unto his brother Reginald, who then made his abode in the Ilands, and ſpake unto him in this maner. Brother, ſaith hee, my Soveraigne Lord the King, thou knoweſt that the kingdome of the Ilands belonged unto me by inheritance; but ſince the Lord hath elected thee to ſway the Scepter thereof, I envie thee not, nor take it grievouſly that thou art exalted to that royall dignity. Now thus much I heartily beſeech thee, that thou wouldeſt provide me ſome portion of land in the Iles, wherein I may live honeſtly according to mine eſtate: for the Iland Lodhus which thou gaveſt unto me is not ſufficient to ſuſtaine me. Reginald his brother after he had given him the hearing, ſaid he would take counſell upon the point: and the morrow after, when Olave was ſent for, and C came in place to parley of the matter, Reginald commandeth that hee ſhould be apprehended and brought unto William King of Scotland, that with him he might be kept in priſon. And Olave lay priſoner in irons and chaines almoſt ſeven yeeres. In the ſeventh yeere died William King of Scotland, after whom ſucceeded his ſonne Alexander. Now before his death he gave commandement that all priſoners ſhould be ſet free. Olave therefore being enlarged and at liberty came to Man: and ſoone after, accompanied with no ſmall traine of Noblemen, he went to S. James: and after he was thus returned Reginald his brother cauſed him to marry a Noble mans daughter of Kentyre, even his owne wives whole ſiſter, named Lavon, and gave him Lodhus in poſſeſſion to enjoy. Some few daies after Reginald Biſhop of the Ilands having D called a Synod, canonically divorced Olave the ſonne of Godred, and Lavon his wife, as being the couſin german of his former wife. After this Olave wedded Scriſtine daughter of Ferkar Earle of Roſſe.

For this cauſe Reginalds wife Queene of the Ilands was wroth, and directed her letters in the name of Reginald the King, into the Ile Sky, unto Godred her ſonne that he ſhould kill Olave. As Godred was deviſing meanes to worke this feat, and now entring into Lodhus, Olave fled in a little cog-boat unto his father in law, the Earle of Roſſe aforeſaid. Then Godred waſteth and ſpoileth Lodhus. At the ſame time Pol the ſon of Boke Sheriffe of Sky, a man of great authority in all the Ilands, becauſe he would not give his conſent unto Godred, fled, and together with Olave lived in the E Earle of Roſſes houſe: and entring into a league with Olave they came both in one ſhip to Sky. At length having ſent forth their ſpies and diſcoverers, they learned that Godred lay in a certain Iland called St. Columbs Ile, having very few men with him, miſdoubting nothing. Gathering therefore about them all their friends and acquaintance, with ſuch voluntaries as were ready to joine with them, at midnight with five ſhippes which they drew from the next ſea-ſhore, diſtant from the Iſland aforeſaid ſome two furlongs, they beſet the Iſle round about. Godred then, and they that were with him, riſing by the dawning of the day, and ſeeing themſelves environed on every ſide with enemies, were aſtonied: but putting themſelves in warlike armes, aſ- F ſaied right manfully to make reſiſtance, but all in vaine. For about nine a clocke of the day Olave and Pol the foreſaid Sheriffe ſet foot in the Iland, with their whole army, & having ſlain all thoſe whom they found without the encloſure of the Church, they tooke Godred, put out his eyes, and gelded him. Howbeit to this deed Olave did not yeeld his conſent, neither could he withſtand it, for Bokes ſonne, the Sheriffe aforeſaid. For this was done in the yeere 1223.

The

A The Summer next following Olave, after he had taken hoſtages of all the Lords and potentates of the Iſles, came with a fleet of 32. ſaile toward Man, and arrived at Regnalfwabi. At this very time Reginald and Olave divided the kingdome of the Ilands betweene themſelves, and Man was given to Reginald over and beſide his owne portion, together with the title of King.

Olave the ſecond time, having furniſhed himſelfe with victuals from the people of Man, returned with his company to his portion of the Iland. The yeere following, Reginald taking with him Alane Lord of Galway, went with his ſouldiers of Man to the Iland parts, that hee might diſſeize his brother Olave of that portion of land
B which hee had given unto him, and bring it under his owne dominion. But becauſe the Mankſmen were not willing to fight againſt Olave and the Ilanders, for the love they had to them, Reginald and Alan Lord of Galway returned home without atchieving their purpoſe. After a little while, Reginald under pretence of going to the Court of his Soveraigne the Lord King of England, tooke up of the people of Man an hundred Markes, but went in very deed to the Court of Alan Lord of Galway. At the ſame time he affianced his daughter unto the ſon of Alan in marriage. Which the Mankſmen hearing, tooke ſuch ſnuffe and indignation thereat, that they ſent for Olave, and made him their King.

MCCXXVI. Olave recovered his inheritance, to wit, the kingdome of Man and of C the Ilands, which his brother Reginald had governed 38. yeeres, and reigned quietly two yeeres.

MCCXXVIII. Olave accompanied with all the Nobles of Man, and a band of the ſtrongeſt men of the country, ſailed over into the Ilands. A little after Alan Lord of Galway, and Thomas Earle of Athol, and King Reginald, came unto Man with a puiſſant army: all the South part of Man they waſted, ſpoiled the Churches, and ſlew all the men they could lay hold of, ſo that the South part of Man was laid in manner all deſolate. After this returned Alan with his army into his owne country, and left his bailiffes in Man, to gather up for him the tributes of the country. But King Olave came upon them at unwares, put them to flight and recovered his owne kingdome.
D Then the people of Man, which before time had been diſperſed every way, began to gather themſelves together, and to dwell with confidence and ſecurity.

In the ſame yeere came King Reginald out of Galway unlooked for, at the dead time of night in winter, with five ſhips, and burnt all the ſhipping of his brother Olave, and of the Lords of Man at Saint Patrickes Iland: and ſuing to his brother for peace, ſtayed forty daies at the haven of Ragnall-wath. Meane while he won and drew unto him all the Ilanders in the South part of Man, who ſware they would venture their lives in his quarrell, untill hee were inveſted in the one halfe of the kingdome. On the contrarie part, Olave had the Northren men of the Iſle to ſide with him: and upon the 14. day of February, at a place called Tingualla, there was a battell ſtrucke
E betweene the two brethren, wherein Olave had the victorie: and King Reginald was by ſome killed there without his brothers knowledge. And certaine rovers comming to the South part of Man waſted and harried it. The Monks of Ruſsin tranſlated the body of King Reginald unto the Abbey of S. Mary de Fournes, and there enterred it was in a place which himſelfe had choſen for that purpoſe. After this went Olave to the King of Norway; but before that hee was come thither, Haco King of Norway ordained a certaine Noble man named Hubac, the ſonne of Owmund for to bee King of the Sodorian Ilands, and called his name Haco. Now the ſame Haco, together with Olave, and Godred Don Reginalds ſon, and many Norwegians came unto the Ilands: and at the winning of a fort in the Iland Both, Haco chan-
F ced to be ſmit with a ſtone, whereof he died, and lieth buried in Iona.

MCCXXX. Olave came with Godred Don and the Norwegians to Man: and they divided the kingdome among themſelves: Olave held Man, and Godred being gone unto the Ilands, was ſlaine in the Iſle Lodhus. So obtained Olave the kindgome of the Iſles.

MCCXXXVII. On the twelfth Calends of June died Olave the ſonne of Godred

" King of Man, in S. Patricks Iland, and was buried in the Abbey of Ruſsin. He reigned A " eleven yeeres, two by his brothers life, and nine after his death.
" Harold his ſonne ſucceeded him being 14. yeeres of age, and reigned 12. yeeres.
" In the firſt yeere of his reigne he made a journey to the Ilands, and appointed Loglen " his couſin, Cuſtos of Man. In the Autumne following Harald ſent three ſonnes of " Nell, namely, Dufgald, Thorquill Mormore, and his friend Joſeph to Man, for to con-
" ſult about affaires. On the 25. day therefore they meet at Tingull: and by occaſion
" of a certaine envious quarrell that aroſe between the ſonnes of Nell and Loglen, there " was a ſore fight on both ſides, wherein were ſlaine Dufgald, Mormore, and the fore-" ſaid Joſeph. In the ſpring enſuing King Harald came to the Iſle of Man, and Loglen, B
" as he fled toward Wales, periſhed by Shipwracke, with Godred Olaves ſonne his fo-
" ſter child and pupill, with 40. others.
" MCCXXXVIII. Goſpatricke and Gilleſcriſt the ſonne of Mac-Kerthac came from " the King of Norway into Man, who by force kept Harald out of Man, and tooke tri" butes to the Kings behooſe of Norway, becauſe he refuſed to come unto the King " of Norwaies Court.
" MCCXL. Goſpatric died, and is buried in the Abbey of Ruſsin.
" MCCXXXIX. Harald went unto the King of Norway, who after two yeeres confir" med unto him, his heires and ſucceſſours under his ſeale, all the Ilands which his pre-" deceſſours had poſſeſſed. C
" MCCXLII. Harald returned out of Norway to Man, and being by the inhabitants
" honourably received, had peace with the Kings of England and of Scotland. Harald, " like as his father before him, was by the King of England dubbed Knight, and after
" he had been rewarded with many gifts returned home. The ſame yeere he was ſent
" for by the King of Norway, and married his daughter.
" And in the yeere 1249. as he returned homeward with his wife, and Laurence King " elect of Man, and many other Nobles and Gentlemen, he was drowned in a tempeſt
" neere unto the coaſts of Radland.
" MCCXLIX. Reginald the ſonne of Olave and brother to Harald, began his reigne
" the day before the Nones of May, and on the thirtieth day thereof was ſlaine by one D
" Yvar a Knight and his company, in a medow neere unto the Holy Trinity Church, " on the South ſide, and lieth buried in the Church of Saint Mary of Ruſsin.
" At that time Alexander King of Scots rigged and brought together many ſhips, " meaning to ſubdue the Iland: and in the Ile Kerwaray he died of an ague.
" Harald the ſonne of Godred Don uſurped the name of King in the Ilands: all the " Nobles of Harald King Olaves ſonne hee baniſhed, and placed in their ſtead all the " Princes and Peeres that were fled from the ſaid Harald.
" MCCL. Harald the ſonne of Godred Don, being by miſſives ſent for, went unto " the King of Norway, who kept him in priſon, becauſe he had unjuſtly intruded him-
" ſelfe into the kingdome. E
" The ſame yeere there arrived at Roghalwaght Magnus the ſon of Olave, and John
" the ſonne of Dugald, who named himſelfe King: but the people of Man taking it to " the heart that Magnus was not nominated, would not ſuffer them to land there: many " of them therefore were caſt away and periſhed by ſhipwracke.
" MCCLII. Magnus the ſonne of Olave came to Man, and was made King: The next " yeere he went to the King of Norway, and ſtayed there a yeere.
" MCCLIV. Haco King of Norway ordained Magnus, Olaves ſonne, King of the " Iſles, and confirmed the ſame unto him and his heires, and by name unto his brother " Harald.
" MCCLVI. Magnus King of Man went into England, and was knighted by the King F
" of England.
" MCCLVII. The church of S. Maries of Ruſsin was dedicated by Richard of Sodore.
" MCCLX. Haco King of Norway came unto the parts of Scotland, and without " any exploit done turned to the Orkneys: where at Kirwas he ended his daies, and ly-
" eth enterred at Bergh.

A MCCLXV. Magnus, Olaves ſonne King of Man and of the Ilands, departed this life at the Caſtle of Ruſſin, and was buried in the Church of S. Mary de Ruſſin.

MCCLXVI. The kingdome of the Ilands was tranſlated, by reaſon of Alexander King of Scots.

That which followeth was written in another hand, and of a later character.

MCCLXX. The ſeventh day of October, a navy ſet out by Alexander King of Scots, ar-

MCCCXIII. Robert King of Scots beſieged the Caſtle of Ruſſin, which Dingawy

MCCCXVI. On the Aſcenſion day, Richard le Mandevile and his brethren with other Potentates of Ireland, arrived at Ramaldwath, requeſting to be furniſhed with victuals and ſilver, for that they had been robbed by the enemies warring upon them continually. Now when the commonalty of the country had made anſwer, that they would not give them any : they advanced forward againſt thoſe of Man with two troops or ſquadrons, untill they were come as far as to the ſide of Warthfell hill, in a field wherein John Mandevile remained, and there in a fought battell the Iriſh vanquiſhed the Mankſmen, ſpoiled the Iland, and rifled the Abbey of Ruſſin : and after they had continued in the Iland one whole moneth, they returned home with their ſhips fraught with pillage.

Thus endeth the Chronicle of the K.K. of Man.

The Proceſſe or courſe of the Hiſtorie following, I will now continue ſummarily out of other Writers.

E WHen Alexander the third King of Scots had gotten into his hands the Weſterne Ilands, partly by way of conqueſt, and in part for ready money paid unto the King of Norway, hee attempted the Ile of Man alſo, as one of that number, and through the valiant proweſſe of Alexander Stewart brought it under his dominion: yea and placed there a petty King or Prince, with this condition, that hee ſhould be ready alwaies at his command, to ſerve with ten ſhips in his warres at ſea. Howbeit Mary, the daughter of Reginald King of Man (who was become the Liege-man of John King of England) entred her ſuit for the Iland before the King of England: but anſwer was made unto her, that ſhee ſhould demand it of the King of Scots, for that he then held it in poſſeſſion. And yet her grand-child John Waldebeof (for the F ſaid Mary married into the houſe of Waldebeoſe) ſued for his ancient right in Parliament, holden in the 33. yeere of King Edward the firſt, before the K. of England, as the ſuperiour Lord of the kingdome of Scotland. But none other anſwer could he have than this (if I may ſpeake the words out of the very authenticall Records) Sequatur coram Juſtitiariis de Banco Regis, &c. that is, Let him ſue before the Juſtices of the K. Bench, let him be heard, and let juſtice be done. But that which he could not obtaine taine by right, Sir William Montacute, his kinſman (for come he was of the race of the Kings of Man) wonne by his ſword. For with a band of Engliſh muſtered up in haſt, he drave all the Scots out of the Iland. But being by this warre plunged deeply in debt, and not having wherewith to make ſome paiment thereof, he mortgaged it for ſeven yeeres to Antonie Bec Biſhop of Durham, and Patriarch of Jeruſalem, and made over the profits and revenues thereof unto him: yea and ſoone after the King granted it unto the ſaid Antonie for tearme of life. Afterwards, King Edward the ſecond paſſed a grant thereof unto his minion Piers Gaveſton, what time as he created him Earle of Cornwall: and when the ſaid Piers was rid out of the way, hee gave it unto Henry Beaumont, with all the domaine and regall juriſdiction thereto belonging. But ſhortly after the Scots under Robert Brus recovered it; and Robert Randulph that right warlike Scot, like as a long time after Alexander Duke of Albany, uſed to ſtile themſelves Lords of Man, and bare the ſame coat of Armes, as did the later Kings of Man; namely, three armed legges of a man linked together, and bending in the hammes: ſuch for all the world as the Iſle Sicilia gave, the three legges naked, in like forme in her coines of money in old time, to ſignifie three Promontories. Notwithſtanding, before time the Kings of Man uſed for their armes, as we have ſeene in their Seales, a ſhip with the ſaile hoiſed up, with this title in the circumference, Rex Manniæ & inſularum, that is, King of Man and of the Iſlands. Afterward, about the yeere 1340. William Montacute the younger, Earle of Salisbury wreſted it by ſtrong hand and force of armes from the Scottiſh: who in the yeere of our Lord 1393. as Thomas Walſingham ſaith, ſold for a great ſumme of money, Man, with the crowne thereof, unto William Scrope. Who being for high treaſon beheaded, and his goods confiſcate, it came unto the hands of Henry the fourth King of England: who granted this Iland unto Henry Percy Earle of Northumberland (as a conqueror triumphing over William Scrope, whom he as yet a private perſon had intercepted and beheaded, when he aſpired to the crowne) with this condition: that himſelfe and his heires ſhould when the Kings of England were enſtalled and crowned, carry before them that ſword, which the ſaid Henry wore by his ſide, what time he came backe againe out of exile into England, commonly called Lancaſter ſword. But I think it good to ſet this down out of the Record, in the very words of the K. himſelf. De noſtra gratia ſpeciali dedimus, that is: Of our ſpeciall grace we have given and granted unto Henry Earle of Northumberland, the Iſle, Caſtle, Pile, and Seigniory of Man, and all the Ilands and Lordſhips to the ſaid Iſle belonging, which were Sir William le Scropes, Knight, now deceaſed, (whom in his life time we conquered, and have decreed him ſo to be conquered) and which by reaſon of our conqueſt of him we tooke into our hand as conquered: which conqueſt verily and decree in our preſent Parliament, with the aſſent of the Lords Temporall in the ſame Parliament being, as touching the perſon of the foreſaid William, and all the lands, tenements, goods, and chattells of his, as well within our kingdome as without, at the petition of the Communalty of our kingdome, ſtand confirmed, &c. To have and to hold unto the ſaid Earle, and his heires, &c. by ſervice of carrying at the daies of our coronation, and of our heires, at the left ſhoulder, and the left ſhoulder of our heires, either by himſelfe or a ſufficient and honourable Deputy of his, that ſword naked which we ware, and were girt with, when we arrived in the parts of Holderneſſe, called Lancaſter ſword, &c.

But in the fifth yeere following the ſaid Henry Percie entred into open rebellion, and the King ſent Sir John Stanley and William Stanley to ſeize the Iſle and caſtle of Man, the inheritance whereof he granted afterward to Sir John Stanley and his heires by letters Patents, with the patronage of the Biſhopricke, &c. And ſo his heires and ſucceſſours, who were honoured with the title of Earles of Derby, were commonly called Kings of Man.

Annales of Th. Otterborn. Anno 7. H. 4.

From Man, untill we come to the Mull of Gallaway, we meet with none but very ſmall Ilands. But after we be once paſt it, in the ſalt water of GLOTTA, or Dunbriſton Frith appeareth the Iland GLOTTA, whereof Antoninus maketh mention, which the Scots now call Arran, whereof the Earles of Arran in Scotland were ſtiled: and neighbouring unto it is that which was in times paſt named Rotheſia, now Buthe

of

A of a ſacred Cell which Brendan erected (for ſo they terme a little Cell in Scottiſh) thence come we to Hellan, in times paſt called Hellan Leneaw, that is, as John Fordon interpreteth it, The Iſle of Saints, and to Hellan Tinoc, that is, The Iſle of Swine: and theſe Ilands are ſeen in the ſame Frith or Forth. But of theſe I have ſpoken before.

Without this Bay or Frith lye a number of Ilands very thicke together, which the Scots themſelves that inhabite them call Inch-Gall, that is haply, The Iſles of the Gallicians: the Engliſh and the reſt of the Scots, The Weſtern Iſles: the writers of the former age HEBRIDES; but the ancient Ethnickes Bettoricæ, and Giraldus other where Inchades and Leucades: Pliny, Solinus, and Ptolomee name them EBUDAS,
B HEBUDAS, and Ecbidus, which names have ſome conſonant affinity with Epidium the promontory of Britain oppoſite unto them, and an Iſle among theſe ſo named. The reaſon of the name I cannot picke out, unleſſe I ſhould thinke they were ſo called, becauſe there groweth here no corne or graine.

For Solinus writeth, that the inhabitants of theſe Ilands are not acquainted with corne, and live onely upon fiſh and milke: and Ebeid in Britiſh ſoundeth as much as without corne. The inhabitants, as ſaith the ſame Solinus, have no skill or knowledge of corne, they live of fiſh and milke onely. They all have but one King: For how many ſoever they be, they are ſevered one from another by a narrow enterflow of the Sea betweene. Scottiſh or weſterne Iles.

C The King hath nothing that hee may ſay is his owne, all things are common to them all: and held hee is to equity by certaine lawes: and leſt hee ſhould for covetouſneſſe ſwarve aſide from the truth, by his poore eſtate he learneth juſtice, as who hath no houſe, furniture, and proviſion of his owne, but all his maintenance is from the common coffer.

No woman is he allowed to have in propriety, but by turnes hee taketh for to uſe whomſoever hee fancieth, whereby hee neither can have his wiſh, nor hope of children.

Of theſe Iſlands, the common people affirmeth there bee 44. whereas in truth there are many more. Pliny wrote that there were 30. of them. But Ptolomee
D reckoneth up but five. The firſt is RICINA, Pliny calleth it RICNEA, Antoninus RIDUNA, now termed Racline: and I think it ſhould be read in Antonine Riclina: for (cl) eaſily maketh a (d) by joining a (c) at the backe unto it. A ſmall Iland this is, butting full upon Ireland, knowne unto the ancient writers, for that it lieth in the very narrow ſea betweene Ireland and Scotland: famous at this day for no cauſe elſe, but for the overthrow and ſlaughter of the Scottiſh Iriſh, who otherwhiles poſſeſſed themſelves of it, and were thruſt out by the Engliſh, under the conduct of Sir William Norris in the yeere 1575. The next is EPIDIUM, which by the name I would gheſſe, with that excellent Geographer Gerard Mercator, lay neere unto the promontorie of the Epidii, and to the ſhore. And ſeeing there ſtandeth apparently in E the ſame ſituation an Iland called Ila, of good largeneſſe, and of a fruitfull, plaine, and champion ſoile, I dare avouch that this was Epidium, or the Iſle of the Epidii; for in ſome places it is read Emdion. This carrieth in length 24. miles, and is 16. miles broad, ſo plentifull of cattell, wheat, and heards of red deere, that it was the ſecond ſeat next unto Man, for the King of the Ilands, as it is at this day of the Mac-Connels, who herein have their Caſtle at Dunyweg. Betwixt Ila and Scotland lieth Iona, which Bede tearmeth Hy and Hu, given by the Picts unto the Scottiſh Monkes, for propagating and preaching of the Goſpell among them: where ſtood a Monaſterie, famous by reaſon of the Scottiſh Kings tombes and the frequent converſing of holy men therein: among whom Columba, the Apoſtle of the Picts, was the principall: of F whoſe Cell the Iland alſo is called Columb-Kill, like as the man alſo himſelfe, by a compound name was termed Columbkill, as Bede witneſſeth. And here at length, as ſome will have it, a Biſhops ſeat was ordained in Sodore, a little towne, whence all the Iles were alſo called Sodorenſis, for that it is reckoned to be in his Dioceſſe. Then have you MALEOS, that Ptolomee writeth of, now called Mula, whereof Plinie ſeemeth to make mention, when hee ſaith, Mella is reported to bee 25. miles larger than the reſt. For ſo we read in the moſt ancient edition of Plinie, printed at Venice, whereas in the Vulgar copies, in ſteed of Reliquarum Mella, is read Reliquarum nulla, that is, None of the reſt, &c. The Eaſtern HEBUDA, now called Skie, from hence lieth out in a great length over againſt the ſhore or coaſt of Scotland: the Weſterne HEBUDA bending more Weſtward, is now called Lewis (the Lord whereof is Mac-Cloyd) and in the ancient hiſtory of Man is named Lodhus, full of ſteep and craggie little hills, ſtony and very ſlenderly inhabited: howbeit the largeſt of them all; from which Euſt is diſ-joined with a very narrow waſh. All the reſt, ſave onely Hyrtha, are of ſmall account, being either very ſtony, or elſe inacceſſible by reaſon of craggy cliffes, & ſcarce clad with any green-ford. Yet the Scots purchaſed all theſe with their ready mony of the Norwegians (as I have ſaid before) as if they had beene the very buttreſſes or pillars of the kingdome, although they reape very ſmall commodity thereby: conſidering that the inhabitants, the ancient true Scots or Iriſh, being men of ſtout ſtomackes and deſperate boldneſſe, will by no meanes be ſubject to the ſeverity of lawes, or awed by juſtice. As touching their manners, apparell, and language they differ nothing at all from the wild Iriſhry, of whom we have ſpoken before: ſo that wee may eaſily know thereby that they be one and the ſelfe ſame nation originally. They that beare the ſway and doe rule in theſe Ilands are the families of Mac-Conel, Mac-Alen, whom others terme Mac-len, Mac-Cloyd of Lewis, and Mac-Cloyd of Harich. But the mightieſt houſe of them all is that of the Mac-Conels, who glory in their pedegree, as derived from Donald, who in the reigne of James the third ſtiled himſelfe King of the Ilands, and with all kinde of cruelty in moſt ſavage and barbarous manner plagued Scotland: which notwithſtanding, his ſonne being outlawed paied deerely, as forced to ſubmit his whole eſtate abſolutely unto the Kings will and pleaſure, and had of his gift ſome poſſeſſions aſſigned to him in Cantire. In the foregoing age, of this ſtocke there flouriſhed Donel Gormy, Mac-Conell, that is, The blew, haply ſo ſurnamed of his apparell. He had iſſue two ſonnes, Agnus Mac-Conell, and Alexander, he who leaving this barren and hungry Cantir, invaded the Glinnes in Ireland. Agnus Mac-Conell aforeſaid, was father of James Mac-Conell ſlaine by Shan O-Neale, and of Surley Boy, upon whom Queene Elizabeth of her bounty beſtowed lands in Rout within Ireland. James Mac-Conell had iſſue Agnus Mac-Conell, of whom I have ſpoken before, between whom and Mac-Clen there was ſuch a deepe and inveterate hatred, that the force of conſanguinity was never able to quench the feud, but that they polluted themſelves moſt wickedly with one anothers bloud. From the Hæbudes, if you hold ſailes along by the ſhore toward the North-eaſt, you may at length diſcover the ORCADES, now called ORKNEY, being thirty Ilands or thereabout, ſundred by the Ocean which hath his walke and current betweene them. A certain ancient fragment ſo calleth them, as one would ſay, Argat, that is, as the ſame interpreteth it, Above the Geies: but I would rather expound it, Above Cath: for it lyeth over againſt Cath, a countrey of Scotland, which of the Promontory they uſe to call Cathneſſe: the inhabitants whereof ſeeme to be named amiſſe by Ptolomee, CARINI for CATINI. In Solinus his time no man dwelled in them, but overgrowne they were Vinceis, or Junceis herbis, that is, With binding or ruſhy weeds: but now inhabited indeed they are, yet deſtitute of woods, bearing barley good ſtore, and altogether without wheat. Among theſe Pomonia, famous for an Epiſcopall See, is the principall, called by Solinus POMONA Diutina, for the length of the daies there: now the inhabitants tearme it Mainland, as if it were the continent or maine, adorned with the Biſhops ſeat in Kirkwale a little towne, and with two caſtles: it yeeldeth plenty of tinne and of lead. OCETIS alſo is reckoned by Ptolomee in number of theſe, which now we gheſſe to be named Hethy.

But whether Hey, which is counted one of theſe, be Plinies DUMNA or no, I could never yet reſolve. Surely if it be not, I would thinke that Faire Iſle, the onely towne whereof (for it hath but one) they call Dumo, is that Dumna rather than with Becanus judge Wardhuys in Lapland to be it. Julius Agricola, who firſt of all ſailed round about Britaine with his fleet, diſcovered out of theſe Iſles of Orkney, which till that time

A time were unknowne and ſubdued them, if we may beleeve Tacitus: but queſtionleſſe they were knowne in the time of Claudius the Emperour; for Pomponius Mela who then lived mentioneth them. Yet doubtleſſe Oroſius is untrue, in that he writeth that Claudius conquered them: and ſo farre is it off that Claudius ſhould conquer them (which is avouched in S. Hieroms Chronicles) that Juvenal in Hadrians time, not long after Agricola, wrote thus of them.

——— Arma quid ultra

B Orcades, & minima contentos nocte Britannos?

Why warred we paſt Iriſh coaſts, and Orkneys lately won,
Beyond the Britans, where there is leaſt night and longeſt Sun?

Afterward when the Romans Empire in Britaine was utterly decaied, now the Saxons, as it ſeemeth, were ſeated in them: for Claudian the Poet plaied upon them in theſe termes.

——— Maduerunt Saxone fuſo
C Orcades.———

With Saxons blood that there were ſlaine
The Orkneys was imbrued againe.

Ninnius alſo writeth, that Octha and Ebiſſus Saxons, who ſerved for pay under the Britans, ſailed round about the Picts with 40. Ciules, that is, Flyboats or Roving Pinnaces, and waſted the Iles of Orkney. After this, they came into the hands of the Norwegians (whence it is that the inhabitants ſpeake the Gothes language) by the grant of Donald Ban, who after the death of his brother Malcom Can-Mor, King of D Scots, by excluding his nephewes, had uſurped the kingdome, that by their helpe he might be aſſiſted in that intended ambition: and the Norwegians held the poſſeſſion of them unto the yeere of ſalvation 1266. For then Magnus, the fourth of that name, King of Norway, being by the Scots that warred upon him brought to diſtreſſe, ſurrendred them up againe unto Alexander, the third King of the Scots, by covenant and compoſition, which Haquin King of the Norwegians confirmed unto King Robert Brus, in the yeere 1312. And at length in the yeere 1498. Chriſtian the firſt, King of Norway and of Denmark, renounced all his right for himſelfe and his ſucceſſours, when he affianced his daughter unto James, the third King of Scots, and made over all his intereſt to his ſaid ſonne in law and his ſucceſſours: and for the ſtronger
E aſſurance thereof, the Popes confirmation was procured to ratifie the ſame.

To ſay nothing of the Earles of Orkney that were of more ancient times, who alſo in right of inheritance obtained the Earldomes of Cathneſſe and of Strathern, at the laſt the title of Orkney came by an heire female unto Sir William Sent-cler: and William the fourth of this line, called The Prodigall Earl for waſting his patrimony, was the laſt Earle of this race. Howbeit, his poſterity enjoyed the honour to be Baron Sent-cler, unto theſe daies. And the title of Cathnes remaineth ſtill in the poſterity of his brother. But within our remembrance this honourable title of the Earle of Orkney and Lord of Shetland was conferred upon Robert, a baſe ſonne of King James the fifth; and Patrick Steward his ſonne enjoyeth the ſame at this preſent. Earles of Orkney.

F Beyond the Iles of Orkney, and above Britaine, the author of that ancient Commentary upon Horace, placeth the Fortunate Ilands, wherein, as they write, none dwell but devout and juſt men; and the Grecians in their verſes celebrate the pleaſantneſſe and fertility of the place, calling them the Elyſian fields. But as touching theſe Fortunate Iſles, take with you, if you pleaſe, another relation of that old fabulous Grecian, Iſacius Tzetzes out of his notes upon Lycophron: In the Ocean (ſaith he) there is a

Britiſh

Britiſh Iland, between Weſt Britain and Thule that looke toward the Eaſt. Thither men A ſay the ſoules of the dead are tranſlated over: for on the ſhore of that ſea wherein the Iland of Britaine lieth, there dwelt fiſher-men, ſubject unto the French, but paying them no tribute, becauſe (as they ſay) they ferry over the ſoules and folk departed. When theſe fiſhermen returne home in the evening, within a while after they heare ſome knocking at the door, and heare a voice calling them unto their work. Then riſe they, and to the ſhore they goe, not knowing what cauſeth them for to goe; where they ſee boats prepared, but none of their owne, and no men in them: which when they be entred into, they fall to their oares, and feele the weight of the ſaid boats as if they were laden with men, but ſee no body. After that, with one puſh they come to a Britiſh Iland in a trice, whereas otherwiſe in ſhips of B their own they could hardly get thither with a day and nights ſailing. Now when they are come to the Iland, then again they ſee no creature, but heare a voice of thoſe that receive them that are a ſhipboard, and count them by the kinred of father and mother, yea and call them one by one according to their dignity, art, and name. But they, after that the ſhip is diſcharged of her load, returne home againe with one yerke of their oares. Hence it is that many men thinke theſe be the Ilands of bleſſed ghoſts.

Of the ſame ſtampe alſo may that Poeticall Geographer ſeeme to be, of whom Muretus maketh mention in his variety of readings: who hath written that C. Julius Cæſar went thither once in a great galley, with an hundred men aboard: and when he was willing to have ſeated himſelfe there (as being wondrouſly delighted with the incredible pleaſantneſſe of the place) he was full againſt his will, and ſtruggling what he could to the contrary, throwne out by thoſe inviſible inhabitants. C

Thule. Five daies and nights ſailing from the Iſles of Orkney, Solinus placeth THULE: An Iland, if any other, often celebrated by the Poets, whenſoever they would ſignifie any thing very remote and farre off, as if it were the furtheſt part of the whole world. Hereupon ſaith Virgil, Tibi ſerviat ultima Thule, that is, Let Thule moſt remote thee ſerve: Seneca, Terrarum ultima Thule, that is, Thule the fartheſt land that is: Juvenal, De conducendo loquitur jam Rhetore Thule, that is, Now Thule ſpeakes, how Oratours to hire: Claudian, Thulen procul axe remotam, that is, Thule far remote under the Pole, and in another place, Ratibuſq; impervia Thule, And Thule where no ſhips D can paſſe: Statius, Ignotam vincere Thulen, that is, To conquer Thule all unknowne: And Ammianus Marcellinus, by way of an Adage or Proverbiall ſpeech, uſeth it in theſe words, Etiamſi apud Thulen moraretur, that is, Although he made his abode even in Thule. To paſſe over other teſtimonies, give me leave yet to note thus much moreover, that the ſaid Statius uſed Thule for Britaine, in theſe his verſes.

Thule for Britaine.

Cærulus haud aliter cùm dimicat incola Thules, Agmina falcifero circumvenit acta covino.
Even ſo the blew inhabitants of Thule when they fight,
Environ battels, marching on with ſithed chariots might. E

As alſo in this place of his Poem entituled Sylvæ, as it ſeemeth:

——refluo circumſona gurgite Thule.
Thule that doth reſound amaine,
With ſea that ebbes and flowes againe.

Suidas writeth, that it tooke the name of Thules a King of Ægypt: Iſidore, of the Sunne: Reynerus Reneccius, of the Saxon word Tell, that is, A limit, as if it were the bound of the North and Weſt. F

But yet for all this, Syneſius doubteth whether there were any Thule or no; and our Giraldus Cambrenſis writeth, that it is no where extant to be ſeene: and the better ſort of learned men are of ſundry judgements concerning it. Moſt of them have affirmed Iſland, that is ſubject to extreme ſharpe cold and continuall winter, to have beene called in times paſt Thule.

Iſland.

But

A But Saxo Grammaticus, Crantzius, Milius, Jovius, and Peucerus are of a contrary opinion. Neither am I ignorant, that the vaſt and huge country of Scandia is deſcribed by Procopius under the name of Thule. But if that be true which the moſt learned Peucer hath recorded in his book entituled De dimenſione terræ, that is, Of the meaſuring of the earth, that ſailers call Shetland Thilenſel (neither dare I empeach his credit) then ſurely wee have found Thule, and the matter is now at an end and queſtionleſſe. For this Shetland is an Iſle under the Scottiſh dominion, environed with other Iſlets, and the ſame is nipped with froſt and chilly cold, lying open on every ſide unto bitter ſtorms; the inhabitants whereof, like as thoſe of Iſland, uſe in ſteed of bread-corne B dried fiſh, and the ſame braied and beaten, which we call ſtock-fiſh. And although it have not the North pole ſo elevated, that there is continuall day ſixe moneths together, as Pytheas of Marſils hath fained of Thule (for which hee is juſtly taxed by Strabo:) and this hapneth not to Iſland it ſelfe, where there is in manner a continuall Winter, and an intolerable ſettled cold. Yet that a man ſhould thinke this Shetland to have been Thule, firſt the ſituation thereof in Ptolomee may induce him, being ſet 63. degrees from the Æquinoctiall, as Thule is in Ptolomee: again, for that it lieth between Norway and Scotland, where Saxo Grammaticus placeth Thule: then, becauſe it is two daies ſailing diſtant from the point of Caledonia or Cathnes, according to which diſtance Solinus placeth Thule: alſo, Tacitus ſaith that the Romans kenned C Thule afar off, as they ſailed round about Britain by the Orcades: laſtly, becauſe it faceth the ſhore of Bergæ in Norway, againſt which place Thule lieth according to Pomponius Mela: in which Author the reading is corruptly, Belgarum littori in ſtead of Bergarum. For Bergæ a citie in Norway lieth over againſt Shetland: and Pliny nameth in this tract BERGOS, which I doubt not but it is that little country wherein BERGÆ flouriſheth, like as no man will deny that Norway is NERIGON ſpecified by Pliny. But enough of this Thule, which ſnow and winter weather, as one ſaith, hath hidden from the ancient writers, and from us too I aſſure you: neither is any of them able to ſay, which of the Northren Ilands they meant, when they ſpake ſo much of Thule. As touching the length of daies in that unknowne Iland, Feſtus Avienus, when hee D treated of Britaine, tranſlated out of Dionyſius theſe verſes.

Lib. 2. belli Gothici.

Longa dehinc celeri ſi quis rate marmora curret,
Inveniet vaſto ſurgentem gurgite Thulen;
Hic cùm plauſtra Poli tangit Phœbeius ignis,
Nocte ſub inluſtri rota ſolis fomite flagrat
Continuo, clarumque diem nox æmula ducit.

From hence if one with pinnace ſwift along the ſea doth ſaile,
E Thule above the Ocean vaſt to finde he ſhall not faile:
Here when about the Northren pole the Suns fire doth ſejourne,
The night is lightſome, and his wheeles continually doe burne,
The night, I ſay, reſembling day faire light makes ſoone returne.

Which Pomponius Mela likewiſe hath noted in theſe words. Oppoſite unto the coaſt of Bergæ lieth Thule, an Iland much renowned both in Greek Poems, and in ours alſo. In it, for that the Sun riſeth and is to ſet farre off, the nights verily are ſhort; but in winter time, as elſewhere, darke; in ſummer light: becauſe all that time hee mounteth very F high, although his body be not ſeen, yet with his neere brightneſſe he doth lighten the parts next unto him. But about the ſolſtice there be no nights at all, by reaſon that hee being then more apparent, not onely caſteth bright beames from him, but ſheweth alſo the greateſt part of himſelfe.

Above theſe Ilands the ſea is tearmed, The ſlow, frozen, and Icie ſea; for that it is ſo rough by occaſion of heaps of Ice, and ſcarce navigable.

The frozen ſea, or Cronium.

It is alſo named of ancient writers CRONIUM, or Cronian ſea, of Saturne; becauſe here in a Britiſh Iland, as Plutarch recordeth, there goeth a tale, how Saturne is kept ſleeping in a deepe cave, or bottome of a golden pumiſh ſtone: that he is by Jupiter caſt into a moſt deepe and dead ſleepe, which ſerveth in ſtead of bonds: that birds bring him Ambroſia the divine meat, with the odoriferous ſmell wherof all the place is perfumed. Alſo that he hath many ſpirits or dæmones attending upon him as ſervitours, who reverence him, ſerve him, and attend upon him. By which pretty fable, (unleſſe I be deceived) is covertly couched by a Mythiology, that there lye hidden in theſe Ilands, veines or mines of Metals, over which Saturne is préſident: which notwithſtanding are forlet and out of requeſt, for want of wood to maintaine the fornaces. A B

Now beneath Thule Southward, the German ſea ſpreadeth it ſelfe wide, wherein, as Pliny affirmeth, there lye diſperſed the ſeven ACMODÆ, Mela tearmeth them HÆMODES: But ſeeing it is knowne for certaine, that theſe be Ilands belonging to Denmarke in the Codan Gulfe, namely, Zeland, Fuynen, Lagland, Muen, Falſtor, Layland, and Femerem, there is no cauſe wherefore I ſhould ſay any more; neither of the Iſle GLESSARIA or ELECTRIDA, ſo called of Amber caſt up there out of the Sea: which Sotacus ſuppoſed to drop forth of trees in Britain. But ſeeing that the ancient Germans called Amber Gleſſe, willing enough I am to thinke with that moſt learned man, Eraſmus Michael Lætus, that the Iland Leſſe, hard by Scagen, or Promontory of Denmark, was in times paſt called GLESSARIA. Now within the German ſea on that ſide where it beateth upon Britaine, appeare very few Ilands, unleſſe they be thoſe that lye in Edenburrough Frith, namely, May, Baſſe, Keth; and Inche Colme, that is, Columbs Iſle. On the coaſt of Northumberland, over againſt the river Lied, one ſheweth it ſelfe, namely Lindiſ-farn: the Britans call it Inis Medicante, which, that I may uſe Bedes words, as the ſea ebbeth and floweth at his tides, is twice a day inundated and compaſſed about with water in maner of an Iland, and twice likewiſe made continent to the land, as the ſhore is laid bare again: whereupon he aptly termed it a Demy Iland. The Weſt part of it being the narrower, and left unto conies, joineth to the Eaſt ſide by a very ſmall ſpange of land: and this part which bendeth toward the South is much broader, having a pretty towne in it, with a Church and a caſtle: where ſometimes had beene that Epiſcopall See, which Aidan the Scot (called thither to preach the Chriſtian faith unto the people of Northumberland) inſtituted, as being much delighted with the ſolitary ſituation, as a moſt fit place of retire. In this ſmall Iland there ſat eleven Biſhops. But afterwards when the Danes rifled and robbed all the Sea-coaſts, the Epiſcopall See was tranſlated to Durham. Under the towne there is a good commodious haven, defended with a Block-houſe ſituate upon an hill toward the South-Eaſt. C D

Lindiſ-farne.

Holy Iland.

This, for the habitation therein of holy Monkes, is called in Engliſh Holy Iland. Concerning which Alcuin, in an Epiſtle unto Egelred King of Northumberland, writeth thus. A place more venerable than all the places in Britaine, is left to the ſpoile of Pagans and Miſcreants: and where after the departure of S. Paulinus from York, Chriſtian religion in our nation firſt began, there it hath felt the firſt beginning of miſery and calamity. E

Farn Iſle.

Seven miles from hence South-Eaſtward, Farn Iſle ſheweth it ſelfe, diſtant almoſt two miles from Banborrow caſtle, encloſed within the moſt deep Ocean, and encircled about with craggy cliffs, and this hath alſo in the middle well neere, a Fort belonging unto it; even in that place, as the report goeth, where Cuthbert Biſhop of Lindisfarn, that tutelar St. and Patron of the Northren Engliſhmen, to the end he might wholly give himſelfe to the ſervice of God, built, as Bede ſaith in his life, a city fitting his government, and erected houſes in this city, ſorting well therto. For the whole building ſtood almoſt round in compaſſe, reaching from wall to wall the ſpace of foure or five perches. The wall it ſelfe on the coaſt ſide was more than a mans height: for on the inſide with hewing downe into a mighty rocke he had made it far higher, ſufficient to with-hold and keep in the wanton laſciviouſneſſe either of eyes or thoughts, and to elevate the whole F intention

A intention of the mind up to heavenly deſires, in ſuch ſort as that the devout inhabitants thereof could out of his manſion place behold nothing but the heaven. Which wall verily he made not of cut ſquared ſtone, or of bricke; nor laid the ſame with ſtrong morter, but raiſed altogether of coble and unpoliſhed rough ſtones, and turfe betweene, which with digging he had taken out of the midſt of the place. Of which ſtones verily ſome were of that huge bigneſſe, as foure men were uneth able to lift one of them. Within this manſion hee had two houſes, a Chappell, and a dwelling roome for common uſes. The walls whereof he brought up of very naturall earth, by digging much of it within and without round about, or elſe by paring it up. And roofes over them of timber without all forme, and ſtraw thereupon. Moreover, at the haven of this Iland there ſtood a greater houſe, wherein the bre-

B thren that came to viſit him might be entertained and lodged, and not far from it a fountain meet for their uſes. Upon this there adjoine other ſmaller Ilands toward the North, as Widopens, Staple Iland, which lieth two miles off, Bronſman, and two leſſer than theſe, which they call the Wambes.

After theſe the Iland commonly called Coquet lieth right before the mouth of the river Coquet, wherein is a plentifull veine of Sea-coale. Neither are there any more Ilands to be ſeen in this coaſt: but over againſt it be the Saxonum Inſulæ, that is, The Saxons Ilands, now called Heilich lant, that is, The Holy-Ilands, and they lie, as it were, in a continued range along Eaſt and Weſt Friſlands: Among which that was beſt knowne unto the Roman Captaines which Strabo called BIRCHANIS, Pliny BIRCHANA, and the Romans FABARIA, of the reſemblance of a certain Graine or Pulſe comming up there of the owne accord: which that I may reſtore it againe to the due place (although it bee nothing pertinent to my purpoſe) the very name it ſelfe witneſſeth to beethat Borkun which lieth over againſt the mouth of Ems. Somewhat lower upon the ſhore of Holland, where in ancient time was the mouth of Rhene, the foundations of a moſt ancient Store-houſe, Magazin or Armory, are covered over with the waves, which being very ſeldome diſcovered and laide bare at a low ebbe of the Ocean, ſheweth both an admirable ſpectacle of reverend antiquitie, and alſo a moſt noble modell and forme of building; which, Abraham Ortelius, the repairer of ancient Geography, and my entire and inward friend, hath preſerved out of the maine Ocean by his exact deſcription thereof. I have mentioned this the more willingly, becauſe the Hollanders call it in their language Huis te Britten, that is, the Britiſh houſe, ſo that it belongeth at leaſt wiſe in name to Britain, and therfore not impertinent to my purpoſe. For as it is evident and confeſſed of all, that the Emperour C. Caligula, when he entended the conqueſt of Britaine, in that ridiculous voiage of his, built it for a watch-tower: ſo an ancient Inſcription there digged up doth teſtifie, that the Emperor Septimius Severus, after it was fallen to decay rebuilt it. But whence it was named Britten, let him tell that beſt can gheſſe. Probable it is that it tooke this name from the Britans: for that Bretta the natall place of Philip Melanchthon tooke name of the Britans, he himſelfe was fully perſwaded: and that Mounts in Heinault were of the Britans termed Breten, we have read elſewhere. But yet (that I may ſpeake as Plinie doth) ſeeing he marvelleth why the Herbe that is peculiar unto Holland, as growing no where elſe, is called Britannica, unleſſe perhaps thoſe that bordered upon the Ocean dedicated it unto Britain ſo neere unto it: ſo for my part I wonder as much, why this tower ſhould be termed Britannica, or Breten, unleſſe the Hollanders conſecrated it to our Britaine, lying oppoſite unto it. Pliny calleth a place in Picardy, Portum Morinorum Britannicum, that is, The Britiſh haven or port of the Morines, either for that they took ſhip there to paſſe over into Britain, or becauſe it kenned Britaine over againſt it on the other ſide of the ſea. Why then ſhould not this tower by the ſame reaſon be called Britannica or Breten? for that the Britans often arrived here, and that from hence out of Germany there was a common paſſage into Britain, it is moſt certain; conſidering that Zoſimus hath given the juſt meaſure of the ſea betwixt Britaine and this mouth of Rheine, to be 900. ſtadia over, as though it had beene an uſuall paſſage: and written beſide, that corne was wont to be brought by ſhips out of Britaine to this place, and from thence with barges and boats haled up the Rhene againſt the ſtreame to ſerve the Roman garriſons: ſeeing

F The Chamavi dwelt thereby, as appeareth out of the Embaſſages of Eunapius.

seeing that Julian the Emperour built garrisons, as Marcellinus saith, wherein might be inned and kept the corne that the Britans usually transported thither. A

At which time this said Armory may seeme to have beene converted into a Garner or Store-house for corne, and of the said British corne tearmed Britannicum: and so much the rather, because in the old Records of Holland, wee finde it written Brittanburg: for that age termed castles standing commodiously, and such as were stored with plenty of corne, Burghs, as we read in the history of the Burgundians. Moreover, what if the Britans (that in this doubtfull matter I may run out of one conjecture to another) sometimes held it in their owne hands, and so adopted it into their owne name? considering they invested Magnus Maximus, whom some name Clemens Maximus, in the purple robe, and proclaimed him Emperour against Gratian. For he arrived at this mouth of Rhene. If againe, it had not as yet taken this name Britannicum, what if the Saxons tearmed it Huis te Britten, for that they tooke ship from hence into Britain, when they annoied our shores with their Cyules? for so they tearmed their pinnaces or Brigantines. Verily Zosimus sheweth that the Saxons, after they had driven out the Frankers called Salii, planted themselves in Batavia, that is, Holland: and that from thence they put over by multitudes into Britain, it is most cleere and evident. Which also as I said before, Janus Douza, a noble Gentleman indeed, and passing well learned, in his Ode of Leyden seemeth to imply: yet here againe, lest I might seeme too forward and lavish in setting forth the glory of Britaine; considering that the right learned Hadrian Junius, borne and bred in Holland, hath fetched the originall of the herbe Britannica from Britten a word of his owne country, because it groweth plentifully upon those turfes which they call Britten, and whereof they raise great bankes and dikes against the violence of the encroching Ocean; it will be no absurdity if one should reduce this Huis te Britten, unto the same originall: and suppose it to have been so called, because it was fenced with banks of turfe, or of Britten, set opposite against the forcible surges of the waves; which when the surges of the sea had once pierced and overthrowne, it may seeme to have borne downe this house also. But let them see to these matters who have a deeper insight into the nature of the word, and the situation of the place, and pardon me withall, if here I have thrust my sickle into anothers harvest.

Zeland. See pag. 333. & 441.

In that coast there be also Isles of Zeland compassed about with the rivers Scaldi, Maese, and the Ocean: Touching which I will onely adde thus much, that the name of Valachria (for of these this is the chiefe) as Lemnius Levinus conjectureth, came from our Welshmen. Over against Zeland, Tamis the goodliest and noblest river of Britain discharged himself into the sea: in which place Ptolomee setteth TOLIAPIS and CAUNA, or CONVENNON. Of Toliapis, which I suppose to be Shepey, see in Kent. Of Convennos I have spoken in Essex in the page 441.

More Eastward without Tamis mouth, there lieth along before the Iland Tenet, a place full of shelves and sands, and very dangerous for saylers, which they call Goodwins sands, where our Annales doe record that in the yeere 1097. an Iland which was the patrimony of Goodwin Earle of Kent, was quite swallowed up and sunk in the sea: concerning which John Twin writeth thus. This land was very fruitfull, and full of plenteous pastures, lying somewhat lower and more flat than Tenet; out of which there was a passage by boat or barge three or foure miles long. This Iland in an unusuall tempest of windes, and boisterous fury of stormy raines, and uncouth rage of the sea, was drowned, and lieth overwhelmed with sand cast up after an incredible manner, and without all recovery is turned into a middle or doubtfull nature of land and sea. For I wot wel what I say, because one while it wholly floateth, and another while at a low water after an ebbe, it beareth walkers upon it. Haply this is Toliapis, unlesse you had rather read Thanatos, for Toliapis, and in some copies we read it Toliatis, of which we have treated in Kent. See the 345. page.

Goodwin Sands.

Some call it Lomea.

In this very place, the huge vastnesse of the sea gathereth into such a straight, that the gullet of the Ocean betweene the firme land of France and Britaine, is not above thirty miles over, which Streights some call the Narrow sea of Britaine, others of France (and the bound it is of the British sea) which by little and little removeth the shores

The British narrow sea.

A shores farther asunder, that were in manner meeting together, and by the driving backe of the lands on both sides equally, floweth between Britaine and France from East to West. At this beginneth the British sea: wherein first you meet with the Iland, or byland rather, Selsy; in the English Saxon tongue, Seolſ-ea, that is, according to Bede, The Iland of Sea-calves, which in our tongue we call otherwise Seales. But hereof I have spoken already in the page 308.

Somewhat higher lieth the Isle Vecta, in the British tongue Guith, in the Saxon, Wuiᵹ-land, and Wicſ-ea, for the Saxons tearmed an Iland Ea, wee The Isle of Wight, and Whight. Whereof also I have written before in the 273. page.

B Of Portland likewise, which now is no Iland, but annexed to the continent, I have treated heretofore in Dorsetshire in the page 210.

Hence will I cut over to the shore of France just against it; where from Beer-fleet in Normandy unto the midst of the Channell, the sea, by the Mariners saying, is paved, as it were, and overspred with rocks and cragges: among which, William sonne to King Henry the first, and heire both of England and of Normandy, whiles he crossed the seas out of Normandy into England, in the yeere of salvation 1120. was by woefull shipwracke, together with his sister, his base brother, and others of the floure of the nobility, drowned. Whereupon a Poet of that age thus versified.

C Abstulit hunc terræ matri maris unda noverca,
Proh dolor! occubuit Sol Anglicus, Anglia plora:
Quæq; prius fueras gemino radiata nitore,
Extincto nato vivas contenta parente.
Him, from the land his mother kind, the Sea a stepdame caught;
Now Englands Sunne, alas, is set: weepe England, weep for thought:
And thou that didst enjoy the beames of twofold light before,
Since Sonne is gone, content thy selfe with father and no more.

Funus plangendum, privat lapis æquoris unus,
D Et ratis una suo principe regna duo.
O dolefull day, one rocke in Ocean maine,
One barke of Prince bereaveth kingdomes twaine.

And another Poet at the same time hammered out these verses touching that shipwracke.

Dum Normannigenæ Gallis claris superatis,
Anglica regna petunt, obstitit ipse Deus:
Aspera nam fragili dum sulcant æquora cymba,
Intulit excito nubila densa mari.
E Dumque vagi cæco rapiuntur tramite nautæ,
Ruperunt imas abdita saxa rates.
Sic mare dum superans tabulata per ultima serpit,
Mersit rege satos, occidit orbis honos.
Whiles Normans after victories of Noble Frenchmen won,
Make saile for England, God himselfe withstood them all anon.
For as the rough and surging waves they cut with brittle barke,
He brought upon the troubled sea thicke fogges and weather darke:
Whiles sailers then in coasts unknowne were driven and hal'd astray,
Upon blind rockes their ships were split and quickly cast away.
F Thus when salt water entred in, and upmost hatches caught,
Drown'd was that royall progeny, worlds honour came to naught.

More Westward, certaine Ilands affront France, yet under the Crowne of England: and first of all upon the coast of Normandy, or the Lexobii (whom our Britans or Welshmen tearme Letaw, as one would say Litorales, that is, Coast-men) lieth

Alderney. Alderney, which in the Records is named Aurney, Aureney, and Aurigney: ſo that it A may ſeeme to be that ARICA, which in Antonine, according to the King of Spaines copie, is reckoned among the Iſles of the Britiſh ſea. Others hold it to be that EBODIA, or EVODIA, whereof Paulus Diaconus only hath made mention, who had ſmall skill of this coaſt; which he placeth thirty miles from the ſhore of Seine, and telleth of a rumbling & roaring noiſe of waters, falling into a gulfe or Charybdis, that is heard a far off. This Alderney lieth in the chiefe trade of all ſhipping paſſing from the Eaſterne parts to the Weſt: three leagues diſtant from the coaſt of Normandy, thirty from the neareſt part of England, extended from South Eaſt to the North Weſt, and containeth about eight miles in circuit, the South ſhore conſiſting of high cliffes. The B aire is healthfull, the ſoile ſufficiently rich, full of freſh paſtures and corn-fields: yet the inhabitants poore, through a cuſtome of parting their lands into ſmall parcells by Gavelkind. The towne is ſituate well neere in the midſt of the Iſle, having a pariſh Church, and about 80. families, with an harbour called Crabbic ſome mile off. On the Eaſt ſide there is an ancient fort, and a dwelling houſe built at the charge of the Chamberlans: for the fee farme of the Iſle was granted by Queene Elizabeth to G. Chamberlane, ſon to Sir Leonard Chamberlane of Shirburne in Oxfordſhire, when he recovered it from the French. And under this fort, the ſand with violent drifts from the Northweſt overlaied the land, ſo that now it ſerveth thereabout moſt for conies.

I know not whether I were beſt to relate of a Giants tooth, one of the grinders, C which was found in this Iland, of that bigge ſize that it equalled a mans fiſt; ſeeing Saint Auguſtine writeth of one that himſelfe ſaw, ſo bigge, that if it were cut in ſmall peeces to the proportion of our teeth, it ſeemed it might have made an hundred of them.

Caſquettes. Hence Weſtward there runneth out a craggy ridge of rockes, which have their ſeverall eddies, and therefore feared of the Mariners, who tearme them Caſquettes. Out of one of the which properly named Caſquet, there guſheth a moſt ſweet ſpring of freſh water, to the great comfort of the Iland-fiſhermen beating up and downe hereabout. At theſe, to remember incidently (that the memorie of a well-deſerving Patriot may not periſh) the fleet which John Philipot D Citizen of London ſet forth and manned at his owne private charges, had a glorious victorie over a rabble of Pirates, who impeached all trafficke, taking their Captaine, and fifteene Spaniſh ſhips that conſorted with them. Which worthy man alſo maintained 1000. ſouldiers at his owne pay for defence of the Realme againſt the French, who ſore infeſted the Southern coaſt in the beginning of the reigne of King Richard the ſecond, to omit his great loanes to the King, and other good and laudable offices to his country. Under theſe lieth Southward CÆSAREA, whereof Antonine hath written, ſcarce twelve miles diſtant from Alderney, which name the Frenchmen now have clipped ſo ſhort, as the Spaniards have CÆSAR AUGUSTA in Gerzey. Spaine: for they call it Gearzey, like as Cherburgh for Cæſarisburgus, and Saragoſe for E Cæſar auguſta. Gregorius Turonenſis calleth it, the Iland of the ſea that lieth to the City Conſtantia, where hee reporteth how Pratextatus Biſhop of Roan was confined hither: like as Papirius Maſſonius tearmeth it, the Iſle of the coaſt of Conſtantia, becauſe it butteth juſt upon the ancient city Conſtantia, which may ſeeme in Ammianus to Caſtra Conſtantia. Moritavum. be named CASTRA CONSTANTIA, and in the foregoing ages Moritonium. For Robert Montenſis writeth thus: Comes Moritonii, id eſt, Conſtantiarum, if that be not a gloſſe of the tranſcriber. For Moritonium, which now is Mortaigne, is farther diſtant from the ſea.

This Iſle is thirty miles or thereabout in compaſſe, fenced with rockes and ſhelves, which are ſhallow places, dangerous for ſuch as ſaile that way. The ground is fertile F enough, bearing plenty of ſundry ſorts of corne, and breeding cattaile of divers kindes, but ſheepe eſpecially, and moſt of them with faire heads, carrying foure hornes a peece. The aire is very wholſome and healthy, not ſubject to any other diſeaſes but agues in September, which thereupon they tearme Settembers, ſo that there is no being for Phyſicians here. And for that it is ſcarce of fuell, in ſteed of fire

A fire wood they uſe a kind of Sea weed which they call Uraic, deemed to be that Fucus marinus, which Plinie mentioneth, and groweth every where about in craggy Ilands, and on rockes moſt plenteouſly. This being dried at the fire, ſerveth for to burne; with the aſhes whereof (as it were with Marle and the fat of the earth) they dung commonly their fields and fallows, and thereby make them very battle & fruitfull. Neither are they permitted to gather it but in the ſpring and ſummer ſeaſon; and then upon certaine daies appointed by the Magiſtrate. At which time, with a certaine feſtivall mirth, they repaire in numbers from all parts to the ſhore with their carres, as alſo to the rockes neere unto them they ſpeed themſelves a vie with their B fiſher-boats. But whatſoever of this kind the ſea caſteth up, the poore may gather for their owne uſe. The inward parts of the Iſle gently riſe and ſwell up with pretty hills: under which lye pleaſant vallies watered with riverets, and planted with fruitfull trees, but apple trees eſpecially, of which they make a kind of drinke. Well ſtored it is with farme places and villages, having within it twelve Pariſhes, and furniſhed on every ſide with creekes and commodious rodes: among which the ſafeſt is that in the South part of the Iſle, betweene the two little townes, Saint Hilaries and Saint Albans: which harbour hath alſo a little Iland belonging to it, fortified with a gariſon, having no way of acceſſe unto it: wherein, by report, Saint Hilarie Biſhop of Poictiers, after he had beene baniſhed hither, was enterred. For the towne dedica- C ted to his name juſt over againſt this Iland is accounted the principall towne, both in regard of the mercate and trafficke there, as alſo of the Court of Juſtice which is there eſtabliſhed. On the Eaſt-ſide, where it faceth the citie Conſtantia, there is ſeated upon a ſteep rocke a moſt ſtrong caſtle, with an haughty name called Mont Orgueil, which is much beholden unto King Henry the fifth, who repaired it. The Governour of the Iſle is Captain thereof, who in times paſt was called the Cuſtos of the Iſle, and in Henry the third his reigne had a yeerely penſion of 200. pound. On the South ſide, but with longer diſtance betweene, Saint Malo is to be ſeene, having taken that new name of Maclou a very devout man, where before time it was called the city Diablintum, and in the ancient Notice, ALETUM: for in a Manuſcript of Iſi- D dor Mercator, we read thus in expreſſe termes, Civitas Diablintum &c. that is, the city Diablintum, which by another name is called Aletum. As for the inhabitants, they freſhly practice the feat of fiſhing, but give their minds eſpecially to husbandry: and the women make a very gainfull trade by knitting of hoſe, which they call Jarſey Stockes or Stockings.

Uraic.
Fucus marinus.

As touching the politicke ſtate thereof, a Governour ſent from the King of England is the chiefe Magiſtrate: hee appointeth a Bailiffe, who together with twelve Jurats or ſworne Aſſiſtants, and thoſe choſen out of the twelve ſeverall pariſhes, by the voices of the Pariſhioners, ſitteth to miniſter juſtice in Civill cauſes: in criminall matters he ſitteth but with ſeven of the ſaid ſworne aſſiſtants, and in cauſes of conſci- E ence to be decided by equity and reaſon with three.

Twenty miles hence North-weſt, lieth another Iland, which Antonine the Emperour in ancient time named SARNIA, we at this day Garnſey, lying out Eaſt and Weſt in faſhion of an harpe, neither in greatneſſe nor in fruitfulneſſe comparable to Jerſey; for it hath in it only ten pariſhes, yet is this to be preferred before it, becauſe it foſtereth no venemous thing therin, like as the other doth. It is alſo better fortified by naturall fenſes, as being encloſed round with a ſet of ſteepe rockes, among which is found that moſt hard and ſharpe ſtone Smyris (which we terme Emerill) wherewith Goldſmiths and Lapidaries clenſe, burniſh, and cut their precious ſtones, and glaziers alſo divide and cleave their glaſſe. Likewiſe it is of greater name for the commodiouſ- F neſſe of the haven, and the concourſe of merchants reſorting thither. For in the fartheſt part well neere Eaſtward, but on the South ſide, it admitteth an haven within an hollow Bay bending inward like an halfe Moone, able to receive tall ſhips; upon which ſtandeth Saint Peters, a little towne built with a long and narrow ſtreet, well ſtored with warlike munition, and ever as any warre is toward mightily repleniſhed with Merchants. For by an ancient priviledge of the Kings of England, here is is alwaies a continuall truce, as it were: and lawfull it is for Frenchmen and others, A how hot ſoever the warre is, to have repaire hither too and fro without danger, and to maintain entercourſe of trafficke in ſecurity. The entry of the haven, which is rockie, is fortified on both ſides with caſtles. On the left hand there is an ancient bulwarke or block-houſe, and on the right hand over againſt it ſtandeth another (called Cornet) upon an high rocke, and the ſame at every high water compaſſed about with the ſea. Which in Queene Maries daies, Sir Leonard Chamberlane Governour of the Iland, as alſo under Queene Elizabeth, Sir Thomas Leighton his ſucceſſour, cauſed to bee fortified with new workes. For here lieth for the moſt part the Governour of the Iland, and the Garriſon ſouldiers: who will in no hand ſuffer Frenchmen and B women to enter in. On the North ſide there is La-vall, a biland adjoining unto it, which had belonging thereto a covent of religious perſons, or a Priory. On the Weſt part neere unto the ſea, there is a lake, that taketh up a mile and halfe in compaſſe, repleniſhed with fiſh, but Carpes eſpecially, which for bigneſſe and pleaſant taſte are right commendable. The inhabitants are nothing ſo induſtrious in tilling of the ground as thoſe of Jarſey, but in navigation and trafficke of merchandiſe, for a more uncertaine gaine they be very painfull. Every man by himſelfe loveth to huſband his owne land, ſo that the whole Iland lieth in ſeverall, and is divided by encloſures into ſundry parcels: which they find not onely profitable to themſelves, but alſo a matter of ſtrength againſt the enemie. Both Ilands ſmile right pleaſantly upon C you, with much variety of greene gardens and orchards: by meanes whereof, they uſe for the moſt part a kinde of wine made of apples, which ſome call Siſera, and we Sydre. The inhabitants in both places are by their firſt originall either Normans or Britans, and ſpeake French: yet diſdaine they to be either reputed or named French, and can very well be content to be called Engliſh. In both Ilands likewiſe they burne Vraic for their fuell, or elſe ſea-coals brought out of England: and in both places they have wonderfull ſtore of fiſh, and the ſame manner of civill government.

Theſe Ilands, with others lying about them, belonged in old time to the Dukedom Normandy loſt. of Normandy, but when as Henry the firſt King of England had vanquiſhed his brother Robert, in the yeere of our Lord 1108. he annexed that Dukedom, and theſe D Ilands unto the kingdome of England. Since which time they have continued firme in loialtie unto England, even when John King of England being endited for murdering Arthur his Nephew, was by a definitive ſentence or arreſt of confiſcation, deprived of his right in Normandy, which he held in chiefe of the French King: yea moreover when the French had ſeized upon theſe Iſles, hee through the faithfull affection of the people twice recovered them. Neither revolted they when Henry the third King of England had, for a ſumme of money, ſurrendred his whole intereſt and right in Normandy. And ever ſince they have, with great commendation of their conſtancy, perſiſted faithfull unto the Crowne of England, and are the onely remaines that the Kings of England have of the ancient inheritance of William E the Conquerour, and of the Dutchy of Normandy: although the French other-whiles have ſet upon them, who from the neighbour coaſt of France have hardly this long time endured to ſee them appertaine not to France but to England. And verily Evan, a Welſh Gentleman, deſcended from the Princes of Wales, and ſerving Tillet. the French King, ſurprized Garneſey in the time of King Edward the third: but ſoone loſt it. And alſo in the reigne of King Edward the fourth, as appeareth by the records of the Realme, they ſeized upon the ſame: but through the valour of Richard Harleſton, valect of the Crowne (for ſo they termed him in thoſe daies) they were ſhortly diſſeized; and the King, in recompence of his valorous ſervice, gave unto him the Captainſhip both of the Iland and of the caſtle. And in the yeere 1549. when F England, under King Edward the ſixth a child, was diſtreſſed with domeſticall troubles, Leo Strozzi Captaine of the French Gallies gave the attempt to invade it, but with the loſſe of many of his men had the foile, and deſiſted from his enterpriſe.

As touching the Eccleſiaſticall juriſdiction, they were under the Biſhop of Conſtance in Normandy, untill that hee in our remembrance refuſed to abjure the Popes authority

A authority in England (as our Biſhops doe). Since which time they were by Queene Elizabeth ſevered from the Dioceſſe of Conſtance, and united for ever to the Dioceſſe of Winchester, ſo as the Biſhop of Winchester and his ſucceſſours execute every thing appertaining to the Epiſcopall juriſdiction: yet their Eccleſiaſticall diſcipline is conformable to the Church of Geneva, which the French Miniſters have brought in. As for the civill cuſtomes of theſe Ilands, I could now note ſome of them out of the Kings records: namely, How King John inſtituted twelve Coroners ſworn to keepe the pleas and rights belonging to the Crowne, and granted for the ſecurity of the Ilanders, that the Bailiffe henceforth by advice of the Coroners, might plead without writ
B of a new diſſeiſin made within the yeere, of the death of any anceſtours and predeceſſours within a yeere, of dowry likewiſe within a yeere, &c. Moreover, that the ſaid Juries may not delay their judgements beyond the tearme of one yeere: likewiſe that in Cuſtomes and other things they ſhould be dealt withall, as naturall inborn inhabitants, and not as ſtrangers or forrainers. But theſe points I think good to leave unto others, who may ſearch more curiouſly into particulars. Generally, the cuſtomes of Normandy take place here in moſt caſes.

Touching Serke, a little Iland that lieth betweene theſe above named, walled a- Serke.
bout, as it were, with mighty ſteepe rockes, in which I. de S. Owen of Jarſey (whoſe antiquity of deſcent ſome avouch (I know not upon what credit and authority) from C before Saint Owens time) by commiſſion from Queene Elizabeth, and for his owne commodity, as the report goeth, made a plantation, whereas before time it lay deſolate. As touching Jethow, which for the uſe of the Governour of Garnſey ſerveth in ſteed of a parke, to feed cattell, to keepe Deere, conies, and phesants: as alſo touching Arme, which being larger than the other, was firſt a ſolitary place for Regular Chanons, and after for the Franciſcan Friers; ſeeing they are not mentioned by the old writers, I have no reaſon to ſpeake much of them.

After theſe, upon the ſame coaſt, LIGA, whereof Antonine maketh mention, ſnooteth up his head, which retaineth the name ſtill, and is now called Ligon. Then lye there ſpread and ſcattered ſeven Ilands, termed by Antonine SIADÆ, of the num-
D ber: for Saith in the Britiſh tongue betokeneth ſeven; which the Frenchmen at this day terme Le ſet Iſles. And I ſuppoſe theſe Siades to be corruptly called Hiadatæ by Set-Iles.

From hence I will now cut over to the coaſts of our owne Britaine, and keeping along the ſhore, as I paſſe by Ideſton, Mouſhole, and Longſhips (which be rather infamous and dangerous rocks than Ilands) at the very utmoſt point of Cornwall, lieth Antonines LISIA, now called of them that dwell thereby Lethowſow, but of others The Gulfe, ſeene onely at a low water when the tide is returned. I take this to be that Liſia which ancient writers Liſia by tranſ-

For Dioniſius Alexandrinus named them Heſperides of their Weſterne ſituation, in theſe verſes.

Of ſtitched hides they all their veſſels make,
And oft through ſea in leather, voiage take.

Like veſſels unto which were uſed in this our ſea, in the yeere of ſalvation 914. For we read of certaine devout men, that in a Carab (or carogh) made of two tanned hides onely and an halfe, ſailed out of Ireland into Cornwall. Afterwards alſo of the ſaid Ilands the ſame Avienus wrote thus:

Tarteſiiſque in terminos Oeſtrymnidum
Negotiandi mos erat, Carthaginis F
Etiam colonis.

Thoſe of Tarteſſus eke, as well
As they in Carthage towne that dwell,
Were wont to trade for merchandiſe,
To ſkirts of Iſles Oeſtrymnides.

Other

A Other Greeke writers tearmed theſe Caſsiterides, of Tinne: like as Strabo nameth a certaine place among the Drangi in Aſia, CASSITERON, of Tinn: and Stephanus in his booke of Cities, reporteth out of Dionyſius, that a certaine Iland in the Indian ſea was called CASSITERIA, of Tinne. As for that MICTIS, which Pliny citeth out of Timæus, to bee ſixe dayes ſailing inward from Britaine, and to yeeld Mines of white lead; that it ſhould be one of theſe, I dare ſcarcely affirme. Yet am I not ignorant, that the moſt learned Hermolaus Barbarus read it in manuſcript books, Mitteris for Mictis, and doth read for Mitteris, Cartiteris. But that I ſhould avouch theſe to be thoſe CASSITERIDES ſo often ſought for, the authority of the ancient writers, their
B ſite, and the mines of Tinne, are motives to perſwade me. Full oppoſite unto the Artabri, ſaith Strabo (over againſt which the Weſt parts of Britain doe lye) appeare thoſe Ilands Northward which they call Caſsiterides, placed after a ſort in the ſame clime with Britaine. And in another place: The ſea between Spaine and the Caſſiterides is broader than that which lieth between the Caſſiterides and Britain. The Caſſiterides look toward the coaſt of Celtiberia, ſaith Solinus: And Diodorus Siculus, in the Ilands next unto the Spaniſh ſea, which of Tinne are called Caſſiterides. Alſo Euſtathius, There be ten Iſlands called Caſſiterides lying cloſe together Northward. Now, ſeeing theſe Iſles of Silly are oppoſite unto the Artabri, that is, Gallitia in Spaine, ſeeing they bend directly North from them, ſeeing they are placed in the ſame clime with Britaine, ſeeing
C they looke toward the coaſt of Celtiberia, ſeeing they are diſ-joined by a farre broader ſea from Spaine than from Britaine, ſeeing they are next unto the Spaniſh ſea, ſeeing they lye hard one by another toward the North, and ten onely of them bee of any good account, namely, Saint Maries, Annoth, Agnes, Sampſon, Silly, Breſer, Ruſco or Treſcaw, Saint Helens, Saint Martins, and Arthur, and that which is moſt materiall, ſeeing they have veines of Tinne, as no other Iland hath beſide them in this tract, and conſidering that two of the leſſe ſort, to wit, Minan Witham, and Minuiſſand, may ſeeme to have taken their names of Mines, I would rather think theſe to be CASSITERIDES, than either the Azores, which beare too far Weſt, or Ciſarga with Olivarius, that lieth in maner cloſe unto Spaine, or even Britain it ſelfe with Ortelius;
D conſidering there were many Caſsiterides; and Dionyſius Alexandrinus after he had treated of the Caſsiterides, writeth of Britaine apart by it ſelfe.

If any man by reaſon of the number deny theſe to be CASSITERIDES, for that they be more than ten, let him alſo number the Hæbudes and the Orcades, and if after the account taken, he finde neither more nor fewer with Ptolomee than five Hæbudes, and 30. Orcades, let him ſearch in any other place but where they are now extant, and with all his ſearching by reckoning of the numbers, I know for certaine he ſhall not eaſily finde them. But the ancient writers had no certaine knowledge of theſe moſt remote parts and Ilands of the earth in that age, no more than wee in theſe daies of the Iſles in the Streights of Magellane, and the whole tract of New Guiney.

E And that Herodotus had no knowledge of theſe, it is no marvell: for himſelfe confeſſeth that hee knew nothing for certaine, to make report of the fartheſt parts of Europe. But lead was brought firſt from hence into Greece. Lead, ſaith Plinie, in his eight Booke, and in the Chapter of the firſt Inventours of things, Midacritus firſt brought out of the Iſland Caſsitiris. But as touching theſe Iſlands, liſten what Strabo ſaith in his third Booke of Geography, toward the end. The Ilands Caſsiterides be in number ten, neere one unto another, ſituate in the deepe ſea, Northward from the haven of the Artabri. One of them is deſert, the reſt are inhabited by men wearing blacke garments, clad in ſide-coats reaching downe to their ankles, girt about the breaſt, and going with ſtaves, like unto the Furies in Tragedies. They live of their cattell,
F ſtraggling and wandring after a ſort, as having no certaine abiding place. Metall mines they have of tinne and of lead, in lieu whereof and of skins and furres they receive by exchange from the Merchants, earthen veſſels, ſalt, and braſen workes. At the beginning the Phœnicians only traded thither from Gades, and concealed from others this their navigation.

But when the Romanes followed a certaine Maſter of a ſhippe (that they themſelves might learne this traffick of merchandiſe) he, upon a ſpitefull envie, ran his ſhip for the A nonce upon the ſands; and after hee had brought them that followed after into the ſame danger of deſtruction, himſelfe eſcaped the ſhipwracke, and out of the common Treaſury received the worth of the commodities and wares that he loſt. Howbeit the Romans, after they had tryed many times, learned at length the voiage hither. Afterwards Publius Craſſus when hee had ſailed thither, and ſeene how they digged not very deepe in theſe Mines, and that the people were lovers of peace and lived quietly, deſirous alſo to ſaile upon the ſea, he ſhewed the feat thereof to as many as were willing to learne: although they were to ſaile a greater ſea than that which reacheth from thence to Britain.

But to diſcourſe no farther whether theſe were the ancient Caſſiterides or no, and B to returne to Silly. There bee about an hundred forty and five Ilands carrying this name, all clad with graſſe, or covered with a greeniſh moſſe, beſides many hideous rockes, and great craggy ſtones raiſing head above water, ſituate as it were in a circle round, eight leagues from the lands end, or utmoſt point of Cornewall Weſt-South-Weſt. Some of them yeeld ſufficient ſtore of corne, but all of them have abundance of conies, cranes, ſwannes, herons, and other ſea-foule. The greateſt of them all is that which tooke the name of Saint Marie, having a towne ſo named, and is about eight miles in compaſſe, offereth a good harbour to Saylers in a ſandie Bay, wherein they may anchor at ſixe, ſeven, and eight fathom; but in the entry lye ſome rockes on either ſide. It hath had anciently a caſtle, which hath yeelded to C the force of time. But for the ſame Queene Elizabeth in the yeere 1593. when the Spaniards, called in by the Leaguers of France, began to neſtle in little Britain, built Stella Maria. a new caſtle with faire and ſtrong ravelines, and named the ſame Stella Maria, in reſpect both of the ravelines, which reſemble the raies of a ſtarre, and the name of the Iſle; for defence whereof ſhee there placed a garriſon under the command of Sir Francis Godolphin.

Doubtleſſe theſe are thoſe Ilands, which (as Solinus writeth) a troublous and rough narrow ſea ſeparateth by the ſpace of two or three houres ſailing from the coaſt of the Danmony, and the inhabitants whereof obſerve the cuſtome of ancient times. They have no faires nor mercates, and refuſe mony; they give and take one thing for another, they pro- D vide themſelves of neceſſaries by way of exchange, rather than by priſing and giving of money, they ſerve the gods devoutly: both men and women will be counted wizzards, and skilfull in foretelling things to come.

Euſtathius out of Strabo termeth the inhabitants Melanchlanos, becauſe they were clad in blacke garments reaching downe to the ankles: and as Sardus was perſwaded, they depart out of this world for the moſt part ſo long livers, that they deſire to live no longer. For from the top of a rocke (as he ſaith) they throw themſelves into the ſea, in hope of a more happy life: which doubtleſſe was the perſwaſion of the Britain Druides.

Hither alſo the Roman Emperours were wont to ſend perſons condemned to work E in the Mines. For Maximus the Emperour, when he had condemned Priſcillanus to death for hereſie, commanded his ſectaries and diſciples, Jaſtantius a Biſhop of Spain, and Tiberianus, after their goods were confiſcate, to be carried away into the Ilands of Sylly: and Marcus the Emperour baniſhed him, that in the commotion of Caſſius had propheſied and uttered many things, as it were by a divine inſtinct of the gods, into this Iland, as ſome are verily perſwaded, who willingly for Syria Inſula read Sylia Inſula, that is, The Iſle of Silly, conſidering the Geographers as yet know no ſuch Vlpian lib. 7. de Mathematicis. Iland as Syria. This confining or packing away of offendors into Ilands, was in thoſe daies a kind of exile; and the Governours of Provinces might in that manner baniſh, if they had any Ilands under them: if not, they wrote unto the Emperour, that him- F ſelfe would aſſigne ſome Iland for the party condemned: neither was it lawfull without the privity of the Prince to tranſlate elſe whither, or to bury the body of him that was thus baniſhed into an Iland.

In the Writers of the middle time wee finde not ſo much as the name of theſe

A theſe Ilands of Sylly, but onely that King Athelſtane ſubdued them, and after his returne built a Church in honour of S. Beriane or Buriene, in the utmoſt promontory Weſtward of Britaine, where he landed.

Full againſt theſe on the French coaſt, lyeth Plinies AXANTOS, an Iſle right before the Oſiſſimi, or Britaine Armorie, which keeping ſtill the name whole, is called Uſhant: Antonine tearmethit UXANTIS SENA, in which one word two Ilands grew together, to wit, UXANTIS and SENA. For this Iland lieth ſomewhat lower, now called Sayn, which butting full upon Breſt, is named in ſome copies SIAMBIS, and of Pliny corruptly Soumos: about which from Eaſt to Weſt, for ſeven miles to-

B gether or thereabout, there ſhoot forth a number of rockes rather than Ilands, ſtanding very thick together. Touching this Sain, take with you that which Pomponius Mela reporteth. SENA, ſaith he, lying in the Britiſh ſea oppoſite unto the ſhores of the Oſiſſimi, is famous by reaſon of the Oracle of a French God, whoſe ſhee-Prieſts vowing perpetuall virginity, are ſaid to be nine in number: the Frenchmen call them Zenas or Lenas, (for ſo read I with Turnebus, rather than Gallitenas) and men are of opinion, that they being endued with eſpeciall endowments of nature, are able by enchantments to trouble the ſea, and raiſe up windes, to turne themſelves into what living creatures they liſt, to heale all thoſe maladies, which with others are incurable, for to know alſo and to foretell things to come, &c.

Axantos.

Uſhant.

Siambis.

Mariners call it the Seame.

C Beneath theſe there lie other Ilands in length, namely, Iſles aux Motions, neere unto Pen-Mac, that is, the horſe head: Gleran over againſt old Blavic (which at this day is Blavet) Groix and Belliſle, all which Pliny calleth VENETICÆ. For they lye oppoſite unto the Veneti in little Britaine, who I wot not whether they were ſo named, as one would ſay, Fiſhermen: for Venna in the ancient language of the Galls ſeemeth to ſignifie ſo much. Theſe Strabo ſuppoſeth to have been the founders and ſtockfathers of the Venetians in Italy: who writeth alſo, that they intended to have given Cæſar battell at ſea, when he minded the conqueſt of Britaine. Theſe Ilands VENETICÆ, ſome out of Dionyſius Afer terme NESIDES, whereas in the Greek book we read Νησιάδων πόρῳ, that is, the Tract of the Iſlands. Of which, Priſcian out of him writeth Veneti.

Inſulæ Venetiticæ.
Vannes.
Venna Caroli, i. Charles Fiſhing, as Helgardus ſaith.
Neſidæ.

D thus;

Nec ſpatio diſtant Neſſidum littora longè,
*In quibus uxores * Amnitum Bacchica ſacra*
Concelebrant hederæ foliis, teſtæque corymbis.
Non ſic Biſtonides Abſynthi ad flumina Thraces, Exertis celebrant clamoribus ἐγχωρίων.

* Samnitum.

Nor diſtant farre from hence the ſhores doe lye
Of Ilands, which Neſſides many call,
Wherein the wives of Amnites ſolemnly
Concelebrate their high feaſts Bacchanall
E With Ivie leaves and berries covered all.
The Thracian dames make not ſo loud a cry,
At Bacchus feaſt, the river Abſynts by.

Which Feſtus Avienus alſo hath expreſſed in theſe verſes:

Hinc ſpumoſus item ponti liquor explicat æſtum,
Et brevis è pelago vortex ſubit: hic chorus ingens
Fœminei cœtus pulchri colit Orgia Bacchi, Producit noctem ludus ſacer: æra pulſant
Vocibus & crebris latè ſola calcibus urgent.
Non ſic Abſynthi propè flumina Thraces, & almæ
F Biſtonides, non quà celeri ruit agmina Ganges, Indorum populi ſtata curant feſta Lyæo.

From hence likewiſe the foaming ſea diſplaies his ſwelling tide,
And from the deep ſhort whirle puffs riſe. Here by the water ſide,
A mighty ſort of women meet, the feaſt of Bacchus faire
To celebrate: their ſacred ſports laſt all night long. The aire

Rings over head with voices ſhrill: and under foot, the ground
With many a friske and ſtampe of theirs in dancing doth reſound.
Like noiſes make not Thracian Dames, the Biſton wives, I ſay, Along Abſynthus river, while they uſe to ſport and play:
Nor Indians neere ſwift Ganges ſtreame farre in ſuch frantick wiſe.
Bacchus. What time to God Liæus they their ſet feaſts ſolemnize.

Now that Belliſle is one of theſe foreſaid Neſsidæ, the authority of Strabo, from the faithfull report of other, doth prove ſufficiently. For it lieth before the mouth of the river Loire: and Ptolomee placed the SAMNITÆ in a coaſt of France oppoſite unto it. For thus writeth Strabo. Moreover (they ſay) there is a little Iland in the Ocean, lying not far into the deep ſea, full againſt the mouth of Ligeris: that in it inhabite the wives of the Samnitæ, which are inſpired with the inſtinct or divine power of Bacchus, and by ceremonies and ſacrifices procure the favour of Bacchus: that no man commeth thither, but themſelves taking their barkes ſaile away and company with their owne huſbands, and ſo returne againe into the Iſland. Alſo that a cuſtome it is among them, to take away the roofe of their temple yeerly, and to cover it again the very ſame day before the ſunne ſetteth; every one of the women bringing their burden: and look which of them letteth her burden fall, ſhe is by the others torne in pieces: and that they gathering together the pieces as they goe unto the temple, make not an end before they be out of this furious fit: and that it alwaies uſually happeneth, that one of them by falling downe of her burthen is thus torne peecemeale.

Thus old Authors, writing of the utmoſt parts of the world, took pleaſure to inſert pretty lyes and frivolous fables. But what things are reported of Ceres and Proſerpine, they carry with them, ſaith he, more probability. For the report goeth of an Iland neere unto Britaine, where they ſacrifice to theſe Goddeſſes after the ſame manner that they doe in Samothrace.

Then follow the Iſles aux Mottouns, Gleran, Grois, Belle-iſle, upon the coaſt of little Britaine, Niermouſtier, and L'iſle de Dieu upon the coaſt of Poictou, and Liſle de Re, Iſlands full well knowne, and much frequented for the plenty that they yeeld of bay ſalt: but for as much as they are not once mentioned by the ancient Geographers, it may be ſufficient for me that I have named them. Onely the next Iſland, at this day Oleron. knowne by the name of Oleron, was knowne to Pliny by the name of Uliarus. ULIARUS, which lieth, as he ſaith, in the Bay of Aquitaine, at the mouth of the river Charonton, now Charent, and had many immunities granted from the Kings of England, then Dukes of Aquitain. At which time it ſo flouriſhed for marine diſcipline and glory, that theſe ſeas were governed by the lawes enacted in this Iland in the yeere 1266.
Lex Rhodia. no leſſe than in old time the Mediterranean ſea by the lawes of Rhodes.

Hitherto have I extended the Britiſh ſea, both upon the credit of Pomponius Mela, who ſtretcheth it to the coaſt of Spaine; and upon the authority of the Lord Great Admirall of England. Admirall of England, which extendeth ſo far. For the Kings of England were, and are rightfull Lords of all the North and Weſt ſea-coaſts of France (to ſay nothing of the whole kingdome and crowne of France) as who, to follow the tract of the ſea-coaſt, Hereditary territories in France belonging to the Crowne of England. wan the county of Guines, Merk, and Oye by the ſword, were true heires to the county of Ponthieu and Monſtrevil by Eleanor the wife of King Edward the firſt, the onely heire thereof. In like maner moſt certain heires to the Dutchy of Normandy by King William the Conquerour, and thereby ſuperiour Lords of Little Britaine dependant thereof; undoubted heires of the counties of Anjou, Tourain, and Maine, from King Henry the ſecond, whoſe patrimony they were: likewiſe of the county of Poictou, and Dutchy of Aquitaine or Guyenne, by Eleanor the true heire of them, wife to the ſaid Henry the ſecond; to omit the counties of Tholouſe, March, the homage of Auvergne, &c. Of all which the French by their arreſts of pretended forfaitures and confiſcations have diſſeized the crowne of England, and annexed them to the Crowne of France; taking advantage of our moſt unhappy civill diſſentions: whereas in former ages the French Kings were ſo fore-cloſed by theſe territories, as they had no acceſſe at all to the Ocean.

Nothing

A Nothing remaineth now, ſeeing my pen hath with much labour ſtruggled and ſailed at length out of ſo many blind ſhelves and ſhallowes of the Ocean, and craggy rocks of antiquity, ſave onely this, that as ſea-men were wont in old time, to preſent Neptune with their torn ſails, or ſome ſaved planks, according to their vow: ſo I alſo ſhould conſecrate ſome monument unto the ALMIGHTY and MOST GRACIOUS GOD, and to VENERABLE ANTIQUITY: which now right willingly and of duty I vow, and God willing in covenient time I will performe and make good my vow. Meane while I would have the Reader to remember, that I have in this worke wraſtled with that envious and ravenous enemy TIME, of which the Greeke Poet
B ſung very aptly in this note.

Αγαλέως φέρει πολιὸς χρόνος, ἀλλὰ παρέρπων,
Καὶ φωνὰς κλέπτει φθεγγομένων μερόπων.
Καὶ μὴ φαινόμενος τὺς φαινομένους ἀφανίζει,
Καὶ μὴ φαινομένους εἰς φανερὸν προσφέρει.

Hore-headed TIME full ſlowly creeps, but as he flye doth walke,
The voices he as ſlyely ſteales of people as they talke:
C Unſeene himſelfe, thoſe that be ſeene he hides farre out of ſight,
And ſuch againe as are not ſeene he bringeth forth to light.

But I for my part am wont ever and anon to comfort my ſelfe with this Diſtichon of Mimnermus, which I know to be moſt true.

Τὴν σ' αὐτῆ φρένα τέρπε, δυσελεγίων δὲ πολιτῶν,
Αλλός τις σε χαχῶς, ἄλλος ἄμεινον ἐρεῖ.

D Heart take thine eaſe,
Men hard to pleaſe
Thou haply maiſt offend:
Though one ſpeake ill
Of thee, ſome will Say better, there an end.
